"One good edition of Byron was wanted, and Mr. Murray should have produced it several years ago.

There has not, in our judgment, been a decline of interest in Byron's poetry, as is often asserted. Looking at the saleable poets of twenty years ago, he sells still; many of them do not.

But we see no reason to expect an extraordinary demand for other editions because at last a good one appears."

DARLINGTON.

MESSRS. BAILEY & Co. write:

We do not think the two new editions of Byron's works called for, nor do we expect a new demand for his works—although, to our surprise, we have received one order for Mr. Murray's issue. We rarely hear Byron's name mentioned, and it is our experience that it does not pay to keep his poetry in stock."

BRIGHTON.

MESSRS. D. B. FRIEND & Co. write:

"We do not think the exhaustive editions of Lord Byron's work now in course of preparation for the press are called for. The popularity of Byron's poetry has considerably declined of late years. We do not think there is at all likely to be a new Byron rage. We have still a few customers who read Byron, but they are very limited. The sale of his works has been very for many years."

CHELTENHAM.

MR. JOHN BANKS writes:

"Byron's poems are certainly not so much in demand as they were a few years ago, and they have lost ground compared with some of his contemporaries—Shelley, for instance. I should think a revival in Byron is very uncertain, but it is difficult to predict how the British public will or will not catch on to a new effort."

DRAMA.

THE Americanisation of the London stage proceeds apace. At the present moment three American companies are acting in London—at the Adelphi, the Shaftesbury, and the Garrick—while a play of American origin holds the St. James's. This is a wholly unprecedented state of things. It can hardly be expected to last, though the Frohman management of New York, a very powerful organisation, is making a determined effort to bring London within its sphere of influence. So far, this American invasion is not exempt from the usual fortune of war—that is to say, it has its failures and its successes, neither of which occur exactly according to anticipation. Last week I pointed out that the weakness of "The Heart of Maryland" found an agreeable set-off in the attractiveness of "The Belle of New York." This week's report is hardly so favourable to American interests. "The Conquerors," given at the St. James's, from the pen of Mr. Paul M. Potter, is an extremely disagreeable play so far as theme is concerned—the most grating to the nerves that I remember—and I do not imagine it can enjoy in London anything but a succès de scandale; while "Too Much Johnson," at the Garrick, proves to be a rather commonplace French farce, overlaid with a veneer of American mannerism and a coating of American humour that dries the moment the actors lay it on.

"THE CONQUERORS" has been compounded for the most part out of incidents of the Franco-German War, recorded or invented by Guy de Maupassant, opening with a well-known scene in "Mlle. Fifi," in which a party of German officers billeted in an old Breton chateau entertain at dinner a number of French cocottes. The Germans behave as unspeakable cad, particularly a young lieutenant, one Von Rodeck, who, before sitting down at table, amuses himself by firing his revolver at works of art on the walls, and at dinner proposes a toast to German victories—victories over French men and French women alike. It is a riotous party, in which some semblance of patriotism and protest is aroused even in the hearts of the abandoned women. On the first night a foreign voice from the stalls protested against the scene as "disgraceful." It is said to have been that of a German financier, who immediately left the theatre; but it might with equal reason have been a Frenchman's or even an Englishman's. The author himself relieves the feelings of the house by a protest which he assigns to the youthful châteline, Mlle. de Grandpré, who, coming upon the scene, dashes a glass of wine in Von Rodeck's face. It is Mr. George Alexander who appears as Von Rodeck, and Miss Julia Neilson as Mlle. de Grandpré, surely the strangest relationship in which hero and heroine were ever placed on the stage. Nor does the unsympathetic character of the story cease with the first act. It is continued in a still more odious form in the second. Von Rodeck does not tamely accept his rebuke. He plots a despicable revenge, which is nothing less than to rob the heroine of her honour, a project which he arranges to carry out in a deserted tavern whither the lady has betaken herself in the hope of meeting with her brother, a spy and a fugitive. Of course, the villain, for such one is bound to call this soldier hero, does not proceed to extremities, though he goes far enough to accentuate the already sufficiently disagreeable character of the story. Once the hapless woman is in his power, pleading for mercy, he relents and leaves her. But she is not, as he supposes, alone. The rascally cabaretier, a Frenchman, pops out of the cellar, and proceeds to strangle her in order to rob her of her money. At that moment Von Rodeck, attracted by the noise, returns, kills the would-be murderer, and again leaves the woman unconscious.

At this stage of the story the author's dramatic scheme begins to be perceived, and it is assuredly one of the most audacious that a dramatist could undertake. He actually hopes to claim our sympathy for that heretofore unmitigated cub, Von Rodeck, and finally to unite him in matrimony with the object of his foul desires. In so doing, it has been said that he "bites off more than he can chew," and this graphic saying of Mr. Potter's countrymen to my mind exactly expresses the situation. Love is the touchstone with which the attempt is made to transform the despicable creature into an acceptable hero, and the author has a powerful coadjutor in Mr. Alexander, one of the most sympathetic of jeunes premiers. But Von Rodeck's offences against good breeding, good manners, and common manliness are too odious to be condoned in a last act—or so at least I feel them to be. With Miss Julia Neilson's assistance, the same revirement is attempted in the case of the heroine, and with just as little success. The influence of love is supposed to operate even more quickly in her case. In the middle of the third act Mlle. de Grandpré still believes in the lieutenant's turpitudes and avenges her lost honour as she supposes by trying to plunge a dagger into his back. But eventually she gathers that he abstained at the last moment from carrying his vile project against herself into effect, and not only so, but that he murdered the cabaretier in her defence, and the fourth and last act is devoted to a tardy but unsatisfactory reconciliation between the strangely incongruous couple. Mr. Potter fails to realise how completely his would-be happy ending conflicts not only with the rules, but even with the exceptions of human nature. He has more promising material to work upon in arranging a union between another German officer and a younger sister of the heroine's—parts played by Mr. Esmond and Miss Fay Davis; but even here probability, despite the tact and skill of the performers, is severely strained. War is not a plausible foster-mother of the tender passion. Like "The Heart of Maryland," this drama opportunely sets forth the horrors of campaigning. A German general callously orders a couple of unoffending French tradesmen to be taken out and shot as spies, the incident only momentarily interrupting his game of cards; and a band of comic opera French peasants render themselves despicable by dancing the Carmagnole in celebration of unfounded French victories. Most of the acting is excellent. Among other performers deserving mention are Mr. Fred Terry as a French spy wearing German uniform, Mr. H. B. Irving as a French cut-throat, and Mr. W. H. Vernon as a grizzled German general. But, frankly, "The Conquerors" is not a piece that I would care to see again.

"TOO MUCH JOHNSON," an adaptation from the French by Mr. Gillette, who also enacts the principal character, is couched in the frivolous vein, being, in fact, a version of a story that has done duty in French farce under many forms for fifty years or more. The immediate source of Mr. Gillette's inspiration is a farce by M. Maurice Ordonneau, entitled "La Plantation Thomassin" already known to the English stage under the name of "The Planter." It is a variant of the theme of "La Flamboyante," by Hennequin, recently seen at the Comedy Theatre as "The Saucy Sally"; and in the latest Parisian success M. Bisson has worked it up afresh under the title of "Le Controleur des Wagons-lits." Broadly speaking, the idea consists in a flighty husband excusing his frequent absences from home on the ground that he is pursuing some occupation elsewhere, as the captain of a ship, as a travelling railway official, and so on. Mr. Gillette's hero, one Billings, is a New Yorker, who professes to own a plantation in Cuba. In all cases the inquisitiveness of a mother-in-law leads to the discovery of the pot-aux-roses. Billings is compelled to conduct his wife and mother-in-law to Cuba to show them his famous plantation; but guards himself against discovery, as he fondly imagines, by writing to a Cuban friend to ask to be allowed to play the part of planter for a week or two. Unfortunately, by the time the party arrive in Cuba, the plantation has changed hands, being in the possession of a stranger of the name of Johnson, who knows nothing of Billings's little scheme. Whence it will be seen a pretty game of cross-purposes and misunderstandings.

To add to the mystification, Billings has been in the habit of carrying on his flirtations as a Mr. Johnson, and has otherwise accumulated peccadilloes without number upon the head of this mythical personage, little dreaming that upon his Cuban plantation he would meet a Mr. Johnson in the flesh. It is the time-honoured formula of the genre, and Mr. Gillette is scarcely frank enough in owning to have borrowed merely "an idea" from the French. The character he plays, that of Billings, is the regulation flighty husband, the mari garçon of the French stage, confronted with unexpected difficulties but cool and resourceful throughout, as Mr. Wyndham and Mr. Hawtrey have so often shown us. Mr. Gillette, who played so impressively as the spy in "Secret Service," imports into the part of Billings exactly the same imperturbability of manner. He never turns a hair, but placidly smokes a cigar with everybody in a state of turmoil and hurry-scurry around him. Combined with his pronounced American drawl, the method is effective for a time, but it tends to monotony and leaves the auditor with an uneasy feeling that the actor possesses little or no versatility. The only other character of note is that of Johnson, the real Johnson, depicted by Mr. Brennan as a brutal, drunken savage of the Legree type—not a person to trifle with, by any means. There is grim humour in this conception. But while the remaining characters are conventional in type, and dramatically insignificant, they convey a pleasing and palatable flavour of Americanism. The commonplace French story has acquired a quaint exoticism in coming to us via New York. J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MALLOCK'S "CONTEMPORARY SUPERSTITION."

SIR,—The letter to Mr. W. H. Mallock in the ACADEMY of April 9 "has doubtless been read with much interest by many of those who admire his writings. As one of these, I should like to add something to the criticism. It is strange that while mentioning, at least by name, most of his works—novels, poems, &c.—the writer should have omitted any notice of one of the most characteristic productions—the volume entitled Studies of Contemporary Superstition."

Probably it was meant to be included in the third division of Mr. Mallock's writings, those "sociological and philosophical" essays which the critic admits he "always reads with pleasure for their clearness of thought and precision of statement."

The volume in question is a collection of papers previously contributed to the Fortnightly Review. To anyone who has felt the peculiar spell of The New Republic it will appear in all essentials very much like its predecessor. There is the same masterly grasp of the subject, and the same light touch in the handling of it, as if the writer were so familiar with the problem before him that he could afford—in a well-known phrase—to play with it.

Like The New Republic, too, it is a satire on the prevailing thought of the day as represented in its various propounders.

Instead of Matthew Arnold, Jowett, Pater, we have Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. Herbert Spencer and Mrs. Humphry Ward. It is true that here they are attacked openly and face to face, while in The New Republic the personalities were disguised—or supposed to be—under a veil of fiction. But throughout the essays there is the same delightful satire, the same irresistible humour. In the first of these the author examines the "scientific basis of optimism," a rather alarming title to the uninitiated. He explains with great care and precision the so-called religion of humanity, and the emotions it is supposed to inspire. Chief among these is gratitude—nay, adoration, towards those who have contributed to the welfare of mankind; and contentment in the reflection how largely the benefit has been enjoyed. Then he writes:

"To some of the remotest of our contemporaries we owe some of our homeliest comforts. To take one instance out of many, we owe tea to the Chinese. Now does any English tea-drinker feel any worshipping gratitude to the Chinese? or, supposing we were to discover on some Egyptian papyrus a receipt for making a certain delicious tart, the pleasure we might take in the eating of it would have nothing to do with any gratification it gave Sesostris."

Could even the gravest professor of the "Creed of Optimism" read passages like these without laughing?

Both in the Studies and in The New Republic there are endless short and witty sayings which have become, like much of Arnold's prose, part of the language of the day. It would be difficult to find a more scathing criticism of a certain class of thinker than that famous passage describing the unlucky Dr. Jenkinson, whose mental attitude consisted of "a few fragments of science imperfectly understood, obscured by a few fragments of Christianity imperfectly remembered."

It is true that the Studies are cast in a less popular form than The New Republic. They require a certain application to render them intelligible. It would be, I think, an excellent mental tonic to read them in conjunction with Mr. Leslie Stephens's Agnostic's Apology and Mr. John Morley's Studies in Literature.—I am, &c.,

E. FORSTER.

Ashburton, Devon.

A CORRECTION.

SIR,—Allow me to say that M. Maspero did not alter Champollion le jeune's name into "Champoleon," as the review of Canon Rawlinson's book in last week's ACADEMY makes him do. I know it is as difficult to get English compositors to spell French names correctly as it is to get French ones to spell English; but it will seem cruel to many that the Father of Egyptology should thus be slighted by his most distinguished successor. The meaning of the third inverted comma would puzzle even his ingenuity.—I am, &c.,

YOUR REVIEWER.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The Jew, the Gypsy, and El Islam." Edited by W. H. Wilkins. THE question whether Sir Richard Burton had gypsy blood in his veins has been raised by this book, and it has interested the critics. The Daily Chronicle's critic finds corroboration of this idea in a circumstance connected with the inception of Burton's paper on "The Gypsy":

"In 1875 he was drawn into a discussion with M. Paul Bataillard, who had challenged him on the score of priority in a letter to the ACADEMY; and the 150 pleasant and valuable pages now printed by Mr. Wilkins grew out of, or were made to rest upon, this discussion. They were well worth rescuing from his posthumous papers. If the author had lived he would have added several chapters on the European gypsies, and he might have recast the whole treatise in a more systematic form. Whether or no he would have satisfied the curiosity of those who imagined that he had gypsy blood in his veins it is impossible to say. Probably not, since Lady Burton had nothing definite to tell us on the subject in her Life. But there is a curious note in his MS., appended to a remark by M. Bataillard, that 'he ought, perhaps, to have been better acquainted with the gypsies.' 'What,' says Burton, 'does the author know about my acquaintance with the gypsies, especially the Burton gypsies?' To our mind, the last four words are all but conclusive. At any rate, they show that Sir Richard was not unwilling to have it supposed that he was descended from the gypsy Burtons. As, however, in that case it would appear that candour required him to make a profession of his descent, especially in connexion with his ethnographic and literary study of the tribe, it may be more natural to suppose that he was uncertain as to his gypsy origin, though his sympathies and his name made him very willing to entertain the idea. He would certainly not have thought that there was any necessary degradation in such an origin."

In the Daily Telegraph Mr. W. L. Courtney dwells on the same interesting suggestion:

"There is some reason for supposing that he was a gypsy himself, for Burton is one of the half-dozen distinctively Romany names, and there were many characteristics in the man which seemed to betray his ancestry. He was incurably restless, and this is, of course, a badge of the gypsy tribe; but, more than this, he had the gypsy 'eye.' Whatever other things may change in the long peregrinations of the Romany race, throughout all the ages of their history they have possessed a peculiar eye, which looks through you and beyond you, bright one moment, and then glazing over as though it perceived something behind the immediate presentments of sense. This is why the gypsies have made such very good fortune-tellers, mesmerists, and hypnotists; and because he too possessed a like characteristic Sir Richard Burton was always claimed by the gypsies themselves. 'We never entered a gypsy camp,' says Lady Burton, in her life of her husband, 'without a remark from our hosts, "What are you doing with a black coat on? Why don't you join us and be our King?"' I do not know whether John Bunyan also possessed the gypsy eye, but he is often supposed to have belonged to the race. So, too, Masaniello, and, though it may not add much credit to the blood, the pugilist Jem Mace."

While the foregoing critics select the paper on the gypsies as the most interesting of the three, the Standard critic thinks Burton's paper on "The Jew" is the best in the volume. Mr. Wilkins's statement that he is holding over certain appendices in which Burton attempts to prove the existence of the rite of human sacrifice among the Sephardin or Eastern Jews (especially in connexion with the murder of Padre Tomaso at Damascus in 1840), is not satisfying to the Standard critic, who replies:

"In regard to this matter, we think he has said either too much or too little. The general purport of the former document can be gathered from the essay. The mention of its existence to a certain extent gives strength to the charge therein implied. Either the subject should not have been named, or the editor should have said, if that were his reason for not publishing the MS., that its statements needed substantiation, and might be held to be libellous. Burton, as we have said, evidently disliked the Jew. Nowhere is that more obvious than in referring to this matter. In the last chapter, under the title of 'The Continuity of Tradition in the East,' he gives a long list of charges against the Jews of having murdered, often by crucifixion, Christians, more especially children. That a downtrodden race, itself often cruelly treated, may now and again, especially either in uncivilised countries or in darker ages, have secretly taken savage vengeance on representatives of their tyrants, is too possible; but do they stand alone in this? and has there never been miscarriage of justice in such cases, even in the present century? But Burton's objection to the Jew rests on a broader basis than this. It may be summed up in the one word that the Jew is a Separatist. He is among the nations, but not of them. He will deal with them, but, where he is most truly the Jew, will not mingle with them. . . . He suffers from the distrust which sooner or later must attach itself to every caste, whether it be dignified by religion or degraded by greed; for to be tolerant of the intolerant is never easy, and, as Burton held, it is not always wise."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, April 21.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &c.

SCIENCE IN RELATION TO MIRACLES, SPECIAL PROVIDENCES, AND PRAYERS. By Rev. J. J. Lias, M.A. James Nisbet & Co.

A HANDY BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By the Rev. Edward L. Cutts, D.D. S.P.C.K.

THE PERFECT LAW OF LIBERTY: A PLEA FOR FREEDOM OF THOUGHT IN THE SERVICE OF FAITH. By Vindex. George Redway.

THE MISSIONARY EXPANSION OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES. By the Rev. J. A. Graham, M.A. R. & R. Clark (Edinburgh).

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF HEREFORD: A DESCRIPTION OF ITS FABRIC AND A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE EPISCOPAL SEE. By A. Hugh Fisher. George Bell & Sons. 1s. 6d.

THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY: THE ENGLISH REFORMATION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES. Four Lectures. By William Edward Collins, M.A. S.P.C.K.

THE ELECTOR KING AND PRIEST. By Andrew Simon Lamb. James Nisbet & Co. 1s.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge, M.A. POETRY: Vol. I. John Murray.

TENTATIVES. By David B. Mungo. Alexander Gardner.

STORIES FROM THE CLASSIC LITERATURE OF MANY NATIONS. Edited by Bertha Palmer. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

THE SPECTATOR. Vol. VI. Edited by G. Gregory Smith. J. M. Dent & Co. 3s.

HANNIBAL: A DRAMA. By Louisa Shore. Grant Richards.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

A STUDENT'S TEXT-BOOK OF ZOOLOGY. By Adam Sidgwick, M.A., F.R.S. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

WITH PEARY NEAR THE POLE. By Eivind Astrup. Translated from the Norwegian by H. J. Bull. C. A. Pearson, Ltd.

EDUCATIONAL.

SAPPHO VON FRANZ GRILLPARZER. Edited by Walter Rippmann, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s.

SACS ET PARCHEMINS. Par Jules Sandeau. Edited by Eugène Pellissier. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

L'ABBÉ DANIEL. Par André Theuriet. Edited by P. Desargès. Macmillan & Co.

UNIVERSITY TUTORIAL SERIES: EURIPIDES; HIPPLYTUS. Edited by John Thompson, M.A., and B. J. Hayes, M.A. W. B. Clive. 3s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES OF GRAMMAR: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE LAWS OF LANGUAGE BY THE INDUCTIVE METHOD. By Herbert J. Davenport and Anna M. Emerson. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

ZWISCHEN DEN SCHLACHTEN VON OTTO ELSTER. Adapted and edited by L. Hirsch, Ph.D. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

JUVENILE.

PRINCE PATRICK: A FAIRY TALE. By Arnold Graves. Downey & Co.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WHAT IS SOCIALISM? By Scotsburn. Isbister & Co. 7s. 6d.

FLOWER FAVOURITES: THEIR LEGENDS, SYMBOLISM, AND SIGNIFICANCE. By Lizzie Deas. George Allen. 3s. 6d.

THE CENTURY ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE. November 1897, to April, 1898. The Century Co. (New York).

ST. NICHOLAS. November, 1897, to April, 1898. The Century Co. (New York).

AN EIGHT-HOURS DAY: THE CASE AGAINST TRADE UNION AND LEGISLATIVE INTERFERENCE. By W. J. Shaxby. "The Liberty Review" Publishing Co., Ltd. 2s. 6d.

THE FIRST COLLEGE OPEN TO WOMEN—QUEEN'S COLLEGE, LONDON: MEMORIES AND RECORDS OF WORK DONE, 1848-1898. Edited by Mrs. Alec Tweedie. Queen's College.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THREE novels are promised by Messrs. Innes about the end of the month, the writers being all ladies: Prisoners of Hope, by Miss Constance Smith; The Island of Seven Shadows, by Miss Roma White; and A Woman's Privilege, by Miss Marguerite Bryant.

THE Rev. G. St. Clair, for many years lecturer to the Palestine Exploration Fund, will issue almost immediately, through Mr. David Nutt, an elaborate study on the beginnings of mythology and its relation to early astronomical theories, entitled "Creation Records—Studies in the Book of the Dead."

MESSRS. W. THACKER & Co. will have ready the first week in May a new (illustrated) edition of Boulger's History of China.

THE first edition of Mr. William O'Brien's new novel, A Queen of Men, has been subscribed prior to publication. Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will have a second ready in a few days.

A NEW edition of Sir George Cornewall Lewis's Remarks on the Use and Abuse of some Political Terms is in preparation at the Clarendon Press. It is edited, with notes and introduction, by Thomas Raleigh, D.C.L., Fellow of All Souls.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish immediately an account of the campaign in Mashonaland, by Lieut.-Col. Alderson, who was in command of the mounted infantry during the outbreak. The book is entitled With the Mounted Infantry and the Mashonaland Field Force, 1896, and contains a large number of plans and illustrations.

MR. F. E. ROBINSON has arranged for the following volumes, which are now in course of preparation, and will be uniform with those of his Oxford and Cambridge series: University of St. Andrews, by J. Maitland Anderson; University of Glasgow, by Prof. W. Stewart, D.D.; University of Aberdeen, by Robert S. Rait, M.A.; University of Edinburgh, by Sir Ludovic J. Grant, Bart.; University of Dublin, by W. Macneile Dixon; University of Wales and its Constituent Colleges, by W. Cadwaladr Davies.

THE first edition of The Naval Pocket Book for 1898, by Messrs. Laird Clowes and Carr Laughton, is exhausted. A second edition is in the press and will be ready shortly.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN is just publishing a New Novel by BENJAMIN SWIFT, the Author of "Nanoy Noon," entitled THE DESTROYER (6s.). In reviewing this work The Daily Chronicle says, "Mr. Swift is a clever man. . . . There is always a pleasant flavour of originality about him. . . . There are no dolls in the story. The drama is vibrant with life all through."

Mr. UNWIN is also publishing a biography by F. REGINALD STATHAM, entitled PAUL KRUGER AND HIS TIMES, with Photogravure Portrait and Map (7s. 6d.). The Daily Chronicle says "It is a portrait of Kruger at his best, and that kind of portrait is in reality likely to be the truest in the end."

TWO NEW NOVELS
at 6s. each.

TALES OF UNREST. By JOSEPH CONRAD, Author of "Almayer's Folly," &c.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Mr. Conrad brings vividly before us the wild, picturesque life of the curious untamable race that inhabits the [Malay] Archipelago. His figures are real flesh and blood, drawn to the life."

PELICAN HOUSE, E.C.: a Novel of Finance. By B. B. WEST.

FIRST REVIEW.—"One of the most entertaining financial stories we ever read. . . . Delightfully humorous. . . . The whole subject is treated with so light a touch, and the extravagant nature of the requests so sunnily invested with an air of reality, that our intellectual enjoyment in the perusal of his book is never allowed to flag for an instant, nor do the delicate flavour of his humour and kindly cynicism tend to cloy."
GLASGOW MAIL.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE OF POPULAR COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

In cloth gilt, price 2s. 6d. each.

- The Stickit Minister .. By S. R. Crockett.
- Effie Hetherington ... By Robert Buchanan.
- Half Round the World for a Husband ... By May Crommelin.
- Trooper Peter Halket By Olive Schreiner.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION IN ONE VOLUME.

LIFE AND TIMES OF NICCOLO MACHIAVELL. By Prof. PASQUALE VILLARI. Translated by LINDA VILLARI. With 32 Full-Page Illustrations. Cloth, 7s. 6d. (Uniform with "Savonarola.")

"Indispensable to the serious student of Machiavelli, his teaching and his times."—The Times.

SIXTH AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE COURTSHIPS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH. By MARTIN A. S. HUME, F.R.H.S. With Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A connected and consistent, though assuredly a most extraordinary, story. . . . A fascinating picture."
Standard.

CATALOGUES and PROSPECTUSES post free,

London:

T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S
Spring List.

NEW NOVEL BY ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 8s.
CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY.
By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER, Author of "Cupid's Garden," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

ROBERT BURNS and MRS. DUNLOP.
Correspondence now Published in Full for the First Time, with Elucidations. By WILLIAM WALLACE. With Portrait of Mrs. Dunlop, and Facsimiles.

"It is extremely fortunate that the work has been undertaken by an editor like Mr. Wallace, whose enthusiasm, thoroughness, and minute knowledge of his subject ensure a satisfactory result. He has brought together nearly all the letters of Robert Burns and Mrs. Dunlop; not only those which have been already published, but a large number which Mrs. Dunlop retained unhandled till her death. These new letters have been interwoven with the old, elucidations and connecting explanations added, and the whole presented skillfully in an almost unbroken narrative."
Saturday Review.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE LIFE OF LADY FRY of DARTINGTON. By ELIZA ORME, LL.B.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

COMPANIONS of the SORROWFUL WAY. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. (Iax MACLAREN).

"Fresh and readable. The volume is a delightful one."
Glasgow Herald.

Second Edition, completing Twenty-third Thousand.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE IDEAL LIFE, and Other Unpublished Addresses. By HENRY DRUMMOND. With Introductory Sketches by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL and IAN MACLAREN.

"These addresses are written in a singularly beautiful style, and contain much beautiful thinking, showing that the writer had pondered deeply on some of the most spiritual aspects of religion. They will, we are sure, be much prized by the many admirers of their author."
Glasgow Herald.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

DR. WILLIAM MOON and his WORK for the BLIND. By the Rev. JOHN RUTHERFORD, M.A. With Portraits and Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

BRIGHTER YEARS: the Second Volume of the Autobiography of Sydney Watson.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

LIFE'S LOOK-OUT: the Autobiography of SYDNEY WATSON. With Photogravure Portrait.

"An exciting story of a life which was familiar with scenes and incidents that do not fall to the lot of more than a minority of us. Mr. Watson knows how to put his reminiscences into a form which cannot fail to be interesting, and, we believe, will be read with profit by many. They appear in a decidedly tasteful form."
Literary World

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

COLOSSIAN STUDIES. Lessons in Faith and Holiness from St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon. By Rev. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D., Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR. NEW EDITION.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

PHILIPPIAN STUDIES. Lessons in Faith and Love from St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians.

"Dr. Moule carefully translates and paraphrases each section of St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, and draws out the permanent lessons of faith and love which it contains; he has made a wise choice of the book of the Bible on which to comment, and has treated it with wisdom and reverence. . . . It is a book to be pondered over in meditation, and we think that those who so use it will find themselves repaid."
Guardian.

Imperial 8vo, 15s.

ON the THRESHOLD of CENTRAL AFRICA. A Record of Twenty Years' Pioneering in the Upper Zambesi, among the Banyai and Barotsi. By FRANÇOIS COILLARD, Paris Evangelical Mission. Translated and Edited by C. W. MACKINTOSH.

With Photogravure Portrait, and 40 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author.

"Quite one of the best books of African travel which we have encountered in recent years. . . . We have seldom read more fascinating book of missionary travel, or one which gives a more detailed and realistic account of the difficulties that beset those who attempt to carry a new idea of human life to the fierce and degraded natives who inhabit the heart of the Dark Continent."
Standard.

London: HODDER & STOUGHTON,
27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

Complete Catalogue post free on application.

Medium 8vo, 18s. net.

THE BASES of DESIGN. By Walter CRANE. With 200 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author, Photographs, &c.

"This collection of Lectures delivered by Mr. Crane to the Manchester School of Art will interest all who care for beauty of form or decoration, and will be of practical value to art student or the apprentice in handicraft. It is a book that was wanted, for it occupies a place between the hard and fast catalogues of design, such as Owen Jones's 'Grammar of Ornament,' and such works as Ruskin's."
Daily Chronicle.
"Many books of design have appeared lately; none is quite like this, and perhaps none so generally interesting and readable."
Full Mail Gazette.

Fcap. 4to, 30s. net.

The ROYAL GALLERY at HAMPTON

COURT ILLUSTRATED: being an Historical Catalogue of the Pictures in the Queen's Collection at that Palace, with Descriptive, Biographical, and Critical Notes, Revised, Enlarged, and Illustrated with 100 Plates. By ERNEST LAW, B.A., Author of "A History of Hampton Court Palace."

2 vols., imperial 8vo, 50s. net.

A HISTORY of RENAISSANCE

ARCHITECTURE in ENGLAND, A.D. 1500-1800. By REGINALD BLOMFELD, M.A., Author of "The Formal Garden in England." With 160 Illustrations from Drawings by the Author, and 90 Plates from Photographs and old Prints and Drawings.

Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ACHIEVEMENTS of CAVALRY. By General Sir EVELYN WOOD, V.C., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., Quartermaster-General. With 20 Maps.

"Sir Evelyn Wood is to be congratulated on his excellent book. The service may also be congratulated that among its Field-Marshal and General Officers on the active list are so many who can empathise their leading in the field by their literary counsels in peace. Amongst the band of able writers the Quartermaster-General to Her Majesty's Forces well holds his own."
Times.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BRITISH FLEET: the Growth,

Achievements, and Duties of the Navy of the Empire. By Commander CHARLES N. ROBINSON, R.N., Assistant Editor of the Army and Navy Gazette. With 140 Illustrations. Third Edition.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE LAY of the NIBELUNGS.

Metrically Translated from the Old German Text by ALICE HORTON, and Edited by EDWARD BELL, M.A. To which is prefixed the Essay on the "Nibelungen Lied," by THOMAS CARLYLE, 5s.
"A new and excellent translation, faithful in sense and spirit, and admirably versified in the ancient ballad style. . . . The version possesses the advantage of resembling the original. Every reader, moreover, will take pleasure in the rhythmical, well-rhymed verse; and students who know the old poem in its ancient form will scarcely be dissatisfied with the new presentation of the poet's meaning."
Standard.

Vol. II. Now Ready.

The WORKS of GEORGE BERKELEY,

Bishop of Cloyne. Edited by GEORGE SAMPSON. With a Biographical Introduction by the Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P. 3 vols., 6s. each.
"An emphatic expression of thanks is due for the industry of the editor and the enterprise of the publishers of this first volume of a projected complete edition of Berkeley."
Manchester Guardian.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
York Street, Covent Garden.

DEIGHTON BELL & CO.,
CAMBRIDGE.

Just published, crown 4to, 6s.

THE PSALMS in THREE COLLEC-

TIONS. Translated, with Notes, by E. G. KING, D.D. Part I. FIRST COLLECTION (Psa. I.-XLI.). With Preface by the BISHOP of DURHAM.

Now ready, crown 8vo, cloth, 8s.

DCC EXERCISES. Including Hints

for the Solution of all the Questions in "CHOICE and CHANCE." With a Chapter on the Summation of Certain Series, and a Gresham Lecture on "Some Points in the Philosophy of Chance." By WILLIAM ALLEN WHITWORTH, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

"A humble equipment of arithmetic and algebra will enable the reader to extract a good deal of entertainment from Mr. Whitworth's problems. The author would probably tell us that the doctrine of Choice and Chance pervades every domain of the human intellect. At any rate, it holds a light and serves as a handmaid to every honest and ingenious occupation in which there is an element of uncertainty."
Daily Chronicle.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

CHOICE and CHANCE. An Elementary

Treatise on Permutations, Combinations, and Probability, with 640 Exercises. Fourth Edition. 8s.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON BELL & CO.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS.

IT TAKES A LOT to astonish the public nowadays, but nevertheless the astonished them. No intelligent person can afford to neglect it. A succession of thrilling TRUE tales of adventure and stirring incident—these take the place of the ordinary fiction which is found in every other publication. That this alone is a grand idea will be evident to anyone who has listened to the stories told by missionaries, traders, pioneers, naval and military officers who have seen much foreign service, Civil servants, and travellers and tourists generally. These true stories are illustrated as though they were fiction. The articles grip the attention on account (1) of the extraordinary nature of their several subjects, and (2) on account of the astounding photographs with which they are illustrated.

WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE

PART 2. PRICE 6d. NOW READY.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7 to 12, Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

NEW RELIGIOUS WEEKLY.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Edited by

GEORGE CLARKE

(The Evangelist).

ENTITLED

THE HOME MAGAZINE.

Published by

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED.

NO. 1 JUST PUBLISHED.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

TALKS by the WAY. By GEORGE CLARKE.

MEN who are MOVING the WORLD. By Dean FARRAR.

A TALE of a MEAN STREET. By Dr. BARNARDO.

SERIAL STORIES by Mrs. L. B. WALFORD, "The Intruders"; and "The Panjandrum Dodo," by G. E. FARROW, Author of "The Wallypug of Why."

LARGEST MISSION HALL on EARTH.

A CLERGYMAN'S PUBLIC-HOUSE.

OUR BAIRNS. By GEORGE CLARKE.

ORIGINAL HYMN, "BRITAIN for CHRIST." Music by Dr. HOPKINS.

May be obtained from every Newsagent or from all Railway Bookstalls.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE

EARTH

FOR TEN

SHILLINGS.

SOLD BY

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.,

LONDON.

This is something new.
The

CITIZEN'S

ATLAS,

which is a pathfinder to every place on the face of the earth, is now being published in twenty fortnightly parts at Sixpence a part. Thus you get the earth for Ten Shillings. The Cheapest, Best, and most Modern Atlas to be bought for the money. One Hundred Maps for Ten Shillings, and Ten Maps for a Shilling, with a Gazetteer thrown in.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1356.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1898.

PRICE 3d.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

H. J. GLAISHER'S New CATALOGUE of REMAINDERS, most free on application to H. J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller, 57, Wigmore Street, Cavendish Square, W.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C. have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and especially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advise and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments connected.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africaniam, London."

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIVE STOCK and GENERAL INSURANCE CO. Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses E. & J. PRY, 455, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 201, per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY OFFICE, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCOIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

ROYAL ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION, BELFAST.

The HEAD MASTERSHIP of the MODERN LANGUAGES DEPARTMENT will shortly be vacant. The salary will be £250 per annum, and the successful Candidate will be expected to enter on his duties on 1st September. No canvassing allowed. Candidates are requested to send to the Secretary their applications, with statement of age and copies of testimonials, on or before Saturday, 21st May.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, Esq., M.A., D.C.L., LL.D. Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, will, on TUESDAY NEXT, MAY 3rd at 3 o'clock, begin a COURSE of FOUR LECTURES on "THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT of MODERN EUROPE." Subscription to this Course, Half-a-Guinea; to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

LONDON SCHOOL of MEDICINE for WOMEN, 30, Handel Street, Brunswick Square, W.C.

The SUMMER SESSION will begin on MAY 2nd, 1898. Fees for Lectures and Hospital Practice, £125, if paid in one sum; £135, if paid in four instalments.

The Prospectus, giving full information as to Classes, Scholarships, Prizes, &c., will be sent on application to Miss DECK, M.B., M.A., Secretary.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and SCHOOL.

The SUMMER SESSION will begin on MAY 2nd, 1898. Students can reside in the College within the Hospital walls, subject to the collegiate regulations.

The Hospital contains a service of 750 beds. Scholarships and Prizes of the aggregate value of nearly £3000 are awarded annually.

The Medical School contains large Lecture Rooms and well-appointed Laboratories for Practical Teaching, as well as Dissecting Rooms, Museum, Library, &c.

A large Recreation Ground has recently been purchased. For further particulars apply, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A young Gentleman, having much spare time, can give ASSISTANCE in Literary Work—e.g., Researches at British Museum; highest references and qualifications.—Address Mr. G. W. GOSN, 37 and 39, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street, London E.C.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Singing, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an unexceptional English Chaperon. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 3 Guineas—a quart—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taken the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address Mr. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

"THE VICTORIAN"

"THE VICTORIAN" is rapidly assuming its place in the ranks of the recognised magazines of London. This month's issue is a remarkably good one from many points of view, and shows that the Editor (Mr. ROBERT BLAKE) has a real desire for the elevation of our literature: that he has also a fine eye for effect is seen in the dramatic development of his undoubtedly clever Novel, 'The Signor's Daughter', which is written with all the skill of the accomplished novelist. Mr. LEWY continues his Poem entitled 'Before the Battle.' This is a fine composition, and will be read with interest. Mr. S. F. WEGUELLIN-SMITH has a lovely little Poem, 'After Pain,' one verse of which is as fine as anything written by any contemporary poet.

'The Adventures of a Curious Man' makes excellent reading. Reviews, Dramatic Notes, and a slashing article on Magazine Poets—evidently the work of the Editor—provide matter for any amount of capital reading.—Whithall Review.

Published by G. STONEHAN, 39, Warwick Lane, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectusses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post frs.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON.—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.O.

PRESIDENT.—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.
VICE-PRESIDENTS.—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.
TREASURER.—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 2s.; to Members, 10s.

C. T. HAEBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

THE FAUNA of BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Edited by W. T. BLANFORD. Medium 8vo, with numerous Woodcuts.

COMPLETION of THE VERTEBRATES.

MAMMALIA. By W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S. 1 vol., complete, price £1.—FISHES. By F. DAY, C.I.E., LL.D. 2 vols., price £1 each.—BIRDS. By EUGENE W. OATES, F.Z.S. Vol. 1, price £1; Vol. 11, 15s.; Vols. III and IV., by W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S., price 15s. each.—REPTILIA and BATRACHIA. By G. A. BOULENGER, 1 vol., complete, price £1.

MOTHS. By Sir G. F. HAMPSON, Bart. 4 vols., price £1 each.—HYMENOPTERA. Vol. 1. WASPS and BEES. By Lieut.-Col. C. T. BINGHAM. Price £1, with Four Coloured Plates. London: TAYLOR & FRANCIS, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta: THACKER, SPINA & Co. Bombay; THACKER & Co., Limited. Berlin: K. FRIEDLANDER & SOHN, Carlsstrasse, 11.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich.

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

PROCESS BLOCKS FOR THE PURPOSE OF ORDINARY BOOK ILLUSTRATIONS.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately.

|                          |         |                                 |          |
|--------------------------|---------|---------------------------------|----------|
|                          | 1896.   | WILKIE COLLINS ...              | March 20 |
| BEN JONSON ...           | Nov. 14 | JOHN MILTON ...                 | 27       |
| JOHN KEATS ...           | 21      | WILLIAM COWPER ...              | April 3  |
| SIR JOHN SUCKLING ...    | 28      | CHARLES DARWIN ...              | 10       |
| TOM HOOD ...             | Dec. 5  | ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON }         | 17       |
| THOMAS GRAY ...          | 12      | HENRY WADSWORTH } LONGFELLOW }  | 24       |
| ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON } | 19      | ANDREW MARVELL ...              | May 1    |
| SIR WALTER SCOTT ...     | 26      | ROBERT BROWNING ...             | 8        |
|                          | 1897.   | THOMAS CARLYLE ...              | 15       |
| SAMUEL RICHARDSON.       | Jan. 2  | PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ...        | 22       |
| THOMAS DE QUINCEY ...    | 9       | CHARLES DICKENS ...             | 29       |
| LEIGH HUNT ...           | 16      | JONATHAN SWIFT ...              | June 5   |
| LORD MACAULAY ...        | 23      | WILLIAM MAKEPEACE } THACKERAY } | 12       |
| ROBERT SOUTHEY ...       | 30      | WILLIAM BLAKE ...               | 19       |
| S. T. COLERIDGE ...      | Feb. 6  | SIR RICHARD STEELE ...          | 26       |
| CHARLES LAMB ...         | 13      | ALEXANDER POPE ...              | July 3   |
| MICHAEL DRAYTON ...      | 20      | DOUGLAS JERROLD ...             | 10       |
| WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR }   | 27      | FRANCIS BACON ...               | 17       |
| SAMUEL PEPYS ...         | March 6 |                                 | 1898.    |
| EDMUND WALLER ...        | 13      | HENRIK IBSEN ...                | March 26 |

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.
6s. net, claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."
"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Feap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

|  |                      |
|--|----------------------|
| BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.                              | THE CHANNEL ISLANDS. |
| THE NORTH WALES COAST.                                   | THE ISLE OF WIGHT.   |
| BRECON and its BEACONS.                                  | THE WYE VALLEY.      |
| ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.                             | THE SEVERN VALLEY.   |
| BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.             |                      |
| BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.        |                      |
| LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.        |                      |
| ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.         |                      |
| BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH and PWLLHELL.     |                      |
| MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM. |                      |
| LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.             |                      |

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.

"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations.

3s. 6d. net.

Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

THE ONLY PERFECT TABLE GUM

IS

LE PAGE'S MUCILAGE.

BECAUSE it STICKS.

BECAUSE it sticks things so that they "stay stuck."

BECAUSE it dries quicker than any gum, being practically a thin, ever-fluid glue.

BECAUSE the less you use the better and tighter it sticks.

MOREOVER, it costs no more than gum or paste, and goes ever so much further.

OF ALL STATIONERS at 3d. and 6d.

RUSSIA CEMENT COMPANY,
46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

A PERFECT LEAD PENCIL.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."—Black and White.
"Surely a boon to all busy people."
Westminster Budget.

"A design in lead pencils that deserves popularity."
Morning Leader.
"I hope he may make a fortune by it."—Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpener Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

But it lasts at the very least twice as long, because there is none of the waste that occurs through breakage of the lead in sharpening a cedar pencil. This is more especially noticeable in the case of blue and red pencils. In using an ordinary coloured pencil, probably half the crayon-lead is wasted in cutting, and another quarter by the lead breaking in use. The Blaisdell coloured pencils waste none of the crayon in cutting, for there is no cutting to be done, and the crayon does not readily break in use. Hence the saving in lead alone is very great, and the saving of time, trouble, and annoyance is greater still. There are no chips, no dirty smears from crayon dust, and a perfect point is produced instantaneously whenever needed. The same is true of the black-lead Blaisdell Pencil.

The paper covering holds firm until it is desired to remove it. Then all that is necessary is to break the outer cover with a knife or pin, and pull off a spiral of paper. The new point is then ready for use.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best; but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

USED BY

THE WAR OFFICE.
BANK OF ENGLAND.
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT OFFICE.
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE.
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OFFICES.
OXFORD UNIVERSITY.
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.
ETON COLLEGE.

UNITED STATES ARSENAL.
UNITED STATES NAVY.
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES.
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE.
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES.

If not obtainable at your Stationer's, send for Specimens—Red, Blue, and Black, post free (in the United Kingdom), 1s.

BLAISDELL PENCIL CO., Limited,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

IMPORTANT.

All who are interested in books, either as readers, authors, purchasers, or vendors, should subscribe to the

PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

ESTABLISHED 1837.

Among the many attractions of its columns the following may be mentioned:—

Literary articles (including leader on some prominent topic of the moment) announcements of forthcoming volumes, notes on current events in connection with the publishing world, reviews (often illustrated) of new books and magazines, correspondence, &c., &c. An exceedingly valuable feature of the paper is the list of

NEW BOOKS OF THE WEEK

(the most complete list issued) giving the full title, size, price, and publisher, with an index of subjects and name of book and author in one alphabet. Also in every number upwards of a thousand

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

are advertised for, thus affording readers an excellent opportunity either of disposing of their own scarce volumes or purchasing others that they may be in need of; and attention is particularly drawn to the fact that annual subscribers have the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in this column. They also receive a gratis copy of the large special Christmas Number—a handsome quarto volume containing over 250 illustrations.

As an advertising medium in connection with books, the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record stands unrivalled.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR can be had by sending Postal Order or Stamps to Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Limited, the Proprietors, St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, London, to whom all money-payments should be made.

|   |          |
|---|----------|
| For One Year, post-free to any part of Great Britain and Ireland ... ..         | 8s. 6d.  |
| „ Six Months ditto ditto ditto  | 4s. 6d.  |
| „ Three Months ditto ditto ditto  | 2s. 6d.  |
| To America and the Continent, the Annual Subscription, including postage ... .. | 11s. 0d. |

NOW READY.

BOOKS OF THE YEAR 1897.

SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF ISSUE OF ANNUAL CATALOGUE

THE

ENGLISH CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

FOR THE YEAR 1897.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 224, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

It contains a much longer List of Works than last year's Catalogue, including an addition of some 1,400 more Titles, but the price remains the same, viz., 5s. net, cloth limp; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications.—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London :

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD., St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.

THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.

HISTORICAL WORKS OF TIMELY INTEREST.

The LAST FIGHT of the "REVENGE."

Described by Sir WALTER RALEIGH, GERVAASE MARKHAM, and VAN LINSCHOTEN. 1s. net. (Arber's English Reprints.)

In the ENGLISH GARNER Series

(8 vols., 5s. net per vol., sold in single volumes), amongst a mass of other interesting matter:

VOL. I. contains: An Account of an Englishman's Fight with a Quartermaster against Three Spaniards, 1625—The Story of an English Strategem Practised upon a Sea-Town of Galicia, one of the Kingdoms of Spain. 1626—The Voyage of the "Dog" to the Gulf of Mexico. 1699—A Letter Written from Goa.

VOL. II. contains: A Chronological History of New England down to 1633—The Petty Navy Royal—Voyage round the Globe by Thomas Cavendish.

VOL. III. contains: Voyage in a Portuguese Carrack to Goa. 1583—Voyage to the East Indies (Ralph Fitch). 1583-91—Account of Two Englishmen in Goa. 1594.—Voyage of the Earl of Cumberland to the Azores. 1589.

VOL. IV. contains: Voyage to the West Indies and Mexico. 1556-58—The Winning of Calais by the French. 1558—The Siege of Guineas. 1558—The Famous and Wonderful Recovery of a Ship of Bristol from Turkish Pirates at Algiers.

VOL. V. contains: A Trip to Mexico, 1564-65—Voyages of William Hawkins to Brazil, 1530; and Sir John Hawkins to the West Indies, 1582—Further Voyages of Sir John Hawkins—The Voyages of Sir Francis Drake.

VOL. VI. contains: Travels in Mexico, 1568-85—Account of the Torments Endured by French Protestants on Board the Galleys. 1708.

VOL. VII. contains: Three Ballads on the Armada Fight—An Account of the Re-taking of the Ship "The Friends Adventure," wherein one Englishman and a Boy killed two Frenchmen, took five prisoners, and brought the ship safe to England. 1693.

VOL. VIII. contains: The Siege of Harfleur and Battle of Agincourt. 1415—The "Spanish Fury" at Antwerp.

The WORKS of Captain JOHN SMITH,

President of Virginia, and Admiral of New England, 1608-1631. 2 vols., 12s. 6d. net. A complete Edition, with 6 facsimile Plates.

THE WATERLOO CAMPAIGN, 1815.

By Captain WILLIAM SIBORNE. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo, illustrated, 5s. net.

THE POTENTATE: a Romance. By

FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A steel bright romance of the middle ages.....passages of love and adventure martialled by a skilled hand."—The Academy.

"There are strong dramatic situations and tragic force in this romance ....Thoroughly theatrical."—Athenæum.

"Miss Forbes-Robertson is to be congratulated on having captured the spirit of chivalry .....her very destructive style is admirably fitted to the romantic period."—Ladies' Field. "A very artistic and fascinating romance."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Well worth reading, not only for the beauties of the story itself, but for the thoughts suggested by every page."—Weekly Sun.

"The Potentate" is a book far above the ordinary."—Daily Graphic.

THE MACMAHON; or, the Story of the Seven Johe. By OWEN BLAYNEY. Crown

8vo, 6s.

THE DARK WAY of LOVE. By

CHARLES LE GOFFIC. Translated by WINGATE BINDER. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

AN ESSAY on COMEDY. By George

MEREDITH. NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

POCKET EDITION of MR. GEORGE

MEREDITH'S SELECTED POEMS. Printed on Hand-made Paper, 6s. net.

2, WHITEHALL GARDENS, WESTMINSTER.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' LIST.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL'S NEW BOOK.

THIS DAY AT ALL LIBRARIES.

THE HONOURABLE

SIR CHARLES MURRAY, K.C.B.: a

Memoir. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P. With 5 Portraits. Demy 8vo, 18s.

COLONEL CONDER'S NEW WORK.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.

THE HITTITES and their LAN

GUAGE. By Lieut.-Col. C. R. CONDER, R.E., LL.D., D.C.L., M.R.A.S., Author of "Tent Work in Palestine," "The Bible and the East," &c. With Illustrations and Map. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

RUSSIA'S POSITION IN THE FAR EAST.

SIDE-LIGHTS on SIBERIA. Some

Account of the Great Siberian Railroad: the Prisons and Exile System. By J. Y. SIMPSON, M.A., B.Sc. With numerous Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"A book which deserves to be warmly welcomed, not only on account of its useful information, but also for the sake of its own charm and interest."—Spectator.

NEW EDITION NOW READY.

A STUDY of ETHICAL PRINCIPLES.

By JAMES SETH, M.A., Sage Professor of Moral Philosophy in Cornell University, U.S.A. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Professor Seth's study may be very confidently recommended to all students of ethical philosophy who can appreciate a well-written survey of the principles of ethical inquiry."—Bookman.

PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE.

Edited by Professor SAINTSBURY.

THE LATER RENAISSANCE. By

DAVID HANNAY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Mr. Hanney has produced a conscientious and scholarly study, which is sure to be widely studied."—St. James's Gazette.

DARIEL: a Romance of Surrey. By

R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of "Lorna Doone," "The Maid of Sker," &c. With 14 Illustrations by Chris. Hammond. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Dariel is one of those charming heroines whom Mr. Blackmore loves to paint with the brush of a Romney....A capital and enterprising story."—Literature.

THE CRICKET SEASON OF 1898.

SIXTH EDITION NOW READY.

THE JUBILEE BOOK of CRICKET.

By Prince RANJITSINGHI. Popular Edition, Large crown 8vo, 6s.

FINE PAPER EDITION, medium 8vo, 25s. net.

EDITION DE LUXE, crown 4to, £5 5s. net.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE, price 1s. each.

FOREIGN CLASSICS for ENGLISH

READERS. Edited by Mrs. OLIPHANT. In crown 8vo volumes. [Ready in May.]

DANTE. By the Editor.

VOLTAIRE. By General Sir E. B. Hamley.

POPULAR EDITION of GEORGE ELIOT'S

NOVELS.

NEW ISSUE. VOLS. NOW READY.

ADAM BEDE, 3s. 6d.—THE MILL on the FLOSS, 3s. 6d.—SCENES of CLERICAL LIFE, 3s.—SILAS MARNER, 2s. 6d.—ROMOLA, 3s. 6d.—FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL, 3s. 6d.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 991.—MAY, 1898,—2s. 6d.

DISABLE THE YOUNGER, by Charles Whibley.—THE ZIONISTS, by Lieut.-Col. C. R. Conder, R.E.—JOHN SPENNDI: THE TALE OF A POOR GENTLEMAN, AND THE

LITTLE WADE of LOEN, by Neil Munro. Chaps. xxiii., xxiv.—THE PHILOSOPHY OF IMPRESSIONISM, by C. F. Keary.—DAVE, by Zack.—THE VOLUNTEERS as a FIGHTING FORCE, by an ex-Adjutant.—OVD VOLUMES, by Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M.P.—THE NOOSE, by Horace Hutchinson.

—WHAT'S IN A NAME? NOMENCLATURE OF OUR BATTLESHIPS, by Admiral Sir John C. Dalrymple Hay, Bart.

K.C.B.—ADVENTURES OF THE COMTE DE LA MLETTE DURING THE REGIONS OF TERROR: THE RED CART, by Bernard Capes.—SIR CHARLES MURRAY.—"BEAUTY'S A FLOWER"; "LOST," by Moira O'Neill.—THE LOOKER-ON.—BRITISH INTERESTS IN THE FAR EAST.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,

EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MACMILLAN & CO'S
NEW BOOKS.

NEW STORY by F. EMILY PHILLIPS.
THE MAN OF THE FAMILY:

A Story of Fortunatus and the Barbarians.

By F. EMILY PHILLIPS,
Author of "The Education of Antonia."
Crown 8vo, 6s.

1898 ISSUE NOW READY.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR-BOOK.

A Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1898.

Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D.,
Secretary to the Royal Geographical Society.
Revised after Official Returns.
Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

SPEAKER.—"Worthily maintains the unique position which it has won amongst popular but authoritative works of reference."

Part XX., Completing the Work, now ready.

LIFE of NAPOLEON BONA-

PARTE. By Professor WILLIAM M. SLOANE,
Ph.D., L.H.D. Illustrated. Imperial 4to. In 20 Parts, at 4s. net each; or in 4 vols., at 24s. net each. Supplied only in sets.

Subscriptions (sent through a Bookseller) will be received at any time, and the Volumes or Parts delivered at such intervals as may be convenient to the Subscriber.

Parnassus Library.—New Volume.

AESCHYLI TRAGOEDIAE.

With Introduction by LEWIS CAMPBELL, M.A.,
LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Greek in the University of St. Andrews.

MAY NUMBER NOW READY.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

Price 1s.—CONTENTS.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE. By JOHN BRISWICK.
Conclusion.

AN AMERICAN HISTORIAN of the BRITISH NAVY: ANTHONY HAMILTON. By STEPHEN GWYNN.

TWO RADICALS of the OLD SCHOOL. By C. B. ROY-LANCX-KENT.

THE GENTLE ART of CYCLING. By AN AMALRA,
THE TREASURY OFFICER'S WOOING. By CXCIL
Louis. Chapters I.-III.

GEORGE THOMSON. By G. H. ELY.
THE PRIVATE SOLDIER in TIRAH. By ONE WHO SERVED WITH HIM.

NEW VOLUME commences with the MAY Number of
THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

THE SCRAMBLE for the UPPER NILE.

By R. D. MOHUN.

THE SEVEN WONDERS of the WORLD.
II. The Great Pyramids of Egypt.

By B. I. WHEELER.

AN OUTLINE of JAPANESE ART. Part I

By E. F. FENELOSSA.

GALLOPS: His First Race.

By DAVID GRAY.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

Also ready, Volume LV., NOVEMBER, 1897, to APRIL, 1898, 10s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME commences with the MAY Number of
ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s.

THREE BOYS in ARMOUR. By TUDOR JENKS.

PUSSINELLA. By F. W. H.

IN OLD FLORENCE. By REBECCA HARDING DAVIS.

And numerous other Stories.

Also ready, Volume XXV., Part I., NOVEMBER, 1897, to APRIL, 1898, 7s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

NOW READY.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d.

ARISTOCRACY AND EVOLUTION

A Study of the Rights, the Origin, and the Social Functions of the Wealthier Classes.

BY

W. H. MALLOCK,

Author of "Labour and the Popular Welfare,"
'Classes and Masses,' &c.

"With the main idea of this work, which is quite the most important that Mr. Mallock has yet produced, we do not think there can be any dispute, though most of the active sociologists in England either ignore that idea or are openly hostile to it."—Spectator.

HIS GRACE O' THE GUNNE.

By I. HOOPER, Author of "A Singer of Marly."
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

"Really a clever, entertaining volume.....No common piece of work."—Athenaeum.

"A sturdy, vigorous, and wholesome story, and one well worth reading."—Literary World.

"For the further developments of this thrilling tale, which culminate in a supremely heroic climax, we must crave our readers' permission to refer them to Part II. of 'His Grace o' the Gunne,' which is even more rife with sensational incident than the first half of that powerful and fascinating work."—Daily Telegraph.

THE STORY OF GLADSTONE'S LIFE.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. Containing 45 Illustrations, mostly Page Portraits, representing Mr. Gladstone at different periods. In 1 vol., extra crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 7s. 6d.

"This is a charmingly written sketch of Mr. Gladstone's public career, with some interesting glimpses at the same time into his private life."—The Observer.

THE VITALITY OF CHRISTIAN DOGMAS, AND THEIR POWER OF EVOLUTION.

By A. SABATIER, D.D., Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology, Paris. Translated by Mrs.
EM. CHRISTEN. With Preface by the Very Reverend the Hon. W. H. FREMANTLE, D.D., Dean of Ripon.
Crown 8vo, 96 pages, cloth, price 1s. 6d. net.

"Is really a gem of theological constructive criticism.
With marvellous lucidity and penetration Dr. Sabatier states for us here the philosophy and natural history of the dogma, its position and use in the Christian evolution."
Christian World.

PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

Book III. Vol. II. By Prof. J. SHIELD NICHOLSON.
Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d.

"The new volume is marked by the same robust practicality and independence of judgment that gave value to its predecessor.....The book is one to be heartily commended to the student, the business man, and the politician."—Literary World.

WHO'S WHO, 1898.

An Annual Biographical Dictionary. Fiftieth Year of Issue. Containing 1,143 New Biographies. In crown 8vo, 894 pages, bound in cloth gilt, with gilt edges and rounded corners, price 3s. 8d. net.

"This is undoubtedly the handiest biographical dictionary and compendium of information, referring to prominent persons and their doings, in existence."
Nature.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

THE HERITAGE of EVE. By *H. H.
SPETTIGUE.* Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A RACE for MILLIONS. By *D.
CHRISTIE MURRAY.* Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

ACADEMY NOTES, 1898 (originated by HENRY BLACKBURN), will be published on May 2, and will contain a number of Copyright Pictures not found in any other publication. TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR. With nearly 200 Illustrations. 1s.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of the
PARIS SALON, 1898. With 300 Illustrations. 3s.
[Immediately.]

THROUGH the GOLD-FIELDS of
ALASKA to BERING STRAITS. By *HARRY DE
WINDT.* With 34 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s.
"The story of his rescue at half-past the eleventh hour by a belated whaler, is one of the most dramatic and thrilling bits of romance in real life I have read for some time."—Fall Mall Gazette.

LIFE of NAPOLEON III. By Archibald FORBES. With 37 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

"Add to the accuracy of an historical annal the charm of romance.
....It carries the reader breathless to the closing scene at Chislehurst."
Punch.

KINGSCLERE. By John Porter.
With numerous Illustrations. CHEAP EDITION.
Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. [Shortly.]

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

FORTUNE'S GATE. By ALAN ST. AUBYN,
Author of "A Fellow of Trinity."
"One of the wholesomest and most delightful excursions into fiction."—Morning Leader.

A WOMAN WORTH WINNING. By *G.
MANVILLE FENN,* Author of "The White Virgin."
"The book should not fail to prove enjoyable to everyone who takes it up."—Scotman.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By
G. A. HENRY, Author of "Rajah the Juggler."
"A rattling good story."—Daily Mail.

WAS HE JUSTIFIED? By FRANK BARRETT,
Author of "Folly Morrison," &c.
"The story is a capital one from beginning to end."—World.

MISS BALMAINE'S PAST. By B. M. CROKER,
Author of "Beyond the Pale," &c.
"A very evocative story....a very delightful novel."—Vanity Fair.

A WOMAN TEMPTED HIM. By *WILLIAM
WESTALL,* Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.
"The book is in every respect a delightful one."—Daily Telegraph.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

A MODERN DICK WHITTINGTON; or,
A Patron of Letters. By JAMES PAYN. With Portrait of the Author.

NULMA. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. [May 5.]

PARIS. By E. ZOLA. Trans. by E. A. VIZETELLY.

LOVIOE. By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.

TALES of TRAIL and TOWN. By BRET HARTE.

IN the MIDST of LIFE. By AMBROSE BIERCE.

TRUE BLUE. By HERBERT RUSSELL.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

MARRIED or SINGLE? By B. M. CROKER.

LADY KILPATRICK. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

BY WOMAN'S WIT. By Mrs. ALEXANDER.

IS HE THE MAN? By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

MICHAEL DANEVITCH. By DICK DONOVAN.

UNDER SEALED ORDERS. By GRANT ALLEN.

THE REVOLT of MAN. By Sir WALTER BESANT.

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

ONE SHILLING MONTHLY.—CONTENTS FOR MAY.

TAPPLES. By QUINTON GARDON.—SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST." By J. W. HALES, M.A.—AMERICA and CHARLES III. By A. SHIELD.—OLD-FASHIONED ADVERTISING. By R. B. MRS. THERESA CORNELYS. By EDWARD WALFORD, M.A.—A FIFTEENTH CENTURY GUIDE-BOOK. By WASEY STERRY.—MATTEO FALCONE. By PROSPER MERIMEE. Trans. by E. M. LYNGE.—PICKWICKIAN BATH. By PERCY FITZGERALD, M.A.—HENRY PEACHAM as EDUCATIONIST. By FOSTER WATSON, M.A.—AUBREY'S "BRIEF LIVES." By SILVANUS URBAN.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane W.O.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                          | PAGE    |
|------------------------------------|---------|
| Socrates as Playwright ... ..      | 461     |
| The Reputation of Thackeray ... .. | 463     |
| Some Huguenots and a Guise ... ..  | 464     |
| An American Layard ... ..          | 465     |
| A Leader Writer's Essays ... ..    | 466     |
| The New Biblical Dictionary ... .. | 467     |
| After Bunyan ... ..                | 467     |
| BRIEFER MENTION ... ..             | 468     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..      | 469-472 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..              | 473     |
| MR. SHAW'S FUTURE ... ..           | 476     |
| LOVE POEMS OF GREECE ... ..        | 477     |
| PARIS LETTER ... ..                | 477     |
| THE WEEK ... ..                    | 478     |
| ART ... ..                         | 479     |
| DRAMA ... ..                       | 480     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..              | 481     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..       | 481     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..              | 482     |
| Announcements ... ..               | 482     |

REVIEWS.

SOCRATES AS PLAYWRIGHT.

Plays: Pleasant and Unpleasant. By Bernard Shaw. In 2 vols. (Grant Richards.)

MR. BERNARD SHAW is so far a disciple in the school of that ardent romanticist, Shelley, that he is clearly eaten up by a passion for reforming the world. It would be, perhaps, difficult, and, perhaps, also a trifle impertinent, to analyse how far this passion is due to a sincere anxiety to see the world grow better according to Shaw ideals, and how far it is due to the desire to impress the Shaw ideals upon the world. There is a large distinction between the two motives, and the curious mingling of them does partly account for the peculiar restlessness of mood by which Mr. Shaw's prefaces and plays are distinguished. But here Mr. Shaw will interpose: "What," he will ask, with all that dramatic amazement which is one of the most engrossing facets of his histrionic capabilities, "what are the Shaw ideals? I have none, none upon earth. It is the idealist who is ruining the world, and the world has to push through the obstacles which he lays in the path of progress. To me the tragedy and comedy of life lie in the consequences, sometimes terrible, sometimes ludicrous, of our persistent attempts to found our institutions on the ideals suggested to our imaginations by our half-satisfied passions, instead of on a genuinely scientific natural history."

We will tell Mr. Shaw whereabouts his ideal lies; it lies in the destruction of one of the most potent forces that are seated in human nature, the tendency of desire as opposed to fulfilment. He will call our distinction a quibble of terms, and willingly accept this position on the condition that it is thoroughly established that his ideal is different entirely from the ideal of the idealist. Yet though that be the case, his ideal is none the less a true ideal, inasmuch as, from the other side of the line, it has every essential element of the idealist's ideal. The idealist conceives the world upon what he imagines to be a more heroic scale than it really is, and entreats men to hurry up towards the level of his ideal; Mr. Shaw also, from his point of view, conceives a world upon what he imagines to be a more heroic scale than it really is—heroic for ten thousand reasons which he would reel off on one leg—and also entreats men to hurry along to his level. Note that neither Mr. Shaw nor the idealist would claim for one moment that the world of today is the world as he wishes it to be; all that each can do is to set up—an ideal world. The strength of Mr. Shaw's position—and it is one which gives him the opportunity of exercising a marvellous gift of humour, fancy, satire and dramatic vision—lies in the fact that, so far, the old idealist has had the arrangement of the modern world's institutions, and that the corruptions of the modern world are therefore laid at the door of that old idealist. We have never yet had an opportunity of working the world upon Mr. Shaw's somewhat vague principle of a "genuinely scientific history," and for that reason alone the reformer may claim with the greatest plausibility that his world would see the removal of all modern corruption. Well, it is a hard matter to judge, and if men come to guide their institutions by the destruction of the codes of the world as regulated according to the old idealist, and by the erection of another code by which the demand, made by law, upon each creature was graduated by the minutest scientific application of principles to every individual, we shall have to wait for the new corruptions and vanities which, of a totally different description from the elder variety, would inevitably invade the new society. That, at all events, seems certain from experimental scientific principles. Then let our posterity look for a future Socrates or Bernard Shaw of another order who, with splendid satire, will expose the evils of contemporary institutions, and will preach the elder Idealism as the New Gospel that has never been tried.

Thus much partly by way of introduction. Whether or not Mr. Shaw regards his dramas as important separate works in the art of imaginative literature, or as merely a fragment in his general scheme of reform, it is as a dramatist that he is to be considered here. It was pre-eminently necessary, however, to refer to the philosophic position taken up by the writer of these plays, because he vehemently demands that this should be done.

"I must warn my readers," he writes, "that my attacks are directed against themselves, not against my stage figures. They cannot too thoroughly understand that the guilt of defective social organisation does not lie alone on the people who actually work the commercial makeshifts which the defects make inevitable."

And, again:

"In spite of a liberal revolution or two, I can no longer be satisfied with fictitious morals and fictitious good conduct, shedding fictitious glory on robbery, starvation, disease, crime, drink, war, cruelty, cupidity, and all the other commonplaces of civilisation which drive men to the theatre to make foolish pretences that such things are progress, science, morals, religion, patriotism, imperial supremacy, national greatness, and all the other names the newspapers call them."

Mr. William Archer has recently inquired with a good deal of condescension if there is any likelihood of Mr. Shaw's attaining to "years of discretion" in the early period of the coming century. If any man, so far as the acute conviction of his opinions go, now writing the English language, has not attained the years of discretion, that man is assuredly not Mr. Shaw. He is as terribly in earnest, despite his reputation for the other thing (in which none rejoices more heartily than he), about his philosophy and his ideal of reform as ever Socrates was; and that philosopher has been reckoned as a pretty serious person, even though to many of his contemporaries he seemed, in his resolute war for reality as opposed to the idealism of his day, an extremely witty buffoon and nothing more. Mr. Shaw's methods, too, are not unlike those of the old Greek. That their fates will be widely different, however; that there is not the least likelihood of a cup of hemlock awaiting the close of Mr. Shaw's career; is entirely due to those benevolent institutions so disliked by him, which are content to look upon his philosophic aims through the same idealist glasses as upon their own progress, science, morals, religion, patriotism, imperial supremacy, and national greatness.

It is imperative, therefore, to consider Mr. Shaw as a combination of philosopher and playwright. Quite naturally enough—and this is a point which he will specially appreciate, since he has too often arraigned Shakespeare upon the same charge—the playwright is at his best when the philosopher is least visible. Take "Widowers' Houses," for example, which Mr. Archer has dismissed with the phrase, "apprentice work." (And so it is apprentice work from the dramatist's point of view, full of weakness, of hitches, and of mere literary exploitation; yet in the two volumes there is not a play which contains so tense an emotion, so keen a passion, so white a wrath.) Take an example or two:

"TRENCH: I hope Mr. Sartorius hasn't much of that sort of property, however it may pay.

LICKCHEESE: He has nothing else, sir; and he shows his sense in it, too. Every few hundred pounds he could scrape together he bought old houses with—houses that you wouldn't hardly look at without holding your nose. He has 'em in St. Giles's; he has 'em in Marylebone; he has 'em in Bethnal Green. Just look how he lives himself, and you'll see the good of it to him. He likes a low death-rate and a gravel soil, he does. You come down with me to Robbin's Row, and I'll show you a soil and death-rate, so I will! And, mind you, it's me that makes it pay him so well. Catch him going down to collect his own rents! Not likely!

TRENCH: Do you mean to say that all his property—all his means—come from this sort of thing?

LICKCHEESE: Every penny of it, sir. [Trench, overwhelmed, has to sit down.]

And almost immediately after:

"LICKCHEESE: I have my children looking to me.

COKANE: True; I admit it. So has our friend Sartorius. His affection for his daughter is a redeeming point—a redeeming point, certainly.

LICKCHEESE: She's a lucky daughter, sir. Many another daughter has been turned out upon the streets to gratify his affection for her. That's what business is, sir, you see. Come, sir, I think your friend will say a word for me now he knows I'm not in fault.

TRENCH [rising angrily]: I will not. It's a damnable business from beginning to end; and you deserve no better luck for helping in it. I've seen it all among the out-patients at the hospital; and it used to make my blood boil to think that such things couldn't be prevented."

However much that may remind one of the humorous lady who recently wrote to a contemporary, "My blood boiled as it has not boiled for many years," there can be no doubt about the sincerity of these passages. Neither Lickcheese nor Trench is anything very much to the purpose; these are the words, this is the preaching of Mr. Bernard Shaw. And therewith one must decide "Widowers' Houses" to be an exceedingly poor play. He lets his passion at every point run away with his imagination. Conceive, if you can, a typical case in life of this kind. Blanche, be it stated, is the daughter of the millionaire who makes his pile out of London slums:

"THE PARLOUR MAID [plaintively]: You speak so brutal to me, Miss Blanche; and I do love you so, I'm sure no one else would stay and put up with what I have to put up with.

BLANCHE: Then go. I don't want you. Do you hear? Go.

THE PARLOUR MAID [piteously, falling on her knees]: Oh, no, Miss Blanche. Don't send me away from you; don't—BLANCHE [with fierce disgust]: Agh! I hate the sight of you. [The maid, wounded to the heart, cries bitterly.] Hold your tongue. Are those two gentlemen gone?

THE PARLOUR MAID [weeping]: Oh, how could you say such a thing to me, Miss Blanche? Me that—

BLANCHE [seizing her by the hair and throat]: Stop that noise, I tell you, unless you want me to kill you.

THE PARLOUR MAID [protesting and imploring, but in a carefully subdued voice]: Let me go, Miss Blanche; you know you'll be sorry; you always are. Remember how dreadfully my head was cut last time!"

Is not that hideous? Did such a scene ever deserve to secure a free passage from brain to paper? By all the rules of instinct, of refinement, and of that realism to which Mr. Shaw himself appeals so constantly as the principle which he enthrones in the place of authority—as though the destruction of one authority did not necessarily mean the setting up of another!—you would answer in the true Adelphi spirit, "No, a thousand times no." And yet you see that the reason why it is so bad, so thin, so violent from the dramatic standpoint, is precisely because in this play the angry philosopher and reformer has come in at the door, and the imaginative dramatist has flown out of the window. We have the profoundest sympathy possible with Mr. Shaw's benevolent purpose, but let it be remembered that, at the present moment, we are discussing him from a dramatic and literary point of view.

Throughout "Widowers' Houses," then, we see Mr. Shaw in a dual aspect, much after the fashion of those composite photographs which were so popular two or three years ago in the cheaper illustrated magazines; but in that dual aspect the features of the philanthropic Socialist are obviously predominant. That was the beginning of things, however; and as one examines carefully play after play, this predominance slowly fades—the comedian, the character-monger, the humorist, even the sentimentalist, come out more and more with striking distinction, while the philosopher just hangs a little in the background, rather restlessly, a little sulkily, but with occasionally audacious intrusions as if to assert, even with a struggle, his independence of thought and the persistent consistency of his position. In the second play on Mr. Shaw's list, however, the balance is somewhat more even than at the extreme end of the line.

"The Philanderer" really needs a word of serious introduction on the part of any reviewer who does not wish at the outset to stultify himself by a domineering assertion of first principles. There are passages—we shall note one out of many—which you will, perchance, read with indignant shame; any average human being could not help it; but if you at once proceed to set down those too customary adjectives—"coarse," "vulgar," "ill-bred," "dehumanising," and the rest, you will be forthwith pulled up by a certain subtle humour on the part of the dramatist, through which you are made perfectly aware that he does not care a brass farthing for such a judgment, seeing that he could not possibly have been such a fool as not to anticipate it. And having recognised so much, you are immediately rewarded by a vision of Shaw the philosopher—we speak familiarly because he explains in one of his prefaces that it pains him to hear the younger generation addressing him as "Mister," "as though I had done good work in my time"—fretting, fuming, unhappy for that the world is out of joint, and mischievously intent upon calling in Shaw the humorist and the satirist to hide his earnestness, his ill-temper, and his amazing disgust with the idealist condition of the world. The result is, indeed, a play far more really dramatic than "Widowers' Houses," largely owing to the easier handling of his tools. It is also, we suppose—but that is a difficult matter to judge—a better acting play. But it never succeeds in getting at one's humanity, simply because the philosopher is too angry and the satirist too brilliant to think of humanity. These puppets are swayed by no real passions of sorrow and desire, despite a vigorous show of each emotion; they are as remote from anything real as any set plucked from the Restoration Comedy. In proof of which, read this single extract, where a dozen might be cited:

"GRACE: I will tell you the truth.

CHARTERIS [unfolding his arms in terror]: No, please don't. As a philosopher, it's my business to tell other people the truth; but it's not their business to tell it to me. I don't like it: it hurts.

GRACE [quietly]: It's only that I love you.

CHARTERIS: Ah! that's not a philosophic truth. You may tell me that as often as you like. [He takes her in his arms.]

GRACE: Yes, Leonard; but I'm an advanced woman. [He checks himself and looks at her in some consternation.] I'm what my father calls the New Woman. [He lets her go and stares at her.] I quite agree with all your ideas.

CHARTERIS [scandalised]: That's a nice thing for a respectable woman to say. You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

GRACE: I am quite in earnest about them, too, though you are not; and I will never marry a man I love too much. It would give him a terrible advantage over me; I should be utterly in his power. That's what the New Woman is like. Isn't she right, Mr. Philosopher?

CHARTERIS: The struggle between the Philosopher and the Man is fearful, Grace. But the Philosopher says you are right.

GRACE: I know I am right, and so we must part.

CHARTERIS: Not at all. You must marry someone else; and then I'll come and philander with you."

That, as it stands, is as grotesque a piece of pseudo-realism, and of what is commonly known as bad taste, as can well be imagined. But supposing a philosopher-satirist to be angry with the marriage institution, supposing that he wishes to show its unreasonableness with the greatest bitterness and keenness, would he not invent just that situation, these words, to discover and unveil the absurdities as he conceives them to exist? Let us forgive this philosopher his romantic instincts from which he cannot get away, and especially when he stands upon his preaching-stool.

These are two of the "unpleasant" plays. "Mrs. Warren's Profession" is the third and last of them, and is by far the best; for, as we have said, the philosopher, beginning to love his material more for its own sake, grows less angry and less obtrusive in his personal assertion. It is true that Mr. Shaw here goes deliberately to a hideous social corruption for his theme, but, at the same time, he is content with that selection. The preacher disappears to a very considerable extent, and the writer begins to prove himself a master of character and of the theatrical situation. We have said a master of character: with the exception of Vivie, who is the mouthpiece of Mr. Shaw's philosophical convictions, and is accordingly sacrificed upon the altar of verisimilitude in immediate homage to Minerva, every character of this extraordinary work is alive and vital with human activities. The tiresome Vivie is absolutely necessary for coherence, development, and fulfilment; but once you have faced her as a necessary evil the others fall into their places with the most perfect ease and completeness: the "booming" clergyman and his splendidly amusing son; Mrs. Warren, pathetically horrible, but quite convincing; Crofts, the conscienceless man, less compact of actual wickedness than of native corruption; and Praed, the nervous ass, anxious to please, but really a very nice fellow. The whole thing goes like flashing light, without a flicker or a cloud. For an example of the dialogue take this. Frank, the clergyman's son, proposes to marry Mrs. Warren's daughter:

"REV. S.: Frank, once for all, it's out of the question. Mrs. Warren will tell you that it's not to be thought of.

CROFTS: Of course not.

FRANK [With enchanting placidity]: Is that so, Mrs. Warren?

MRS. WARREN [reflectively]: Well, Sam, I don't know. If the girl wants to get married, no good can come of keeping her unmarried.

REV. S. [astounded]: But married to him! Your daughter to my son! Only think, it's impossible!

CROFTS: Of course it's impossible. Don't be a fool, Kitty.

MRS. WARREN [nettled]: Why not? Isn't my daughter good enough for your son?

REV. S.: But surely, my dear Mrs. Warren, you know the reason—

MRS. WARREN [defiantly]: I know no reasons. If you know any, you can tell them to the lad, or to the girl, or to your congregation if you like.

REV. S. [helplessly]: You know very well that I couldn't tell anyone the reasons. But my boy will believe me when I tell him there are reasons.

FRANK: Quite right, Dad: he will. But has your boy's conduct ever been influenced by your reasons?"

The thing is all infinitely quick, intensely interesting, and profoundly true. The clash of force against force and the resultant line of action are admirably seen and realised. With this play we come to the end of Mr. Shaw's first volume. He reserves for his second volume the explanation from his point of view of how he came, later on, "to write plays which, dealing less with the crimes of society, and more with its romantic follies, and with the struggles of individuals against those follies, may be called by contrast Pleasant." We, too, have an explanation in petto, which perforce we must reserve, with a consideration of those plays, for another article.

THE REPUTATION OF THACKERAY.

The Works of William Makepeace Thackeray. With Biographical Introductions by his Daughter, Anne Ritchie. Vol. I.: Vanity Fair. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THACKERAY has not been fortunate in the purple and fine linen of his books. The current popular editions are by no means joys for ever, and we do not honestly think that the new "Biographical" edition is, in this respect, much of an improvement. The red cloth is not altogether pleasant in hue; the title-page and back are conceived without much sense of proportion, while the use of gilt in straight bars and misplaced monograms testifies to a too venerable conception of the nature and use of ornament. These things are generally managed better nowadays. Moreover, Vanity Fair is a great deal too big for one pair of covers; two slender volumes and liberally spaced type would have made a book far more desirable alike to handle and to read. We are grateful, on the other hand, for the author's illustrations, reproduced from the édition de luxe, and supplemented by some additional unpublished drawings in the introduction. Thackeray is said to have given up the intention of becoming an artist, because he could not learn to draw. Nevertheless, his Vanity Fair designs, however technically incorrect, are wonderfully spirited and wonderfully in keeping with the humour of the scenes they accompany. They are, at least, genuine illustrations.

An important feature of the new edition is, of course, the set of biographical prefaces which Mrs. Richmond Ritchie proposes to contribute to each volume. As is well known, Thackeray requested that no formal or official biography of him might be written. Most modest of men, he had been offended by the singularly indiscreet memoirs of some other contemporary writers, and was inclined to put down the whole proceeding as "snobbery." Whether he would have persisted in this view if he had quite realised the alternative may be doubted. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie faithfully respected the prohibition, but the great impertinent public was not going to be balked of its privilege in poking and prying into the personal affairs of the dead, and, as a natural result, unauthorised and inaccurate statements got abroad. Now Mrs. Ritchie has decided to give to the world just so much as she thinks it is really entitled to know; the material facts, that is to say, about the writing of the books, and, as regards the man, enough to put the popular impression of him into truer proportions. "It is only after a quarter of a century," she says, "that I have determined to publish memories which chiefly concern his books." And again: "So much has been forgotten, so much that is ephemeral has been recorded, that it is my desire to mark down some of the truer chords to which his life was habitually set." A score of pages of very interesting reminiscences follow, in which Mrs. Ritchie traces some episodes in Thackeray's childhood and youth which seem to have found their reflection in Vanity Fair, and also gives some details as to the conditions under which that novel was written, and some extracts from letters to his mother describing its progress and completion. Thackeray was then living with his grandmother and his daughters at 13, Young-street, an old-fashioned London house hard by Kensington-square. The book hung fire at first after its publication in yellow-covered parts by Messrs. Bradbury & Evans began. Mrs. Ritchie describes an interesting episode in its career:

"I still remember going along Kensington-gardens with my sister and our nursemaid carrying a parcel of yellow numbers, which my great-grandmother had given us to take to some friend who lived across the Park; and as we walked along, somewhere near the gates of the gardens, we met my father, who asked us what we were carrying. Then somehow he seemed vexed and troubled, told us not to go on, and to take the parcel home. Then he changed his mind, saying that if his grandmother wished it, the books had best be conveyed; but we guessed, as children do, that something was seriously amiss. Something was seriously amiss. The sale of Vanity Fair was so small that it was a question at that time whether its publication should not be discontinued altogether."

Mrs. Ritchie reprints the letter to the Duke of Devonshire with regard to the future destiny of the Vanity Fair characters, which has already been discussed in the ACADEMY. It is clear from the dates now given that this must not be regarded as a supplement to the story itself, but as a first draft of the conclusion which was afterwards modified. The letter was written on May 1, 1848; the closing pages of Vanity

Fair itself were not finished until July 2 in the same year. Thus the ending of Becky's career given in the novel is the final and authoritative one.

Thackeray died in 1863, and it begins to be possible to discern how his work will endure the wear and tear of time. Far less than a quarter of a century has proved fatal to the reputation of more than one writer, whose popularity, at one time or another, must have rivalled his. Where is now the Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton of our grandmothers and are not even the Anthony Trollope and the Charlotte Yonge of our mothers fast hurrying to join him in those oblivious fields? Even George Eliot, it is whispered, hardly maintains her hold upon the rising generation. What, then, of Thackeray? Does he, too, suffer eclipse, as the newer lights of the literary world rise into prominence? Do the young men and maidens who read George Meredith and Thomas Hardy and Louis Stevenson still find a place upon their shelves for Vanity Fair and Pendennis, Esmond and The Newcomes? Our own impression is that they do; that of the early Victorian reputations, the two which tend to survive, to become classic, are those, firstly, of Thackeray, and secondly, of the obscure ex-governess whose dedication of Jane Eyre to Thackeray in the very year of Vanity Fair caused him such profound perplexity. If this be so, 1848, significant already for very different reasons, should be a noted date in the annals of literature. We have not forgotten that inquiries made by the ACADEMY among booksellers last autumn elicited the opinion that while in many parts of the country the sale of Thackeray's books remained good, it showed a falling off in precisely those towns—Oxford and Cambridge to wit—where a falling off would mean most. But we do not think that the evidence proves much. University men probably do not buy Thackeray, because he is on their shelves or their fathers' shelves already; and, after all, the number of copies bought of a book is not a fair test of the number of times a book is read. The ephemeral work of fiction is bought, read, and done with; to the worn volumes of your classics one returns year after year with renewed affection.

In many respects Thackeray makes a greater appeal to the modern mind than he did to the first generation of his readers. We have seen that the indifference of the public nearly converted Vanity Fair into a torso, and in how many ways must not the author of Vanity Fair have knocked up against the prejudices of an age whose ideals of fiction were founded upon the romance of Scott and the sentimentality of Dickens? For, since the tradition of Jane Austen had faded away, Thackeray was the first of the realists; and our mothers fought a little shy of realism: the best of them were idealists, and the bulk were sentimentalists. Here is Thackeray's literary manifesto, from the preface to Pendennis:

"Since the author of Tom Jones was buried, no writer of fiction among us has been permitted to depict to his utmost power a man. We must drape him and give him a certain conventional simper. Society will not tolerate the natural in our art. Many ladies have remonstrated, and subscribers left me, because, in the course of the story, I described a young man resisting and affected by temptation. My object was to say that he had the passions to feel, and the manliness and generosity to overcome them. You will not hear—it is best to know it—what moves in the real world, what passes in society, in the clubs, colleges, mess-rooms—what is the life and talk of your sons. A little more frankness than is customary has been attempted in this story; with no bad desire on the writer's part, it is hoped, and with no ill consequence to any reader."

Because, then, Thackeray saw and painted life as it was, and not as men or women wished it to be, or liked to think that it was; and because, hating pettiness, vanities, and snobbery of every kind, he smote the sham with a bludgeon wherever he came across it—because of this, he was called a cynic. A cynic, of course, he was not; he never painted the shadows darker than they really were, never left out the high lights. The epithet was a retort, the wild parry of the snobs stung by the merciless lash of his satire. Well, largely owing to Thackeray himself, literary ideals have changed. We no longer fear to look on things as they are, no longer wish them enveloped in the sentimentalist's rosy mist. And, therefore, Thackeray's realism no longer offends: he speaks to us with our own tongue. If anything has lost savour, it is rather the moments when he, too, appears to approach the sentimental; when the kind, shrewd eyes behind the round spectacles grow suspiciously dim. We do not, of course, speak of the great crowning passage in The Newcomes, which we cannot refrain from transcribing once more:

"At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time, and, just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said, 'Adsum'—and fell back. It was the word we used at school when names were called; and lo, he, whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of his Master."

That is one of the immortal pathetic bits in literature, and there are few who read it unmoved. But there are other passages, the death of George Osborne on the field of Waterloo, for instance, conceived in the same vein, but without the same felicity; and from some of these the charm, if they once had charm, seems to have evaporated. Nor, one thinks, do those pale heroines, Amelia Sedley and Helen Pendennis, quite retain their old authority.

One other consideration may confirm our belief in Thackeray's endurance. He is, of course, very largely a painter of manners. And the manners he paints are curiously obsolete. Major Pendennis no longer walks Pall Mall; the vogue of the Fotheringay is forgotten. There is folly and snobbery still in Vanity Fair, but its outward manifestations have been metamorphosed. Yet this makes no difference at all to Thackeray's appeal. You accept his manners historically, as you accept the manners of Eastcheap when the riotous prince and the fat knight kept revel there, as you always, indeed, had to accept the manners of "Esmond." For, after all, it is not in the ephemeral merely, but in the essential that Thackeray's power lies, in his hold on the central facts of human nature, in the gift of the mage, projecting real men and women on the consciousness of all time.

SOME HUGUENOTS AND A GUISE.

Henry of Guise, and Other Portraits. By H. C. MacDowall. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE historical studies, or "monographs," which Mr. MacDowall has here bound together are three; and they are closely related, as will be evident from the mere recital of their titles—"Henry of Guise," "Agrippa D'Aubigné," "Catherine of Navarre." The first bulks the largest, but the second is far and away the most interesting, while the third is almost a thing of naught. Henry of Guise is, of course, an exceedingly difficult subject to treat sufficiently in a comparatively short space: his connexions and his pretensions were so great and so many, and the part he played so lofty, that his history is almost the history of his time, and that the most complicated with intrigue and disaster in the long and varied experience of France. The difficulties are great, but Mr. MacDowall has contrived to give a lively and sympathetic rendering of the most notable and most handsome of the Guises—who had so much of the temper and colour of his ancestress, the most infamous of the Borgias, who "spoke ill of no one, and never refused a favour," who "asked nothing better than (with one exception) to be friends with all the world," and with whom "all the world (with one exception) was ready to be friends." The first exception was Coligny, the leader of the Huguenots and the reputed assassin of Guise's father, and the second was Henry of Anjou, King of France. Another might be added, a subtle middle third, Catherine de' Medici, the mother of the king. The history of the time is presented with accuracy—that, of course—but also with measured precision and vigour. It is instructive to note—and Mr. MacDowall might have noted—that the articles of union of the famous Catholic League, of which Guise was the head, are almost identical with those of the Scottish Covenant of sixty years later; and it is no secret to the intimate student of Scottish history that this was no coincidence, but that Argyll and the ultra-Presbyterian party quite consciously and cynically adopted the Catholic model. That is doubly instructive, as tending also to show how quick and tense was the interest of one country of Europe in another, and of the several religious parties in each other—quicker and tenser, indeed, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries than to-day.

But it is with Agrippa D'Aubigné, the soldier-poet of the Huguenots, and the grandfather of Madame de Maintenon, that Mr. MacDowall is at his best—at his freest and most sympathetic. Henry of Guise he admires and, we may allow, coldly comprehends; but Agrippa D'Aubigné he loves, and sets forth with all the glow and charm of complete affection and understanding. Take his admirable summary of D'Aubigné's character and career on p. 200:

"All Henry's [of Navarre] fine tact and temper were needed to hold his party together, and no one tested them more severely than D'Aubigné. From the hour when they rode westward together through the frosty night, 'with death and shame behind them,' till the day, eighteen years after, when Henry IV. made his triumphal entry into his capital, D'Aubigné's fortunes were bound up with those of his prince; but their relations, though always intimate, were never harmonious. D'Aubigné did not possess one of the qualities which make a man easy to live with. He was as quick to take offence as he was careless of giving it, he was cursed with an ironical humour which neither interest nor discretion ever restrained, and he prided himself on the savage sincerity which disdained to consider time, place, or person. Yet, though he often quarrelled with his master, Navarre never allowed the parting to be final; for with that unerring knowledge of character which helped to make Henry IV. one of the first diplomatists of his time, he recognised in his intractable equerry one virtue which in the day of adversity outweighed many defects. D'Aubigné was not always to be loved, but he was always to be trusted; he was not often amiable, but he was invariably loyal; there was no bribe in the Treasury of France that could affect his fidelity for a moment, and Henry, bred in the cynical pessimism of the Florentine's school, knew better than most men what fidelity was worth."

Yet there is a phase of D'Aubigné which Mr. MacDowall fails to understand, which, we suppose, it is impossible for any Englishman to understand—especially if he be of the precise and academic sort. He recognises—or says so, at least—that D'Aubigné "was before everything a soldier," and he quotes with approval Biron's saying, that vanity is the fifth element, and the one in which soldiers live. Mr. MacDowall recognises, or allows, that kind of thing, and yet in his excellent chapter on D'Aubigné's distinction as poet, historian, and satirist, he is able to express himself thus:

"It would indeed be difficult to find a greater contrast than that presented by his Meditations on the Psalms . . . and the volume [The Adventures of Baron Foëneste] whose 'blasphemies and impieties' justly scandalised the writer's kind hosts [the Puritans of Geneva]. . . . Whether the talk turns upon the court, the church, or the camp, it overflows with that profane and scurrilous raillery to whose coarse licence the sixteenth century satirist sets no bounds. . . . The wit of the Confession [of the Sieur de Saucy] is more malevolent than that of the Gascon dialogue [the Foëneste], the satire more ruthless, the coarseness more outrageous; it is difficult to comprehend how the pen which wrote the 'Evening Hymn' and the beautiful little verses on the Lord's Supper could have been guilty of producing it."

To write like that is surely to proclaim oneself a precisian of the narrowest, most insular, and most academic sort. Why is it "difficult to comprehend" that a man may be of a very devout, religious temper, and yet be able to talk, and so to write—for in the sixteenth century and in the seventeenth, and even later, men did not fear to write as they might talk—freely, and to the modern

AN AMERICAN LAYARD.

Nippur. The Narrative of the University of Pennsylvania's Expedition to Babylonia in the Years 1888-1890. By John Punnett Peters, Ph.D., &c. Vol. II. (G. B. Putnam's Sons.)

At the end of Dr. Peters's first volume (reviewed in the ACADEMY of Sept. 11, 1897), we left the expedition straggling back to America, much out of spirits and not a little inclined to quarrel among themselves. After nearly a year's work, executed under circumstances of great hardship, their camp had been burned and looted by the Arabs, and save for the antiquities bought in London, they took back hardly anything to exhibit to the public-spirited subscribers who had found the money for the first campaign. But good Americans do not so easily accept defeat; and, in spite of his own forebodings to the contrary, the committee insisted on Dr. Peters's immediate return to Constantinople, with increased funds and more ample powers. How this wise confidence and liberality was rewarded by discoveries richer, perhaps, than have yet fallen to the lot of any explorer in Western Asia, is told in the present volume.

The success which attended this second effort seems to have been due in the first place to the indomitable energy and tact of Dr. Peters himself, and in the next to the use which he made of the resources of civilisation. On his first campaign, he made friends with politicians and savants alike, so that not only did Hamdi Bey and the British Consulate at Bagdad do their best for him, but the great French explorers M. de Sarzec and M. Pognon gave him valuable help. Yet there remained the nomad Arab tribes among whom he had to work, and these at first sight appeared an insuperable obstacle. The year before their perpetual feuds with each other and the Turks had kept the expedition in a constant state of unrest; and it was the shooting of an Arab thief by one of the Turkish guard supplied by the Porte which had brought about Dr. Peters's precipitate retreat from the country. This time, however, he resolved to attack the Arabs on their weakest side: he had before noticed their superstitious reverence for anything like magic, and had gathered from a conversation overheard between his interpreter and some Arab chiefs that he was himself credited by them with the possession of magical powers. Determined to live up to this reputation, he supplied himself through a Greek at Beyrout with rockets and other fireworks, including "some indescribable inventions of his [i.e., the Greek's] own made in old tomato-cans." Arrived at Nippur, the Arabs began their former practices by stealing a donkey, and Dr. Peters solemnly warned them of the mysterious punishment likely to follow the offence. After a little conjuring with a measuring tape, believed by the Arabs (as in Layard's time) to be a sort of snake, he concealed himself on a dark night in a neighbouring trench, and played off his pyrotechnics with startling effect:

"The first rocket had hardly gone off when we could hear a buzz of excited voices below us. When the second and third followed, the cry arose that we were making the stars fall from heaven. The women screamed and hid themselves in the tents, and the more timid of the men followed suit. As Roman candles and Bengal lights followed, the excitement grew more intense. At last we came to our pièce de résistance, the tomato-can firework. At first this fizzled and bade fair to ruin our whole performance. Then, just as we despaired of success, it exploded with a great noise, knocking us backward in the trench behind a wall in which we were hidden, and filling the air with fiery serpents hissing and spluttering in every direction. The effect was indescribably diabolical, and every man, woman, and child, guards included, fled screaming to seek for hiding-places overcome with terror."

After this there were no more petty thefts, and it only needed a second display to rout an attack in force upon the camp planned by a hostile tribe.

Thanks to the fireworks, an awful medicine administered by Dr. Peters to the Arabs, and the occasional use of the stick, the expedition was allowed to work in peace, and very good work it was they did. They thoroughly excavated the old temple of Bel of Nippur, shifting more earth, as Dr. Peters proudly says, than any scientific expedition before or since; and this time they reaped the benefit of the careful surveys they had made the year before. Digging not at haphazard, but in accordance with a pre-arranged plan, they found, like Schliemann at Troy, several cities buried one under the other, and at every level succeeded in obtaining statues, pottery, seals, and dated tablets establishing the main facts of Babylonian history as worked out by Assyriologists. Cutting through the remains of a Jewish settlement of the seventh century A.D.—distinguished, curiously enough, by the number of magic cups or incantation bowls found in it—they came upon the restored buildings of Assur-bani-pal, King of Assyria, in 650 B.C., then, under a regularly graded series of monuments ascribed to other well-known kings, upon bricks and tablets bearing the inscriptions of the famous conqueror, Sargon of Accad, whose date is now accepted as 3800 B.C., and finally upon those of Alusharsid, a king hitherto unknown to us, whose date cannot be made later than 4000 B.C. Mr. Haynes, who took up in 1893-1896 the completion of Dr. Peters's work, went further still, and obtained results which have drawn from so cautious an Assyriologist as Dr. Hilprecht the statement: "I do not hesitate to date the founding of the temple of Bel and the first settlements in Nippur somewhere between 6000 and 7000 B.C., and possibly earlier." As the date of Menes, the legendary king who is said to have introduced civilisation into Egypt, cannot safely be put higher than 5000 B.C., the American Expedition can fairly claim to have discovered the records of the earliest civilisation which has yet come to light.

This is a very important discovery, because it brings us at once many steps nearer to the solution of the wide-reaching problem, How did the civilisation of the Old World arise? Dr. Peters's explorations go to confirm the conclusion, arrived at by Prof. Fritz Hommel on linguistic grounds, that ear coarsely, of such matters of human interest as are to-day commonly reserved for smoking-room conversation? To our anæmic, bleached sense of life, in these latter days and in this country, it may be something of a shock to find such a combination in the same person, but surely it should not be "difficult to comprehend." The combination has been familiar in all ages and in all countries, save our own; it marked alike such opposites as St. Augustine and the Rev. Samuel Rutherford, and Protestant and Puritan, as well as Catholic; and it is a point of much doubt whether our greater reticence tends either to greater devoutness in religion, more genuine purity, or truer refinement of life.

As for Catherine of Navarre, spite of Mr. MacDowall's evident admiration of her character and conduct, spite, too, of her brother Henry's tribute to her in a letter to his ambassador in England—

"I loved my sister dearly; no greater loss could have befallen me. She was the companion of all my adventures, good or bad, and she endured the ill more constantly than she had leisure to share the good"

—spite of that affectionate tribute when she was dead, the king, her brother, found her a great embarrassment and obstruction in his political exigencies, and her story provokes in us no sympathy for her misfortunes, but only a great impatience with the obstinacy which brought these misfortunes upon her. And regarding the position of the Huguenots, which Catherine so completely illustrated in her own person, and in particular their attitude towards the State, the last words are not uttered when their firm faith to their principles is commended and the slaughter of St. Bartholomew's Day is spoken of with reprobation. "According to ces mômiers—these Puritans"—wrote Balzac in Le Martyre Calviniste, "good conduct lay in renouncing the arts and graces of life, in eating well but without luxury, and in silently amassing money without enjoying it otherwise than as Calvin enjoyed his power—in imagination." And into Calvin's own mouth he put these words of shrewd Calvinistic, that is to say, Huguenot, wisdom, "There are bodies in great States; I will have only individuals: bodies are too resistant; they see clearly when individuals are blind." But no stronger condemnation was ever written of the Huguenot position than that set down some years ago by Dr. Martineau, himself of Huguenot ancestry, in an historical essay on the English Puritans. There he declared, in effect, that no State could endure with safety the Puritan ideal either in religion or in politics, because it contemplated a state within a state, an imperium in imperio; it was destructive of all true patriotism—that sense of unity of purpose and community of interest which should bind the citizens of a state together; and it made more of those who held a common faith than of those who were of the same blood and the same speech, under the same laws and the same government. These reflections are made because Mr. MacDowall's book provokes thought and something of opposition. It needs a book of substance and character to do that.

the Egyptian civilisation was derived from the Babylonian. Terrien de Lacouperie and others have long said the same thing about the Chinese, and although the proof is not very cogent to uninitiated eyes, it seems to have satisfied such high authorities as Prof. Douglas. As for India, her earliest records do not go anything like so far back as the Babylonian, and she was well known to some of the earliest Babylonian kings whom Dr. Peters has made known to us, they having imported Indian teak for the construction of their temples. It was no doubt the tradition of their rule over, at any rate, the Punjab which inspired Alexander's invasion of that province. There remains only Greece, from whom we derive our own culture, but that hers was derived from Babylon, either directly or through the Phœnicians, has long been known to scholars, and the identification of Greek art and Greek mythology with their Babylonian prototypes is going on every day. Everything, therefore, seems to point to Babylonia as the centre whence the civilisation of the Old World spread, and the Biblical legend of the Garden of Eden may thus have an historical foundation hitherto unsuspected. Whether we can get yet further back depends in part on the decipherment of the 32,000 cuneiform tablets which formed the "bag" of the Philadelphian Expedition, and of the almost equal number now lying unread in the different museums of Europe. Meanwhile, we can recommend all who are interested in the matter to read the work on Old Babylonian Inscriptions, Chiefly from Nippur, published by Prof. Hilprecht, which should certainly be taken in conjunction with Dr. Peters's book.

There is much, however, in the present volume to interest the reader who is not an archæologist. Dr. Peters writes easily, and the opinions of a shrewd and observant traveller without prejudices arising from too close an acquaintance with European politics have a value of their own, apart from the dry American humour with which he generally expresses them. After leaving Nippur, he returned to Constantinople by way of Palestine and the Syrian coast, and, therefore, had a good chance of comparing the state of the different parts of the Turkish dominions. It may surprise some among us to hear that in his opinion the Sick Man is by no means so moribund as they would wish, and that in Asia the Sultan's authority was reviving. The Arabs, he thinks, may yet be a source of trouble in Mesopotamia, whither they are slowly being pushed from the deserts bordering Arabia. Yet they know their masters, and an ambush of both horse and foot, laying in wait for the Expedition, "rode sullenly back" at the bidding of a single Circassian zaptieh, who represented the authority of the Porte. In Palestine, too, he tells us, the Circassian colony planted by the Turks, "although few in number, had so handled the Arabs in the neighbourhood that none ventured to molest or interfere with them." And in the Lebanon, he says:

"Although the Turks do not seem to conduct their military operations with much skill, and their wars usually result in a draw; nevertheless they have been, and still are, slowly pressing southward on the Eastern side of the Jordan, establishing military stations, extending the telegraph, and bringing the country into actual and not merely nominal subjection to the Porte."

On the other hand, Dr. Peters has few compliments for English diplomacy, which he considers to have been outwitted in Armenia by the Russians, and to have pursued "a weak and futile policy, occasionally protesting against Turkish outrages, but taking no active steps to enforce its protestations." He admits, however, that we have sometimes interfered effectively to prevent massacres of the Syrian Jews.

This volume, like its predecessor, is well got up, and furnished with all necessary plans and appendices. The illustrations, as before, are a failure, partly owing to a camera having been tampered with by "someone acquainted with photography." The few photographs which Dr. Peters has succeeded in reproducing are too small, indistinct, and wanting in detail, to make us regret the absence of the others. One good woodcut would be worth a dozen of them.

A LEADER-WRITER'S ESSAYS.

Studies on many Subjects. By Samuel Harvey Reynolds. (Edward Arnold.)

THIS book, to which Prof. Saintsbury contributes a preface, is, with one exception, a collection of reviews by the late Mr. Harvey Reynolds, contributed either to the Westminster or the Times. Mr. Reynolds is interesting as a typical example of the Times contributor: a clergyman and a Fellow of Oxford, living in his quiet vicarage, unheard of by the public, and yet more widely read by the public than all but the most popular authors. For he wrote, as his widow tells us, some two thousand leaders for the great, unchanging organ of the solid and stolid English moneyed classes; as permanent and tenacious as Downing-street itself. Mr. Harvey is the thorough journalist of the old class. His wife quoted from his papers his conception of the journalist's vocation:

"He must be content to be counted as nothing, in the future as in the present, to be unknown or set aside, and never to take rank among the real influences of his time. His labours will be rewarded, but not as men ordinarily count reward. He will have a real power—his work will be deep and lasting, but his name will be obscure or evanescent. He will affect the tone of the nation for which he writes, and will thus be the indirect cause of its most noble after-growth. . . . To those who are dissatisfied with such a position among the unrecognised forces of the world we will say only that they must try some other line, for they have not the temper of journalists."

It is a fair and dignified defence of the old steady-going journalism. The work of the journalist is deep and lasting, like the work of the coral-insect, which is also among the nameless forces of the world. He powerfully affects the tone of the nation for which he writes, but whether the result be "noble after-growth" manifestly depends on how he affects the tone of the nation. As to whether England's noble after-growths are the product of Times journalism, one may make some dram of a scruple. To be among the unrecognised forces of the world one must plainly be unambitious. And unambitious is, perhaps, the first adjective we should apply to Mr. Harvey's Studies. An absence of ambition must clearly have been a note of his character. To be unambitious—and a Times journalist—one must be unimaginative. And unimaginative is perhaps the second adjective we should apply to these Studies. The imagination of Shakespeare would turn a jade, a very Dobbin, after hauling a couple of thousand leaders for the Times. Even the style has we know not what which breathes of sound commercial principles and solid mahogany. It is an honest-suited style enough, a durable article made of the best material, but—shall we say?—bagging a little with much wear. A style constructed to work if you turn the key; a trudging style, insensitive, with seasoned sole, built for heavy going. Yet you cannot say why. You cannot lay your finger here or there and fix a defect: the sentences are scholarly enough in structure, not involved or ponderous; direct, clear; yet their impression is heavy. Perhaps faults would be a relief. Perhaps it is the flavourless unimpeachability, as of distilled water, which jades our palate. It is an able specimen of that journalistic style which still has its fortress in the Times, while the movement begun, shall we say, by Mr. Stead, has infected other papers with vivacity and character.

Mr. Harvey is distinctly at his best when he is not dealing with literature. His master-quality is temperance and judiciality applied to matters of fact or theory rather than of taste. In dealing with Louis Blanc's French Revolution, with Mr. Herbert Spencer's Man versus the State, or with Bimetallism, his calm, clear, commonsense judgment shows to advantage. He is on his own ground, also, in discussing Bacon's political career and true relation towards the philosophy which goes under his name. It is an excellent piece of work. In the essay, On the Critical Character, he has the merit (as Prof. Saintsbury points out) of recognising the value of Matthew Arnold's criticism when Arnold had not attained his present undisputed place. It must be granted, also, that his essay on Dante pleaded for the study of that poet in a day when Dante was neglected by Englishmen; but it would be impossible to call it an adequate criticism on Dante. He does his best to be judicial; but half of Dante is beyond his range. His hatred for metaphysics (most characteristic in a Times reviewer of Mr. Harvey's period) and his defective imagination lead him into a hopelessly narrowed estimate of the great Florentine's genius; while to the Paradiso in particular he shows lamentable obtuseness. And what shall we say of an essay on The Fathers of Greek Philosophy, which opens with the statement:

"It is not probable that any, who have not either a pecuniary or theological interest in the matter, will contend in the present day that metaphysics are of any value";

and who further refuses to waste his time on the discussion of such "elaborate nonsense." An estimate of Plato and Aristotle by a man who has thus candidly stated his degree of competence can only be a literary curiosity. It serves, at any rate, to show how far we have since come. What would have been Mr. Harvey's amazement to behold a Leader of the Commons putting forth a more or less metaphysical book amid public applause, can but dimly be conjectured. We spoke of one essay not before published. It is the final essay on Dr. Samuel Parr, and is perhaps the best in the volume. Here Mr. Harvey has manifestly followed Macaulay in style, with considerable gain of life; and he attempts to clear the Doctor from the aspersion cast on him in De Quincey's brilliant essay. His statement is excellently impartial, and the last word that need be said on a by no means important person. For ourselves, we think rather worse of Parr after reading Mr. Harvey's essay than after reading De Quincey's. We are glad to part with this word of cordial praise from a book which is the work of an undoubtedly able man, and has the interest of a type disappearing and a day disappeared. But that it contains the seed of life we cannot pretend.

THE NEW BIBLICAL DICTIONARY.

A Dictionary of the Bible. Edited by James Hastings, D.D., and Others. (T. & T. Clark.)

BOTH the editors and the publishers are to be congratulated upon the appearance of the first volume of this most excellent work. In form it is larger than Smith and Fuller's, while an ingenious system of abbreviating references gives more space to the writers without imposing much additional labour on the readers. On the title-page appear the names of Profs. Davidson (Aberdeen), Driver (Oxford), and Swete (Cambridge); while the list of contributors includes nearly every school of Christian thought, with the notable exception of the extreme High Church or Anglo-Catholic. Every attempt, with the exception afterwards mentioned, seems to have been made to exclude matters of controversy, while scientific questions have been entrusted to the best known and most capable hands; and, though much space has been allotted to subjects demanding lengthy treatment, such as the Chronology of the Old and New Testaments, due notice has been taken of such matters as the explanation of obsolete words which may be supposed to present difficulties to less advanced students. If the other volumes keep up to the high level of this one, the editors will have produced the best Biblical Dictionary which has yet appeared.

To say that such a book is entirely free from fault would, of course, be to say that its contributors were more than human. We think, for instance, that it would have been well had Prof. Ira Price (Chicago) not been allowed to air, in the article "Accad," his adhesion to the wild theory of M. Halévy on the Semitic origin of the Sumerian texts. As M. Halévy's opinions on this point are gaining no ground in Europe, we do not see why the editors should have admitted an article which has necessitated an editorial note of disclaimer, and is, besides, in direct contradiction to the full and authoritative articles of Prof. Hommel (Munich) on "Assyria" and "Babylonia." We may protest, too, against Mr. Crum's disfigurement of his own most useful and complete article on "Egypt" by the adoption of the latest vagary in the transliteration of Egyptian hieroglyphics, of which the spelling of King Mycerinus' name as "Mnk'wr" is the only instance quotable in ordinary type. Such strictly local fashions in pedantry—for the French Egyptologists have always stoutly resisted this German system of transcription—are as certainly doomed to disappear as the fancy which prevailed in the fifties for spelling Clovis as Hlodowig, and can besides convey no information to the readers for whom the Dictionary is intended. But these are but spots in the sun which in no way detract from the real merit of most of the other articles. If we were to make a choice where nearly all are good, we should perhaps take Mr. Forbes Robinson's "Apocrypha" and Prof. Ramsay's "Ephesus" as perfect models of what such articles should be.

Not the least interesting feature in the Dictionary is the evidence it affords of the change in opinion as to the date of the different books in the Old Testament, brought about by the increasing diffusion of archaeological knowledge and more rational views of the inspiration of Scripture than formerly prevailed. Although among the contributors are numbered such determined opponents of the higher criticism as Profs. Sayce and Hommel, the Book of Job is quietly relegated to the age of the Captivity and the Book of Daniel to that of Antiochus Epiphanes in apparent confidence that such assertions are in accordance with the best religious opinion of the time. Yet Renan made the late date of the Book of Job, which he assigned to the reign of Hezekiah, an argument for supposing that the Jews were not acquainted with the Mosaic law until its re-discovery by Josiah; and if Daniel were not written till 170 B.C., it is plain that what were formerly regarded as his prophecies were merely a poetical narrative of current events. It is true that neither theory is incompatible with the most orthodox view of Scripture; yet we can fancy what a storm their promulgation in a work of this kind would have raised among the orthodox even ten years ago. That it will not do so now seems to be clear gain.

AFTER BUNYAN.

The New Guest. By Angus Rotherham. (David Nutt.)

MACAULAY was properly severe on all attempts to "improve and to imitate" the Pilgrim's Progress. Mr. Rotherham, perhaps, would have escaped his censure, for he takes little from Bunyan except the general idea of the book. His pilgrim sets out after an interview with the Wandering Jew and passes a night in the Castle of the Crown of Thorns; he meets with Faith, Hope, and Charity, and is accepted as the Pilgrim of Faith; he falls into the clutches of Circe, is taken prisoner by the Giant of the Milling District, and passes through the Valley of the Shadow of Death; at last he embarks on the Sea of Self-Mistrust and lands on an island which sinks under him, when he swims to the Hill Country and meets the Wandering Jew grown young again. The moral of it all is, apparently, that each must work out his salvation for himself, and that it is best to do one's duty without bothering too much about creeds. The following is a sample of Mr. Rotherham's not ungraceful style, the subject being the apparition of the Golden Helen in the Castle of the Crown of Thorns.

"Now as I was sitting listening, I heard a rustle of garments, and looked round. Then I saw at one side of the hall a phantom more exquisitely lovely than desire itself could mould of earth. It cast a glance of startled wonder at the place and the people, and bearkened with amazement to the music. Then it took two or three steps and looked and listened again. None of the others marked anything, only myself was rapt with the entrancing vision. She moved on and gathered her robe close around her, as if fearing somewhat, yet her carriage was queenly. When she came near I knew the spirit could tell that I alone of the company was aware of her—such a wonderful soul came into her eyes. She passed by the Crown of Thorns, paused a moment to look at it, and shuddered. Then she ventured nearer to the seats, and looked at the men and women there; but they saw nothing, and gave no heed. At last she put forth a lovely hand and touched one and another, but they marked nothing. Then she glided near to me and touched me too, but neither could I feel it, and when I put out my hand to touch her, lo! it was nothing again. Then drawing back a step she bent her head, letting fall her wreath of flowers, while the golden hair shed itself over her shoulders; and below the music I heard her sigh and utter these words in a whisper: 'Greece gave her swiftest and fairest for me, and forgave me; in windy Troy they loved the face that brought their ruin. Was not great Agamemnon my husband's brother, or do I dream? For sure he was—absent, dishonoured, I still held sway in that husband's palace, and he hated the blind grace of the statues when he thought of me. But this hall, these faces, that strange crown. Why do the men not look at me? Why do they not speak? What is the blood upon their foreheads? The phantom on the palace couch, the evening shadow from the hills of Lacedæmon have more being than I. Nothing, nothing for evermore, I pass across the fields of sleep.' And with that she drew to the further side of the hall, and growing thinner and thinner presently vanished away."

It cannot be said that Mr. Rotherham handles the allegorical method like a master. He might, indeed, plead Bunyan's example as an excuse for sometimes allegorising and sometimes not, and the lyrics with which his pages are strewn are certainly not worse than Bunyan's own; but he shows an alternate distrust and confidence in the discernment of his readers which his great example was far from professing. Thus, he tells us by a marginal note that the burden borne by his pilgrim is "the burden of the unsatisfied soul," and that the sinking island is the Roman Catholic Church, both of which facts "every schoolboy" could make out for himself. But what in the world is the Milling District with its thrown-down walls, its people who cannot say yea and nay, and its three-headed giant with a captious wife and an army of slaves? At one time it seems to be Capital with some reference to Free Trade, though such a theory is rather at variance with the tone of the rest of the book. Then it looks like Education and the scepticism it is supposed to engender. But the author gives us no hint: which is to behave not like an imitator of the inspired tinker, but like the commentators, of whom it is said:

"The commentators each dark passage shun,
And hold their farthing rushlight to the sun."

Can it be that Mr. Rotherham has at one time meditated a commentary on Bunyan, and now confuses his earlier with his later method?

Spite of this, the book has much to recommend it. It is beautifully printed in antique type and on hand-made paper, though—the pity of it!—in "Boston, U.S.A."; it is too short to be tedious; and it contains by way of incidental piece as good an original fairy story as the reader is likely to meet with. With more of the same sort, we shall be glad to greet Mr. Rotherham again.

BRIEFER MENTION.

History of England under Henry the Fourth.
By James Hamilton Wylie, M.A. Vol. IV.
(Longmans.)

THIS volume completes Mr. Wylie's laborious task. During a quarter of a century he has written the history of fourteen years, with a scrupulous minuteness and a painful determination to dig to the sources which have won him the respect of every scholar. And if the very abundance of detail, no less than that wilful archaism of manner for which Mr. Wylie professes himself still impenitent, does something to repel the easy reader and obscure the broad outlines of historical portraiture, the book will nevertheless endure as a vast storehouse of facts, invaluable, essential to anyone who would comprehend that difficult, complicated thing, the fifteenth century. Of direct narrative there is but little left for this closing volume. A chapter or two on the relations of England to Burgundians and Armagnacs, and on the battle of St. Cloud; a chapter on the myth of madcap Prince Hal and on the strained relations between father and son; and then the end. The narrative of Henry's death and burial and the summary of his personality and character are written in Mr. Wylie's best manner, with even more than his usual lavish apparatus of confirmative and illustrative references. Thus he describes the last honours paid to the mortal usurper.

"The king's body was washed, brained, bowelled, and embalmed in a mixture of myrrh, aloes, laurel flower, and saffron, and wound in cerements of waxed Rheims linen, leaving the face alone exposed. They then clothed it in a long robe reaching to the heels, with a royal mantle over it. The thick brown beard was smoothed over the throat and chin, the crown was placed upon the head, the hands were strapped with cerecloth sewed about each thumb and finger, and dressed in gloves richly brodered with orphreys. The right middle finger wore a gold ring. The right hand held a golden orb with the cross resting on the breast, while the left hand lay at his side, grasping a sceptre of gold which reached to the left ear. The legs were cased in silken galogs or buskins, and the feet were shod with sandals. Dressed in this guise, the body lay in state for a time at Westminster. It was then stripped again, lapped in lead, chested in a rough elm hutch, packed with haybands to steady it, and taken down the Thames to Gravesend in a barge arrayed with lamps, accompanied by eight vessels, having on board the Prince of Wales, his brothers John and Humphrey, and a crowd of barons, knights, bishops, abbots, and other notables."

The rest of the volume is made up of appendices, a glossary, and an exhaustive index. Among the former may be noted an itinerary for the whole reign, a list of mediæval trades, and a long series of extracts from Wardrobe and other Accounts in the Record Office. Many of these are valuable as evidence upon matters of costume and domestic economy during the reign. The whole is compiled with exact and elaborate care, and forms a worthy finish to a most honourable work.

The Iliads of Homer. Translated by George Chapman. "Temple Classics." 2 vols. (Dent.)

THIS is a welcome little reprint. Chapman was not a very precise scholar, and he had some eccentricities of vocabulary, but for spirit and swing not one of his successors has approached him. How well this goes, taken quite at random!

"This said, the multitude Was all for home: and all men else, that what this world conclude
Had not discover'd. All the crowd was shov'd about the shore,
In sway, like rude and raging waves, rous'd with the fervent bore
Of th' east and south winds, when they break from Jove's clouds, and are borne On rough backs of th' Icarian seas; or like a field of corn
High grown, that Zephyr's vehement gusts
bring easily underneath,
And make the stiff up-bristled ears do homage to his breath;
For even so easily, with the breath Atrides us'd, was sway'd
The violent multitude. To fleet with shouts, and disarray'd,
All rusht; and, with a fog of dust, their rude feet dimm'd the day."

Chapman's Odyssey, better still, has already been issued in this series.

Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories.
By Marion Harland. (Putnam's.)

MISS HARLAND has written a pleasant, gossipy book upon old Virginia, full of studies of its early families and their homes, many of which still stand, full also of bits of personal and historical romance. She tells the story of the Fair Evelyn of Westover and her ill-starred love affair with Charles Mordaunt, son of the Earl of Peterborough. She tells the story of the Jumel mansion on Washington Heights, and of the extraordinary marriage between Mme. Jumel and that truly "magerful man," Colonel Aaron Burr. Most touching, and to English readers most familiar of all, she tells the story of the beautiful Indian princess Pocahontas, daughter of Powhattan, of the services which she rendered to the early Virginian settlers, and of her ill-requited affection for their famous leader, the explorer and writer Captain John Smith. Ultimately she was christened with the name of Rebecca, married to an Englishman, and taken to England, where she was entertained by Bishop John King. She died at Gravesend, as she was about to return to America. Miss Harland writes prettily, with a strong sense of the picturesque and of the dreamy interest clinging round the "unhappy far-off things" with which she has to do. The get-up of the book is not altogether pleasing to an English taste, for the heavily-clayed pages make it a portentous weight.

The Story of Hawaii. By Jean A. Owen (Mrs. Visger). (Harper Brothers.)

THIS book is in no sense a work of art; and art of the most distinguished has been so lavished upon the islands of the Southern Seas, that the kindly gossip of Mrs. Visger is apt just a little to jar upon a tender nerve. But for this the volume is informing enough, and quite well up to the daily level of Our Special Correspondent. You will have your notions of the whereabouts of the group and its local relation to Samoa and Tahiti corrected, your herbarium of the islands will be filled in, your ideas of their folklore will be rounded off. From Mrs. Visger you may also learn of the progress that had been made by native thought and the growth of the native polity, when the originality of an adolescent civilisation was graciously nipped in the bud by the condescending intrusion of de-civilised man out of the East and the West. It is the too familiar story of a simple race of sweet unsophisticated instincts banded about between alien races of corrupt and greedy adventurers; and the moral comes home with all the more vivacity that Mrs. Visger apparently is hardly conscious of it.

The Architectural Review (June—November, 1897). (Office: Effingham House.)

THIS very excellent magazine grows in interest. Some of the reproductions in the volume before us are worthy of high praise, and all are interesting. Not only architecture, but the decorative arts generally receive notice; and some idea of the editor's catholicity may be gained from the ingenious illustrated article on Zenda—Mr. Anthony Hope's imaginary city—in which we are offered both a plan of the castle's arrangement and a picture of its exterior, which might well accompany new editions of the story.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE OPEN BOAT.

BY STEPHEN CRANE.

A fat green volume of seventeen short stories and sketches by the author of The Red Badge of Courage. The author divides them into "Minor Conflicts" and "Midnight Sketches." The longest of the "Conflicts" is "The Open Boat," which sails through forty pages; the shortest of the "Sketches" is "A Detail," which comes to an end on its third page. (W. Heinemann. 301 pp. 6s.)

KRONSTADT.

BY MAX PEMBERTON.

An exciting story of the impregnable fortress which is represented as the gate of all Russia. The story tells how Maria Best, governess to the children of General Stefanovitch, tries to steal the plans of the fortress. A strong element of love mingles with the plot. (Cassell & Co. 304 pp. 6s.)

THE UNKNOWN SEA.

BY CLEMENCE HOUSMAN.

"A solitary fisher ploughed the lively blue of a Southern sea"—that is the first sentence of this poetical, mystical, dreamy story, or allegory. Miss Housman is the true sister of her gifted brothers, and here her imagination has had full play. (Duckworth & Co. 315 pp. 6s.)

A RACE FOR MILLIONS.

BY DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY.

Still they come. We refer to Mr. Murray's books. The new one is, however, something to be thankful for, so brisk and exciting is the story it tells. Here is the opening: "Inspector Prickett, of the Yard, was neither a worker of intellectual miracles, like the famous Sherlock Holmes, nor a patent donkey, like the average officer of farcical comedy." Instead he was one of the most fascinating detectives in fiction. His adventures on the trail of a mysterious thief form this story. In the end he does quite a new thing: he proposes. Detectives are usually above this. (Chatto & Windus. 296 pp. 3s. 6d.)

A QUEEN OF MEN.

BY WILLIAM O'BRIEN.

The Irish politician and Home Ruler, whose imprisonment for conscience' sake produced the romance When We Were Boys, now offers a story of Ireland in the time of Good Queen Bess. The Armada here and there floats majestic between the lines, and history is more than suggested. The book is agreeable reading, save for the nomenclature of the dramatis personæ. We cannot think it right for people (except in Zulu novels) to be called Graun'ya Uaile and Lady Nu'ala, Dowdarr'a and Ca'hal. (F. Fisher Unwin. 321 pp. 6s.)

ORDEAL BY COMPASSION.

BY VINCENT BROWN.

A soul's tragedy worked out relentlessly, yet pitifully, by the author of that powerful story My Brother. "I would be plain in the beginning," runs the opening passage: "this is the history of a young man of the common people who murdered his wife. Good reader, it cannot, I fear, be a smiling book. But it is not sadder than life, than truth; and I think kind hearts will understand it." (John Lane. 260 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE BETROTHAL OF JAMES.

BY CHARLES HANNAN.

The author's motto is: "Hail, gentlemen! So it please you, let me clown awhile," and a fearsome cat sports upon cover and title-page. The story, by the author of The Captive of Peking, is of cats, and it endows them with capacities hitherto unsuspected by the most ardent felinologists. We shall say no more save that fantastic farce is the order to which Mr. Hannan's new book belongs, and one of his characters is named Quiggerfield. (Bliss, Sands & Co. 243 pp. 3s. 6d.)

CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY.

BY ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

A serious story of modern society and dissent, of love and literary life, by the author of Cupid's Garden. Let us quote the dedication:

"To Mine Own People: meaning those within
The magic ring of home—my kith and kin;
And those with whom my soul delights to dwell—
Who walk with me as friends, and wish me well;
And lastly those—a large, unnumbered band,
Unknown to me—who read and understand."

(Hodder & Stoughton. 360 pp. 6s.)

WHERE THE TRADE-WIND BLOWS.

BY MRS. SCHUYLER
CROWNSHIELD.

If ever there was a fitting moment for the publication of a collection of West Indian stories, it is now, with Cuba in every one's thoughts. And in this book such a collection is offered. Twelve stories in all are here printed, and to make them more topical still, they deal largely with the loves and jealousies of Spaniards, against seductive backgrounds of orange grove and cocoa plantation. Among other characters is a humorous black-and-tan terrier named William Penn. (Macmillan. 308 pp. 6s.)

A CHAMPION IN THE SEVENTIES.

BY EDITH A. BARNETT.

A clever, serious book for serious women. "Being the True Record"—so runs the sub-title—"of some Passages in a Conflict of Social Faiths." The champion was Tabitha Vassie, and she fought for woman's independence. (Heinemann. 360 pp. 6s.)

BEATRIX INFELIX.

BY DORA GREENWELL MCCHESENEY.

This is rather a sketch than a novel; it is a portrayal, tenderly done, of a girl of Marie Bashkirtseff's type, unhappy, unsatisfied, and early dying. There is good writing in the book, with Rome for the background. (John Lane. 193 pp. 3s. 6d.)

JOCELYN.

BY JOHN SINJOHN.

He does not love his Polish wife, he loves Jocelyn. One night "he saw himself; he saw what he was doing. Like a drowning man he saw all that had gone before, all that was coming, stretched grimly into a dim future. He saw her mind—the pity in it, the reflection of his own passion. He saw his wife. He saw all things—love, pity, and honour. He weighed them in the scales, they were all as nothing. Their lips met."

We beg pardon; we have omitted a sentence. Just before their lips met, "a short, sobbing breath of wind sighed through the olives." (Duckworth & Co. 309 pp. 6s.)

THE INDISCRETIONS OF LADY ASENATH.

BY BASIL THOMSON.

This is not a story of dress-coat society and card-leaving. It is a sketch of Fijian manners—Lady Asenath being Fijian, very Fijian. When she was induced to give evidence before a board-meeting convened to inquire into the decrease of population in the Fijian Islands her evidence was like "Rabelais let loose, plus the text of the Scented Garden"; so that when she wound up with the joyous remark: "Oh, we of Nandi, what gay dogs we are!" the members could only toy with their pens and look earnestly at their papers. (A. D. Innes & Co. 199 pp. 6s.)

MISS ERIN.

BY M. E. FRANCIS.

Miss Erin comes from California wrapped in an old cloak and sundry folds of flannel, and in the incompetent care of Michael Dooley. She is consigned to her uncle, who bids Michael take her to the workhouse. But Miss Erin does not go the workhouse: she thrives, and in the twelfth chapter begins to write patriotic poetry; and in the fourteenth she is called the Irish Joan of Arc, on rather slender grounds, preliminary to settling down in life. A good Irish story. (Methuen. 357 pp. 6s.)

THE FIRE OF LIFE.

BY CHARLES KENNETT BURROW.

A love-story by the author of The Way of the Wind and Asteeek's Madonna. Mr. Burrow's readers are sure of good writing—a dainty style, but sometimes overwrought. Thus: "After a long silence it occurred to Waring to look at his watch. The action was a recognition of the inevitable; it confessed the dominion of arbitrary circumstance; it acknowledged mortality." (Duckworth & Co. 328 pp. 6s.)

SPECTRE GOLD.

BY HEADON HILL.

A romance of Klondyke, with eight pictures, and a "beautiful Indian bride." (Cassell & Co. 304 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

The Destroyer. By Benjamin Swift.
(Unwin.)

MR. SWIFT has made a decided advance upon The Tormentor. All the qualities that were conspicuous in the earlier work—novelty of thought, felicity of style, and that union of the two which makes epigram—are here, not less brilliant, and a good deal less crude; and the capital defects which disfigured that book do not obtrude themselves in The Destroyer. There is nothing in this story definitely incredible, no leading incident or trait of character that the mind refuses to accept. Yet for all that Mr. Swift, as a novelist, has not, in our judgment, advanced beyond the stage of remarkable promise. His imagination has not yet subdued its leaning to the fantastic, and he is not wise enough to stamp frankly his inventions—as Stevenson, for instance, did in youth—with the character of dreamland. If one thinks over the book after reading it, the dream nature is evident. The whole thing hangs together superficially, but it has that touch of extravagance and inconsequence which reminds one that it is not life; yet it is in the wrong key for a new episode of the Arabian Nights; the author wants you to take it as a serious representation of the world that we have got to live and die in. For that reason, Mr. Swift is still a failure. He will be read and admired by the people who write books and are vigilant for exclusively technical qualities; but the people to whom literature appeals, they cannot tell why, will not care for him; and the success really worth having is to please both. The intellectual quality alone, to say nothing of the poet's imagination, shown on every second page of this book, is something entirely beyond Trollope's range; while in point of style Trollope has nothing to set against Mr. Swift's flashing excellences but a certain sanity and reserve. Yet for all that Trollope had the creative touch: any one of his Chronicles of Barset—which, let it be remembered, were pure inventions, not sketches from the life—presents a society so credible that it is difficult to believe it did not exist. That is just what this clever young writer misses. No single one of his characters seems to us a living person, though each is a telling comment upon some imaginable type. They all speak with the same accent, though in different dialects. Listen to old Isaac, when he insists upon leaving the farm, the chance of a hereditary resemblance having made it clear to all the world that his wife's daughter is none of his blood: "Ye've been a good lady to me," he said, "but I can't plough the same ground any more. The truth goes a-wriggling before me on it."

That is precisely the same turn of violent imaginative metaphor which Edgar Besser, Hubert, and Violet (other of Mr. Swift's puppets) employ; admirable in itself, but not appropriate.

In short, it seems to us that if Mr. Swift had chosen to write an essay upon the many phases of love—for love is the Destroyer—the result would have possessed every good quality which this book can show, and none of the bad ones; we should have been spared at least the horrible central episode of a girl's marriage to a man whose incipient mania, caused by a long course of reckless self-indulgence, comes to a crisis in the excitement of his wedding night. Mr. Swift gives ample proof that he is a remarkable writer; he has yet to convince us that the novel is his true medium. Certainly in the construction of a plot, and the whole business of story-telling, he has everything to learn. Between the two threads of this plot there is no real connexion; Violet's marriage to Hubert, and the subsequent drama between her and Edgar Besser, whom she loves, while Hubert, supposed dead, is in confinement under Besser's roof, do not relate themselves in any way to the fact that Miriam, who is Violet's half-sister by blood, though not in name, grows up into a likeness of her that makes life bitter to Violet and her mother. The knavish valet Prah!—a clever sketch, but quite unconvincing—who returns with Besser in charge of Hubert, forms only an arbitrary link, not an essential one.

We take Mr. Swift at a high valuation and subject his work to the severest tests; but the more we look at it the more we are convinced that we admire in him a writer of novels who possesses qualities that a good novelist can well dispense with, and owns none of those which are indispensable to the great writer of fiction. That, however, does not blind us to the beauty of writing like this.

"They seemed to have, in a moment, a vision into the depth and solemnities of each other's lives. They divined without use of words this easing of their destinies. They had been sitting long in the cold places of duty, but this soft glow came like the warmth of fruit that ripens in the sun. Love, troubled and forsaken, had long been laying his foundations in darkness, and these were to be his late upbuildings. What could words do? Tears could not do enough for that silent chorus of their lives."

Sometimes, however, metaphor is overstrained: "Hubert," wrote Besser, "your body is only your soul's sentry-box and point of vigilance. I've left Oxford. I'm tonsured. You know what that means." Did Hubert know, one wonders? And sometimes Mr. Swift sins at once against good sense and good taste. When Hubert returned, like the prodigal son, "Jesus, for instance," writes Mr. Smith, "would have accepted him straight away; would have said that he was 'born again,' and that his past was now dead and meaningless; of no moral or physical importance any more." Was the Teacher, then, whose name, after nineteen hundred years, most people dislike to hear mentioned in this off-hand manner, so much less intelligent than any modern physician? It is almost pathetic to see how many there are who think that the world has made a great stride in understanding within the last five, ten, fifteen, or, at the outside, within the last twenty years.

* * * *

The Incidental Bishop. By Grant Allen.
(C. Arthur Pearson.)

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S recent excursions with "Women who Did," whom he has since abandoned, seem to have braced his powers, for, not since his early volume of Strange Stories, has he done anything better in his own way than The Incidental Bishop. Mr. Grant Allen is not a great writer of fiction, but he is a very clever man, and he has a remarkable inventive faculty, and with that also a logical mind, which constrains him to make even his strangest inventions consistent and complete. The story of the clever young sailor, Tom Pringle, who finds himself engaged unwittingly in the illegal Labour Traffic in Kanakas for Queensland, and who, in a certain exceedingly tight situation on the high seas, dons, for safety's sake, the clothes of a missionary, the Rev. Cecil Glisson, is told with sympathy, understanding and humour, and finally with such a touch of tragic pathos, as (to tell truth) we had not thought Grant Allen could command. How, having donned the missionary's clothes, honest Tom Pringle is compelled by sheer force of circumstance to endure himself with the reverend gentleman's character and attainments, and at length becomes completely the other person and more; and how he at the last, in old age, splits on the rock of High Anglican casuistry—these compose an admirable, light, ironical theme, which gives abundant play to both sides of Mr. Grant Allen's temper towards the world—the artistic and the scientific or theological; for, though it may surprise many to have it said, Mr. Grant Allen is a born theologian. It would not be fair to him to reveal more of his adroit conduct of an interesting problem—for it is more than a mere "situation"—but let us commend him for his pretty management of Tom Pringle's love affair with Olive, the Sydney parson's daughter. Here is a passage from the love-declaration, which occurs when Tom has been caught in the fact of trying to slip away out of his new life into his old:

"And—you were really going to leave me?" Olive repeated, clinging to his hand with a sense of terror, as if she thought he would withdraw it —which, to do Tom justice, was far at that moment from his intention. 'To leave me without one word, without a good-bye, even!'

Tom had an irresistible impulse. Parson or no parson, impostor or honest man, he was only aware at that instant that a woman who loved him was elinging to his hand; and with a great flood of feeling he stooped down and kissed her. . . . As for Olive, she took the kiss with a sense as of her right. She loved him, he loved her, that was all she thought about.

Her hand tightened on his. The blush died away from her face. If he felt like that, she had no cause to be ashamed. Their secret was mutual. She looked up into his face, and murmured gently: 'Then you love me, Cecil?'

'Cecil!' That 'Cecil' brought Tom back with a horrid thud to solid earth again. The seventh heavens melted away. A pang darted through his heart. More than ever before, he knew the die was cast now. . . . 'And yet,' she whispered, half chiding, 'you were going to run away from me!'

He gave a despairing gesture. 'Olive, what else could I do? What else can I do now? . . . What will your father say? He will say I should never have ventured to dream of you.'

Olive looked deep into his eyes again. 'I wouldn't mind that,' she answered. 'This is a question for me. I love papa dearly—he is the kindest and best of fathers. But a girl's heart is her own. Her own, not her father's.'

'To you and me, yes. But fathers do not think so.'

'He will think so soon. Cecil, I have no fear for you. I know you are cleverer and greater than you think. . . .'

And so forth. As we have said, Mr. Grant Allen has not produced a great piece of literature; his characters, albeit sympathetic, are hastily and roughly outlined; and his writing is lacking in the refinements, and also somewhat in the virilities of style; but, in spite of these things, The Incidental Bishop is a very agreeable and noteworthy production.

JAMES PAYN AND HIS FRIENDS.

To the Cornhill Magazine for May Mr. Leslie Stephen contributes some intimate and touching pages in memory of James Payn, whom he called friend for nearly half a century. We have copied a few of the passages: "I, who knew him for some forty-five years, can do little more than confirm impressions already formed by less intimate acquaintances; nor can I boast of the talent which is required for good 'reminiscences.' Old incidents have become blended in my mind, and though they have left an indelible impression, can no longer be separated into distinct anecdotes. It happens, however, that I remember my first sight of Payn. In 1851-52 I was at the meeting of a little debating society of Cambridge Undergraduates. We were discussing the ancient problem of the credibility of ghost stories. 'It is all very well,' said Payn, 'but see if any one of you, waking at dead of night in the solitude of his room, will dare to summon himself by name three times in a loud voice.' I have never dared to take up the challenge, though I do not know what was the inference which Payn took to be implied by such cowardice. . . . Payn often visited Cambridge after the close of his academical course, and kept up the old friendships. To us, the dons of that time, he came invested no doubt with some halo derived from his association with the great world of letters, which we revered in our hearts, though we professed to despise its want of scholarly refinement. I could mention more than one of those college chums to whom Payn's friendship was of real and lasting service; but I should have to speak of matters of too private an interest. When I myself came, some years later, to live in London, I found Payn settled as the father of a family, and devoting himself most energetically to the profession, of which he was as proud as it was thoroughly congenial to him. Circumstances brought us into closer connexion as the years went by. I was a pert young reviewer in the earlier time, and I agreed with Payn that I should review his novels as they came out, on condition of saying (more or less) what I thought of them. I am afraid that I allowed a rather full play to my conscience; but Payn took all that I said with the most admirable good humour. Once only I hurt him by suggesting over-haste as an apology for some shortcoming. Whatever else might be his faults, he said, he always did his best to turn out good work. I fully believe it. . . . He was superlative as an anecdotist. Good stories seemed to have a natural instinct for resorting to him. Often as I used to see him, I always thought myself defrauded if I did not come away with some fresh and amusing narrative. On such occasions my family found me out and used to reproach me if I did not bring back some telling anecdote. It must clearly be my own fault. I was certainly not the rose, but I had been near the rose. Payn's fertility in this respect no doubt implied more study than might be obvious to his readers; he was fond of the literature in which such harvests are to be reaped and 'crammed' (if I may say so) for his work conscientiously, though more, it seemed, from spontaneous delight in it than from deliberate purpose. . . . Many will remember him with kindness, and no one can have a word to say against him. To me the loss is irreparable; and I know not whether to feel humbled or gratified by the memory of the long years of intimate comradeship bestowed upon me by one so tender and so true."

Mr. Andrew Lang, in his evergreen commentary, "At the Sign of the Ship," in Longmans' Magazine, also has some remarks to make on the same subject: "Mr. Payn," says Mr. Lang, "was, I suppose, the first author, known to me as an author, whom I ever met. It was in Edinburgh, when he was a young man, editing Chambers's Journal, and I was a small boy. We both dined at the house of one of my family, and I remember his black curly hair and handsome laughing face, as if it were yesterday. The dinner was followed by a whist party, in which 'I did not take a hand,' nor did I ever meet Mr. Payn again, I think, till the gloss had gone out of his black hair, though his mirth was as unaffected as ever. Possibly because, as a boy, one knew him slightly, his writings always appealed to me from the first. The public, the novel-reading public, like a romancer to take himself seriously. This was a thing that Mr. Payn simply could not do. I remember a character of his who has just committed fratricide, no less, and yet converses in a style quite as diverting as that of Mr. Richard Swiveller. He comes out of a storm of no ordinary kind, with his brother's blood on his hands, and yet his chaff is airy and exhilarating. . . . There is not so much mirth in ten years of our modern literature as in Mr. Payn's High Spirits and Glow-Worm Tales. . . . If anyone is sad, with or without cause, let him read Mr. Payn's High Spirits, or Melibæus (if he can get that early work), and be comforted. Causes enough of melancholy had Mr. Payn, like the rest of us, but he never whined, or repined, or reviled the nature of things; nor ever did I hear him speak a word of jealousy about younger men and more successful men; and often less deserving men than himself."

MR. FRANK R. STOCKTON AT HOME.

Mr. J. H. MORSE, who has been visiting Mr. Stockton at Convent Station, N.J., gives an account of the incident in the New York Critic, from which we take the following passages:

"There is no pleasanter country in the neighbourhood of New York than the Loantika Valley, with its sweep of bordering uplands, thirty miles to the north-west of the great city. No avenue of elms and tall maples is more musical on a windy day than the broad road which connects Morristown and Madison. Half-way between the two towns, and abutting on the main road, Kitchell-avenue starts out straight for the west.

As you walk, or drive, down Kitchell-avenue in blossom time, beautiful is the blush on the red buds of the maples; the boughs are full of birds singing the new spring in. For the birds come early to the long avenue, and the road sweeping down to the low ground is alive with them. If you follow the birds that way, and just where the road dips, turn in between two stone gate-posts, which are the outcropping of a bank wall, after a brief curve along the carriage-road, you will, perhaps, if you are happy enough to be an invited guest, see Mr. Stockton himself inspecting a tulip bed, or with his walking-stick poking away a chestnut burr of last autumn, or a long cone fallen from one of the many noble Norway spruce trees which hide the house from the road.

It is not until your attention has been called by that inquisitive walking-stick to the subterranean windings of a mole in the sod under the pines—for Mr. Stockton is particular in these things—that you become gradually aware that you are standing in front of a frame building of two or three storeys high—the house isn't particular which, sometimes two, sometimes three—with a square tower of five storeys at the corner.

Mr. Stockton spends a good part of every afternoon, rain or shine, in driving. The roads pierce the hills, or meander through wooded valleys, past rose gardens and shimmering beehives, to Summit and Short Hills, to Basking Ridge, where Gen. Charles Lee judiciously relieved Gen. Washington of his impertinent presence in the army by falling into the hands of the British; to Hanover; to Whippany, lying in its angle of streams which wash the roots of tall trees and sing for the Sunday idlers who sit on the fences and get their music for nothing. These drives are a feature of life at 'The Holt.' Horses are a prime delight with the author. He is never without a handsome, serviceable pair of well-matched greys or glossy blacks, selected generally by himself, and named in his own quaint style. One horse is remembered, purchased out of the profits sent him from the English sale of Rudder Grange, and called, in a burst of international gratitude, by the full title of the publisher—'David Douglas, 15A, Castle-street, Edinburgh.'

When breakfast is over, and the morning visit to the garden and barn, with a fresh study, perhaps, of the mole, has brought ten o'clock near, Mr. Stockton disappears into his study, and the day's work begins—not at the desk, or with the pen, although a desk is there, loaded with letters to be answered, and a table with the latest works of reference; for there is no man so particular as to facts, especially facts recently acquired by science—facts which he must use gently, as not abusing them. How he gets them is not evident from any display of books, but how he verifies them is clear enough. His wildest inventions must have a show of truth. Sometimes they are startling as predictions or anticipations of discoveries; sometimes alarmingly true, as when in The Merry Chanter he located Boston in a volcanic region. His favourite thinking chair is not a chair, but a hammock swung in the study. Just where or just when those marvellously funny stories are thought out in all their details, no man but Mr. Stockton himself knows. They seem to exist in his mind, one behind another, in long shadowy procession, like the bodiless shapes in Virgil's underworld. While one is emerging into life, many are thronging up the windings of the enchanted valley. Except for an occasional remark dropped in conversation, when the speaker seems struggling with a name, or searching for the correct statement of a fact, there is little outward evidence of the preparation going on. He is not inclined to talk of his creations until they are things of life.

The study during the hours of work, ten o'clock until one, is almost as peaceful a place as the bright parlour or the tempting dining-room. This part of the house, containing the study, is an addition made since the present owners developed a need for it. Defended as it is from the sounds of approaching market-waggons and the pretty dialogue which nature prompts at the kitchen door, it has on two sides as pleasant a rear view as ever falls to the lot of a lover of back yards. For three hours Mr. Stockton will see with the inner eye only. He is boring, perhaps, right through the terminal moraine under him, past innumerable springs which hide there, into The Great Stone of Sardinia, or he is engaged with the breezy Ardis Claverden, whose spiciness has taken his fancy mightily; or he is mentally trundling the baby-carriages for the pretty governess graduate at 'The Squirrel Inn,' or he is renewing his youth in that exquisite love-scene in The Hundredth Man. These are his living pictures. Around them is growing up an ideal life to which the waving branches and the croquet will be made tributary. The very maidens playing under the shadow of the oak will lend their charming features, but they will never know it.

When the morning session in the study is over, the doors are shut on that inner world. The author will show you his rare collection of pipes, and tell you how they have come to him from all quarters. He values them as curiosities rather than for their use. He will take you to the dairy under the square tower, where the milkpans shine, or to the ice-house in the woods, to the old well-house at the foot of the garden, or among the late parsnips left underground for the winter. He will talk dog, or horse, or let you into the secrets of earlier stories, but the ideal life which belongs to the daily session in the study is sacred, until the villain has been dismissed and the lovers have received his benediction with the marriage-bell. In the evening, when the guests separate for an hour, the ladies going to their quiet game or work about the evening lamp, the men to the study for a smoke, the conversation may take the widest range in politics, literature, or society. But at midnight, when the well-regulated part of the household is in bed, and when the moonlight is on the rustling leaves under the windows, and a rising wind is wailing in the chimney, the guest, sitting late over a last cigar, may haply find Mr. Stockton at his best in some ghost-story or humorous tale—'shadows of fact, verisimilitudes, not verities, or sitting upon the remote edges of history.'

APHORISMS AND EPIGRAMS.

IX.—THE TESTIMONY OF THE APOSTLES OF EGOISM.

The following aphorisms have been collected by The Eagle and the Serpent, a new "Journal of Egoistic Philosophy and Sociology," published in London:

CONSCIENCE is a club of which each makes use to beat his neighbour.—Balzac.

Cease to gnaw that crust. There is ripe fruit over your head.—Thoreau.

If there were more extremists in evolutionary times, there would be no revolutionary times.—Tucker.

Don't take life too seriously. Nothing depends on you but your own happiness, and you are not even obliged to be happy.—Replogle.

Not to enjoy one's youth when one is young, is to imitate the miser who starves beside his treasures.—Mme. Louise Colet.

All passions are good when one masters them; all are bad when one is a slave to them. (The same is true of ideas.)—Rousseau.

You can tell more about a man's character by trading horses with him once than you can by hearing him talk for a year in prayer meeting.—American Maxim.

Forget this superstition (that the day of noble deeds is past), steep your souls in Plutarch, and through believing in his heroes, dare to believe in yourselves.—Nietzsche.

The discoverer of a great truth well knows that it may be useful to other men, and, as a greedy with-holding would bring him no enjoyment, he communicates it.—Stirner.

Everywhere the strong have made the laws and oppressed the weak; and, if they have sometimes consulted the interests of society, they have always forgotten those of humanity.—Turgot.

Napoleon the exploiter said, "The heart of a statesman should be in his head." The exploited will never be saved till they make the brain the seat of their patriotic affections.

The believer in "Duty" is food for powder. He will either be enslaved by the crafty, or by what he calls his "Conscience."—Badcock.

To be regardful of others within reason is intelligent egoism, but it is necessary to distinguish those who are worthy of our regard from those who are not.—Tak Kak.

There is something servile in the habit of seeking after a law which we may obey. We may study the laws of matter at and for our convenience, but a successful life knows no law.—Thoreau.

Warm your body by healthful exercise, not by cowering over a stove. Warm your spirit by performing independently noble deeds, not by ignobly seeking the sympathy of your fellows who are no better than yourself.—Ib.

The dogma of resignation, abnegation, self-sacrifice, has been preached to the people. Oh, the people long ago resigned themselves, renounced themselves, annihilated themselves. Did they do well? What do you think about it?—Bellegarigue.

Mirabeau foretold the Universal Strike in these words: "The people do not know, that, in order to strike their enemies into terror and submission, they have only to stand still, that the most innocent and the most invincible of all powers is the power of refusing to do."

We still wish to work for our fellow-men, but in so far as we find our own highest advantage in this work, not more, not less. Everything depends only on what one regards as his advantage; the immature, undeveloped, coarse individual will also have the coarsest conception of it.—Nietzsche.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1898.

No. 1356, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .               | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.                        | 0 15 3  | 0 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IT is interesting to note that there is an increasing demand for the right to publish translations of the works of our popular novelists. To mention one instance, Mrs. Humphry Ward's Sir George Tressady has been translated into German, Dutch, and Norwegian, and arrangements are being made for the publication of her forthcoming novel in those languages. French publishers are, perhaps, the least eager to acquire works by English authors, but Mrs. Ward's Story of Bessie Costrell has been printed by M. Brunetière in the Revue des Deux Mondes.

MR. ALFRED SUTRO obtained permission from Mr. Meredith some time ago to dramatise The Egoist for Mr. Forbes Robertson. The production of this play will be an event indeed; especially if, as rumour says, Mr. Meredith will directly supervise its stage presentation.

MR. MEREDITH'S Nature Poems will be available to his wealthier admirers in a splendid edition before the year is out. Including large paper and presentation copies, the edition will number about five-hundred copies. The feature of the edition will be twenty full-page photogravure pictures from drawings by Mr. William Hyde, whose achievements in black-and-white brush work, though not yet widely known, are of a brilliant order.

MR. MEREDITH is indeed prominent this week. The May number of Cosmopolis is to contain his third French ode, entitled "Alsace - Lorraine." Meanwhile, "Mr. Punch" with one hand adapts the Napoleon ode to fit the case of Mr. Rhodes, and parodies the poet with the other. Here are passages:

"Oh! bodeful, unhandkerchiefed, decreescent,
Puritan, pig-headed Kruger,
Mannerless, graceless, laughterless, unapt
At repercussant casts calamitous—
Whatever that may mean—clumsy, unneat,
In clothes of a shocking bad cut, which would disgrace even a hydrocephalic aërolite;
Nor even by such ascendent ambitions fired
As might make budge an incalcescent bootmaker.

The cumulative, quenchless, persistent Titan,
The unweaponed confabulator on the malign-nant Matoppos,
The condemnatory critic of unctuous rectitude,
At whom avuncular Pretorian Paul repellent hoots;
It's bad enough for you to have to read this poetry,
But think of me, struggling to write
It!"

MEANWHILE, Mr. E. T. Reed, pursuing his investigations in Animal Land, has discovered Ouida, and presents her to the public as "The Weeda," thus:

"This sentimentle little Animal is a most wonderfull discriber—full of gaugeous colours. She has a terrible fassinating kind of hero who goes out to battle talking several langwages with a gardeenya and lavender kid gloves on, and carrying a ormerleu lunch-basket inlade with plovers eggs. He makes little rings with cigerret smoke while he conkuers the enemy. He is a mixture of Sandow and Cupid and Bobby Spencer and Richard Curdyleong. She is very kind-hearted to other Animals. She was thought rather risky for girls-schools some time ago untill all the Mrs. Tankyrays started dragging their 'parsts' about—then it didn't matter."

THE second volume, in order of publication, of Mr. Henley's edition of Byron will be published at the beginning of next month. It will be entitled, Vol. V.—Verse: Vol. I., and will contain, "Hours of Idleness," "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," and "Childe Harold." Of the other ten volumes, Nos. II., III., IV. will be devoted to the Letters, Diaries, Controversies, and Speeches, and the remainder to the Poems.

To Mr. Lang's comments upon the treatment of Mr. Anthony Hope by American papers, a writer in Harper's Weekly offers a reply and an invitation. Mr. Lang said that he wished British authors would take an oath never to go to America professionally at all. Though even on private visits, he added, it is probable that they would have to endure the odium of "being said to have said things." "Come and see, Mr. Lang; come and see," is the reply. "There is a fair possibility that if you came here for fun you might have fun, just as there is a reasonable certainty that if you came here to earn money you would get the money. . . . There is a young Belgian prince somewhere in the country now who seems as yet to have suffered no inconvenience from mis-reported talk or unpleasant surveillance. Signor Boldini, the portrait-painter, has been here for some months, and except that the Custom House has tried to convict him of swindling, and that he has had pneumonia, there are grounds for hoping that he has had a pleasant visit. . . . Those who live by the sword must expect to perish by the sword, and those who expect to profit by newspaper notices must be prepared for the drawbacks that seem to be inseparable from publicity so promoted."

MR. LANG, who has already collaborated more than once in works of fiction (and recently, in Blackwood's, in a work of history), is writing a romance with Mr. A. E. W. Mason, the author of The Courtship of Morrice Buckler. Among Mr. Lang's earlier joint efforts were He, which he wrote, we believe, with Mr. W. H. Pollock, and Pictures at Play, with Mr. W. E. Henley, and The World's Desire, with Mr. Rider Haggard; not to mention his translation of the Iliad, with Mr. Leaf and Mr. Myers, and the Odyssey, with Prof. Butcher.

LAST Wednesday's meeting of the Omar Club was graced by an appreciation of the poet by Mr. Asquith, who is becoming as universal a public critic as Lord Rosebery or Mr. John Morley. Mr. Asquith said the customary things; but better do we like Mr. Owen Seaman's rhymed irreverences, which figured on the menu. Thus:

"The Lion and the Alligator squat
In Dervish Courts—the weather being hot—
Under umbrellas. Where is Mahmud now?
Plucked by the Kitchener and gone to Pot!
Not so with Thee, but in thy place of Rest
Where East is East, and never can be West,
Thou art the enduring Theme of dining Bards:
O make allowances; they do their Best."

MR. THOMAS B. MOSHER, the publisher of belles lettres at Portland, Maine, whose enterprise has now and then caused distress to English authors, sends us a little pamphlet to which no exception can be taken. It is composed of Col. John Hay's address at a recent meeting of the Omar Khayyam Club, eked out by certain verses on the Persian poet by other hands. The whole bears the title, In Praise of Omar. There are 925 copies, which, if Col. Hay's guess at Omar's popularity in the States is accurate, is not enough to go round.

AMONG the subsidiary matter is this pretty conceit by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy:

"Keats once entreated some traveller who was going to the East, to take a copy of Endymion with him, and when he came to the great Sahara, to cast the volume from him with all his force far away into the yellow waves of sand. It was a delicious fantastic wish, that the loveliest poem of our later English speech should lie and drift in the remote Sahara, and be covered at last in the sand that has engulfed so many precious things, but none more precious, caravans, and gold, and tissues, and fair slaves, and the chiefs of mighty clans. If I might frame a wish in distant emulation, I would choose that some wanderer to the East, some Burton, some Kinglake, some Warburton, might carry this little book [Mr. McCarthy's prose translation of the Rubaiyat] in his saddle-bags, and ride through Khorassan till he came to Naishápúr, and cast it down in the dust before the tomb of Omar Kháyyam."

THE Poet Laureate, who has just returned from Italy, will read to-day (Saturday), before the Royal Society of British Artists, a series of selections from his works, including "A Dialogue at Fiesole" and the first act of "Savonarola." Visitors to the Galleries in Suffolk-street will be invited to remain.

APROPOS of Poet Laureates, the Daily Chronicle prints the following paragraph: "In the current week's number of the New York Truth, the coloured cartoon of a sailor, with 'The Maine' on his cap, bears the underline, 'Lest we forget.' The same words were on the Nelson statue in Trafalgar-square last Trafalgar Day. The double appearance, in connexion with great national waves of feeling in London and New York, is a tribute of which Mr. Kipling, as poet or as patriot, has reason to be proud. He is, at any rate, de facto the poet laureate, democratically chosen of the Anglo-Saxon race."

News comes from South Africa of Mr. Rudyard Kipling as designer. At Kimberley he was requested by a delegation of the South African League, a company of progressive politicians, to suggest a coat of arms for them. At once, says the account, he sketched a rough design, the main feature being a shield in four colours—red, white, blue, and orange, the divisions being by the great rivers of South Africa, the Zambesi, the Limpopo, the Vaal, and the Orange. Dominating the whole was the lion couchant, wearing a crown in token of the suzerainty. Beneath there was a scroll, bearing the motto, "Not less than the greatest." When fiction gives out Mr. Kipling should try the Heralds' College.

MR. ASQUITH'S speech on "Criticism," delivered at the Mansion House, on Saturday last, contained one sentence which we are entitled to ask shall be amplified. Said Mr. Asquith, in enumerating the best critics: "Lamb, and Coleridge, Bagehot, Matthew Arnold, Stevenson, and that fine and subtle writer whom we have lately lost and can not replace, R. H. Hutton, maintained a succession which is carried on with undiminished brilliance by a band of living critics whom I need not name." It seems to us that it is in the names of these illustrious contemporaries that the sole interest of the passage resides. Where is our modern Lamb of undiminished brilliance? and our modern Coleridge? and our modern Matthew Arnold?

BUT there is just now a fashion of maintaining reticence over the identity of the best critics. Mr. Heinemann's private Aristotle—"peerless among those that sit in judgment"—is still anonymous.

IN the May Cornhill is the first of two articles introducing a bundle of freshly-discovered Lamb letters. These letters, which are twenty-two in number, will be found in their entirety in a volume which Messrs. Smith & Elder will publish later in the year; meanwhile, some interesting excerpts are offered. Lamb's correspondent was Robert Lloyd, brother of Charles Lloyd, who lived with Coleridge at Bristol and Nether Stowey in the autumn of 1796 and spring of 1797, and united with Coleridge and Lamb in a volume of poems in 1797. The letters range from 1798 to 1812.

ONE letter in the current instalment, containing a passage in praise of the good things of life, penned by Lamb to rally his young and somewhat morbid friend, is particularly Elian. Thus:

"One passage in your letter a little displeas'd me. The rest was nothing but kindness, which Robert's letters are ever brimful of. You say that 'this world to you seems drain'd of all its sweets!' At first I had hoped you only meant to intimate the high price of sugar! but I am afraid you meant more. O, Robert, I don't know what you call sweet. Honey and the honeycomb, roses and violets are yet in the earth. The sun and moon yet reign in Heaven, and the lesser lights keep up their pretty twinklings. Meats and drinks, sweet sights and sweet smells, a country walk, spring and autumn, follies and repentance, quarrels and reconcilements have all a sweetness by turns. Good humour and good nature, friends at home that love you, and friends abroad that miss you—you possess all these things, and more innumerable, and these are all sweet things. You may extract honey from everything; but do not go a-gathering after gall. The bees are wiser in their generation than the race of sonnet writers and complainers, Bowless and Charlotte Smiths, and all that tribe, who can see no joys but what are passed and fill people's heads with notions of the unsatisfying nature of earthly comforts. I assure you I find this world a very pretty place."

THE following touching account of the present condition of Friedrich Nietzsche has been sent to the Berlin correspondent of the Daily News by Frau Forster-Nietzsche, his sister: "In the doctor's opinion recovery is an utter impossibility. . . . He sleeps well, takes a friendly interest in everything going on about him, and listens attentively when I read to him. He especially likes to hear French, but I do not think that he can follow me. Besides, I dare only read a short time, so as not to tire him. He by no means makes the impression of an insane man. His eyes are beautiful and clear. He has retained much of his old dignity and elegance, but he speaks little, and the paralysis shows itself in his heavy and unsteady gait and movements. He is perfectly ignorant of the awful fate that has befallen him, and this fact I feel to be a great comfort. He cannot bear tears, and has often said to me reproachfully, 'Why are you weeping, my sister? We are happy, are we not?'"

PARODIES of Whittier's ballad of "Maud Müller" have been written as often almost as those of the "Heathen Chinee." That there is, however, still fun in the convention is proved by the latest travesty, which is meant not only for those who like parodies but those who like cycling. Here are stanzas:

"Maud Müller, at the close of day,
Mounted her wheel and rode away.

The Judge rode slowly down the lane,
In the path where Maud now rode again.

The rest has well been told before,
For many children play round their door.

And often times the Judge has said
He longs for the old-time joys instead.

And from his breast a sigh oft steals
At thought of the crowd that must have wheels.

Alas for maiden! alas for Judge!
For faded beauty and wheel-cursed drudge!

God pity them both and pity us all
Whom wheeling families e'er befall!

Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these, 'New tires again!'"

THE precise residence of Sheridan in Bath has been ascertained by Mr. J. F. Meehan, who, after forwarding news of his discovery to Lord Dufferin, who is Sheridan's great-grandson, and has long wished to identify the house, received a congratulatory reply.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish in a few days The Cheverels of Cheverel Manor, by Lady Newdigate - Newdegate, author of "Gossip from a Muniment Room." This book deals with incidents in the family life of Sir Roger Newdigate, of Arbury, in Warwickshire, and his second wife, Hester Mundy, the period covered being 1719-1806. It gives the real history of the principal actors in George Eliot's "Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story," and is mainly composed of extracts from the letters of the Lady Newdigate who was the original of Lady Cheverel in the tale. The story being founded on fact, these letters show how skilfully and boldly George Eliot drew upon her youthful memories for the exercise of her genius in after years.

MR. TYLER'S reply to Mr. Sidney Lee appears in the form of a shilling pamphlet on "The Herbert-Fitton Theory of Shakespeare's Sonnets," published by Mr. Nutt. Mr. Tyler devotes himself mainly to two points. He argues at length against Mr. Lee's view that Thomas Thorpe cannot possibly have been so familiar as to address the Earl of Pembroke under the commoner's disguise of "Mr. W. H."; and he challenges the authenticity of the portraits at Arbury, on the authority of which Lady Newdigate-Newdegate has asserted that Mary Fitton was not a "dark woman" at all, but had blue-grey eyes and light-brown hair. Mr. Tyler thinks that the portraits in question may be of Mildred Cooke, afterwards Lady Maxey, an intimate friend of Anne Fitton. This, however, is a mere guess, and, though Mr. Tyler refers to a letter which may give distant support to his theory, he does not quote it. Nor does he give any other details as to Lady Maxey. Curiously wanting in thoroughness, these English students of literary history!

MR. AYMER VALLANCE has some interesting reminiscences of the late Mr. Aubrey Beardsley in the Magazine of Art. Mr. Vallance knew Mr. Beardsley when he was but a boy-clerk in the Guardian Fire Office, with a taste for drawing which he indulged after nine in his evenings. Once Mr. Vallance had perceived young Beardsley's abnormal ability, he formed the scheme of bringing him under the direct influence of William Morris. In this he was not successful. Mr. Morris looked at the drawings which his young guest brought with him and only said, "I see you have a feeling for draperies, and I should advise you to cultivate it." Later, at the beginning of 1893, when Beardsley had begun to illustrate "Morte d'Arthur," Mr. Vallance took one of his designs to Mr. Morris, thinking it would be sure to excite his admiration; but Mr. Morris flew out indignantly, declaring that Beardsley's work was a usurpation, and he was barely dissuaded (by Sir Edward Burne-Jones) from remonstrating with the publisher. "A man ought to do his own work," he said. Thus the hope of making Morris and Beardsley allies was quenched, and Beardsley's career took another course.

MR. VALLANCE gives a curious account of Beardsley's work on the "Morte d'Arthur." He began his drawings for it with enthusiasm, but soon tired, and became an unwilling and rebellious servant of his publisher:

"He was disappointed, I know, with the printing, and at finding how much the beauty of drawings on which he had bestowed infinite pains was lost in excessive reduction. One has only to compare the miniature circle of the Merlin in the Morte with the same design in large in the Book of Fifty Drawings to understand the difference. Whether it was from these causes or because he had taken upon himself a burden beyond his strength, a quarter of the work in serial parts had not been issued when Beardsley declared he would not go on with it: every subsequent drawing was wrong from him by threats and promises and entreaties. The publisher was in despair over it, and no wonder; Beardsley on his part was under contract to supply so many drawings per month until the whole was completed, and yet again and again he was on the point of renouncing the obligation. Not one of the outside public knew what the struggle cost the young artist; how he used to put off the irksome duty as long as ever he could, and then, as the day approached when the month's work was due, how he had to strain every nerve, working early and late, to get it done. Knowing what I do of the way Beardsley's Morte was produced, I have always been surprised that intelligent writers should have regarded it and criticised it as a complete whole; whereas it is in fact a most incongruous medley. It contains some of the artist's very best, together with some of his most indifferent and slovenly work."

OF personal reminiscence there is not much in Mr. Vallance's article, but the following is interesting:

"About the same time [1893] I arranged for Beardsley the fittings and decoration of his now home in Cambridge-street, Warwick-square. The orange walls and black woodwork everyone who used to visit him during his residence there will remember. It was during that time that Beardsley painted his sole oil painting, a grey and leaden representation of a woman (half-length) contemplating a dead mouse. It was not an attractive work, and was never finished. It was also during the Cambridge-street days that the quarterly, The Yellow Book, was started, with Beardsley as art editor and Mr. Henry Harland as literary editor. For some unknown reason Beardsley's name seems to be better known in connexion with The Yellow Book than anything else, although as a matter of fact only four numbers contained work by his hand."

MR. H. BUXTON FORMAN's text of Keats's poems is so well established that no one save Mr. Forman himself appears to attempt its alteration or improvement. In the sixth edition of his Keats, just published by Messrs. Gibbings & Co., Mr. Forman reminds the reader that the text has been kept up to date in each re-issue as discoveries have been made. In the present edition two "trifles" have been added, and two sets of lines of rather more importance have been withdrawn. The additions are some lines "apparently addressed to Fanny Brawne," and a sonnet which Mr. Forman places among Keats's "Nonsense Verses." "The Lines Supposed to Have been Addressed to Fanny Brawne" are these:

"This living hand, now warm and capable
Of earnest grasping, would, if it were cold
And in the icy silence of the tomb,
So haunt thy days and chill thy dreaming nights
That thou would[st] wish thine own heart dry of blood
So in my veins red life might stream again,
And thou be conscience-calm'd—see, here
it is,
I hold it towards you."

THE "nonsense sonnet" is sufficiently unintelligible, and Mr. Forman does not attempt to elucidate it. Perhaps some of our readers can suggest an interpretation. Here it is:

"Before he went to feed with owls and bats
Nebuchadnezzar had an ugly dream,
Worse than an Hus'if's when she thinks her cream
Made a Naumachia for mice and rats.
So scared, he sent for that 'Good King of Cats'
Young Daniel, who soon did pluck away
the beam
From out his eye, and said he did not deem
The sceptre worth a straw—his Cushions old door-mats.
A horrid nightmare similar somewhat
Of late has haunted a most motley crew,
Most loggerheads and Chapman—we are told
That any Daniel, tho' he be a sot,
Can make the lying lips turn pale of hue
By belching out, 'Ye are that head of Gold.'"

WITH regard to his two withdrawals, Mr. Forman writes:

"It has been necessary to reject the sonnet formerly supposed to have been written in sickness to George Keats, and the lovely couplets from The Examiner ('Oh, What a Voice was Silent,' &c.), which the late Dante Gabriel Rossetti and myself were both deceived into regarding as a cancelled passage of 'Endymion.' The sonnet is by Mrs. Tighe; and I am unable to explain positively why George Keats copied it among his brother's poems; probably Keats himself copied it from Mrs. Tighe's works into a commonplace book among his own compositions, and thus unwittingly misled George as to the authorship. The couplets are to be found in 'Marciano Colonna,' &c. (1820), by Bryan Waller Procter ('Barry Cornwall'), and must, I should think, have been written in conscious imitation or perhaps illustration of 'Endymion.'"

It is not a little odd that these lines, which have been in Barry Cornwall's book since 1820, should have been thus transferred to Keats for a number of years. They are now returned to their rightful owner, and the fallibility of critics is established on a surer foundation.

HERE is some magazine gossip. Mr. William Archer is writing for the Pall Mall Magazine an article on his preferences among American poets. The new series of the Idler will begin with the August number. The cover has been designed by Mr. Forrest. The English edition of McLure's Magazine may be expected in the autumn.

THE second number of the Wide World Magazine is excellent; and we congratulate Sir George Newnes on his idea of a magazine which, while excluding fiction, promises to be a treasury of things marvellous and beautiful in nature. In the number before us we have illustrated articles on "Canadian Curiosities"; "Earth-Pyramids" (the extraordinary earth pillars formed by rain in the Tyrol and America); "Across the Atlantic in an Open Boat," with photographs of the boat and its crew of two; "In Search of an Orchid"; "The Queerest Monarch in the World," "Tree-Blazing," and other subjects.

MR. ARTHUR HUTCHINSON has been appointed editor of the Windsor Magazine in succession to Mr. Williamson, who resigned the post a short time ago. It would seem that the Illustrated London News office is a sort of stepping-stone to editorships, as both Mr. Williamson and Mr. Hutchinson were introduced to London journalism by Mr. Shorter, and acted for some years as his lieutenants.

THE rumours with regard to Mr. H. G. Wells's ill-health are, we are glad to say, totally without foundation.

THE Booksellers' Dinner on May 7 promises to be as successful as any of those in previous years. The toast of "Literature" will be proposed by the chairman, Mr. James Bryce, M.P., to which Mr. Andrew Lang will respond. Mr. Zangwill will give "The Trade," while other toasts will be spoken to by Mr. John Murray, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, M.P., Mr. C. J. Longman, Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, Mr. W. J. Squires, and the vice-chairman, Mr. Sydney J. Pawling.

AMERICA sees some things differently. A paper lies before us with a heading: "Books for Young People." The first book named is The Vintage.

It has been suggested that a better title for our review last week of Robert Burns and Mrs. Dunlop would have been "Mrs. Dunlop Tires."

THE principal speakers at the Literary Fund Dinner on Tuesday, May 17, will be the Duke of Devonshire, the United States Ambassador, Mr. Justice Madden, and Lord Crewe.

MR. SHAW'S FUTURE.

A CONVERSATION.

"We are anxious about your future," I remarked to Mr. Bernard Shaw.

"There is really no news about my future," said Mr. Shaw, "except that I am going to throw up dramatic criticism."

"Good gracious! Why?" I asked.

Mr. Shaw, who does not even sit in a chair as other men sit, twisted himself rapidly round a sprained foot—the result of overmuch cycling.

"Well, I've been writing dramatic criticism in the Saturday Review for nearly four years, and really I've said all I've got to say about actors and acting. If I went on I should only repeat myself; I've begun to do that already. After all, when you have written two or three articles about Beerbohm Tree you have said all there is to say about Beerbohm Tree. It doesn't take very long to say all you think of Irving.

"I shall lose my pulpit," continued Mr. Shaw, "and that is a pity. But I fancy the world is rather tired of being preached at. Besides, I suspect it is beginning to find me out. For years I was supposed to be brilliant and sparkling and audacious. That was quite a mistake. I am really slow, industrious, painstaking, timid. Only I have continually been forced into positions that I am bound to accept and go through with. I am not clever at all."

Mr. Shaw sat upright and looked at me with complete candour in his eyes, as I made a gesture of polite dissent.

"I am a genius," pronounced Mr. Shaw, sitting upon his shoulder-blades.

"After all," proceeded Mr. Shaw, "I have accomplished something. I have made Shakespeare popular by knocking him off his pedestal and kicking him round the place, and making people realise that he's not a demi-god, but a dramatist."

"Then do you think of going in for Parliament?"

Mr. Shaw writhed round his disabled foot.

"I haven't much voice," he said; "but I daresay I might get a place in the chorus at the opera. And I should be doing quite as much good there, and have a deal more fun, than in the chorus at Westminster. Think of the incredible waste of time! And you must remember that for the last ten years I—I and a few of my associates—have practically directed public policy. There's no reason at all for my going into Parliament. But the Vestry—now there is some sense in a Vestry. It does something. Really, my dear fellow [Mr. Shaw nursed his foot in his lap], you ought to be on a Vestry. If you take it humorously, you can laugh at the amazing difficulties it finds in doing the simplest things. If you take it seriously, you learn how things ultimately get done. When you come to think of the muddle-headed way in which affairs are managed, you wonder that the world goes on at all, instead of smashing up in confusion. It does go on, but the waste of life is awful. We worry through—just like the Northern armies in the American Civil War—by sheer force of numbers. If we could ensure that no more people should be born for twenty years, we should very soon find out a way of economising our forces. I have always made it a rule, you know, to be mixed up with practical life; that is where I score and the purely literary man fails. The people who write Adelphi melodramas know life—of a kind. They know the bar-loading blackguard, and the sort of thing he likes. I know life—the life of action—affairs. The literary man can't write a play, because he knows nothing at all of life. The literary man ought to serve on a Vestry. For my own part I have found my experience of affairs invaluable in the writing of plays."

"Then are we to regard you in the future as a dramatist?"

"I am just in the middle of the first act of a new play."

"What is it about?"

"Well, this time I am going to give Shakespeare a lead. Cleopatra is the heroine, but Caesar, and not Antony, is the hero. And I want to see Forbes Robertson and Mrs. Patrick Campbell in it."

"Then I suppose you have been reading up Mommsen—and people like that?"

"Not a bit of it. History is only a dramatisation of events. And if I start telling lies about Caesar it's a hundred to one that they will be just the same lies that other people have told about him. I never worry myself about historical details until the play is done; human nature is very much the same always and everywhere. And when I go over my play to put the details right I find there is surprisingly little to alter. 'Arms and the Man,' for example, was finished before I had decided where to set the scene, and then it only wanted a word here and there to put matters straight. You see, I know human nature. Given Caesar, and a certain set of circumstances, I know what would happen, and when I have finished the play you will find I have written history."

Mr. Shaw dug both his hands deep into his pockets, and turned on to one side.

"Criticism is a poor thing to spend your life over," he said. "Four years over the painters of London, four years over the musicians, and four years over the actors—that is quite long enough to express any views you may have. It's an awful labour done as I do it. And you can't make money at that sort of work. Now, you wouldn't think that 'Arms and the Man' was a great success. I don't suppose anyone made much out of it, as things go. But from first to last it has brought me £800. And that was when my percentage of profits was low. The 'Devil's Disciple,' which has been running in America, has drawn £25,000; and on that I got 10 per cent. I should have to write my heart out for six years in the Saturday to make as much. It was quite easy to write, too. A young woman I know wanted to make a portrait of me, sitting on the corner of a table, which is a favourite attitude of mine. So I wrote the play in a note-book to fill up the time. I write all my plays on scraps of paper at odd times—on omnibuses and places like that."

"Then," I said gravely, "you are going in frankly for money-making."

Mr. Shaw shifted to his other side and twined one leg round an adjacent chair.

"It is quite time," he said, "that I gave younger journalists a chance."

"It is inexpressibly painful to me," I said, "to find that you, of all men, have succumbed to the temptations of riches."

Mr. Shaw curled himself up until his face and his slippers were within an inch of meeting, and laughed.

"I will not stay to see you swallow yourself," I said.

C. R.

LOVE POEMS OF GREECE.

THE anthologist is somewhat irritating at times. He has the air of insisting that you shall read and admire what he reads and admires—and nothing else. And the reader who loves poetry, having his own tastes, resents being set down to a literary table d'hôte. He prefers to be his own anthologist. Let us then reflect upon Agathias of Byzantium and be reconciled to the anthologist. For Agathias sat down somewhere about 530 A.D. and laboriously brought together a collection of epigrams and short pieces ranging over the thousand years or so of Greek literature from the time of Simonides of Ceos, verses that touched the very life of the people, their loves, their arts, their drinkings, and their burials. Doubtless Agathias was not the earliest weaver of a garland of verse. But it was upon this collection that Planudes, a monk of Constantinople, founded his anthology in the fourteenth century, which was the only one known until 1606, when, in the library of the Elector Palatine at Heidelberg, was found the anthology of Cephalas. This was compiled early in the tenth century, and was evidently the immediate source from which Planudes drew his material. So that to Agathias—whose name is now but a name—we owe the preservation of an enormous mass of verse which expresses the inner life of a people who have over and over again vitalised humanity. For, as the late John Addington Symonds wrote, "All civilised nations, in all that concerns the activity of the intellect, are colonies of Hellas."

The Anthology of Cephalas is known as the Palatine Anthology, and it is the love epigrams of the fifth book of the Palatine Anthology that Mr. W. R. Paton has edited and partly rendered into English verse under the title Anthologie Græca Erotica (David Nutt). We may say at once that we have read Mr. Paton's translations with great pleasure. They seldom wander further from the original than the necessities of versification demand. Nor has the translator often yielded to the ever present temptation to throw aside chronology and make the amorous Greek a modern lover. Much has been written concerning the treatment of the passion of love in ancient and modern times, the influence of chivalry—"charity in armour" as it has been called—on the relations of the sexes. There is indeed a striking difference, to which we shall shortly allude; but the change came later and spread less widely than is commonly supposed. There is little in the sentiment of these Greek verses which differentiates them from those of our own eighteenth century poets. Indeed, your first glance through them will suggest that men have not yet broken the poetic mould into which the Greek poured his passion. Here is a couplet which Mr. Paton translates almost literally:

"O would I were the pink rose beside thy path doth grow,
And thou would'st pluck me for thy breasts that are as white as snow."

No one knows who wrote that couplet. That is as it should be. It belongs of right to no man, but is for all time. Love, in its first faint flutter, always hovers round my lady's glove, her handkerchief, her fan, or the flower that she plucks, and hundreds of happy youths every year write that couplet—with infinitesimal differences. Let us, however, take a few of Mr. Paton's renderings, which may give an English reader some idea of what the Greek wrote of love. Here is one of a four-line elegiac stanza of Philodemus:

"My faith I have shattered
To come to thee, sweet;
And hard the rain battered,
And dark was the street.

Then why sit we musing,
And silent as sages,
Sin's servants, but losing
The gold of his wages?"

A well-turned pair of stanzas. But for once Mr. Paton drops into Christianity and the nineteenth century. "Sin's servants!" There is no hint of sin in the Greek quatrain, and no conception of it in the mind of the writer. But it is not often Mr. Paton gives such a painfully false touch. In the following rendering of a trifle of Aesclepiades he is at his best:

"Sweet on a thirsty summer day
A cup of snow; sweeter to play
With the first garland of the may,
And know that winter's done.
Sweetest of all two lovers lying
Beneath one plaid with no more sighing,
No half-confessing, half-denying Love, who has made them one."

The original is shorter, directer; but the translator comes near it in grace. Nor can we refrain from quoting a verse or so from the excellent rendering of a poem of Meleager—to a baby:

"Sell it, though it's sweetly sleeping
On its mother's breast;
Sell it, it's not worth its keeping,
Such a little pest.

It's a monster. Going! going!
Ho! who sails to-day,
Buy a baby healthy, growing,
Buy it and away.

No! it heard, and fond and tearful
Begs for grace until
I have promised: 'Be not fearful,
Bide with Zenophil.'"

And we read in a newspaper the other day that "the ancient Greeks were in the habit of exposing their children upon a neighbouring mountain." Here again is another skilful rendering:

"Thou art my vine; two tendrils did enwind me,

Thy rosy arms,
And stronger grown, now 'neath thy shadow bind me
Safe from alarms.

I sit and pick Love's bunches underneath thee,

My hot-house vine,
Not reeking of the seasons until death thee
And me untwine.

For thou wilt ne'er grow old, and if a wrinkle

Come to surprise,
'Twill only be an opening vine-leaf's crinkle Unto my eyes."

Mr. Paton has missed the force of the optative in the first line of the last stanza. "So may'st thou ne'er grow old" would be nearer the mark.

PURE FABLES.

THE REVIEWED.

A man, sitting upon a wall, was approached by a stranger, who whistled in his face and said, "That is music: give me your opinion of it."

"Duleet!" quoth the man. "But I have heard better."

Then the stranger dropped, as in an agony, and beat the ground, and cried: "Let me die, let me die; I am robbed of my reputation!"

INCORRIGIBLE.

They set two men in the stocks—one, a tinker, who had rioted on small ales; the other, a ballad-maker, who, by vile diction, had offended the public taste.

And about noon the tinker broke silence, and observed, "Master Ballad-maker, these melancholy hours will not be wasted; for I have now devised means whereby, on our releasement, good store of liquor may be procured."

"And, for my part," responded the ballad-maker, "I rejoice to say that I have hit upon a most seductive collocation of rhymes!"

THE FOUR WISHES.

Four men of letters wished each a wish. The first one wished that he might never lack bread; the second, that he might compass great riches; and the third, that his name might endure indefinitely.

And the fourth and maddest of them wished for a gift to filter good things into style, without regard to bread, or gain, or fame.

MERCANTILE.

He inquired of an old wise man whether it were sinful to write for money.

And the old wise man answered, "There be but two kinds of writers, my son; to wit, those who write for money and get it, and those who write for money and don't get it."

T. W. H. C.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

Névrosés, by Arvède Barine, is a volume of studies of disordered genius of singular depth, lucidity, and strength. The four unfortunates so brilliantly and sympathetically dissected by this notable writer, who here shows herself something more than a critic, a sound and admirable probe of nature, are Hoffmann, De Quincey, Poe, and Gérard de Nerval. Quite the most masterly study of these four remarkable essays is that of De Quincey. I doubt if in our English tongue there is anything on the subject to match it. Arvède Barine's style is clear and supple, and with her the rigid pronouncements of sanity are brightened by a lively and attractive irony. She condemns smilingly the extravagances of madness and bad manners, and finds, at their worst, something good-humoured and profoundly true to say of these unhappy victims of heredity or temperament. Intuition with her lends sensibility to rational criticism, and she has the inappreciable gift of extracting the best from a life as well as a book. "When you have read what she has to say of a book," a friend once remarked to me, "it is generally a disappointment to read the book afterwards, as her method of revealing its essence is sure to prove more attractive than the book." Certainly nobody has ever made De Quincey and his work more sympathetic. She goes to the very depths of the sufferings of this crucified slave of opium, "the impenitent prophet of artificial paradises wherein he suffered so much, and left so much of his genius." This noble and luminous essay ends: "Jewels of great price among the bones and dust of a tomb, behold what De Quincey has left us; behold the work of opium."

How true even to-day is the complaint of poor Gérard de Nerval to his father:

"Those whom an unfortunate or fortunate vocation push into letters have, in truth, far more to contend with than any one, owing to the eternal distrust of others. Let a young man adopt a trade or industry, every possible sacrifice is made for him—he is offered every means of succeeding; and if he fails, he is pitied and helped again. The lawyer, the doctor, may remain a long while doctor without patients or lawyer without briefs—never mind, their parents will take the bread out of their own mouths for them. But the man of letters, whatever he may do, however far he may go, however patient his labour may be, nobody dreams that he needs to be supported in his vocation, and that his position, materially as good as the others, at least to-day, should have a beginning as harsh. . . . Literary work is of two kinds: journalism which enables one to live and gives a fixed situation to all who pursue it assiduously, but which unhappily leads neither further nor higher; then the book, the play, artistic studies, things slow and difficult, that need long preliminary work, and certain periods of self-concentration and fruitless labour, but also there is the future fortune, and honoured and secure old age."

For a névrosé, poor Gérard argued very lucidly and sensibly. This mild and innocent creature was humorously out of place amid the roaring lions of romantism, who could address a tradesman only in the majestic eloquence of a Red Indian, and who were condemned eternally to assume Satanic and Titanic airs in every situation of life, however commonplace. The writer humorously paints them, representing a quadrille as a "bacchanalia," and the domestic mutton or rabbit as an "orgy destined to reduce the Almighty to despair, and draw down His thunder on the famous inn of Mother Saguet." The Almighty unflinched, the romantics, to prove their Satanism, borrowed a skull of Gérard, and believed they were emancipating literature by turning it into a drinking-horn. They practised "fatal glances," "cavernous voices," "cadaverous complexions," and walked abroad with the corner of a middle-ages cloak flung desperately over the shoulder. It was only Gérard's imperturbable sweetness and loveliness that procured him pardon for a pink and white round face, a dimpled chin, soft grey eyes, and hair of angelic fairness. Instead of glaring Byronically, he blushed like a girl; and instead of a tragic insistence of attitudes, he timidly shrank from view. In his work, instead of loud-voiced tragedy, Manfred shouting defiance from the mountain-tops, a fleeting and delicate suggestiveness, half-tones, mere murmurings. "In the Paris of letters, so difficult to find a footing in, Gérard met only with friendly smiles and kindly words. Successful writers, writers in the background, romantics, classics, realists, poets, prose writers, novelists, dramatists, vaudevillists, and journalists, all showed him the same good-will, so unusual in the literary world." And the reader introduced to him by Arvède Barine shares that feeling of tender sympathy, and reluctantly parts company with the "bon Gérard."

Mme. Caro won her spurs as a novelist by the Péché de Madeleine, which appeared anonymously in the Revue des Deux Mondes. Her latest book, Pas à Pas, somewhat of an enigmatic title, is a prettily and delicately told tale of an unhappy wife, who with an aspiring lover at hand, and a coarse and brutal husband only too anxious to push her into his arms for his private ends, keeps clear of the fatal plunge to be rewarded afterwards by a legitimate union with her heart's choice. Her father, a timid and nervous officer, capable of killing an enemy and shrinking in terror from a rough voice, shoots the terrible husband under circumstances that make it appear an accident, disappears, leaving a statement of the fact for the consolable widow, who, having shut her doors to Roberty in her first fear that he might have been the assassin, has the sense to take refuge in his arms; and destiny thus repairs its previous errors. The story is not strong or original, but it is short and pleasingly written, and reveals a delicate quality of observation.

Ombre by the woman of fashion, writing under the pseudonym of Brada, is a more novel experiment. Incompatibility of temper drives a virtuous lady into scandal and exile with a lover, taking her daughter, whom she keeps through a lie, having pretended the child was not her husband's. The method of solving the question seems an excessive and surely a disagreeable one.

The lover dies, the wife forms an intimacy with a fast and brilliant English aristocrat, also living with a lover, and having a daughter. The girls grow up in intimacy. The abandoned son, a young French midshipman, falls in love with Grace, and after the usual difficulties the young people are made happy. The brother persuades his father to see the girl he believes to be the child of his wife's lover; finds her strikingly like himself, and is finally reassured by his wife's confession, and pardon follows all round. There are some charming descriptions of Biarritz, and the little tale is written in a minor key not unattractive. Genial refreshment for a lazy sea-voyager, in pretty, musical French.

Mme. Octave Feuillet may, without any disadvantage to modern French fiction, be induced to abandon an idle competition. La Filleule de Monseigneur is a placid, pious, and commonplace tale that even the young girl may leave alone.

H. L.

THE WEEK.

A COLLECTION of letters from Walt Whitman to his mother, written from Washington during the war of North and South, is entitled The Wound Dresser. In them we have pictures of the military hospitals and convalescent camps that lay around Washington during the conflict. Whitman's own devoted labours, as an attendant and "wound dresser," are also reflected in these letters. By way of Introduction to the volume we have some extracts from communications made to the press by Whitman during the period in which he was writing to his mother. In one of these he says:

"The military hospitals, convalescent camps, &c., in Washington and its neighbourhood sometimes contain over fifty thousand sick and wounded men. Every form of wound (the mere sight of some of them having been known to make a tolerably hardy visitor faint away), every kind of malady, like a long procession, with typhoid fever and diarrhoea at the head as leaders, are here in steady motion. The soldier's hospital! how many sleepless nights, how many women's tears, how many long and waking hours and days of suspense, from every one of the Middle, Eastern, and Western States, have concentrated here! Our own New York, in the form of hundreds and thousands of her young men, may consider herself here—Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and all the West and North-West the same—and all the New England States the same."

The Letters are edited by Dr. Richard Maurice Bucke. A portrait of Whitman, taken from life in 1863, is given as frontispiece.

VICTOR HUGO's Alps et Pyrénées has been translated by Mr. John Manson, who has prefixed to it a Preface reminding the reader of the circumstances under which Hugo wrote his two or three books of travel. Here we have the records of two Journeys: one through the Alps in 1839, and the other to the Pyrenees in 1843. The story of the Alpine journey comes to us in the form of letters addressed to Mme. Victor Hugo, and one—the best of all from the literary point of view—to Louis Boulanger, the artist. The Pyrenean Journey is more fragmentary, having been written hurriedly on the leaves of sketch-books in the spots described. Mr. Manson has been permitted to construct a first Preface with extracts from Mr. Swinburne's review of Alps et Pyrénées in his Studies in Prose and Poetry. The quality of the book may be divined, by those who do not know it, from the following passage, which has also a strong biographical interest:

"The account of Gavarnie, 'nature's Colosseum,' may be matched against any of this great artist's studies for terse and vigorous precision of imaginative outline. The brief notice of Luz gives a last touch of brightness to a book which then closes in gloom as deep as death. In the isle of Oléron, a ghastly and hardly accessible wilderness of salt marshes, with interludes of sterile meadow and unprofitable vineyard, manured with seaweed and yielding an oily and bitter wine; with foul gray fog rising in heavy reek from the marshlands, a shore of mud, a desolate horizon, a lean and fever-stricken population, a prison for some hundreds of military convicts; a heaviness like death, he tells us, fell upon the visitor:

'Not a sound to seaward, not a sail, not a bird. At the bottom of the sky, to westward, appeared a huge round moon, which seemed in those livid mists the reddened imprint of the moon with its gilding rubbed off. . . . Perhaps on another day, at another hour, I should have had another impression. But for me that evening everything was funeral and melancholy. It seemed to me that this island was a great coffin lying in the sea, and this moon the torch to light it.'

Next day the writer of these words came by chance on the tidings—in a newspaper taken up in a coffee-house—that just five days earlier his eldest daughter and her six-months' husband had been drowned in a boating excursion on the Seine.

It was not till three years later that the first was written of those matchless poems of mourning which kept fresh for ever the record of his crowning sorrow."

THE addition of a life of David Hume to the "Famous Scots Series" may be regarded as something more than a volume added to a series. Hume's personality, character, and convictions call for re-examination. The present little biography was written by the late Prof. Henry Calderwood, who had completed the body of the work before his death. He left only his notes for the Preface, and from these the Preface actually prefixed to the book has been built up. Commenting on the need for a revision of the popular, or at least prevailing, view of Hume, Prof. Calderwood writes:

"Now when the enmity against him has in great measure become traditional, it seems possible to place him in a truer light, to show that he is not an Infidel, that he scorns even the name of Deist, and that the man who himself challenged the evidence for belief in miracles maintains [Essays II., sec. x., p. 147] 'that the Christian religion not only was at first attended with miracles, but even at this day cannot be believed by any reasonable person without one.' So readers may be willing to consider afresh the scepticism and the religious faith; and they may even be able to find, in Hume, a witness for Christianity whose testimony is in some respects the more valuable since beset with so many and such grave doubts. Going further than this, it is probable that a renewed study of Hume's writings may lead us to a fairer interpretation of the attitude of those, in our own day, whose avowed doubts have induced earnest men to classify them amongst the irreligious."

The book contains chapters on "Hume as Historian," "Hume in the Government Service," "Hume's Attitude to Religion," and "Hume Among His Friends."

ART.

AT THE NEW GALLERY.

THIS is a year of Portraits at the New Gallery. We have, it is true, Mr. Watts's allegory, "Can these dry bones live?"; Mr. Peppercorn's beautiful landscape, "The Common"; we have from Sir Edward Burne Jones what we have every reason to expect from him, and from Mr. Leslie Thomson the surprise of his "Arcadia," with the poor enough nymphs but the wonderfully well-felt distance; we have two lovelily lighted Edward Stotts; two George Wetherbees; an Arthur Lemon, an Arthur Tomson, some Alfred Hartleys, and an Olsson; an Abbey that is better than his last year's Academy work; two representative Costas; and a Frank Bramley that is a triumph of lighting, especially in the rendering of the fainter and whiter light behind the solidly painted head of the old man who sits at the fire—a rather too streaky fire, as this artist always sees it. These things go to make up a remarkably good exhibition; but they are lost in the human and artistic interest of the portraits. These, in mere numbers, mount up to a proportion that is higher than usual; while in general excellence they far exceed the record of all former years.

Cosmopolitan Mr. Sargent, of course, we count as our own. Born in Florence, his father a Bostonian, he was bred as an artist in Paris. But England is the country of his adoption; and it is among her masters that he will rank. Of his four portraits in this exhibition, one is a supreme Sargent—the "Mrs. Thursby." She sits cross-legged in a chair, her body bending forward, in a posture which only this painter could attempt without disaster. The folds of the purple dress carry out the scheme; they are not composed; they have the movement of the figure as it subsided into the chair—but subsidence is hardly the word for this figure, which, though seated, is so vital as to seem in the act of movement—a bird poised for flight. Surely nothing was ever so alert that was not alive. The expression of the face is equally a creation. The very temperament of the sitter is painted; the artist seems to see and tell her secrets, and there is a diffidence on the part of the stranger to be put at once on a footing of intimacy. So triumphant a capture of his sitters, in their daily doing and thinking, no artist has excelled Mr. Sargent in effecting. In his portrait of Mrs. Anstruther Thomson, Mr. Sargent had a more phlegmatic subject; she stands solidly, robed in black, with rich hints of green and blue in beads and spangles, with a lovely arm in shadow, and a face that is living in its bloom. Near at hand is the same artist's "Mrs. Ernest Franklin," robed in white satin, the black hair brushed bluntly back from the forehead, and the face infused with a sensitive consciousness that is—character. In comparing this portrait with that just named—this pale taper's earthy spark with yonder Sargent round—we measure the painter's all-round adaptability to his subject, when that subject is a woman. In the "Arthur Cohen, Esq., Q.C.," the treatment is perhaps questionably masculine; and the beauty of the greys and browns and blacks does not prevent one from feeling that there is something wrong somewhere—a whim in the modelling, or in the colour, or in the texture, which gives the impression that the result is a little queer.

The hanging of Mr. Sargent's "Mrs. Anstruther Thomson" away in a badly lighted corner needs to be recorded, so that it may be told in times to come, with the same note of solace for neglected artists that rejected authors gather from the return of MSS. like Vanity Fair. But the hangers did an intelligent thing when they hung near to his "Mrs. Thursby" "Ivy, Daughter of Lord and Lady Algernon Gordon Lennox," of M. Carolus Duran, a meretricious and puffily painted little portrait of a girl, falsely and inconsistently lighted on the face and the flaxen hair, as lifeless as a doll's. The figure, too, is as feeble as can be. It is not worthy of M. Duran, whose lovely portrait of his daughter in a recent Academy still lingers in the memory; but it is certainly a telling commentary, standing where it does, on the attitude of the master towards the pupil, according to the gossip of the Paris studios. "Sargent," the French painter is reported to have said, "is admirable as a student; had he stayed with me for another year, I should have made him an artist." Then look on this picture and on that.

Mr. Shannon, A.R.A., exhibits three large canvases, two of them singularly beautiful. Mr. Shannon proves himself to be the decorative portrait painter before all men. All round, English portraiture is shaking off the trammels of the Millais tradition. No portrait by Mr. Shannon will go to a wall to make a blot upon it. It is a thing of beauty as well as a personality in paint. If we take any exception to the full-length life-sized portrait of "Mrs. Harold Burke," it is because Mr. Shannon, in this instance, comes perilously near to prettiness. The expression of the lady is a portrait expression, and so is her pose. She has not been caught; she has been arranged. The accessories also are a little artificial. The weights are not felt; the cat is beautiful in colour, but with such substance only as dreams are made of. The background is a little too emphatic, for some of the almost phantasmal and evanescent handling in the fore. No such qualms can be felt about Mr. Shannon's "Miss Berthe des Clayes," with its beautiful scheme of blues; or his "Miss M. E. Bishop, First Principal of Holloway College." This last portrait, in particular, is full of dignity; the expression is natural to life, neither more nor less; and the hands are painted with a rare distinction. "Fine writing," said Keats, "is next to fine doing, the top thing in the world." In presence of the Sargents and the Shannons at the New Gallery, one thinks it is fine painting, not fine writing, that is that, after all.

Mr. Arthur Melville's "Mrs. Graham Robertson" is amazing. Yet the frank laughter of private-viewers does not extinguish this painter's claim to serious remark. Call his portrait a Dutch doll or a Japanese idol if you will, you have still to admit that you are arrested by something other than its mere singularity. The great skirt may appear to be white, or to be grey, or to be parti-coloured; it is really meant to be white, and those black blotches are shadows, except, of course, the ten bows—some say beetles—on the floor that is all alive with reflections. These uncertain details may distract, and even detract; but there remains a very brilliant bit of painting, scrappy yet organic, ugly yet attracting, instinct with life and being. The thing is blotchy caricature; but it recalls Degas. Mr. Melville is a Wilful for the moment, but a greatly comprehending Wilful, who had Velasquez before his eyes.

Mr. George Spencer Watson's "Edith, Daughter of Thomas Brock, Esq., R.A.," has among its beauties the treatment of the hair, soft and simple in its shine and in its shadows. There is no doubt that the treatment of the hair is beginning to be better and better understood in English art: it is seen to be a live growth, with a spring and wave and lightness of its own. The same artist's "A Pretty Woman" has much grace and distinction, and requires only a little more to be very highly rated. Mr. Henry Tuke has given his "Miss Hilda Kitson" a subtle Mary Tudor expression, quite suited to his subject; his modelling is very good; and the fresh painting of the whites of the tulle and silk makes a passage of uncommon beauty. Mr. Tuke has painted another portrait, "Mrs. Forbes Brown, of New Hall," which will rank among his successes for the delicate treatment of the face and hair, a harmony of ivory and silver; and for the film of age, so to speak, over the eyes. Portraits by Mr. D. Y. Cameron, Mr. J. Coutts Michie, Mr. Edmund L. Van Someren, Mrs. Swynnerton, Mr. Jacob Hood and Mr. Charles W. Bartlett, have points of beauty that call for recognition. Mr. Byam Shaw has found in Miss Pyke-Nott a sitter exactly suited to his artistic requirements; and he has rendered her charm in a clever portrait which gives everybody something to talk about. Mr. A. T. Nowell's "Mrs. Charles Johnson, with her Sons," has so much merit that one is constrained to wish that it had more. Let Mr. Nowell learn from the neighbouring portraits of Mr. Shannon's that a mere likeness is an inefficient thing beside a likeness that is a work of decorative beauty as well.

DRAMA.

THE task that Mr. John Hare has set himself at the Globe is one of the most difficult that an actor could undertake. It is that of popularising a theatre without the help of a leading lady. That Mr. Hare is an actor of great distinction everyone must allow; but in ignoring female interest, or assigning it a merely subordinate position, he engages in the struggle for life with one hand, so to speak, tied behind his back. Sir Henry Irving, Mr. Tree, Mr. Alexander, and other leading actors, avail themselves of the best female talent at their command; and that is the course which all experience indicates to be the best. The drama cannot safely be presented in a lop-sided fashion—that is to say, as a matter of male human nature solely or chiefly. Woman must play her part in it. Here, if anywhere, one is bound to admit the equality of the sexes. That Shakespeare has dispensed with “female interest” in “Julius Cæsar” is very true, but that is the sort of exception which proves the rule. If we are to have one-part plays, it is better that they should be in the hands of a leading actress than a leading actor—a principle sufficiently demonstrated by the world-wide tours of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt on the one hand and M. Coquelin on the other. On artistic grounds these performers may be regarded as co-equal, but they have been very far from achieving the same degree of success with the playgoing public. Women are, in all countries, the great supporters of the drama, and to them the male “star” makes but a limited appeal, seeing that in his single-handed efforts he is concerned mainly with the elucidation of character and very little with the love story, which is the universal sine quâ non. In his campaign heretofore at the Globe Mr. Hare has condemned himself to appear in plays of character—one-man plays; and no exception can be made of “The Master,” though it has been selected by Miss Kate Terry as the medium of her re-appearance on the boards after an absence of no less than thirty years.

THE love story no longer falls within Miss Kate Terry’s province. For auld lang syne the public have extended her a cordial welcome. Only the older generation of playgoers recall her triumphs as the most gifted member of a gifted family; but tradition has come to her aid, and, indeed, within the limits prescribed by the lapse of time, she fully sustains her former reputation. Charm and tenderness she still possesses in an exceptional degree. But necessarily her part is a subordinate one; her presence in the cast of “The Master” still leaves Mr. Hare fighting his arduous battle single-handed—a result which the keenest admirers of this distinguished actor must deplore. In truth, the quality of Mr. Hare’s talent is not that which can be placed with the best effect in the forefront of the drama. It belongs rather to the background of the dramatic picture. Essentially episodic is the character of the tyrannical father preaching down a son’s ambition and a daughter’s heart. It is the young people who ought to be in the foreground. But this, unfortunately, is not the consideration that the author has kept in view: and, with all its merits, “The Master” remains but a sketch of character, not a full-bodied play with a powerful clash of human interests. As dramas go, Mr. Ogilvie gives us a cast of respectable proportions, but the majority of his dramatis personæ are mere “feeders” to Mr. Hare’s character, the only question before the house being the humanising of an elderly egoist who rules his household with a rod of iron—surely the most unsympathetic motive that a dramatist could select.

WHEN the curtain rises, “the Master” is celebrating his silver wedding. He has built up a great financial house in the city, and is worth a million of money. Arbitrary, dictatorial, self-sufficing, he is presented to us as a type of the strong man who has helped to make England great. In reality he is a petulant fool, with no discrimination of character, no eye even for the worthlessness of the wild-cat securities in which he is asked to deal. It is difficult to accept Mr. Ogilvie’s portrait as an authentic one. His iron “Master” is merely a lath painted to look like iron; and one secretly wonders why, as a commanding personality in the city, he should so long have escaped being found out. Within a year from the opening of the story “the Master” has dissipated his immense fortune, and ruined himself domestically as well. He has brought down the great financial firm about his ears like a house of cards; he has estranged his son and daughter, and taken to his bosom a scoundrelly nephew. This is not clever. Of course, a dramatic author is entitled to choose his own postulates, and Mr. Ogilvie is within his right in offering us “the Master” as a strong man to begin with; but the spectator, for his part, may also object to this paragon being attacked with softening of the brain or some kindred complaint as soon as he sets foot on the boards. Such a development of character is too obviously marked with a lack of sincerity.

As to the excellence of the chances which “The Master” affords Mr. Hare there is, however, no question. The actor is always at his best in depicting sharp and decisive old men with an underlying suspicion of weakness or tenderness in their nature, and this is a type after his own heart. Not that the tenderness counts for much in the character of the autocratic financier. He cuts off his son with a shilling because he prefers the army to the City as a career; and he disowns an affectionate daughter for no other reason than that she gives her heart to a manly young fellow rather than to her worthless cousin. Not till adversity has overtaken him, and he finds himself without a friend in the world, except the faithful wife who has stood by him throughout, does “the Master” relent—master now no more, but a mere piuma al vento. It is a tardy and ineffective repentance; but Mr. Hare’s grasp of the character is such that he commands our sympathies to the last. What would become of this part in other hands it is needless to speculate. Of the cast-off daughter and her husband, who return in the last act with the conventional baby in order to offer the ruined magnate a home, and of the heroic son who brings back the Victoria Cross from a frontier campaign, we see too little. The “Master” fills the scene. The only other portrait of any consistency is that of the wife, invested by Miss Kate Terry with much matronly sweetness and delicacy. It is her daughter, Miss Mabel Terry Lewis, who sustains in the piece the part that would have been hers when last she played.

MR. CARTON’S work seldom meets with the approbation of the new critic, who is inclined to take the stage and himself very seriously. Not without reason, the author of “Sunlight and Shadow,” “Liberty Hall,” and “The Tree of Knowledge” is suspected of treating the drama as an entertainment rather than a true and possibly disagreeable reflection of life, and his reputation for levity will not be redeemed by his “Lord and Lady Algy,” which provides the Comedy Theatre with a modernised version of “The School for Scandal,” so far, at least, as the intrigue is concerned. Of course, there is no reason why the story of Lady Teazle’s relations with Mr. Joseph Surface should not be modernised. It is an entirely human story. But when an author undertakes to tell it anew, with the help of incidents peculiarly Sheridan’s own, or, at least, borrowed by Sheridan from French and Spanish sources—notably the screen scene—the presumption is strong that he is not dealing with human documents at first hand, but is “vamping up” for the occasion. This is Mr. Carton’s position. It may not be marked by much sincerity, but to me as a playgoer the only vital question at issue is whether he has succeeded in being entertaining, and on this ground there appears to be no reason for disturbing the popular verdict. No attempt is made to reproduce Sheridan’s background of backbiting and scandal-mongering, but in the modern setting of the story one identifies without difficulty Charles and Joseph Surface, Sir Oliver and Sir Peter and Lady Teazle, the corresponding characters being Lord Algy and the Marquis of Quarmby, the Duke of Droneborough, and Mr. and Mrs. Tudway. The only new character introduced into this group is Lady Algy, who plays an important part in the dénouement. She and Lord Algy are a semi-detached couple unable to “hit it,” in their up-to-date jargon, partly because they never agree upon the winner, partly because they do not smoke the same brand of cigarettes. Lord Quarmby, a pious peer, greatly respected at Exeter Hall for his “moral sentiments,” has struck up an understanding with Mrs. Tudway, wife of a wealthy bone-boiler, and arranges with his younger brother, Lord Algy, to obtain the use of the latter’s room in town as a rendezvous with his innamorata.

AT a fancy dress ball at which all the parties meet Lady Algy overhears the assignation of the lovers and resolves to turn up at the critical moment as a deus ex machina. Her opportunity occurs in the third act in her husband's rooms, whither Mrs. Tudway has come, followed by the suspicious husband, the righteous Quarmby, and the Duke. Mrs. Tudway takes refuge not behind a screen but in an anteroom, and a heated discussion arises as to her identity. Lord Algy does not exactly name "the little French milliner"—this would be out of date—but he owns to the presence of a lady whose name he is not at liberty to divulge. At this moment Lady Algy comes upon the scene, professing to have an appointment there and then with Mrs. Tudway; whereupon the latter is triumphantly brought forth from her place of concealment amid general apologies and congratulations. This, it will be noted, is the screen scene with a difference, a difference that paves the way for Mr. Carton's favourite device of a happy ending—the bane of the new critic, and of the Ibsenites in general. The piece is remarkably well acted, especially by Mr. Hawtrey and Miss Compton as Lord and Lady Algy, and by Mr. Eric Lewis as Quarmby, mature, liverish and valetudinarian; it is couched, moreover, in a vein of smart and up-to-date dialogue. Mr. Carton does not expressly acknowledge his indebtedness to Sheridan—this would have been to court irridious comparisons; but he makes no secret of the source of his inspiration, which is indicated in more than one passage of the dialogue, and notably by the fact that at the fancy-dress ball alluded to the moral Quarmby appears disguised as his prototype, Joseph. From the point of view of the new critic, "Lord and Lady Algy" proves nothing, but it is none the less likely to develop into a popular success. . . . J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BROWNING CONTEST AMONG BOARD SCHOOL CHILDREN.

SIR,—Last year you were kind enough to notice at some length the endeavour made by this Settlement to interest the Board School children of the neighbourhood in the life and work of the poet amid whose early haunts they live. Selections from Browning's poetry were given to six hundred children in the senior standards, and contests in essay writing and recitation were held in nine Board schools, with a final contest in Browning Hall on Browning's birthday, when eleven prizes were presented. This year twelve schools are competing, and fourteen prizes will have to be awarded at the birthday gathering on May 6. May I appeal to the generosity of your readers to supply the sum needed to purchase these prizes? Five pounds will suffice. The great interest taken both by teachers and children last year in the contest, and its popularity with the local public, warrant me in hoping that a ready response may be made to this appeal. All remittances should be sent to the undersigned.—I am, &c., F. HERBERT STEAD, Warden.
Browning Settlement, 82, Camberwell-road, S.E.

A NEW DEGREE.

SIR,—I beg to call your attention to the decision of the Council of the University of Paris, dated April 1, 1898, instituting the degree of Doctor of the University of Paris (not to be confused with the degrees of Dr.-ès-Lettres, Dr.-ès-Sciences, &c., which are granted by the State only). For the sake of brevity, I only enclose that part of the regulations which deals with the Faculty of Arts, but it must be understood that the new degree (like the German Ph.D.) is of an eclectic, not of a special nature, and will be granted to students of science or of medicine on similar conditions (i.e., the composition of a thesis embodying original research).

The ordinary State degrees have always been, and still remain, practically beyond the reach of foreigners, the Government requiring all students, without distinction, to pass the various preliminary examinations—a process which involves a considerable loss of time.

Such a restriction does not exist for the obtaining of the new degree, the regulations for which have been framed with due regard to the needs of foreign students. The "Doctorat" will, it is hoped, be of special value to teachers and students of modern languages and philology, and be sought by them as a fitting crown to their English university career.

I shall be greatly obliged if you will kindly give to this communication all the publicity which lies in your power.

Thanking you in anticipation,—I am, &c.,

H. E. BERTHON,
Taylorian Teacher of French in the University of Oxford.

April 25, 1898.

P.S.—I shall be glad to give additional information if necessary.

[COPY.]

"Le Conseil de l'Université de Paris. Vu l'article 15 du décret du 21 juillet 1897. . . . &c., &c.

Délibère :

Art. 1<sup>er</sup>. Il est institué un doctorat de l'Université de Paris. . . .

Art. 5. A la Faculté des lettres, les aspirants doivent, s'ils sont étrangers, présenter des attestations d'études de la valeur desquelles la Faculté est juge.

La durée de la scolarité est de quatre semestres au moins.

Elle peut être accomplie soit à la Faculté, soit dans un des grands établissements scientifiques de Paris.

La durée peut en être abrégée par décision de la Faculté.

Les épreuves comprennent : 1<sup>o</sup> la soutenance d'une thèse, écrite en français ou en latin ; 2<sup>o</sup> des interrogations sur des questions choisies par le candidat et agréées par la Faculté."

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE absurdity of this "Absurdity" is freely admitted.
By Robert Hichens. Says the Pall Mall Gazette :

"Take a farce like Mr. Buchanan's The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown, add the most riotous comic scenes from Drury Lane, sprinkle with all the new humour at your command, and stir with a clown's red-hot poker, and you will get some attenuated idea of Mr. Hichens's latest. It is quite clever and quite school-boyish, and there is rather a lot of it. You know quite well that, if you saw this sort of thing, say, at the Strand Theatre, you would go home aching, and you can see that the stage directions would very properly order all the actors to pause for the howl which they would get at every other line; only somehow it is not so easy to ache and somewhat easier to get tired over this kind of thing in a book. It is really screamingly funny, and does great credit to Mr. Hichens's luxuriant imagination; but the only time to read it with perfect satisfaction would be on a railway journey, and a good long one, from London to Liverpool and back, say, or working out a return ticket from Waterloo to Clapham Junction on a misty day."

The Athenæum is brief and severe :

"Mr. Hichens describes his most ambitious effort in fiction as 'An Absurdity,' though it would be better characterised as a social farce. Its chief merit lies in its severe, but not unkind, castigation of the follies of the day in so-called 'fashionable' life; and its chief defects are its exaggeration and extravagance. Readers who can tolerate the book at all will probably find it very amusing; and the suspicion that some at least of the characters may possibly be drawn from life will not diminish such interest as it can be said to possess. The most indulgent reader will admit that he has had enough when he has got half way. Mr. Hichens is worthy of better work."

Literature says: "It is a new experiment to write a three-act farce and publish it as a novel." But the critic points out that the conditions of stage and novel farce are different.

"It takes ten minutes to read of a piece of buffoonery which in the theatre would be over and done with in sixty seconds; and ten minutes afford ample time for the reason to revolt. When, for example, as in The Londoners, a burlesquely jealous husband pursues a farcically suspected wife to the house of an impossible Lothario in the person of an amateur market-gardener, who, on being offered his choice of weapons, proposes a duel with hoes, it is absolutely essential that those implements should be ready to hand, and that the combat, or the diversion which is substituted for it, should take place before we have time to think. But actually to postpone the hostile meeting to another chapter, while in the meantime the jealous husband and his unwilling second repair to a public-house a mile off to procure the weapons, is to demand too much of a sane and self-respecting reader."

The Scotsman describes, and comments on Mr. Hichens's story in the same strain :

"To unwind the plot and describe the action of Mr. Robert Hichens's whimsical tale of The Londoners were a task as futile and perplexing as to ticket the inmates and report the conversations of Colney Hatch. Beginning in a tone of genteel comedy, the doings and sayings of the characters make easy and rapid descent into screaming farce, as they remove from the borders of Park Lane to the woody margins of Ascot, and thence rush in wild confusion into the marshes and mushroom beds of Bungay Marshes, Lisborough. . . . The piece is a merry and biting satire on the laborious diversions of London society; but for ordinary readers it would be twice as enjoyable if half the absurdities were weeded out."

The Manchester Courier says :

"Less epigrammatic than The Green Carnation, the fun is far more diverting, and the characters . . . are interesting throughout."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, April 28.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &amp;c.

- SOME BIBLE PROBLEMS. By D. W. Simon, D.D. Andrew Melrose.
- PRAYERS OF THE SAINTS: BEING A MANUAL OF DEVOTIONS COMPILED FROM THE SUPPLICATIONS OF THE HOLY SAINTS AND BLESSED MARTYRS, AND FAMOUS MEN. By Cecil Headlam, B.A. F. E. Robinson.
- THE HOLY BIBLE: ACTS TO REVELATION. ("Eversley" edition.) Macmillan & Co. 5s.
- COLOSSIAN STUDIES. By H. C. G. Moule, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- A MINGLED YARN: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF EDWARD SPENCER MOTT ("NATHANIEL GUBBENS"). Edward Arnold.
- THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS. By the Rev. S. Baring-Gould. New edition. Vols. XI. and XII. (October). John C. Nimmo. 5s. each.
- FRANCES E. WILLARD. By Florence Watts. The Sunday School Union. 1s.
- THE HISTORY OF EARLY CHRISTIANITY. By Leighton Pullan, M.A. Service & Paton. 3s. 6d.
- TEMPLE CLASSICS: THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF SAINT FRANCIS. Translated out of the Italian by T. W. Arnold. J. M. Dent & Co.
- FAMOUS SCOTS SERIES: DAVID HUME. By Henry Calderwood. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.
- THE HONOURABLE SIR CHARLES MURRAY, K.C.B. By the Right Honourable Sir Herbert Maxwell. Wm. Blackwood & Sons. 18s.
- PAUL KRUGER AND HIS TIMES. By F. Reginald Statham. T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.
- A FRENCH VOLUNTEER OF THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE. By the Chevalier de Pontgibaud. Translated and edited by Robert B. Douglas. Charles Carrington (Paris).
- VAUSSORE: A SON OF ROUSSEAU: HIS JOURNAL. Edited by Francis Brune. Methuen & Co. 6s.
- THE WOUND-DRESSER: A SERIES OF LETTERS WRITTEN FROM THE HOSPITALS IN WASHINGTON DURING THE WAR OF THE REBELLION. By Walt Whitman. Small, Maynard & Co.
- A STUDENT OF NATURE: MEMORIALS OF THE LATE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON, M.A. By R. Menzies Fergusson. Alexander Gardner.
- POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES. EMERSON, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By John Jay Chapman. David Nutt.
- THE ALPS AND PYRENEES. By Victor Hugo. Translated from the French by John Manson. Bliss, Sands & Co. 7s. 6d.
- THE CHORDS OF LIFE: POEMS. By Charles H. Crandall. Printed for the Author (Springdale, Connecticut, U.S.A.).
- COMPLETE PROSE WORKS: SPECIMEN DAYS AND COLLECT, NOVEMBER BOUGHS, AND GOOD-BYE MY FANCY. By Walt Whitman. Small, Maynard & Co. (Boston).
- THE SHADOW OF LOVE, AND OTHER POEMS. By Margaret Armour. Duckworth & Co.

THE ART OF ENGLAND, AND THE PLEASURES OF ENGLAND: LECTURES GIVEN IN OXFORD IN 1883-1885. By John Ruskin. New edition. George Allen. 5s.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- ELECTRO-PHYSIOLOGY. By W. Biedermann. Translated by Francis A. Welby. Vol. II. Macmillan & Co. 17s.
- THE SCIENCE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Henry George. Kegan Paul.
- TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.
- EOTHEN. By A. W. Kinglake. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. George Newnes, Ltd.
- SHORT STALKS: COMPRISING TRIPS IN SOMALILAND, SINAI, &c. By Edward North Buxton. Edward Stanford.

EDUCATIONAL.

- HISTORICAL FRENCH READINGS: THE AGE OF RICHELIEU. Edited by A. Jamson Smith. A. & C. Black.
- BLACKWOOD'S SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE: THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. With Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. By R. Brimley Johnson. Wm. Blackwood & Sons.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- THE HANDBOOK OF JAMAICA FOR 1898. Compiled by T. L. Roxburgh and James C. Ford. Edward Stanford.
- A CENTURY OF VACCINATION, AND WHAT IT TEACHES. By W. Scott Tebb. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.
- THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL RED BOOK: A MANUAL OF INSTRUCTION AND ADVICE FOR SUPERINTENDENTS. By F. F. Belsey. The Sunday School Union. 1s.
- THE STORY OF PHOTOGRAPHY. By Alfred T. Story. George Newnes, Ltd.
- THE GREAT SECRET: HEALTH, BEAUTY, &c. By Francis Edward Clark, D.D. The Sunday School Union. 1s.
- THE ANNUAL REGISTER: A REVIEW OF PUBLIC EVENTS AT HOME AND ABROAD FOR THE YEAR 1897. New Series. Longmans, Green & Co. 18s.
- THE GOLFING PILGRIM ON MANY LINKS. By Horace G. Hutchinson. Methuen & Co. 6s.
- CRICKET. By the Hon. R. H. Lyttelton. Duckworth & Co. 1s. 6d.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE Queen has been pleased to accept the dedication of Sir Wyke Bayliss's work upon the Likeness of Christ, now in the press. It will be published during May by Messrs. George Bell & Sons. The full title of the book is Rex Regum: a Painter's Study of the Likeness of Christ, from the Time of the Apostles to the Present Day.

MISS M. DORMER HARRIS will be responsible for the forthcoming volume of the "Social England" series, published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., called Life in an Old English Town. The book deals especially with the history of Coventry, a city which has a past of great interest, and is rich in MS. records.

Short Studies on Vital Questions is the title of a volume of ethical essays by Phillip de Quetteville, announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

DR. J. CAMPBELL OMAN, author of Indian Life: Religious and Social, will publish on Monday next, through Mr. Grant Richards, an Indian novel under the title Where Three Creeds Meet: a Tale of Modern Indian Life. It deals to some extent with the conflict of religions and races in Asia.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS will publish on May 2 a collection of short stories by an American author, Mr. W. C. Morrow, under the title of The Ape, the Idiot, and Other People. They deal—sometimes in the manner of Poe, sometimes in that of Stevenson—with the weird, the horrible, and the grotesque, and in their American form have had a considerable success.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS will publish next Monday the story of penal servitude, Convict 99, which originally appeared anonymously in Answers. In its book shape it will bear the names of its authors, Marie Connor Leighton and Robert Leighton. The details of modern prison life in England are dealt with in this narrative of an innocent man's experiences under the sentence of penal servitude for life.

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & Co. will issue immediately a cheap centenary edition of the Lyrical Ballads of 1798, edited, with an introduction and notes, by Mr. Thomas Hutchinson. The book is not a line for line reprint of the original, such as that edited by Prof. Dowden in 1890; but it reproduces the text, spelling, punctuation, &c., of 1798, and gives in an appendix Wordsworth's Peter Bell (earliest published text), and Coleridge's Lewti, The Three Graves, and The Wanderings of Cain. It also contains reproductions in photogravure of the portraits of Wordsworth (by Hancock, 1798), and of Coleridge (by Peter Vandyke, 1795), now in the National Portrait Gallery.

THE sermons of the Rev. F. W. Robertson, of Brighton, are to be published in a few days, in a "People's Edition," by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co. The new edition is to be published in five volumes, at 1s. 6d. net, with a biographical and critical introduction by Ian Maclaren. Mr. C. B. Robertson, the famous preacher's son, also contributes a preface, and a portrait has been prepared for this edition from a contemporary water-colour painting.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days The Ministry of Deaconesses, by Miss Cecilia Robinson. The book, which is both historical and practical, has an Introduction by the Bishop of Winchester, who has taken considerable interest in the work.

Evelyn Innes, Mr. George Moore's new novel, will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin early in May, and will be published contemporaneously in the United States by Messrs. Appleton & Co.

MR. FRANKFORD MOORE's new novel, The Millionairess, will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson simultaneously in New York and London on May 2.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

POPULAR NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

At all Libraries, Booksellers', and Bookstalls.

NOW READY.

THE SECOND EDITION OF JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE PEACEMAKERS. By the AUTHOR of "BOOTLE'S BABY," "THE TRUTH TELLERS," &c.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

LITTLE MISS PRIM. By the Author of "THE GIRLS at the GRANGE," "THE HOUSE on the MARSH," &c.

BY L. T. MEADE.

THE SIREN. By the Author of "The WAY of a WOMAN," "A SON of ISHMAEL," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BEETLE."

THE HOUSE of MYSTERY. By RICHARD MARSH.

"It is a clever tale, and deserving of many readers," Scotsman.

BY ESME STUART.

THE STRENGTH of TWO. By the AUTHOR of "ARRESTED," "A WOMAN of FORTY," &c.

JEAN MIDDLEMASS'S NEW NOVEL.

BLANCHE CONINGHAM'S SUR-RENDER. By the AUTHOR of "DANDY."

NEW NOVEL BY E. YOLLAND.

MISTRESS BRIDGET. By the Author of "IN DAYS of STRIFE."

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford St., Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS and their PENS.

HALL CAINE: "I wrote the 'Manx-man' with the Swan Pen."

S. R. CROCKETT: "Your Gold Pen suits me most admirably."

GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA: "I have lately taken to writing with a Gold Pen."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES: "You may like to know I used this pen from the days of a book of mine called 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table' (1857)."

PHIL MAY: "It is the most successful pen I have ever used."

W. R. BRADLAUGH: "I write over 8,000 words a day, and your pens are a perfect boon."

"TOBY'S DIARY' daily written with it."

Send for Illustrated List, &c., to MABIE, TODD & BARD, 93, Cheapside; 95, Regent Street; 21, High Street, Kensington.

MABIE, TODD & BARD,

Manufacturers of Gold Nibs, and the Swan Fountain Pen.

people's Edition, price 6d. with Portrait. Special terms for quantities.
JOSEPH MAZZINI: a Memoir by E. A. V. with Two Essays by MAZZINI "THOUGHTS on DEMOCRACY" and "THE DUTIES of MAN."
London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Fumival Street, E.C.

NOW READY, ONE SHILLING.

WHEN WAR BREAKS OUT.

Being a selection from the Letters of Andrew D. Jones, the London Correspondent of "Calner's Weekly" during the War between GREAT BRITAIN and the Allied POWERS of FRANCE and RUSSIA, September 21, 1900, to January 1, 1901.

By H. W. WILSON and ARNOLD WHITE.

"The authors plunge us at once in medias res, and their narrative of the 'Hundred Days' War' is extraordinarily graphic and thrilling. We need not spoil it by extracts. Suffice it to say that after a terrible state of things in England, the British fleet eventually destroys the enemy off Beachy Head. But that result is only gained by tremendous losses, and the end is a ruinous peace. The moral drawn is that our fleet must be increased still further. Nota bene: Nobody stirs a finger to help us."—St. James's Gazette.

A BOOK ON THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

NAVAL ACTIONS OF THE WAR OF 1812 BETWEEN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

By JAMES BARNES.

With 21 Full-Page Illustrations in Colour. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 21s.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED, medium 8vo, buckram, 21s.

SHORT STALKS:

SECOND SERIES.

Comprising Trips in Somaliland, Sinai, The Eastern Desert of Egypt, Crete, The Carpathian Mountains, and Daghestan.

By EDWARD NORTH BUXTON.

With 89 Page Illustrations and 2 Maps.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 and 27, Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

Now ready for MAY, price 6d.

THE EXPOSITORY TIMES.

Edited by JAS. HASTINGS, D.D.

Contents include: Editor's Notes of Recent Exposition.—The Genizah of Old Cairo, by C. TAYLOR, D.D., Master of St. John's Coll., Cambridge.—Israel's Historical Recollections, by Prof. E. KONIG, D.D.—The Great Text Commentary.—Ezekiel's Temple, by Principal DOUGLAS, D.D.—Oiving: a Study in Oriental Manners, by the Rev. G. M. MACKIE, M.A., Beyrout.—At the Literary Table.—Contributions by Professors MARGOLIOU, NESTLE, and RANGLES, Revs. J. A. SELBIE, J. H. MOULTON, and others.

Now ready for APRIL, price 1s. 6d.

THE CRITICAL REVIEW.

Edited by Prof. S. D. F. SALMOND, M.A., D.D.

Containing signed Reviews of all the Important Books Published during the past Quarter.

Subscribers' Names received by all Booksellers.

Edinburgh: T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street.

London: SIMPSON, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Limited.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., postfree.

HISTORY

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKELTON.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Fumival St., London, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

NATURAL SCIENCE:

A MONTHLY REVIEW OF SCIENTIFIC PROGRESS.

Price ONE SHILLING net.

The MAY Number contains an Article

ON

"CELL PHYSIOLOGY."

BY

Mr. HERBERT SPENCER.

J. M. DENT & CO., 29 and 30, Bedford Street, W.C.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN.

Most Recent, crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, AND OTHER SERMONS.

"Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the Beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 6s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE HOLY of HOLIES: a Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, 21 AND 22, FUMIVAL STREET, E.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

PROFESSOR MAITLAND'S FORD LECTURES.

TOWNSHIP and BOROUGH: being the Ford Lectures delivered in the University of Oxford in the Michaelmas Term, 1897. By F. W. MAITLAND, LL.D., Downing Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Royal 8vo, 10s.

DOMESDAY-BOOK and BEYOND. Three Essays in the Early History of England. By F. W. MAITLAND, LL.D. Royal 8vo, 15s.

BRACTON'S NOTE-BOOK. A Collection of Cases decided in the King's Courts during the reign of Henry the Third, annotated by a Lawyer of that time, seemingly by HENRY of BRATTON. Edited by F. W. MAITLAND, LL.D. 3 vols., demy 8vo, £3 3s. net.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE. By W. F. Reddaway, B.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE ITALIC DIALECTS. Edited, with a Grammar and Glossary, by R. S. Conway, M.A., Professor of Latin in University College, Cardiff, late Fellow of Gonville and Caius College. In 2 vols., royal 8vo, 30s.

ATHENÆUM.—"Professor Conway's book is a magnum opus in the fullest sense, and will long remain the standard authority in a very difficult and dry, but necessary field of study."

A GRAMMAR of the ARABIC LANGUAGE. Translated from the German of Caspari, and Edited, with numerous Editions and Corrections, by WILLIAM WRIGHT, LL.D., late Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge. Third Edition, Revised by W. ROBERTSON SMITH, and M. J. DE GOEJE, Hon. Litt.D., Professor of Arabic in the University of Leyden. Vol. I. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. [Vol. II. nearly ready.]

FRAGMENTS of the BOOKS of KINGS ACCORDING to the TRANSLATION of AQUILA. From a MS. formerly in the Geniza at Cairo, now in the possession of C. Taylor, D.D., Master of St. John's College, and S. Schechter, M.A., University Reader in Talmudic Literature. Edited by F. C. BURKITT, M.A., with a Preface by C. TAYLOR, D.D. Imperial 4to, with 6 Facsimiles, 10s. 6d. net.

SELECTED POEMS from the DIVANI HAMSÍ TABRIZ. Edited by R. A. Nicholson, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. Crown 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE: a Biographical Study. By M. E. Lowndes. Crown 8vo. [Immediately.]

A TREATISE on UNIVERSAL ALGEBRA, with Applications. By A. N. Whitehead, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vol. I. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.

General Editor—G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and Professor of History in the University of Edinburgh.

ITALY, from 1815. By W. J. Stillman, M.A. [Nearly ready.]

AN ESSAY on WESTERN CIVILISATION in its ECONOMIC ASPECTS. (Ancient Times.) By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Considering the complexity of the subject, and the scanty materials at his disposal, together with the brief limits of the work itself, we are of opinion that Dr. Cunningham has rendered a most important service to our knowledge of the course of human history by means of this interesting and well-conceived work."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

OUTLINES of ENGLISH INDUSTRIAL HISTORY. By W. Cunningham, D.D., and E. A. McARTHUR. Crown 8vo, 4s.

GUARDIAN.—"This little book is by far the best introduction to English economic history which has yet been published. It is well arranged and clearly expressed. It is characterised throughout by fulness of knowledge and sobriety of judgment."

CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL ESSAYS—No. X.

THE HISTORY of ENGLISH DEMOCRATIC IDEAS in the SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By G. P. GOOCH, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 5s. [Immediately.]

CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.—New Volume.

General Editor for the Old Testament and Apocrypha—A. F. KIRKPATRICK, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew.

THE BOOK of ISAIAH. Vol. II. Chapters XL.-LXVI. Edited by the Rev. J. Skinner, D.D. 4s. Vol. I. Chapters I.-XXXIX. By the same Editor. With Map, 4s.

CAMBRIDGE NATURAL SCIENCE MANUALS.—Biological Series. New Volumes.

General Editor—A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Christ's College.

FOSSIL PLANTS: a Manual for Students of Botany and Geology. By A. C. Seward, M.A., F.G.S., St. John's College. In 2 vols. [Vol. I., 12s., now ready.]

VERTEBRATE PALÆONTOLOGY. By A. S. Woodward, M.A. Demy 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

LONDON: C. J. CLAY & SONS, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AVE MARIA LANE.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1357.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1898.

PRICE 3d.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

H. J. GLAISHER'S New CATALOGUE of REMAINDERS, most free on application to H. J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller, 57, Wigmore Street, Cavendish Square, W.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES—The MAY CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW REMAINDERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 180, Strand, London, W.C.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TO AUTHORS—Colonel ROBERT W. ROUTLEDGE, late Managing Director of George Routledge & Sons, Limited, will be pleased to RECEIVE MSS., with a view to disposing of them for Publication. From his long experience in the Publishing Trade, Col. ROUTLEDGE has special facilities for placing Literary Work, advising as to rates of payment, drawing up agreements, &c. Terms on application.

Temporary Office: 4, Raquet Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

AN EXPERIENCED WRITER on the English Drama and English Minstrelsy is prepared to SUPPLY Special ARTICLES, ESSAYS, and CRITICISMS on all subjects, current and historical, connected with the Theatre and the Stage.—AGAIR FITZ-GERALD, Arlson Lodge, Wimbledon.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his total best co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No premium. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

LITERARY ASSISTANT WANTED on Publisher's Staff in Scotland; must have had editorial experience, be a quick and easy writer, and be a good judge of fictional literature; one with a working knowledge of French and German preferred.—Reply, stating fully experience, age, and salary required, "LITERARY ASSISTANT," care of Wilkie's Advertising Offices, 29, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETTRES—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilized world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

WANTED—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 13, who are studying French, Music, Stenography, Painting in FRANCE, to charge of an unexceptional English Chaperon. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 31 Guinea 1/4 quarterly.—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.

The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will be held on TUESDAY, May 17, at the WHITEHALL ROOMS, HOTEL METROPOLE, at 7 for 7.30 p.m. precisely.

His Grace the DUKE of DEVONSHIRE, K.G., in the Chair.

STEWARDS.

Capt. Sir George C. Armstrong, Bart.
The Earl Beauchamp.
His Grace the Duke of Bedford.
Edward F. Benson, Esq.
Richard Bentley, Esq., F.S.A.
Henry L. Bischoffsheim, Esq.
Charles Booth, Esq.
The Rev. Prof. William Bright, D.D.
The Lord Burghclere.
Prof. Montagu Burrows, R.N., Retired.
Sir Edward H. Carrutt, Bart.
H. Cholmondeley-Peacock, Esq.
Julian S. Corbett, Esq.
Major Leonard Darwin, late R.E.
The Earl of Desart.
Austin Dobson, Esq.
Gerald de L'E. Duckworth, Esq.
The Earl Egarot of Tatton.
Sir J. Whitaker Ellis, Bart.
Capt. E. Pennell Elmhorst.
W. Warde Fowler, Esq.
J. P. Gaslot, Esq.
Edmund Gosse, Esq.
W. E. Green, Esq.
Sir A. Seale Haslam.
Anthony Hope Hawkins, Esq.
Alexander Henderson, Esq.
Alexander Hill, Esq., M.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge.
Lewis Hoop, Esq.
Thomas Hodgkin, Esq., D.C.L., Litt.D.
The Hon. E. Hubbard, M.P.
Major Martin A. S. Hume.
Alfred H. Huth, Esq.
F. A. Ioderwick, Esq., Q.C.
Dr. William Keighton, LL.D.
Sir James Lamb, D.D.
Sir Edward Lawson, Bart.
John Temple Leader, Esq.
The Rev. Alfred G. L'Estrange.
T. Norton Loogman, Esq.
Sir Lewis M'Yer, Bart., M.P.
Frederick Macmillan, Esq.
Maurice Macmillan, Esq.
The Right Hon. Mr. Justice Madden, LL.D., Vice-Chancellor of Dublin University.
Gentlemen who are willing to act as Stewards are requested to communicate with the Secretary, A. LLEWELYN ROBERTS, 7, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.

Sir Philip Magnus.
The Rev. J. R. Magrath, D.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford.
Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B., K.C.V.O.
A. E. W. Mason, Esq.
Frank Mathew, Esq.
Sir John Muir, Bart.
John Murray, Esq., F.S.A.
John C. Nimmo, Esq.
J. C. Parkinson, Esq., D.L.
Sir Theophilus Peel, Bart.
Dr. John S. Phené, LL.D., F.S.A.
George Rae, Esq.
Sir Wemyss Reid.
John Morgan Richards, Esq.
Francis H. Rivington, Esq.
W. M. Rossetti, Esq.
The Very Rev. the Dean of St. Paul's.
George Sainsbury, Esq.
The Rev. George Salmon, D.D., Provost of Trinity College, Dublin.
Sir David L. Salomons, Bart.
Sir Sidney G. A. Shippard, K.C.M.G., M.A., D.C.L., F.R.G.S.
The Ven. Archdeacon Sinclair, D.D.
The Right Hon. Thomas Sinclair, D.Litt.
His Worship the Deputy Mayor of Eastbourne (J. A. Skinner, Esq.).
Reginald J. Smith, Esq., Q.C.
J. Alfred Spender, Esq.
Marion H. Spielmann, Esq.
William Stebbing, Esq.
E. Steinkopf, Esq.
Sir Herbert Stephen, Bart.
Francis S. Stevenson, Esq., M.P.
J. St. Loé Strachey, Esq.
George S. Street, Esq.
The Lord Tweedmouth.
Sir Charles G. Walpole, K.B.
Wilfrid Ward, Esq.
C. Knight Watson, Esq., F.S.A.
A. P. Watt, Esq.
H. Schutz Wilson, Esq.
Robert A. Yerburgh, Esq., M.P.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.

For the Relief of Distressed Artists, their Widows and Orphans.

PRESIDENT—Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will take place at the WHITEHALL ROOMS, Hotel Metropole, on SATURDAY, May 7th, at half-past 8 o'clock.

Right Hon. Sir W. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, M.P., &c., in the Chair.

Dinner Tickets, including wines, One Guinea.

DONATIONS will be received and thankfully acknowledged by ALFRED WATERHOUSE, R.A., Treasurer.
WALTER W. OULESS, R.A., Hon. Secretary.
DOUGLAS GORDON, Secretary.

39, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.

WANTED, a HEAD MASTER or HEAD MISTRESS for the PENYNGROES COUNTY SCHOOL. Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications. Salary £120, and Capitation Fees.

Particulars will be sent on application to

J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,

Clerk to the County Governing Body.

Carnarvon, May, 1898.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.

WANTED, a HEAD MASTER* for the BOTTWNOG COUNTY SCHOOL. Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications. Salary £120, and Capitation Fees.

Particulars will be sent on application to

J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,

Clerk to the County Governing Body.

Carnarvon, May, 1898.

(* This term includes, per Scheme, Head Mistress.)

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The PROFESSORSHIP of GERMAN LANGUAGE and LITERATURE is VACANT. Applications for the Chair, accompanied by any evidence of qualification which Candidates may desire to submit, should reach the Secretary by Saturday, May 21st.

J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

MÉRYON EXHIBITION.—

ETCHINGS and DRAWINGS at

Mr. R. GUTEKUNST'S GALLERY, 18, King Street, St. James's, S.W. Will be OPEN from May 3rd to May 23rd, 10 to 6 daily.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum. N.B.—Two or Three Friends may WRITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS

Caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE CO., LD., 17, Pall Mall East, London S.W. Agents wanted.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10s. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address: Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows Interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

Th BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCOIS RAVENSCROFT Manager.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO
"THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained ;
or Complete Sets may be had separately.

|                       |         |                      |          |
|-----------------------|---------|----------------------|----------|
|                       | 1896.   | WILKIE COLLINS ...   | March 20 |
| BEN JONSON ... ..     | Nov. 14 | JOHN MILTON ... ..   | " 27     |
| JOHN KEATS ... ..     | " 21    | WILLIAM COWPER ..    | April 3  |
| SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... | " 28    | CHARLES DARWIN ...   | " 10     |
| POM HOOD ... ..       | Dec. 5  | ALFRED, LORD         | } " 17   |
| THOMAS GRAY ... ..    | " 12    | TENNYSON }           |          |
| ROBERT LOUIS          | } " 19  | HENRY WADSWORTH      | } " 24   |
| STEVENSON }           |         | LONGFELLOW }         |          |
| SIR WALTER SCOTT ...  | " 26    | ANDREW MARVELL ...   | May 1    |
|                       | 1897.   | ROBERT BROWNING ...  | " 8      |
| SAMUEL RICHARDSON.    | Jan. 2  | THOMAS CARLYLE ...   | " 15     |
| THOMAS DE QUINCEY     | " 9     | PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY | " 22     |
| LEIGH HUNT ... ..     | " 16    | CHARLES DICKENS ...  | " 29     |
| LORD MACAULAY ...     | " 23    | JONATHAN SWIFT ...   | June 5   |
| ROBERT SOUTHEY ...    | " 30    | WILLIAM MAKEPEACE }  | } " 12   |
| S. T. COLERIDGE ...   | Feb. 6  | THACKERAY }          |          |
| CHARLES LAMB ... ..   | " 13    | WILLIAM BLAKE ...    | " 19     |
| MICHAEL DRAYTON ...   | " 20    | SIR RICHARD STEELE   | " 26     |
| WALTER SAVAGE         | } " 27  | ALEXANDER POPE ...   | July 3   |
| LANDOR }              |         | DOUGLAS JERROLD ...  | " 10     |
| SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..   | March 6 | FRANCIS BACON ...    | " 17     |
| EDMUND WALLER ... ..  | " 13    |                      | 1898.    |
|                       |         | HENRIK IBSEN ... ..  | March 26 |

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.
6s. net, claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."
"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE of WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLEOH, CRICCIETH and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.

"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations.

3s. 6d. net.

Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

THE ONLY PERFECT TABLE GUM

IS

LE PAGE'S MUCILAGE.

BECAUSE it STICKS.

BECAUSE it sticks things so that they "stay stuck."

BECAUSE it dries quicker than any gum, being practically a thin, ever-fluid glue.

BECAUSE the less you use the better and tighter it sticks.

MOREOVER, it costs no more than gum or paste, and goes ever so much further.

OF ALL STATIONERS at 3d. and 6d.

RUSSIA CEMENT COMPANY,
46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

"8000 words a day with ease."

W. R. Bradlaugh.

Once a gold pen has been selected, the writer finds he is spared the recurring annoyance and regret of losing its services when he has become thoroughly used to it. "I have written with it half a dozen or more volumes, a large number of essays, etc., and a thousand of letters."

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Send for descriptive
Catalogue, or call:
Mable, Todd & Bard.

Manufacturers of Gold
Nibs and the Swan
Fountain Pen,
93, Cheapside.
95, Regent Street.
21, High St., Kensington.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.,

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS of ART.

A SELECTION FROM THE COMPANY'S COLLECTION OF FAMOUS LANDSCAPES BY MASTERS OF
THE BRITISH SCHOOL.

The following Autotypes are issued of the uniform scale of about 18 inches longest line, and are produced in rich Sepia Permanent Pigment. Price 12s. each, unframed; or, framed in oak or walnut mouldings of special design, from 27s. to 35s. each complete.

|  |   |
|--|---|
| J. CONSTABLE.The Cornfield.The Valley Farm.The Glebe Farm.The Bridge at Gilling-ham. | J. GLOVER.Landscape with Cattle.  |
| D. COX.The Vale of Clwyd.  | J. LINNELL.The Windmill.The Coming Storm.Downward Rays.               |
| J. CROME.Mousehold Heath.The Windmill.The Poringland Oak.                                    | A. NASMYTH.Stirling Castle.   |
| T. GAINSBOROUGH.The Watering Place.View of Dedham.   | J. M. W. TURNER.A Frosty Morning.Crossing the Brook.Chichester Canal. |
|  | G. B. WILLOCK.A Country Lane (Chil-ston, Torquay).A Devonshire Mill.  |

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, New Edition of 160 pages.

With upwards of One Hundred Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and Twenty-three Tint Block Illustrations.

For convenience of reference, the Publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' names.

Post free, ONE SHILLING.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET LONDON, W.

IMPORTANT.

All who are interested in books, either as readers, authors, purchasers, or vendors, should subscribe to the

PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

ESTABLISHED 1837.

Among the many attractions of its columns the following may be mentioned:—

Literary articles (including leader on some prominent topic of the moment) announcements of forthcoming volumes, notes on current events in connection with the publishing world, reviews (often illustrated) of new books and magazines, correspondence, &c., &c. An exceedingly valuable feature of the paper is the list of

NEW BOOKS OF THE WEEK

(the most complete list issued) giving the full title, size, price, and publisher, with an index of subjects and name of book and author in one alphabet. Also in every number upwards of a thousand

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

are advertised for, thus affording readers an excellent opportunity either of disposing of their own scarce volumes or purchasing others that they may be in need of; and attention is particularly drawn to the fact that annual subscribers have the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in this column. They also receive a gratis copy of the large special Christmas Number—a handsome quarto volume containing over 250 illustrations.

As an advertising medium in connection with books, the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record stands unrivalled.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR can be had by sending Postal Order or Stamp to Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Limited, the Proprietors, St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, London, to whom all money-payments should be made.

|   |          |
|---|----------|
| For One Year, post-free to any part of Great Britain and Ireland ... ..         | 8s. 6d.  |
| „ Six Months ditto ditto ... ..   | 4s. 6d.  |
| „ Three Months ditto ditto ... ..   | 2s. 6d.  |
| To America and the Continent, the Annual Subscription, including postage ... .. | 11s. 0d. |

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1897.

SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF ISSUE OF ANNUAL CATALOGUE.

THE

ENGLISH CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

FOR THE YEAR 1897.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 224, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

It contains a much longer List of Works than last year's Catalogue, including an addition of some 1,400 more Titles, but the price remains the same, viz., 5s. net, cloth limp; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

“The English Catalogue” is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications.”—Daily News.

“Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day.”—Athenæum.

“We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume.”—Daily Telegraph.

“The English Catalogue of Books” is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome.”—Scotsman.

“To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record.”—Notes and Queries.

London :

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD., St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE BOOK OF THE WEEK.

(AT ALL LIBRARIES.)

REMINISCENCES.

BY

M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

Reviewed extensively as follows:—

One Column, DAILY TELEGRAPH, April 27 (“Full of pleasant passages and amusing anecdotes”).

One Column, SCOTSMAN, April 25 (“A charming book”).

One Column, DAILY NEWS, April 25 (“Delightful reading”).

One Column, STANDARD, April 25.

One Column, DAILY CHRONICLE, April 25.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN, April 26 (“This is a very agreeable book. So many ill-natured and ill-written autobiographies are published nowadays that one is quite relieved to come upon a volume which is neither the one nor the other”).

The GLOBE, April 25 (“Light and enjoyable reading”).

One Column, GLASGOW HERALD, April 28 (“The masculine quality... does not diminish the piquancy of the book”).

GEORGE REDWAY, Publisher, London

W. THACKER & CO.'S Important New Books.

ALREADY PUBLISHED.

HUNTING REMINISCENCES. By Alfred E. PEARSE, M.P., Author of “The Cleveland Hounds as a Trencher-fed Pack,” “Horse-breeding for Farmers,” &c. With Illustrations by the late Sir Frank Lockwood, Cuthbert Bradley, H-ywood Hardy, and from Photographs. CONTENTS.—The Cambridge Drag and House of Commons Steeplechase—The Life of a Hunter—Hounds—Hare-Hunting—Fox-Hunting—Badger-Hunting—Cub-Hunting—The Greatest Run I ever Saw, &c. The First Large Edition exhausted in a Fortnight, a SECOND EDITION now ready. 16mo, 5s. net.

CLOWES' NAVAL POCKET BOOK, 1898. Third Year of Issue. Founded by W. LAIRD CLOWES, Hon. Member of the Royal United Service Institution, Life Member and Gold Medalist of the United States Naval Institute. Edited by L. G. KARR LAUGHTON. The most valuable work of reference now available, containing a full List of Battleships, Ironclads, Gunboats, Cruisers, Torpedo Boats, a List of Dry Docks, and other valuable information, concerning ALL THE NAVIES OF THE WORLD. Corrected to February, 1898. Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, in a letter to the Publishers, says: “It is one of the most useful and handy works of reference on naval matters that I know of, and invaluable to all who take an interest in naval matters.”

JUST READY.

LOCKHART'S ADVANCE THROUGH TRAH. By Capt. L. J. SHADWELL, P.S.C. (Suffolk Regiment), Special Correspondent of the Indian Pioneer and the London Daily News. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

MAY 30.

THE SHEPHERDESS OF TREVA. A New Novel. By PAUL CUSHING, Author of “The Blacksmith of Yoc,” “I'll Th' Thorn,” &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. “Mr. Cushing has achieved a very great success in ‘The Shepherdess of Treva.’”—Academy.

MAY 18.

MEMORANDA and FORMULÆ on FORTIFICATION and TOPOGRAPHY. For the use of Military Students. By Colonel H. M. S. BRUNKE, Author of “Notes on Organisation,” &c. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

MAY 30.

A NEW NOVEL BY THE POPULAR AMERICAN NOVELIST. JASON EDWARDS and a LITTLE NORSK. By HAMLIN GARLAND, Author of “Rose of Dutcher's Coolly,” “Wayside Courtships,” &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

READY JUNE.

THE HISTORY OF CHINA. By D. C. SOULGER, Author of “Chinese Gordon,” “Sir Stamford Raffles,” &c. A New Edition, Revised and brought up to date, including the recent Concessions to the European Powers. Illustrated with valuable Maps and Portraits. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED, medium 8vo, buckram, 21s.

SHORT STALKS:

SECOND SERIES.

Comprising Trips in Somaliland, Sinai, The Eastern Desert of Egypt, Crete, The Carpathian Mountains, and Daghestan.

By EDWARD NORTH BUXTON.

With 89 Page Illustrations and 2 Maps.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 and 27, Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

JUST PUBLISHED, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

FIGHTING THE MATABELE:

A STORY OF ADVENTURE IN RHODESIA.

By J. CHALMERS.

With Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood.

“A spirited and extremely interesting narrative.”—Scotsman.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey

EPSS'S COCOAINE

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—“Cocaine,” a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistency of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPSS & CO., Ltd., Homeopathic Chemists, London

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKELTON.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Farnival St., London

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

NOW READY, price 1s.

PART I. of

Cassell's Unique Fine Art Publication, ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1898

In which will appear EXQUISITE REPRODUCTIONS

of
NUMEROUS IMPORTANT PICTURES

In this year's Exhibition, by
THE PRESIDENT and other

MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY, that will appear in
NO OTHER PUBLICATION.

* * All who desire a really representative Collection of the Pictures in this year's Exhibition, exquisitely produced, should at once register their orders for CASSELL'S "ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES," to be published in Five Parts at 1s. each, or one handsome volume at 7s. 6d.

MR. MAX PEMBERTON'S NEW NOVEL NOW READY, price 6s.

KRONSTADT.

By MAX PEMBERTON,

Author of "A Paritan's Wife," "Christine of the Hill," &c.
With 8 Full-Page Illustrations.

"Kronstadt" is beyond measure superior in all respects to anything that Mr. Pemberton has hitherto done. Singularly original in its conception, the story is most cunningly and cleverly told. It grips the attention in the first paragraph, and whirles one irresistibly along in unabated excitement through all the stirring incidents of its skillfully devised plot."—Daily Mail.

* * The large First Edition having already been exhausted, the work has been reprinted, and copies can now be obtained at all Booksellers.

READY SHORTLY, price 6s.

GRACE O'MALLEY: PRINCESS AND PIRATE.

Told by RUARI MACDONALD,
Redhank and Rebel.

The same set forth in the Tongue of the English
By ROBERT MACHRAY.

While most of the incidents in this stirring novel are imaginary, many of the characters in it are taken from the actual history of Ireland. The story is put into the mouth of a certain Ruari Macdonald, a "Redhank" of the Scots, who was Grace O'Malley's chief lieutenant. The romance is the work of Mr. Robert Machray, who is well known as a contributor to the leading English and American magazines.

NEW NOVEL BY FRANK STOCKTON. NOW READY, price 6s.

THE GIRL AT COBHURST.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON,

Author of "A Story-Teller's Pack," "Mrs. Cliff's Yacht," &c.

The scene of this work is laid in a pretty country village. It is a love story, but ample scope is afforded by the humour which has always distinguished Mr. Stockton's writings.

NOW READY, price 6s.

SPECTRE GOLD.

By HEADON HILL,

Author of "By a Hair's-Breadth."

With 8 Full-Page Illustrations.

"A man who likes a lightly-written tale, full of movement, peril, and sudden surprises, is safe to find in 'Spectre Gold' what he wants."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, price 6s.

YOUNG BLOOD.

A NOVEL.

By E. W. HORNING,

Author of "The Rogue's March," "My Lord Duke," &c.

"A story which for the cleverness and intricacy of its plot, well sustained until its final and dramatic unravelling, and for the careful workmanship and originality of its portraiture, deserves the warmest recommendation."
Pall Mall Gazette.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris,
New York, and Melbourne.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

WITH SKI and SLEDGE over ARCTIC

GLACIERS. By Sir WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, M.A., F.S.A., F.R.G.S. With Illustrations from Photographs by E. J. Garwood. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

SCENES in the THIRTY DAYS' WAR

BETWEEN GREECE and TURKEY. By HENRY W. NEVINSON, War Correspondent to the Daily Chronicle. With Illustrations from Photographs, and Maps. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
Truth—"Incomparably the most brilliant and sympathetic account of the many I have read."

MEDÆVAL TOWN SERIES.—First Volume.

THE STORY of PERUGIA

By MARGARET SYMONDS and LINA DUFF-GORDON. With Illustrations by Miss Helen James, and a Plan. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Manchester Courier—"Few guide-books have such a varied and fascinating theme, or are written with such knowledge, freshness, and sympathy."

A SPRING SONG. By T. Nash (1600).

With Illustrations by L. Lealis Brooke, printed in Colours by Edmund Evans. Paper cover, 1s. 6d. net; leather bindings at various prices. Immediately.

POEMS from HORACE, CATULLUS,

and SAPPHO, and Other Pieces. By E. G. HARMAN. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. net.

Spectator—"Scholars and lovers of belles lettres will welcome this pleasant little volume."

A BOOK of CATS. Drawn and Written by Mrs. W. CHANCE, containing between 30 and 40 Reproductions of that Lady's Pencil Drawings. Small crown 4to, 2s. 6d. net.

Sketch—"Mrs. Chance is one of the best delineators of the cat.... She indicates the fluffiness, the airiness of pussy by the most charming pencil-work."

READY IMMEDIATELY.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION, with Portrait of the Author, crown 8vo, 2s. net.

Also in demy 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. net.

QUO VADIS: a Narrative of Rome in the Time of Nero. By HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ. Translated from the Polish by JEREMIAH CURTIN.

Of this Book upwards of 700,000 Copies have so far been sold in England and America.

Times—"An exceptionally good novel.... The scheme of the book is ambitious.... The atmosphere is lurid, the scenes of extraordinary splendour.... This whole novel is full of scenes little less exciting."

The Temple Classics.

Under the General Editorship of ISRAEL GOLLANZ.

Pott 8vo, with an Etched or Photogravure Frontispiece, limp cloth, 1s. 6d. net; limp lambskin leather, 2s. net.

LATEST VOLUMES (see Special Prospectus).

LAW'S SERIOUS CALL to a DEVOUT and HOLY LIFE. Edited by Dr. HORTON.

BOSWELL'S TOUR to the HEBRIDES with DR. JOHNSON. With Notes by ARNOLD GLOVER.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS of S. FRANCIS.

Newly Translated from the Italian by Professor T. W. ARNOLD. With Frontispiece and Title by Laurence Housman.

THE HIGH HISTORY of the HOLY GRAIL.

Translated for the first time from the French by Dr. SEBASTIAN EVANS. With Appendix. With Frontispiece and Titles by Sir Edward Burne-Jones. 12 vols.

* * Large-Paper Edition, limited to 250 Copies, printed on Hand-made paper, with Proofs of Sir Edward Burne-Jones's Drawings on India paper, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph—"Unsurpassed as a cheap, artistic, and, what is more, a scholarly edition."

The Temple Dramatists.

A Series of the Best Tragedies and Comedies of the English Dramatists, edited by well-known and competent Scholars, and produced in a similar size and style to that of the "Temple Shakespeare." One Play is published per month.

Limp olive cloth, 1s. net; olive paste-grain roan, 1s. 6d. net per volume.

LATEST VOLUMES (see Special Prospectus).

ELIZABETHAN SECTION.

GREENE'S TRAGICAL REIGN of SELIMUS

Edited by Dr. GROSART.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER'S PHILASTER. Edited by F. S. BOAS, M.A.

FLETCHER'S KNIGHT of the BURNING PESTLE. Edited by E. W. MOORMAN, Ph.D.

MODERN SECTION.

SHERIDAN'S THE CRITIC. Edited by G. A. AITKEN.

Spectator—"A most delightful series."

Copies of the General Catalogue and of any Prospectus above mentioned will be forwarded post free on application.

J. M. DENT & CO.,

29 and 30, Bedford Street, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THREE NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE.

By JOHN BERWICK,

Author of "The Secret of Saint Florel."

THE CONCERT-DIRECTOR.

By NELLIE K. BLISSETT,

Author of "The Wisdom of the Simple."

THE MAN OF THE FAMILY:

A Story of Fortunatus and the Barbarians.

By F. EMILY PHILLIPS,

Author of "The Education of Antonia."

Part XX., Completing the Work, now ready.

LIFE of NAPOLEON BONA-

PARTE. By Professor WILLIAM M. SLOANE,

Ph.D., L.H.D. Illustrated. Imperial 4to. In 20 Parts, at 4s. net each; or in 4 vols. at 24s. net each. Supplied only in sets.

Subscriptions (sent through a Bookseller) will be received at any time, and the Volumes or Parts delivered at such intervals as may be convenient to the Subscriber.

Parnassus Library.—New Volume.

AESCHYLUS TRAGOEDIAE.

With Introduction by LEWIS CAMPBELL, M.A.,

LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Greek in the University of St. Andrews. Fcap. 8vo, 6s. net.

Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

FOUR LECTURES on the EARLY

HISTORY of the GOSPELS. Delivered at Milborne

Port, Somerset, Advent, 1897, by the Rev. J. H.

WILKINSON, M.A., Rector of Stock Gaylard, Dorset, sometime Lecturer at Queen's College, Oxford.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

PHILOLOGY of the GOSPELS.

By FRIEDRICH BLASS, Dr. Phil., D.Th., Professor of Classical Philology in the University of Halle

Wittenberg.

NEW VOLUME commences with the MAY Number of

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

THE SCRAMBLE for the UPPER NILE.

By R. D. MOHUN.

THE SEVEN WONDERS of the WORLD

II. The Great Pyramids of Egypt.

By B. I. WHEELER.

AN OUTLINE of JAPANESE ART. Part I.

By E. F. FENELLOSA.

GALLOPS: His First Race.

By DAVID GRAY.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

Also ready, Volume LV., NOVEMBER, 1897, to APRIL, 1898, 10s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                         | PAGE    |
|-----------------------------------|---------|
| Byron ... ..                      | 489     |
| Socrates as Playwright ... ..     | 490     |
| A Plunge into Reality ... ..      | 492     |
| Salmon Fishing ... ..             | 493     |
| BRIEFER MENTION ... ..            | 493     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..     | 495-498 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..             | 499     |
| PURE FABLES ... ..                | 502     |
| THE COUNTRY OF "KIDNAPPED" ... .. | 502     |
| THE WEEK ... ..                   | 503     |
| THE BOOK MARKET ... ..            | 503     |
| ART ... ..                        | 504     |
| DRAMA ... ..                      | 505     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..             | 506     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..      | 507     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..             | 507     |

REVIEWS.

BYRON.

The Works of Lord Byron. A New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition, with Illustrations. Poetry: Vol. I. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge, M.A. (London: John Murray.)

IT is natural and becoming that an elaborate and probably final edition of Byron should proceed from the great publishing house of Murray.

"Strahan, Lintot, Tonson of the times,
Patron and publisher of rhymes,
To thee the bard up Pindus climbs,
My Murray."

It is also touching and appropriate that the editing of Byron's poems should be entrusted to a grandson of Coleridge: a literary scholar, at home in the history of Byron's times, and himself a poet. Mr. Coleridge has, with special facilities, collated MSS. and editions, published fresh poems, written elucidatory notes, and, in short, provided an excellent apparatus criticus. This first volume contains the "Hours in Idleness," "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," "Hints from Horace," "The Curse of Minerva," and "The Waltz." Our congratulations to Mr. Murray and Mr. Coleridge: but though they have done well what they purposed to do, was it worth doing?

The Byron of tradition is a fascinating figure. He flashes through his brief life with a disastrous glory; he is passion incarnate; he is a noble, a man of ancient and illustrious descent, and he flings poems broadcast in a golden largesse; he is the Napoleon of passion and of poetry, adored, dreaded, reviled, extolled; he is an Apollo-Apollyon, beautiful and satanic; he is the spirit of revolt, freedom, unfettered manhood; like Browning's Ottima, he is "magnificent in sin"; he is Milton's ruined archangel, fallen from Heaven, and keeping something of his pristine splendour; he is the man of inevitable genius, who loves to be himself, and to mock into oblivion and contempt all spurious and puling respectability; he is the Titan, the Prometheus, who filches fire from Heaven or from Hell; Europe is aghast at him, and he dies heroically at Missolonghi. And "Byronism" becomes a contagion: from Moscow to Madrid, whole armies of young men fall to drinking out of skulls, to writing cut-throat or indecent tragedies, to loving Alps and ruins and bandits and the East and the Middle Age and their neighbours' wives; he is a portent and an epoch; the Revolution was one mighty thing, and the existence of "Milor" Byron was another. "That pale face is my fate," said an unhappy girl, upon catching sight of Byron: "that pale face" possessed, obsessed all Europe. It lengthened the hair, and shortened the collar: it created "Byronism," and enriched all civilised tongues with the epithet "Byronic." A beautiful devil of supreme genius—that is the Byron of tradition. Supremacy in genius, vice, personality—they were all ascribed to the Byron of tradition. Infamous, perhaps: but, what a poet, what a man!

So much for the Byron of tradition. And the Byron of fact? "Well," said Mr. Stevenson's Attwater to Captain Davis, "you seem to me to be a very twopenny pirate!" And to me, Byron with all his pretensions and his fame seems a very twopenny poet and a farthing man. "He had the misfortune," writes Mr. Symonds, "to be well-born and ill-bred," a most deplorable combination. His letters alone reveal the man; a man of malignant dishonour and declamatory affectation, and poetising conceit; a man who could not even act upon Luther's advice and "sin boldly," but must needs advertise his silly obscenities. Despicable, that is the word for him; and it is no Philistine Puritanism that so speaks. The vulgar aristocrat, the insolent plebeian, that Byron was, looks ludicrous by the side of his great contemporaries. Wordsworth, so impassioned, awful, and august; Shelley and Keats; Lamb, the well-beloved, that tragic and smiling patient; miraculous Coleridge; Landor, with his gracious courtesy and Roman wrath; how does Byron show by these? He did one thing well; he rid the world of a cad—by dying as a soldier. There was a strain of greatness in the man, and it predominated at the last.

But Byron the poet? Emphatically, he was not a poet; not if Shakespeare and Milton are poets. He was a magnificent satirist; the "Vision of Judgment," "Don Juan," and "Beppo" are very glories of wit, indignation, rhetoric; accomplished to the uttermost, marvellous and immortal; filled with scathing laughter, rich with a prodigal profusion of audacious fancy and riot of rhyme. Here the man is himself, eloquent and vehement of speech, alive and afire. No coarseness, cruelty, insolence, can blind us to the enduring excellence of these writings, to their virility and strength. This Byron is deathless. But the Byron of love lyrics, and tragedies, and romantic tales, is a poet of infinite tediousness in execrable verse; in the severely courteous French phrase, he "does not permit himself to be read." And he is not read; no one now reads "Lara," or "Parisina," or "The Corsair," or "The Giaour," or "The Bride of Abydos," or "The Siege of Corinth," or "The Island," or the weary, weary plays. They are dead, and past resurrection; their passion is as poor and tawdry a thing as that of Frankenstein or The Mysteries of Udolpho; their garish theatricality is laughable, and we can scarce believe that these things of nought were once preferred to the noble simplicities and rough, true music of Scott. Among the poems of farewell, regret, despair, is there one, except, may be, "When we two parted," that can be read with more than a mild and languid pleasure? In all the moralisings, and meanderings, and maunderings of "Childe Harold," is there anything better than a few bursts of sounding rhetoric and impressive declamation, superbly and masterfully trivial? Dullness is the word, dullness unspeakable. Outside his own royal province of satire, he created nothing of power, nothing but frantic efforts to be powerful; and he turned the lovely speech of English poetry into a hideous noise. Coleridge, master of music, says of him, "It seems, to my ear, that there is a sad want of harmony in Lord Byron's verses"; and again, "How lamentably the art of versification is neglected by most of the poets of the present day! By Lord Byron, as it strikes me, in particular." In our times, Mr. Swinburne, to whom none will deny a mastery of his craft, has poured upon Byron's inharmonies the contempt, not of parody—that were impossible—but of faithful imitation. Consider an average example of his rhythm from "Cain":—

"Oh, thou beautiful
And unimaginable ether! and Ye multiplying masses of increased
And still increasing lights! What are ye?
What
Is this blue wilderness of interminable
Air, where ye roll along, as I have seen
The leaves along the limpid streams of Eden?
Is your course measured for ye? Or do ye Sweep on in your unbounded revelry
Through an aerial universe of endless
Expansion—at which my soul aches to think—
Intoxicated with eternity?
O God! O Gods! or whatso'er ye are!
How beautiful ye are! how beautiful
Your works, or accidents, or whatso'er
They may be! Let me die, as atoms die
(If that they die), or know ye in your might
And knowledge! My thoughts are not in this hour
Unworthy what I see, though my dust is.
Spirit! let me expire, or see them nearer."

Musical, is it not? Let us try again; a passage from "Sardanapalus":

"You disk,
To the star-read Chaldean, bears upon
Its everlasting page the end of what Seemed everlasting! But oh! thou true sun,
The burning oracle of all that live,
As fountain of all life, and symbol of Him who bestows it, wherefore dost thou linit
Thy love unto calamity? Why not
Unfold the rise of days more worthy thine
All-glorious burst from ocean? Why not dart
A beam of hope athwart the future years,
As of wrath to its days! Hear me! oh, hear me!"

Such is Byron's "mighty line": this horrid dissonance, this gasping and croaking, is the breath of his fiery spirit expressing itself in poetry and passion. "Moore," said Sir Henry Taylor, "makes Byron as interesting as one whose nature was essentially ignoble can be." And "essentially ignoble" is the very term for Byron's verse; it lacks every fine quality—from the majesty of Milton to the polish of Pope. Many a poet whose matter is tedious and outworn can be read for the redeeming excellence of his manner; Byron is not of these.

But Byron was accepted abroad—he enfranchised English literature, he was the genius of English poetry incarnate before the eyes of Europe, he moved the aged Goethe and the youthful Hugo. Why? Surely for a simple reason: Byron is very easy to understand, he deals rhetorically with elemental emotions, and he enjoyed the fame of being "at war with society"—an aristocrat in exile, a champion of the peoples. Now, rhetoric and oratory and eloquence make a wide appeal; they are seldom subtle, but they address themselves with pungent and poignant vigour to the simple feelings of men. "Give me liberty or give me death!"—that is the kind of thing; a sonorous and impassioned commonplace, flung out upon the air to thrill the hearts of thousands. Byron's best verse has this quality: he possessed the imagination of the orator, the faculty of finding large and bold phrases. Stanza upon stanza of "Childe Harold" reads like the finest things in Irish or American oratory—grandiose and sweeping. "Roll on, thou deep and dark-blue ocean, roll!" You can see the outstretched arm, hear the resonant voice, of Byron the declaimer; and the effect upon ears unversed in the niceties and delicacies of English poetry was prodigious. The blaring magniloquence of Lucan has certain attractions not possessed by the majestic, melancholy, subtle Virgilian lines; and Byron was much of a Lucan. "The Isles of Greece" and "Ode to Napoleon" and "Lines on Completing My Thirty-sixth Year"—emphatic, strenuous, impressive—have the true oratorical note and ring:

"The sword, the banner, and the field,
Glory and Greece, around me see!
The Spartan, borne upon his shield,
Was not more free."

There is a trumpet call in that; but for greatness of beauty we turn from it to the last chorus of Shelley's "Hellas," and hear a music of the morning stars. Byron could shout magnificently, laugh splendidly, thunder tumultuously; but he could not sing. There was something in him of Achilles, nothing whatever of Apollo. Think only of these mighty masters of passion—Æschylus, Lucretius, Dante, Milton, Hugo; what sweetness proceeding from what strength! They are filled with a lyrical loveliness, the very magic of music, the beauty almost unbearable. By the side of these Byron is but a brazen noise. His sæva indignatio becomes a mere petulance of arrogance when we think of Dante; one line of Milton rebukes his haste of speech. He took Europe by storm; but a far more impassioned figure is that of Wordsworth, with his whole being, body and soul, shaken by the "divine madness" of inspiration, by converse with eternity, by commune with "the most ancient heavens." There was the true passion, not in Byron, hurriedly throwing off a few hundred lines of romantic rant after coming home from some silly dissipation. He has no trace of the poet consecrate, such as marks many a nameless balladist. Who would not rather have written "Helen of Kirkeconnel," so fierce and loving, desolate and defiant, a cry imperishable and perfect, than all the famed rigmarole of rhetoric called "Childe Harold"? In that long and elaborate work there are precisely two lines of pure poetry, the lines on the Dying Gladiator:

"He heard it, but he heeded not: his eyes
Were with his heart, and that was far away."

That, and perhaps a score of other lines in Byron, have an enduring freshness and fragrance of thought and word. For the rest, he was pleased in poetry, as in life, to "cut a dash," with the result that both his verse and himself are serrily discredited; things, as George Borrow has it, of "mouthings and coxcombry." Landor, in stately Latin, once exhorted him to amend his morals and his style. He did neither, and his style remained even more detestable than his morals. When Tennyson heard of Byron's death, he went out upon the seashore and wrote upon the sand the words, "Byron is dead!" Seas of oblivion have swept over Byron, and washed away his fame, as the sea washed away those words. It may be that his most celebrated passage will be remembered only by the scornful ridicule of Browning. The poets whom he insulted or patronised—Wordsworth and Coleridge, and Shelley and Keats—have long since taken their starry stations in altitudes beyond sight of him, and Byron, "The Claimant" of English poetry, has been found out. He retains but one glory—his gift of wit and satire, his superb recklessness of mocking phrase and rhyme. There, all that was potent and sincere in him became triumphant, and the writer of "Don Juan" is a deathless delight. But the "poet of passion" is dead. Peacock killed him long ago in Nightmare Abbey. His wailings and howlings wring no man's heart, stir no man's pulses; we no longer believe in the Byron of dazzling devilry and burning poetry, volcanic and voluptuous. In place of him we contemplate an ill-mannered and cross-grained fellow, charlatan and genius, whose voluminous writings are mostly dull and mostly ill-written—gone for ever, that Byron of the fatal fascination, the passionate and patrician glory, whose freaks and whimsies threw Europe into fits, whose poems revealed to the universe the fact that Shakespeare's England had at last produced a poet. If he could be resuscitated, Mr. Murray as publisher, and Mr. Coleridge as editor, are the men to accomplish that miracle. But, as Mr. Matthew Arnold loved to inform us, "miracles do not happen." Byron the wit is alive for evermore; Byron the poet of passion and imagination will never rise from the dead.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

SOCRATES AS PLAYWRIGHT.—II.

Plays: Pleasant and Unpleasant. By Bernard Shaw. In 2 vols. (Grant Richards.)

WE left Mr. Bernard Shaw at the end of our review last week standing, as it were, on tip-toe bidding good-bye to the subjects of his unpleasant plays, and coming frankly, and with some glee, to the writing of those others which, to quote him once more, "dealing less with the crimes of society and more with its romantic follies and with the struggles of individuals against those follies, may be called, by contrast, Pleasant." For an explanation of this change in the selection of his material he had also, it will be remembered, prepared the expectations of his readers, carefully promising that in a further preface he would expound his development in this matter, much as if he proposed to give a brilliantly witty answer to a conundrum of his own invention. When, however, one comes to read this pre-arranged preface, one finds that these promises are without any fulfilment of any kind. The document, indeed, is well worth reading; it contains the only passage we know in all Mr. Shaw's voluminous writings—and our knowledge of those writings is both extensive and peculiar—which can be called nobly and touchingly eloquent; a brief handling of the subject of modernity not unworthy of Pater himself; it contains the most ingenious attack possible on the actor-manager, though set in the guise of an elaborate defence; it contains some engrossing autobiographical details, and a triumphantly complacent assertion of the truth of the author's imaginative realism backed up by historical demonstration; it contains some exceedingly clever nonsense which is the expression of a pose with Mr. Shaw when he has the humour to refuse to give way to an almost overwhelming tendency towards passionate seriousness; but it contains not the shadow of an explanation why the playwright turned from the "crimes of society" to its "romantic follies" for the material of his drama. Whether the omission is an intentional one, or whether Mr. Shaw merely forgot his promise when he came to write his second preface, it does not in the least matter; for the true reason is perfectly clear to any reader who takes the trouble to think the matter out.

The fact is, that Mr. Shaw found, as he progressed from play to play, that an excessive tendency to be didactic, to play the lecturer, is the destruction of the playwright's art. He found that though he had a gospel to preach, and a very serious gospel too, the preaching of it with too great an insistence in his plays deprived him of a thousand delightful opportunities; and, accordingly, he did what any romantic writer of his artistic accomplishment and artistic need of expression would have done—he succumbed to his own brilliant art. He had too apostolically restrained his humour, his wit, his exquisite gift of quickness in dialogue, of sudden surprise in speech, and all for the sake of his indignation and his insatiable passion for reforming the world. He found that an indulgence in all these tendencies for their own sake was exceedingly pleasant and stimulating, and he gave his fancy, with some qualms of conscience, a free hand. He did not at the same time consciously surrender any essential principle in his career as reformer; he soothed himself with a phrase, with that antithesis of the "crimes of society" against "its romantic follies." And having ingeniously contented himself with this form of words—was there ever such an idealist since the days of Socrates?—he set to work to enjoy himself thoroughly until he had drifted, as it were, through a fairy-land of unrealities, into the realms of absolute romance. The first fruits of this development showed themselves in "Arms and the Man," the last fruits (so far as we have them in print) in "You Never can Tell."

"Arms and the Man" is described by its author as a Comedy, and it is as witty and interesting a work of its kind as could well be desired. Because Mr. Shaw has chosen to deal with the vanities and egotisms of a semi-civilisation, and because those vanities and egotisms are obviously due to a distorted understanding of self and of others, he is contented and happy in his conscience, seeing that his "mission" is still safeguarded. When, however, he claims that the perfect self-introspection of his characters whensoever the truth is pointed out to them is an essay in realism and not in a very amusing form of romance, he does not carry conviction. Take an example:

BLUNTSCHLI: You said you'd only told two lies in your whole life. Dear young lady: isn't that rather a short allowance? I'm quite a straightforward man myself; but it wouldn't last me a whole morning.

RAINA [staring haughtily at him]: Do you know, sir, that you are insulting me?

BLUNTSCHLI: I can't help it. When you get into that noble attitude and speak in that thrilling voice, I admire you; but I find it impossible to believe a single word you say.

RAINA [superbly]: Captain Bluntschli!

BLUNTSCHLI [unmoved]: Yes?

RAINA [coming a little towards him, as if she could not believe her senses]: Do you mean what you said just now? Do you know what you said just now?

BLUNTSCHLI: I do.

RAINA [gasping]: I! I!!! [She points to herself incredulously, meaning I, Raina Petkoff, tell lies!] He meets her gaze unflinchingly. She suddenly sits down beside him and adds with a complete change of manner from the heroic to the familiar] How did you find me out?"

Now that is exceedingly good, very amusing, and the antithetical point is worked out with strong and ingenious humour. But Mr. Shaw might write essays at the rate of three a week for the rest of his life to prove that this is not romance without convincing us. The conversion of Raina, who has posed all her life, and who has surrounded herself by habit and daily repetition with a thousand forms of self-deceit, into a woman of the clearest self-knowledge, the easiest straightforwardness and the quietest acceptance of her folly by the simple process of being called a liar, is a strain too great upon any credulity. No act of the despised heroism of the Adelphi Theatre could be more difficult, more impossible, than this psychological feat of Mr. Shaw's heroine. The Adelphi idealist insists upon it that the miraculous achievement of his hero is the kind of thing men should aim at, just as Mr. Shaw insists that we should try and reach Raina's amazing self-knowledge upon general information. The pull on Mr. Shaw's side lies in his literary expertness, to use his own phrase, and in his keen instinct for theatrical points. As a theatrical point Raina's change of front is an example of the Comic Muse at her best; but it is not realism. The play, sparkling as it is, runs upon the pure conventional lines of modern fiction, ending—O, Socrates!—with a happy marriage, and a rather overdone insistence upon the hero's extraordinary, almost superhuman, business instincts and organising talents. Of course, it would not be good Dumas if we were deprived of such a passage; but Mr. Shaw, like everybody else, feels the necessity of convention. We quote one more exceedingly amusing passage, which, it will be noted, ends with a little bit of patriotic rant that should bring a typical audience to tears of joy. Bluntschli is suing Petkoff for Raina's hand:

"PETKOFF: We should be most happy. Bluntschli, if it were only a question of your position; but, hang it, you know, Raina is accustomed to a very comfortable establishment. Sergius keeps twenty horses.

BLUNTSCHLI: But what on earth is the use of twenty horses? Why, it's a circus!

CATHERINE [severely]: My daughter, sir, is accustomed to a first-rate stable.

RAINA: Hush, mother; you're making me ridiculous.

BLUNTSCHLI: Oh, well, if it comes to a question of an establishment, here goes! [He darts impetuously to the table and seizes the papers in the blue envelope.] How many horses did you say?

SERGIUS: Twenty, noble Switzer.

BLUNTSCHLI: I have two hundred horses. [They are amazed.] How many carriages?

SERGIUS: Three.

BLUNTSCHLI: I have seventy. . . . How many tablecloths have you?

SERGIUS: How the deuce do I know?

BLUNTSCHLI: Have your four thousand?

SERGIUS: No.

BLUNTSCHLI: I have. I have nine thousand six hundred pairs of sheets and blankets, with two thousand four hundred eider-down quilts. I have ten thousand knives and forks, and the same quantity of dessert spoons. I have six hundred servants. I have six palatial establishments, besides two livery stables, a tea-garden, and a private house. I have four medals for distinguished services; I have the rank of an officer and the standing of a gentleman; and, I have three native languages. Show me any man in Bulgaria that can offer as much!

PETKOFF [with childish awe]: Are you Emperor of Switzerland?

BLUNTSCHLI: My rank is the highest known in Switzerland: I am a free citizen."

In "Candida," the second of the "Pleasant" plays, we have what may be called Mr. Shaw's masterpiece in human drama, so far as he has yet given it to the world. "Candida" is not the most brilliant of his plays; the first half of "You Never Can Tell" deserves for that quality to rank highest; but in it he has chosen a most subtle, and, at the same time, a most pressing problem, not of society, not of crime and folly, but of sheer character and passion. For all practical purposes the characters are three—Candida, her husband, the Rev. James Morell, and Eugene Marchbanks—and the play is the unerring development of these forces acting in concert and producing an inevitable resultant. Which is the weaker man? How shall the woman judge, and what shall be the reason of her decision? In these questions Mr. Shaw, with a wonderful tenderness, a full and quiet mastery of emotion, and profound psychological secrecy—any intelligent reader of the play will understand the phrase—finds a noble opportunity and rises to the height of his argument. The study of the clergyman is extraordinarily true and complete in its perfect understanding; a living Morell could say or think not a word more in his own favour or defence than Mr. Shaw has permitted him to say and think. The poet is as clever, if not so complete a picture, partly because Mr. Shaw deliberately leaves a side of the boy's character untouched, and partly because the poetical phraseology put into his mouth is, in the extreme development (particularly in the passage about the "tiny shallop" and the "marble floors," which reads like the old-fashioned description of an Alma-Tadema) not altogether convincing. Candida herself is not short of being a masterly piece of work, with her beautiful intelligence and sympathies not made impossible by exaggeration, but all the more attractive because Mr. Shaw subtly makes you aware of their human limitations, without once indicating the exact bounds of those limitations. The less essential characters, which are woven with great skill in and out of the piece, are used with unerring instinct. We make two quotations, indicating something of the moving forces in the drama:

"MORELL [with noble tenderness]: Eugene, listen to me. Some day, I hope and trust, you will be a happy man like me. [Eugene chafes intolerantly, repudiating the worth of his happiness. Morell, deeply insulted, controls himself with fine forbearance, and continues steadily with great artistic beauty of delivery] You will be married; and you will be working with all your might and valour to make every spot on earth as happy as your own home. You will be one of the makers of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth; and—who knows?—you may be a pioneer and master builder where I am only a humble journeyman. . . . It should make you tremble . . . to think that the heavy burthen and great gift of a poet may be laid upon you.

MARCHBANKS [Unimpressed and remorseless, his boyish crudity of assertion telling sharply against Morell's oratory]: It does not make me tremble. It is the want of it in others that makes me tremble.

MORELL [Redoubling his force of style under the stimulus of his genuine feeling and Eugene's obduracy]: Then help to kindle it in them—in me—not to extinguish it. In the future—when you are as happy as I am—I will be your true brother in the faith. I will help you to believe that God has given us a world that nothing but our own folly keeps from being a paradise. . . . There are so many things to make us doubt if once we let our understanding be troubled. Even at home, we sit as if in camp, encompassed by a hostile army of doubts. Will you play the traitor and let them in on me?

MARCHBANKS [looking round him]: Is it like this for her here always? A woman with a great soul, craving for reality, truth, freedom; and being fed on metaphors, sermons, stale perorations, mere rhetoric. Do you think a woman's soul can live on your talent for preaching?"

And this, the beginning of the final scene:

"MORELL [with proud humility]: I have nothing to offer you but my strength for your defence, my honesty of purpose for your surety, my ability and industry for your livelihood, and my authority and position for your dignity. That is all it becomes a man to offer a woman."

(Doesn't he hit the rhetorical note, with feeling behind it, however, with marvellous acuteness?)

"CANDIDA [quite quietly]: And you, Eugene? What do you offer?"

MARCHBANKS: My weakness! My desolation! My heart's need!

CANDIDA: That's a good bid, Eugene. Now I know how to make my choice.

She pauses and looks curiously from one to the other, as if weighing them. Morell, whose lofty confidence has changed into heartbreaking dread at Eugene's bid, loses all power of concealing his anxiety. Eugene, strung to the highest tension, does not move a muscle.

MORELL [in a suffocated voice—the appeal bursting from the depths of his anguish]: Candida!

MARCHBANKS [aside, in a flash of contempt]: Coward!

CANDIDA [significantly]: I give myself to the weaker of the two.

Eugene divines her meaning: his face whitens like steel in a furnace.

MORELL [bowing his head with the calm of collapse]: I accept your sentence, Candida.

MARCHBANKS: Oh, I feel I'm lost. He cannot bear the burden.

MORELL [incredulously, raising his head with prosaic abruptness]: Do you mean me, Candida?"

And "the secret in the poet's heart," which neither Candida nor Morell knew—it was just your secret and mine, if we did but know it, and hers and Morell's if they had but known it.

We have said that "You never can Tell" represents Mr. Shaw in his most brilliant mood, and the first half of that play is, indeed, a most wonderful display of character-mongering of an extremely sparkling and incessant variety. The problem of the drama, one must perforce own, is not of very vast interest, and the complexity of the situations is not made coherent by the development of a single essential interest surrounded by, but not involved in, lesser interests, as is the case with "Candida." The effect is, that the play suffers in attractiveness when the dramatist's vitality and high spirits droop a little, a result which must at times inevitably occur. Nevertheless, Mr. Shaw, by a piece of sheer intellectual bravery and determination, succeeds in sustaining the interest upon a satisfactory, if not always on the same high level. The twins, Philip and Dolly, with their lightness (like the lightness of gnats), and their keen sense of life, are splendid; Mrs. Clandon and Gloria, in another line of work, are very well done; Valentine and Crampton are careful but not inspired work; and the waiter and Bohun are, for all the world, bad imitations of Dickens in a mood for the ready-made. We are sorry about the waiter, because it is impossible not to feel that Mr. Shaw has a personal tenderness for him. But this kind of dead conventionality will not do, and there's an end of it. We quote a brief passage between the twins and Valentine, the dentist:

"PHILIP: We shall have to introduce him to the other member of the family: the Woman of the Twentieth Century—our sister Gloria!"

DOLLY [dithyrambically]: Nature's masterpiece!

PHILIP: Learning's daughter!

DOLLY: Madeira's pride!

PHILIP: Beauty's paragon!

DOLLY [suddenly descending to prose]: Bosh! No complexion.

VALENTINE [desperately]: May I have a word?

PHILIP [politely]: Excuse us. Go ahead.

DOLLY [very nicely]: So sorry.

VALENTINE [attempting to take them paternally]: I really must give a hint to you young people—

DOLLY: Oh, come; I like that. How old are you?

PHILIP: Over thirty.

DOLLY: He's not.

PHILIP [confidently]: He is.

DOLLY [emphatically]: Twenty-seven.

PHILIP [imperturbably]: Thirty-three.

DOLLY: Stuff!

PHILIP [to Valentine]: I appeal to you, Mr. Valentine.

VALENTINE [remonstrating]: Well, really—[resigning himself].—Thirty-one.

PHILIP [to Dolly]: You were wrong.

DOLLY: So were you.

PHILIP [suddenly conscientious]: We're forgetting our manners, Dolly."

We have done; save but to remark that "The Man of Destiny," rightly described by Mr. Shaw as a "trifle," was really too trifling to be included in these volumes. As a curious example, finally, in the matter of detail, of that fact upon which we have insisted that the destruction of one authority necessarily implies the setting up of another, Mr. Shaw never uses italics for emphasis, and eschews as far as he can the apostrophe and the hyphen. He would have us, instead, space out our letters, and write teatable and youd. Le Roi est Mort, vive le Roi.

A PLUNGE INTO REALITY.

The Workers. By Walter A. Wyckoff. (Heinemann.)

WHEN a learned professor, after years devoted to book-lore and theorising upon economic questions, determines to plunge penniless into the proletariat and find out for himself whether a man can earn a living with his two hands and his head, the record of his experience can scarcely fail to be interesting. The Workers (Heinemann) is an account of the first part of the wanderings through America of the author, Mr. Walter A. Wyckoff, in search of honest employment from the time when he set forth in an old suit of clothes with a magazine under his arm to the time when he found himself at work in a logging camp in the Alleghanies. No such lurid encounters fell to his lot in the East as those which awaited him in Chicago and are now being serially described in an American monthly. But for all that he saw enough of the grim realities of life to make a bookworm open his eyes.

He carried the magazine in order to gain access to the humbler classes by inviting subscriptions. The method was not invariably successful. While showing it to some village children he was noticed by the local carpenter.

"The old carpenter presently turned upon me with the air of one who was master of the situation.

"Would you like to sell some of them books around here?" he asked.

I told him that I should.

"Well, you're a stranger here, ain't you?"

"Yes."

"Then don't you try it. A young fellow done this place out of more'n fifty dollars last spring, and we're kind o' careful of strangers now."

On the very first day of his journeying the professor realised the altered attitude of the world:

"There was no money in my pocket, and a most subtle and unmanly insecurity laid hold of me as a result of that. The world had curiously changed in its attitude, or rather I saw it at a new angle, and I felt the change most keenly in the bearing of people. My 'Good morning' was not infrequently met by a vacant stare, and if I stopped to ask the way, the conviction was forced upon me that, as a pack-pedlar, I was a suspicious character, with no claim upon common consideration."

Nevertheless, in the Eastern States food and rough shelter were seldom wanting. Food is cheap and abundant, and an odd job such as sawing wood usually ensured a meal. Mr. Wyckoff's first regular job was among the gang engaged to demolish the old Academic building at West Point, and here he came into close touch with the unskilled labourer, whose toil lacks dignity and inspires no interest whatever in the heart of the toiler. After shovelling débris into a cart for several days he writes:

"From work like ours there seems to us to have been eliminated every element which constitutes the nobility of labour. We feel no personal pride in its progress, and no community of interest with our employer. He plainly shares this lack of unity of interest; for he takes for granted that we are dishonest men and that we will cheat him if we can; and so he watches us through every movement, and forces us to realise that not for an hour would he entrust his interests to our hands. There is for us in our work none of the joy of responsibility, none of the sense of achievement, only the dull monotony of grinding toil, with the longing for the signal to quit work, and for our wages at the end of the week."

Such work Mr. Wyckoff thinks could be rendered more interesting if the gang were paid in proportion to the speed with which they finished their job. His next experience—as a hotel porter—showed him that work is not toilsome in proportion to its severity:

"I worked for nine hours and a quarter at West Point, and had, at the end of the day's labour, if the weather had been good, eighty-five cents above actual living expenses. Here I have usually worked from five o'clock in the morning until eleven at night, at all manner of mental drudgery, and have gone to bed in the comfortable assurance that, in addition to food and shelter, I have earned twenty-six cents and a fraction. And yet, as a matter of choice, purely with reference to the conditions under which the work is done, I should infinitely prefer a week of my present duties to a single day at such labour as that at West Point. The work here is specific, and it is mine, to be done as I best can. Responsibility and initiative and personal pride enter here, and render the eighteen hours of this work shorter than the nine hours of my last."

It is the dull monotony of the toil, which does not call forth the personality and gives no chance for individual excellence, that reduces the day-labourer to despair and finally renders him incapable of anything better. He is unconscious of the reason, and only feels the despair. But the fact was obvious enough to a man who entered their life with the trained faculty of self-analysis. Nevertheless the despair is now and again lit up by a sardonic humour. In a logging camp, where Mr. Wyckoff afterwards found himself, was a veteran—old Pete—who worked on in spite of the tortures of rheumatism.

"After the rain let up I happened to pass through the lobby as the men were starting for their work. Old Pete was the last to move. I watched him rising slowly to his feet. In spite of him, his face drew the picture of the hideous pain he bore; but through it shone the clear courage of a man, and his eyes reflected the grim humour of a thought that touched his native sense, and he smiled as he said: 'We don't have to work; we can starve.'"

Once only was the Professor drawn aside from his self-appointed task by the temptation to debauch; and then it was not a saloon that seduced him, but a public library. Arriving at Wilkesbarre on a Friday he should have at once begun looking for work. But he wandered into a public library where "perfect quiet reigned and comfortable chairs invited you to grateful ease, and shelves on shelves of books were free to your eager hand," and there he sat through the livelong day:

"Taking my hat and stick, I walked out into the gas-lit street, and into our modern world, with its artificialities and its social and labour problems; and I remember that I am a proletaire out of a job, and that, with shameless neglect of duty, I have been idling through priceless hours. Crestfallen, I hurry to my boarding-house, longing, like any conscientious-stricken inebriate, to lose remorse in sleep."

Mr. Wyckoff carefully abstains, as a rule, from propounding theories. His object in setting forth on his expedition was, we suspect, the desire of learning to feel as well as to think. His purpose in writing his experiences is to record the feelings of a theorist when brought into contact with the world of facts. And this he has done with a simplicity which has interested us hugely. We shall eagerly await the account, which will doubtless occupy a second volume, of his adventures in the big cities.

SALMON - FISHING.

The Salmon. By the Hon. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy. "Fur, Feather, and Fin Series." (Longmans, Green & Co.)

A CERTAIN library in England contains 2,707 works on Angling. This Mr. Gathorne-

Hardy knows; yet he has written another volume quite cheerfully. In writing it he seems to have been conscious of a "call" akin to that which draws a Scots minister to a fresh parish and stipends new. All keen fishermen are at one time or another subject to this impulse. That partly explains why nearly every book about angling is bad literature. If every stone-mason described his emotions on the subject of architecture, the literature of that art would necessarily be deplorable as a whole. There is, however, another reason why books about angling are usually shocking. It is that, whilst the emotions which the sport produces are glorious, the inspiration towards pen and paper which succeeds is not one easily to be woven into artistic words. It is not, for example, like the inspiration of love. Love moves men variously, and women too; and thus even a badly written love-story, if actual feeling is reflected in it, has a certain touch of art. Fishing, as they would say in the navy, is a different pair of shoes. It is almost impossible to be original about fishing. Its inspiration is the same to all men. Therefore you begin your screed with a mention of the Gargantuan breakfast which preceded the labours of the day. Then the light that never was on sea or land, or anywhere else, must needs be vindicated while you gaze upon the river as the gillie is putting your rod up. If you hook a fish, he is, of course, either "a brute of a kelt" or a "foeman worthy of your steel."

There is, we grieve to say, a good deal of this eloquence in Mr. Gathorne-Hardy's book. Nevertheless, the work deserves a welcome. It adds not a little to one's knowledge of the sport. In particular, it chronicles for the first time some great "records" in salmon fishing. One of these is so remarkable that it deserves quotation. Mr. Naylor and two friends arrived on the Grimerstra River, in the island of Lewis, at the end of July, 1888. The stream where it joins the sea was only two inches deep, and the thousands of salmon waiting to run up could not cross the bar. Mr. Naylor and his friends dammed a lake near the source of the river, and when much water had been gathered broke down the dyke, setting free an artificial flood. The fish ran up and gave very fine sport indeed.

"Two days after we let down the water," Mr. Naylor wrote to Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, "I got thirty-one in the first loch, but for the next few days the weather was bright and calm, and not many fish were got by any of us; and on August 27, the rod which fished the first loch got thirty-six. Next day I got fifty-four. The rod on that beat the following day got forty-six, and the next day I had it I got forty-five. The total take of the three rods for the six last days of August was 333 salmon and seventy-one sea-trout. All the fish were fairly caught with fly. We might have killed many more if we had all fished in the first loch each day, but we did not care to break through the rules as to the division of the beats (under which the whole of the first loch formed part of number 1 beat), consequently only one of the three rods was among the fish each day, the other two not getting many.

The average weight of the fish caught in each of these exceptional large takes was 6 lbs.

The numbers and weights for the six days were as follows:

|                | Salmon | Weight | Sea-Trout | Weight |
|----------------|--------|--------|-----------|--------|
| Naylor ... ..  | 143    | 856    | 31        | 23     |
| Hansard ... .. | 106    | 680    | 26        | 19     |
| Probyn ... ..  | 84     | 490    | 14        | 10     |
|                | 333    | 2,026  | 71        | 52     |

Mr. Naylor's individual take for nineteen days' fishing was [Mr. Gathorne-Hardy notes] 214 salmon weighing 1,307 lbs., and 304 sea-trout weighing 161 lbs. On his great day, August 28, he fished for nine hours, from 9.30 a.m. to 6.30 p.m. The largest number caught in an hour was ten, and the smallest two. When he left off there was still an hour and a half of daylight, and his gillies implored him to continue fishing. To use his own expression, he 'was tired of the slaughter,' and did not care to go on, although he has no doubt that he might have caught eight or ten more fish."

In respect to passages such as that, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy's book is valuable. Otherwise it does not add much to the average fisherman's knowledge of the art. The writer touches upon a few of the subtler problems which suggest themselves on the riverside; but he is not convincing as to any of them. He thinks that salmon are colour-blind, and that, as regards flies, size and shape are the only considerations of importance. So thought Sir Herbert Maxwell until another expert suggested that, although to a man lying on the bed of a pool a fly on the surface might be of indifferent hue, by a salmon, the eyes of that creature being more accustomed to the position, it might be accurately beheld. Then, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy thinks that, because he once caught a salmon suffering from a wound quite recently inflicted, fish are not "keenly sensible to pain." That strikes us as very feeble philosophy. If Mr. Gathorne-Hardy were slightly wounded by a cab-horse, or by a bicycle, or by a reviewer, would not a natural instinct cause him to yearn for something nourishing, or stimulating, without delay?

BRIEFER MENTION.

With Peary Near the Pole. By Eivind Astrup. (Arthur Pearson, Ltd.)

THIS is a most readable book. In a high degree it satisfies the modern man's craving to know about thinly scattered peoples who are still environed by nature, happy in their loves and outlandish mirth. Here, with Eivind Astrup, we literally hob-and-nob with the Inuits, or Esquimaux, who live on the unspeakable coasts of Northern Greenland. Mr. Astrup, a Norwegian, whose premature death two years ago is much to be lamented, accompanied Lieutenant Peary in the Kite in his expedition to North Greenland in 1891-2, and again in his second expedition in the Falcon. We soon forget how or why he went there, for Mr. Astrup seems to have shared, rather than merely watched, the life of these bear-skinned and dog-skinned hunters. We learn their names and personal traits. They are so delightfully few, moreover—these northernmost Inuits—all told. Imagine two hundred and fifty people scattered along the coast in tiny groups between Ramsgate and Scarborough—the illustration is Mr. Astrup's—and you know their numbers and distribution. And yet the women's cackle travels by dog-sledge from one end of this greasy thread of humanity to the other. It is scraps of this personal gossip that make these pages so piquant. The chapters on hunting and sledge journeys are lively; but we have often heard how the Esquimaux loves his dogs, and crawls up to a seal on his belly. It is a newer thing to have the hunting stories of living Esquimaux, like sturdy Akpallia, who has recently changed his name to Nordinger, and young Kolotengua, his pupil, who won the grace of his "long selected mother-in-law" by the way he tackled his first ice-bear. It is a fresh experience to go walrus hunting with Mr. Koshu. How well we know Koshu, as he lives at this moment, with his broad, round face that "looks as if it had been cut in wood in a great hurry by a carpenter." But here is his portrait at full length :

"When very happy he would laugh so that the corners of his mouth stretched upwards to the back of his head, at the same time closing both his eyes; when in danger of life, however, never more than one was shut. Although a thief and a liar under certain pardonable circumstances, he was, nevertheless, a thoroughly splendid man. . . . Whenever there was any fun going on amongst us white men Koshu must join in, nor was he ever absent when we were ski-running down the hills behind the house. Consequently he came by degrees a hardened and comparatively skilful runner, but he never attained elegance. He was of the broad-gauge type, and had the habit of making the most frightful grimaces directly he got up a little speed. When the pace became greater, he closed one eye—a sure sign that he considered himself in serious danger."

Then we eat narwhal with that excellent couple Ingapaddu and Ituschaksui, and their six children—"the greatest number that has been known in one family in the memory of the tribe." We gently intrude on the retiring Panipka, and repay his hospitality by answering his questions about the white man's railways. Or we smile at the conceit of Kayegvitto, who, because he is the tallest of his tribe, imagines himself its chief. "Kayegvitto—well, he is mad," we hear the gossips say; and Ekva, the acknowledged wit, clinches the verdict with a jest, until Ituschaksui's voice is heard trolling out "Tara-ra-boom-de-ay" on the four months' night. The book is a treasury of facts about this strange, moral, mirthful people.

Lines from my Log-Books. By Admiral the Right Hon. Sir John C. Dalrymple Hay, Bart. (David Douglas.)

In its own line, this record of a sailor's reminiscences would be hard to beat. A spirit of incurable optimism runs through its pages and makes it delightful reading.

The Admiral saw service in many seas, and through many years, and fought in Syria and in the Crimea, and played havoc among the junks of the Chinese pirates. There are many touches in the book which bring home to the reader, in a very vivid way, the changes which time has made in the management of the navy. Take, as an instance, this incident which occurred during a visit to Ascencion, in 1834 :

"The biscuit, baked by a contractor at the Cape of Good Hope, had been long in store and positively swarmed with weevils and maggots. None was to be obtained to replace it, and, in order to make it eatable, the bread bags filled with this biscuit were dragged out into the great square; on each bag was placed a fresh caught fish, the maggots came out of the bread into the fish, and the fish was then thrown into the sea. A fresh fish then replaced the one thrown away, until at last nothing more came out of the biscuit, when it was pronounced fit for food and served out to the squadron."

On the same cruise the men were fed upon beef which had been boiled twenty-five years before. Even after it had been cooked it required to be grated with a nutmeg grater before being eaten. Admiral Hay's services at the Admiralty are well known to all who are interested in the welfare of the navy, and his recognition of the more generous appreciation of the force which now prevails throughout the country lends the warmth of a pleasant afterglow to the sunset of his days.

A Tour Through the Famine Districts of India.
By F. H. S. Merewether.

MR. MEREWETHER travelled through India during the recent famine, contributing descriptive articles to an Indian paper. These he has incorporated in this present somewhat too bulky record of his journeys. For the work being frankly made up of one man's impressions, and not of ordered and official facts for reference, would have gained by greater brevity and, we may add, more art in the writing of it. Mr. Merewether writes in a style diffuse and almost boyish; but he really used his eyes, really amassed information; and if his book reminds one somewhat of the traditional Englishman's work on the Camel—well, it has the merits of its defects. Mr. Merewether's advice to the traveller who wishes to see the famous Taj at Agra concludes: "In this way you will carry away a mental photograph, which will remain ineffaceable upon the retina of the brain, as long as the mind retains its inner consciousness." From that kind of writing the transitions to something plain and pertinent are happily swift. Here is a good story to show the difficulty of obtaining the truth from a native by questioning. A Mahratta woman with a crowd of children was in destitution, and a certain collector, "a past master of colloquial Mahratta," wished to find out the whereabouts of her husband. The following dialogue took place :

"Collector: How long have you been on the works?"

Mahratta Lady: About two months, your honour.

Col.: Are you married?

M. L.: Yes, your highness.

Col.: Are these your children?

M. L.: Yes, lord protector of the poor.

Col.: Are you working with your husband?

M. L.: No, sahib.

Col.: Where is your husband, then?

M. L.: He is in Sholapur, your honour.

Col.: Why doesn't he come to work, then?

M. L.: He is in Sholapur, sahib.

Col.: Is he ill?

M. L.: No, your honour.

Col.: Can't he work?

M. L.: No, your mightiness, he is in Sholapur.

Col.: Can't he work.

M. L.: No, your mightiness, he is in Sholapur.

Col.: Well, where does he live?

M. L.: In Sholapur, lord protector of the poor.

Col.: Is he a weaver?

M. L.: Yes, and it pleases your honour.

Col.: Is he out of work?

M. L.: Alas! heaven-born one, yes.

Col.: Well, come now, my good woman, what is it you say—he isn't ill, is in Sholapur, can't work—what is really the matter with him?

M. L. (with a burst of tears and beating of the breast): Alas! lord protector of the poor, margya (he is dead).

Col.: God bless me, why didn't you say so before? How long has he been dead?

M. L. (with another access of grief): Nearly three years, your honour."

The book is admirably, if sometimes unpleasantly, illustrated.

A HISTORY OF NORTHUMBERLAND (Vol. IV.).
—Hexhamshire. Part II. By John Crawford Hodgson. (Newcastle: Reid & Co.)

THE Northumberland County History Committee are in the way of making a great book—great meaning large in this connexion. Here is a huge quarto taken up with the parishes of Chollerton and Thockrington, and the chapelry of Kirkheaton. If the whole county be treated in this ample manner the history is like to exceed all others of its kind in size. Yet we can scarcely wish it were less bulky, especially as no one is likely to read it through for mere pleasure, and a work intended for purposes of consultation cannot be too full. Among the items of general interest, perhaps the first place is due to the pedigrees of such county families as the Swinburnes of East and West Swinburne; it was Alan de Swinburne who, in 1274, purchased Great Heton, or Capheaton, the ancestral home of the bard of that ilk; the Riddles of Swinburne Castle, the Shaftos, Widdringtons, and so on. There are many interesting references to Lord Derwentwater's Rising, and a brief, but excellent, biography of John Patten, Curate of Allendale, its historian. Of historical contributions, the most important is the Rev. William Greenwell's able account of the battle of Hefenfelth, the supposed site of which is the subject of one of many fine illustrations. The notes to the various genealogies are literally packed with curious bits of information concerning old ways of life. Indeed, the book altogether is one full of meat for the historical novelist as well as for the antiquary and the local patriot.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE CROOK OF THE BOUGH. BY MÈNIE MURIEL DOWIE.

A new novel by the clever author of Gallia and A Girl in the Carpathians, the pages of which are cut—good omen. The story begins at an interesting point. Thus—"In a plain-looking room of a flat which formed an individual pigeon-hole in a great scarlet human dovecote off Victoria-street, a man was proposing to a girl." The Crook of the Bough is concerned mainly with the development of the character of an English girl and of a Turk—half attraction, half repulsion of Occident and Orient. From an italic note at the end, the reader gathers that The Crook of the Bough was begun at Sofia, Bulgaria, in 1895, and finished in London in 1897. (Methuen. 300 pp. 6s.)

THE DULL MISS ARCHINARD. BY ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK.

A study of the growing up and love affairs of two sisters, and of Peter Odd (was ever hero so named!), who falls in love with the "dull" Miss Archinard after he has proposed to her sister. The adjustment of matters is the story. (Heinemann. 296 pp. 6s.)

LITTLE MISS PRIM. BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

Little Miss Prim has been engaged as a lady help by Mrs. Warley; and Mrs. Penistone thinks it a rash thing to introduce an unknown young woman into the midst of a growing-up family; and Mrs. W.'s family itself—three grown-up step-children and four small boys and girls of her own—becomes restive when the governess is really found and is about to arrive. Enter Miss Prim, polite, unassuming, freckled. She proceeds to twist the Warleys round her little finger; and in doing so finds a ring on her own. (F. V. White & Co. 296 pp. 6s.)

THE MAN OF THE FAMILY. BY F. EMILY PHILLIPS.

A clever story by the author of The Education of Antonia. It tells how Sebastian Le Roux, an artist who was never likely to earn a penny, circled round the heart of Barbara Dalyell, a School Board teacher, who had brought herself into notice by her plucky behaviour during a fire which had threatened her class-room. "Ah! forgive me," she says at last—they are looking at the river from Waterloo Bridge—"I have my work, and you have yours. Let us 'study to be quiet.'" (Macmillan. 223 pp. 6s.)

THE DARK WAY OF LOVE. BY CHARLES LE GOFFIC.

The Breton story, Le Crucifié de Keraliès, done into English by Edith Wingate Rinder. A dark way indeed, for the book is full of black passions. If this is Brittany, forfend us from living among its rude and simple peasantry. (Constable & Co. 170 pp. 3s. 6d.)

A DIFFICULT MATTER. BY MRS. LOVETT-CAMERON.

"Sir Francis Deverell, of Deverell Chase, in the County of Southshire, sat motionless at his breakfast table, with his tea getting stone cold at his elbow, and his bacon and eggs untasted on the plate before him." Such is the time-honoured beginning. Naturally the trouble was a letter. The book is of the sensational-social order, worthy of the author of In a Grass Country. (John Long. 312 pp. 6s.)

CONVICT 99. BY MARIE AND ROBERT LEIGHTON.

Dedicated to Mr. A. C. Harmsworth for his "enthusiasm on behalf of those ground down beyond redemption under the iron rigour of a merciless convict system." We fancy that this exciting story ran its course in the Daily Mail as a feuilleton. Two new novels by the same authors are stated to be "in preparation." Enterprise indeed! (Grant Richards. 316 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE ADVENTURES OF A GOLDSMITH. BY M. H. BOURCHIER.

A brisk story of French intrigue and politics at the beginning of this century. Napoleon looms large therein, and that old friend of romancers, the Society of Jesus, is here in strength. The writer is the author of that clever work, The C Major of Life. (Elkin Mathews. 377 pp. 6s.)

THE STORY OF AN OCEAN TRAMP. BY CHARLES CLARK.

A thorough-going sea story, told in the first person by Jack Blunt, first mate of the Iron Age. Jack confesses he is six feet two, broad in proportion, and double-jointed; then he settles down to tell how the Iron Age went lumbering in her "Weary William style" down the Mediterranean and fell among the Riff pirates. The slow-going qualities of the vessel, and the excitability of her captain, Timothy Titus Toop, who is cursed with a liver, are a piquant sauce to the adventures related. (Downey & Co. 394 pp. 6s.)

PRISONERS OF THE SEA. BY FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY.

A romance of the seventeenth century, concerned with the Huguenots. The story professes to determine the identity of the Man with the Iron Mask. "Thar ain't no bloomin' doubt of it" does not strike one as a seventeenth century exclamation. (Ward, Lock & Co. 478 pp. 6s.)

THE DATCHET DIAMONDS. BY RICHARD MARSH.

About lost diamonds. Of two rivals in love, one steals the Duchess of Datchet's diamonds; the other reads about the robbery, and half wishes he had done it, for he has bullied Erics and lost. The two men put up at the same hotel, and the thief's portmanteau is carried by mistake into the bedroom of his rival, who gloats over brooches, tiaras, and rings worth a quarter of a million. (Ward, Lock & Co. 302 pp. 6s.)

SELAH HARRISON. BY S. MACNAUGHTEN.

When Arthur Napier returned from the South Seas he told his father about Selah Harrison, the missionary, whom he had met out there.

"'He was a brave man,' said Arthur.
'He was a young scapegrace when I knew him,' said his father.
And together they told each other the story of Selah Harrison. But the story of the miniature Arthur never told."

Thus the prologue. (Richard Bentley & Son. 328 pp. 6s.)

SIR TRISTRAM. BY THOROLD ASHLEY.

A love-story, so much is plain. But we have no table of chapters, nor chapter titles, and not a page bears a heading more informing than "Sir Tristram." But we observe that Sir Tristram and his Hylda are in the usual attitude at the end of the book. (Ward, Lock & Co. 320 pp.)

THE PHILANTHROPIST. BY LUCY MAYNARD.

This story is a delineation of life in a large Orphan Asylum, the heroine, Penrose Frere, being a governess. The author has her own views of Asylum life, and satirical touches are not wanting. "I hope, children," said the Bishop impressively, "that you are all aware of the privileges you enjoy here. When I look round on all your happy faces, I think that the future of England is safe in your hands." Miss Maynard suggests that the Asylum orphans who have helped, in a marked manner, to make England are very few indeed. The story has a strong love interest by way of relief. (Methuen. 324 pp. 6s.)

JOHN MAVERELL. BY J. DUNCAN CRAIG.

A very long story of Provençal life, culminating with the days of the Commune and conflicts in the Franco-Prussian War. The book contains ninety-one chapters, and the ninety-first is appropriately entitled "Enfin." A feature of the story is its numerous foot-notes. (Elliot Stock. 360 pp. 6s.)

THE APE, THE IDIOT, AND OTHER PEOPLE.

By W. C. MORROW.

Fourteen strong short stories or sketches with such titles as "The Inmate of the Dungeon," "The Permanent Stiletto," "Over an Absinthe Bottle," "An Original Revenge," &c. The first story tells how a convict, a man-slayer not otherwise a criminal, had for years been subjected to terrible treatment in gaol for insubordination and threatening to kill the governor. He had been falsely accused of trying to obtain two rations of tobacco, and the name of "thief" utterly demoralised him. His case is at length inquired into; and the governor, dismissed, and convinced of his long error, gives his prisoner the opportunity of carrying out his threat of murder. (Grant Richards. 330 pp. 6s.)

THE HERITAGE OF EVE.

By H. H. SPETTIGUE.

The Eve of this story is Tita Storck, the daughter of a German engineer, who came to Cornwall to develop a tin mine and study Shakespeare. The mine went to the bad, after an explosion; and Storck's Shakespearean studies resulted in little more than the bestowing on his four daughters the names Miranda, Bianca, Olivia, and Titania. Titania emerges quickly as the heroine, and like most modern heroines she begins to write. Her efforts in authorship, indeed, occupy many pages, and to literature succeeds philanthropy, and to philanthropy love. (Chatto & Windus. 372 pp. 6s.)

SIREN.

By L. T. MEADE.

This is a society story with a strong flavouring of the Russian secret police, and a tragic ending for the heroine. (L. T. Meade. 296 pp. 6s.)

BETTER LATE THAN NEVER.

By EMMA MARSHALL.

A pure love-story, and an old-fashioned. Pamela Somers sings "Yes, love can last," and is chidden for her sentimentality. Of course, it does last—despite obstacles. (Griffith, Farran & Co. 312 pp.)

THE SEA OF LOVE.

By WALTER PHELPS DODGE.

Ten short stories, not all pleasant. The first is concerned with the love of a boy of twelve for an actress, to whom he indites a childish love-letter. The actress contemplates a hoax: she will disguise her thirty years, dress as a young girl, and receive her juvenile lover for the amusement of her fellow actors and actresses. But she thinks better of it. The second story is horrible: it tells how a widower sells his first wife's grave to raise the wedding expenses of his second marriage. (John Long. 126 pp.)

REVIEWS.

The Standard Bearer. By S. R. CROCKETT.
(Methuen.)

THE great mass who are not purists in art, and who like a quickly moving story with a dash of love-making and a dash of swashing blows and a dash of picturesque scenery, might find very much worse mental fodder than Mr. Crockett's easy-going romances provide. The present specimen, for all its name and a bloodthirsty beginning, does not contain a very large proportion of actual fighting. The "Standard Bearer," Quintin MacClellan, bears a spiritual banner, the blue banner that is the sign of the Cameronian hill-folk. He has become a minister in the Established Kirk after the Revolution, but leads the protest of a small minority against the Erastian domination of the State, and is consequently expelled from his living. But Quintin's troubles with the Presbytery really play a lesser part in the book than his love affairs. There are two women in his story. One is haughty Mary Gordon, whom Quintin saved from the persecuting dragoons when both were children, and who, long wooed in vain, becomes in the end his bride. The other is Jean Gemmell, languishing and consumptive, whom Quintin, out of pity rather than love, marries on her death-bed. More attractive than either of these maidens is Alexander-Jonita Gemmell, the Amazonian breaker of horses, vigorous of speech and true of heart. Alexander-

Jonita falls to the lot of Quintin's brother, Hob, and this is an episode from the wooing:

"Will you let me be your friend?" I said, impulsively taking her hand.

"I do not know," said Alexander-Jonita; "I will tell you in the morning. It is over-dark to-night to see your eyes."

"Can you not believe in me?" said I. "Have you ever heard that I thus offered friendship to any other maid in all the parish?"

"You might have offered it to twenty, and they taken it every one, for aught I care. But Alexander-Jonita Gemmell accepts no man's friendship till she has tried him as a fighter tries a sword."

"Then try me, Jonita! Try me and prove me?" I cried eagerly.

"I will," said she promptly. "Rise this instant from the place where you sit, look not upon me, touch me not, say neither good-e'en nor yet good-day, but take the straight road and the ready over the hill to the manse of Balmaghie."

The words were scarce out of her mouth when, with a leap so quick that the colliers had not even time to rise, I was over the dyke and striding across the moss and whinstone-crag towards the house by the water-side, where my brother's light had long been burning as he sat over his books.

I did not so much as look about me till I was on the heathery crest of the hill. Then for a single moment I stood looking back into the clear grey bath of night behind me, where the lass I loved was keeping her watch in the lonely sheepfold.

Yet I was pleased with myself too. For though my dismissal had been some deal swift and unexpected, I felt assured that I had not done by any means badly for myself.

At least I could call Alexander-Jonita my friend. And there was never a lad upon all the hills of heather that could do so much."

Mr. Crockett has not chosen a very ambitious theme in The Standard Bearer or handled it with very great elaboration. But the book is written easily and fluently, and there is a wholesome out-door tone about it. The thread of the story, too, is better kept than in some earlier writings, which have irritated us by their devious and episodic course.

* * * *

The Potentate. By Frances Forbes Robertson.
(Constable & Co.)

THE telling of this story of Everard Val Dernement (who is not the Potentate, but the Potentate's victim) would seem to be the result of a study of the style of George Meredith, and the open manner of Maeterlinck. Everard Val Dernement was a count, with features chiselled as a young Greek's, eyes with a wistful look in them, and flaxen curls that fell about his shoulders like any pretty maid's. But "where the bully thought to find a likely prey for jesting at, he must, on the contrary, have discovered a veritable wight for the breaking of bones." Such was Everard; and, "across the centuries the fragrance of the man's sweet life reaches us, and the story of his death, with his child-son's untimely knowledge of it, stand out among the countless tragedies that colour our chronicles of the Middle Ages." The Potentate is the Duke of Bresali; and this is the kind of place Bresali was, and the manner of its wit:

"In Bresali shapes were mostly crooked. The hearts of men seemed awry, however fair were their outward bodies, for an evil man governed, and evil governing, as the wise know, maketh the governed evil. The root of the matter is in the head, quoth a wag, and spoke something of the truth, which perhaps dawned on the minds of his listeners—made their fingers itch to be at that head. Indeed, we read of one among them remarking, 'They grow too thick; at the falling of one up sprouts another, and who is to know it would not be even an uglier one?'"

Everard Val Dernement was a good man, therefore he was done to death by the wicked Duke, and his head was set to "decorate the city gate," where his youthful son discovered it. The mother of the young Everard implanted in the young heart of him, and cultivated there a deeply rooted desire for revenge; and on the night of his coming of age there came to him one whose "strange eyes seemed to peer at him from across the long years of his life, paralysing the consciousness of the present, and dragging him back into a real and living past." This gentleman with the "strange eyes" is one whom Everard had formerly seen, seen at the moment when he had discovered the bodiless and bloody head of his father on the city gate. He has come now to intimate to Everard that the opportunity for his revenge is at hand, may be seized that very night. The man who destroyed his father is on the point of betraying "five hot-headed youths" to the wicked

Duke. At a certain hour he will be alone, writing their names on a parchment, which parchment will reach the Duke the next morning, unless—

“Go on.”
 ‘None entering his room—’
 ‘Well?’ persisted the boy.
 ‘He is old.’
 ‘But he betrays men for money.’
 ‘And women,’ said the stranger.
 ‘Not women?’
 ‘His hair is white.’
 ‘Surely not women?’ repeated Everard.
 ‘And he is feeble.’
 ‘Surely not women?’
 ‘Women; and he betrayed your father.’
 Everard turned pale, and clutched his dagger.
 ‘I will kill him,’ he said. . . . .”

And he did; and thereafter fled and fought in the wars of “the Emperor,” was wounded and fell in love with a lovely, learned, and noble lady who is about to take the vows of a religious life. Business—the business of the story—takes them both to the court of the wicked Duke, who also falls in love with the lovely and learned, the about-to-be religious, lady; and there the crisis and dénouement arrive with a rebellion of the people. Such is the story of The Potentate, which has a weird semblance to the truth of life, without being actually true; but it has points of cleverness, and points of understanding.

* * * *

King Circumstance. By Edwin Pugh. (Heinemann.)

THE author of A Street in Suburbia and A Man of Straw is recognised as a promising writer; and if this volume of short stories carries him no further on his way, at least it tends to confirm the esteem in which he is widely held. It probably represents the occasional output of some few years, and in the case of one story, at least, we are able to apply the test of time. “The Martyrdom of the Mouse” the present writer lighted upon a long while ago; and the horror of the tale as it then curdled the blood was renewed upon the moment that we opened this volume. It has its faults; the boy victim, for instance, is too like a girl, and his piety is strong of the Methodist Sunday School; but the horrid chill of the damp barn where the three outcasts foregathered, and in contrast with it the lurid atmosphere of the story as one wretch tells it—the story of the gin-sodden years spent by him naked, sweating, in the coal-hole, feeding the demon of the furnace, of the interlude of sanity under the influence of the child and the child’s mother, and the hideous, wanton crime that is the catastrophe—stamp an impression (experience proves) not soon to be effaced. Not that we are always in an atmosphere of horror. “The Undoing of Matty White,” “Crazy Madge,” “The Inevitable Thing,” and “The First Stone” are an appeal for rebellious indignation; “The Watchmaker” and “Blind Peter”—neither of them in the first flight—move towards a tearful joy. Purely pathetic—and perhaps the most distinguished of these by blows—is “The Poor Idealist”; who dreams luxurious dreams of a world converted group by group to the Gospel of Love, while the blowsy waitress amuses the coffee-house customers by flooding his hat-brim with slops. “Bettles” is a clever study of the fighting cockney; and in “The Anterior Time” is exploited a new realm of romantic comedy—the Board-school playground. From this last we submit the following excerpt:

“My sister said, when I told her what had happened: ‘Why don’t yer ‘ave little Nina?’”

Insensibly I found the idea gaining possession of me. . . .
 That night I waited for her outside her door, and when she came out to get the supper-beer I accosted her.
 She thought I was going to play some practical joke on her.
 ‘If you touch me I’ll go straight and tell yer mother,’ she said. . . .
 ‘I ain’t a-go’in’ to touch you,’ I said.
 ‘Well, go away, then,’ she exclaimed, shrinking against the wall and drawing up one leg.
 I said no more, but handed her the letter I had originally prepared for Mary. I had scratched out ‘Mary’ and substituted ‘Nina.’ She took the letter, and ran away.
 On the following day our engagement was formally announced.

But I was not happy. Nina was an awkward girl to love. It was impossible to kiss her without her consent, because she was so tall and stiff. If I put my arm round her waist, she invariably put it away, saying I made her hot. If I pressed her hand, she told me to mind her ‘gathered finger.’ She was an impossible girl altogether. So that I was not sorry when she discovered that she no longer loved me.”

Two touches here—the gathered-up leg and the gathered finger—are evidence of a talent for observation. In his lighter vein, as in his moods of indignation and rebellion, Mr. Pugh is a realist of the best stamp: he makes no effort to take us out of our world of moderate quality into a shadow realm of excellence; but, on the other hand, he sees—and can show forth—the humour, the pathos, and the tenderness that abide in Things as they Are.

MR. G. W. CABLE IN LONDON.

AN INTERVIEW.

THE British Weekly, with characteristic promptitude, has interviewed Mr. G. W. Cable, who is at present staying with Mr. J. M. Barrie in Kensington. Mr. Cable is known to English readers as the writer of that masterpiece, Old Creole Days, published when he was thirty-five, and other stories of creoles and negro life. This is Mr. Cable’s first visit to London:

“Had you ever crossed the Atlantic before?” asked the interviewer.

“No,” said Mr. Cable; “this is my first stay of any length in a foreign country. I ought not, however, to say foreign in speaking of England, for I find this country very homelike, and seem to be constantly meeting my own people. London is very charming—such a delightful confirmation of a lifetime of reading and pictorial illustration. The pictures seem to have come out of the books, although magnified to life-size.”

“You propose, I think, to give some readings in England?”

“Yes,” said Mr. Cable, “at the suggestion of English friends, I have come over at last, after many years of delay, during which I put off the idea. In America I have been in the habit of giving readings to public audiences. The old entertainment of elocutionary reading by professional elocutionists has long since quite gone out of fashion, but there is still a very strong interest in hearing and seeing authors render their own pages by word of mouth. That kind of entertainment is common all over the States from Maine to Mexico, where the population is not too sparse to maintain it.”

“What passages from your books do you find most popular in America?”

“It is rather difficult to give an accurate reply to that question. My sustained novels seem to be all about equally favoured, but among my shorter stories ‘Parson Jones’ is perhaps the one which audiences most like to hear. Along with ‘Parson Jones’ I may mention ‘The Story of Madame Delphine,’ and the middle story in the trilogy of ‘Bonaventure,’ entitled ‘Grand Point.’ These are beyond doubt the most popular single passages. Then I choose pieces from two or three of my novels, always confining myself to one book or story, and reading passages selected for their literary and dramatic quality, but at the same time making the story plain to the hearers.”

“Do you ever read a whole story at once?”

“Sometimes, as in the case of ‘Grand Point’ and ‘Parson Jones’ the latter is really almost a play.”

“Do your audiences in America consist chiefly of the richer and more cultured classes?”

“There is a system of lyceums all over the country,” said Mr. Cable. “These provide a series of entertainments lasting over the season, to which admission is by course-ticket. People of every social rank attend these entertainments, and the audiences are as varied as those of a theatre.”

“And how about the creole songs, Mr. Cable?”

“Well, many years ago, when I discovered that these Folk-songs of the slaves of former Louisiana creoles had a great charm of their own, and were preserved by tradition only, I was induced to gather them and reduce them to notation. I found that others were so strongly interested in the songs that, without pretending to any musical authority or original charm of voice, I was tempted to sing one or two of them before public audiences. The first time I did so was in Boston, and since then I have rarely been allowed to leave them out of my entertainment when the length of my literary programme left room for them."

"What of your present literary work, Mr. Cable? Shall you be making any progress with that in London?"

"Certainly," said Mr. Cable, "in fact, one thing that has brought me over besides my lifelong desire to see the mother country of our own great nation and the home of our language and literature, is the hope that by taking my days very quietly and in much retirement, I may carry on at a moderate pace my present literary work even here. So I have brought my knitting with me. It is a novel based upon my experience as a cavalry soldier in the American Civil War."

"Have you fixed on the name?"

"I never succeed in naming a story till I have finished it. I name it to myself a dozen times, but these names are mere scaffolding, and the real task and agony of getting the right name is one of the finishing touches. I have another story, by the way, in the hands of Scribner's Magazine which is now awaiting publication. It is called The Entomologist, and the scene is laid in New Orleans during the great epidemic of 1878."

Mr. Cable lived in New Orleans through that terrible time, and had many strange experiences in nursing the sick.

THE OLD PUBLISHERS AND THE NEW.

"I AM interested in the announcement," writes Mr. Shorter in the Illustrated London News, "that Mr. Grant Richards is proposing to publish the five principal novels of Jane Austen in ten volumes, uniform with the Edinburgh Stevenson. Lady Susan and The Watsons are still the copyright of Messrs. Bentley, having been first published through the intervention of Mr. Austen Leigh, the novelist's nephew.

It is not too much to say that the Edinburgh Stevenson is an absolute ideal, which publishers may take to guide them when they are anxious to produce really handsome books. In this respect it is curious how, for the most part, the older firms of publishers have separated themselves from the younger men, so far as concerns the mechanical production of books. I do not think, indeed, that these younger publishers will ever make anything like the same amount of money that their elder brethren have secured. The town house and the country house and the carriage are not, so far as I have observed, the good fortune of any of the men who have entered the publishing business within the last dozen years or so. This does not alter the fact that the new publishers are producing books artistically, and that the old publishers have never shown much capacity for so doing. I doubt if any publisher nowadays could make the colossal profits of the older houses. These latter initiated great school-book projects, for which they paid, in many cases, a comparatively small sum, and out of which they have steadily drawn thousands from year to year. Some of them purchased novels for anything from fifty to five hundred pounds, and made five thousand out of the transaction. Sir Walter Besant and the Society of Authors, plus the literary agent, have made that kind of thing impossible, and one popular novelist, to my knowledge, proposes to obtain seven thousand pounds down from a publisher before a single copy of the writer's next book is sold.

None the less I must return to my main point, which is one of serious indictment of the older firms of publishers. Their business capacity, from the point of view of producing good books, has never been greater than it is to-day. In looking down the new lists of Longmans and Murray, of Smith & Elder, and of Bentley, I find that they still contain new works equal or superior to those of any of their rivals; but when I come to place these same books side by side with those of the newer and younger firms, from the point of view of paper, of binding, and of printing, I am bound to recognise that the books of the older firms are completely out of court. This new movement in good printing commenced, if I am not mistaken, with the Riverside Press, at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and with the press of Messrs. R. and R. Clark, of Edinburgh, who are responsible for the bulk of the books issued by the Macmillans. Since then two or three firms have obtained distinction, notably Constables, of Edinburgh, and the Ballantyne Press, and both these firms really understand in a remarkable way that printing may still be a fine art among us.

As an example of what I mean, let me take the new Byron, issued by Mr. John Murray. Here is a book in which I am quite sure that expense was not considered, and in which the publisher would probably, had the taste been his, as readily have gone to one firm of printers as to another. The result is a distinctly ugly book, judged from the point of view of the bibliophile. I do not say that it will not sell just as well as if it had been produced under the careful guidance of Mr. Blaikie, of Constables, or after careful consultation with Mr. Arthur Humphreys, who has shown by his editions of Marcus Aurelius and Epictetus that he knows how a good book should be produced. The fact remains that the new Byron—whatever may be its merits as the final and complete issue of the poet's works—is a distinctly ugly book, that its type is comparatively poor and old-fashioned, that its headlines altogether lack the balance and taste which should be given to so important and so distinctive a book, and you may even see the type through the all-too-transparent paper. The large-paper edition, I may add, which lends itself peculiarly to the zeal of the enthusiast in these matters, provides a far less pleasing page than the smaller edition. As a matter of fact, until the recent revival of printing, there had been for well-nigh half a century a tremendous lack of artistic taste in the production of books. To contrast the Aldine poets as issued by Pickering with the Aldine poets issued by Bell & Son would seem to indicate retrogression indeed. Another and still older firm than Mr. Murray's I am tempted to indict in this connection. Messrs. Longmans, with perhaps the most magnificent catalogue of any firm of publishers in England, with many of the most famous writers in history, in theology, and in criticism, that our modern literature has seen, produce these authors in a manner altogether unworthy of the reputation of the books or of their publishers. You may buy Newman's Apologia uniform with a novel by Mr. Rider Haggard, and both of them bound in a way which the slightest examination of Messrs. Methuen's six-shilling novels should make quite impossible. Take Thackeray again. Until the new biographical edition, it is not too much to say that, with the exception of the first edition of Esmond, Messrs. Smith & Elder have never issued, during the forty and more years that they have published Thackeray's works, a single really well-printed and well-prepared volume of the great novelist, always excepting that fine edition of Esmond in three volumes, which was, I admit, a pretty book. Sometimes the binding was wrong, sometimes the paper, and sometimes the printing. The same criticism applies, until Mr. Oswald Craufurd recently took the books in hand, to Messrs. Chapman & Hall's various issues of the works of Carlyle and Dickens—ugly books, all of them, as a bibliophile views them."

M. JULES VERNE AT HOME.

THE celebrity at home in the World this week is M. Jules Verne, in the Rue Charles-Dubois, Amiens. "It is doubtful," remarks the writer of this interesting interview, "whether, among the countless English admirers of M. Jules Verne, there are any of the many who pass through Amiens en route to Paris, or further on, who have the least notion that the windows of his residence 'give' upon the cutting between two tunnels through which the line from Calais and Boulogne runs into the station, and that if they looked up to the left they might very possibly see in the flesh the author who has delighted them with his tales of wonder.

M. Jules Verne's library, with his study leading out of it, is on the second floor of his house, and it is in these two rooms, both facing the railway, that he has the most to show his visitors. Not that there is much in the study itself, where M. Jules Verne has a bed placed so that he may rest during the intervals of work, with an electric bell and speaking tube at the side; while a rack of clay pipes and a box of cigars from Havana, named after one of his novels, testify to his partiality for tobacco—though, strangely enough, he only smokes in the summer. The place of honour in the library is accorded to a head of Hetzel, the publisher who has brought out all the books of which M. Jules Verne is the author; and the shelves contain many interesting volumes, among them being an Arabic translation of the journey to The Centre of the Earth. M. Jules Verne also has a good collection of Dickens's works, which, he assures you, never pall upon him, and he speaks with unfeigned admiration of that inimitable genius.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1898.

No. 1357, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .               | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom. . . . .                | 0 15 3  | 0 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W. C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THERE has been some talk of the effect of the War on publishing and bookselling. The effect has, so far, been unimportant. Certain publishing houses which export books to America have had orders postponed or cancelled. No doubt, too, some publishers have been discouraged from issuing books by a well-grounded fear that the American sales would be small. But the notion that during war-time neutral peoples read newspapers instead of books is discounted by a high authority in the book trade. This gentleman perfectly recollects that even the Franco-German War had no disastrous effect in diverting the public from books. The book-reading public is a definite and constant body, and is not much affected by the excitement of war news. War multiplies newspaper readers, but does not subtract from book readers, except in the belligerent countries. More newspapers are bought, but they are quickly thrown aside. The thousands of newspapers left in the London morning trains show this.

PUBLISHING would be quiet just now in any case, for the spring publishing season grows less active every year. Therefore, from the bookselling point of view, the present is a convenient time for a war to be in progress. If the war should seriously affect English books, it will be through the publishers rather than through the public. Our publishers are becoming more and more enamoured of, and dependent on, their "American sales," and therefore, if the war should hang on till the autumn, and then produce agitating events, the American market will be spoiled.

THE demand for books at Mudie's is not less than usual. Books on Cuba (few in number) are asked for. They include

Mr. Richard Harding Davis's Cuba in War Time and Mr. J. H. Bloomfield's A Cuban Expedition. The latter work was published some years ago, but is likely to be issued in a new edition. As a result of the war, maps and atlases are selling well. People want to know where Tampa is, and Matanzas.

WE observe that Sir Walter Besant confirms the foregoing views in some notes in the Author. Sir Walter's conviction is that the war excitement will not stop people reading books. Under its awakening influence the emotions will be stirred and will seek literary satisfaction. He reminds us that it was in the war-vexed years, 1793-1814, that Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, Byron, Scott, Rogers, Landor, Shelley, Godwin, and many others rose in their might.

WHEREAS—continues Sir Walter :

"The most dead, dull, and dejected time in the whole history of English literature was that of the early Thirties—a period of profound peace. At one time, I believe in the autumn of 1832, there were hardly any books published at all. It was at that time, I believe, that the world finally rebelled against the rubbish that was forced upon the book clubs as fiction and poetry. The society novel fell never to be revived; the tales in verse fell; and the book clubs fell, to be revived, perhaps. They broke up, and their place has never since been filled up. I remark, again, that this was, after many years, a time of profound peace."

MR. ANSTEY has just finished a new humorous story about the length of The Tinted Venus. The scene is laid in London, and the tale bears the admirable title, Love Among The Lions.

THE professional critic is always with us, and if at times his judgments are apt to be hard-featured and lacking in spontaneity, the excuse must be that he is a professional critic, and consequently something of a critical machine. What the amateur critic lacks in judgment he gains in freshness, and he speaks from the heart rather than from the brain. So we make no apology for printing the following extract from a private letter on Mr. Le Gallienne's Romance of Zion Chapel, by an unprofessional critic, which has come into our hands.

"To me it is far away the truest thing he has written, and the most beautiful, allowing, of course, for all exaggerations and ultra-sentimentalism. All except the end—which to my mind is quite wrong in every way, and a vexatious blot upon a lovely book. But the subtle presentment of the mutual and inclusive love of the three, and its perfect possibility on the spiritual plane, spite of its impossibility on the earthly, is true, though so easily jeered at by the Referee. Then (the crowning wonder of the book) the long-drawn-out analysis of the effect of the successive stages of bereavement on a supersensitive nature came home to me as nothing of the kind has ever done. It must have been written from the heart, and its reality is the secret of its power. I felt like wanting to say to R. Le Gallienne, 'Thank you, thank you, for putting it into words.' By the by, why is it such a strange delight to have one's own experience translated thus by a stranger?"

THE Newdigate prize of £20 for an English poem has been won by Mr. John Buchan, Hulme Exhibitioner of Brasenose College. Mr. Buchan is already launched in authorship. His Scholar Gypsies was a very promising book. A more sustained effort is his story, "John Barnet of Barns," now running in Chambers's Journal. Mr. Buchan is a frequent contributor to the ACADEMY.

"NOTWITHSTANDING the enemies he has made," says the New York Critic, "M. Zola's Paris is said to have sold 125,000 copies." Why "notwithstanding"? The friends of an author rarely buy his books. This also is vanity.

THE same paper says it has begun to suffer from the war with Spain. A series of articles on "Authors at Home," by Mr. Richard Harding Davis, has had to be postponed. The fact is, the authors are not at home; they are en route for Cuba to find copy.

To-Day, which, under Mr. Barry Pain's energetic editorship, quite maintains its traditions of popularity and humour, has made a new departure in the issue of a supplement which will probably go down to posterity as the last portrait of Mr. Gladstone. Drawn by Mr. Forrest who in this instance has pushed his ingenious and effective convention to the furthest, it shows the old man—his face intent as of yore, but now ashen and sunken—huddled in his black coat on a Sunday afternoon in St. Swithin's Church, Bournemouth. Mrs. Gladstone kneels by his side, and beyond are the faces of other worshippers peering from the massed blacks. A curious picture! Looking upon it one feels at first something like dislike, then something like fascination. Besides his editorial duties, Mr. Barry Pain has found leisure to prepare three books for the press, all of which will be issued this year. They are Wilmy, and other Stories, being studies of women; The Tompkins Verses, with a preface wherein Tompkins will have something to say about his method of spelling Cockney dialect; and The Real History of Robin Hood.

GAELIC redivivus! There will be a boom presently in Gaelic dictionaries. General Chapman, commanding the forces in Scotland, has been impressing upon militia sergeants in the North the desirability of becoming acquainted with Gaelic. At Inverness he offered to provide a Gaelic Dictionary for the use of the sergeants, and so stimulated their enthusiasm that a class is to be started forthwith for the study of the "Paradisaical" tongue.

THAT it should have fallen to the late Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh to pen an appreciative monograph on David Hume is a curious illustration of the irony of fate. For it was Edinburgh University which declined the services of Hume as a teacher; and, moreover, the late Prof. Henry Calderwood, whose posthumous volume on Hume was published the other day, was reckoned, and justly reckoned, as perhaps the most orthodox exponent of moral philosophy who has occupied a Scottish chair for the past half century. Prof. Calderwood, who was a Dissenter, was one of the leaders of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and in theology was regarded as belonging to the Evangelical school. He was much less narrow, however, than many of the clerics of that school, and it is significant of his breadth and of his charity that he was able to write sympathetically and appreciatively of the "infidel" and "arch-sceptic" of last century.

WE like the dedication in Brevet-Lieut.-Col. Alderson's With the Mounted Infantry and the Mashonaland Field Force. It is the sort of dedication a soldier should pen:

"To my father, who taught me that which, during my nineteen years' soldiering, I have found of more value than anything I ever learnt—namely, to ride—this book is affectionately dedicated."

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS's lines on Omar Kháyyám, spoken by him at the Omar Club dinner last week, were as follows:

"Omar, when it was time for thee to die,
Thou saidst to those around thee, Let me lie
Where the North wind may scatter on my grave Roses; and now thou hast what thou didst crave,
Since from the Northern shore the Northern blast
Roses each year upon thy tomb hath cast.
Thy more familiar comrades, who have sped
Many a health to thee, send roses red.
We are but guests unto the tavern brought,
And have a flower the paler for that thought;
Yet is our love so rich that roses white
Shall fall empurpled on thy tomb to-night."

IN the Century for May is a letter from Mrs. Arnold Toynbee, concerning her late husband's connexion with the famous road-making experiment at Oxford:

"It is, I believe, quite correct to say that he acted as foreman over the work of Ruskin's road-making; he told me so himself, but I cannot inform you whether he was foreman for the whole time or only for a part. He mentioned to me that it was very nice to be foreman, because he went, in consequence, every time to breakfast with Ruskin, when the workers were invited, and not only in turn, as the others did. He was appointed foreman, I believe, because he was scarcely strong enough to do much of the hard work himself, and also because he was always good at leading men. His own opinion about the road-making was that, though, of course, it was impossible not to smile at it, yet it was not a bad thing altogether. The idea was to do a piece of work that was useful to the working people living in houses near the bit of road, and a piece of work that was not being taken up by anyone else, either public or private; also that it might give the idea of athletes using their muscles for some useful purpose. Of course, the thing after a time became a joke."

UNDER the title of "A Record of Art in 1898" three fully illustrated extra numbers of The Studio are being issued containing descriptive summaries of the work completed during the past twelve months in Great Britain and France. The first part is excellent in every way. The selection has been made with more care than is usual with such publications, the printing is good, and the letterpress notes are to the point. Much of the work reproduced will necessarily be selected from what has been exhibited during the year, but many things will also be included which come direct from the artists' studios, and have not yet been submitted to public inspection. In this way a wider view of the art of the present day will be given than would be possible if the publication of only such examples as are to be found in one particular gallery were preferred.

MR. W. H. HUDSON, whose Birds in London is published this week, may claim to be the poet of the London sparrow as well as one of its keenest observers. He once contributed a long and pleasant apostrophe to a town sparrow to Merry England. The poem we refer to was in blank verse, and ran to about a hundred and fifty lines. We quote a few of these:

"Never a morning comes but I do bless thee,
Thou brave and faithful sparrow, living link
That binds us to the immemorial past;
O blithe heart in a house so melancholy,
And keeper for a thousand gloomy years
Of many a gay tradition; heritor
Of Nature's ancient cheerfulness, for thee
'Tis ever Merry England! Never yet
In thy compauionship of centuries,
With man in lurid London, didst regret
Thy valiant choice;—yea, even from the time
When all its low-roofed rooms were sweet with scents
From summer fields, where shouting children plucked
The floating lily from the reedy Fleet,
Scaring away the timid water-hen."

THERE are some enterprises of which one heartily disapproves, however good a motive underlies them; and one of these is the attempt to rewrite the Bible. This week we have received an attempt to reform the Book of Job. Mr. Howard Swan is its author; and he prefixes a long explanation of his method to his version. We cannot attempt to summarise the qualifications which Mr. Swan thinks he has for re-translating Job; but one of them appears to be the "Inner Light" as understood by the Society of Friends. What we can do is to give short parallel passages from the Swan and the old version:

MR. HOWARD SWAN.

"Hast thou given the horse his might?
Hast thou clothed his neck with the tossing mane?"

Hast thou made him leap like a locust? The glory of his snorting is terrible;

He paws the ground, and rejoices in all his strength; he paces forth to meet the armed soldiers.

He mocks at fear, and little is he dismayed; nor turns he back from the sword,

The flashing spear, or the javelin."

THE BIBLE.

"Hast thou given the horse strength?
hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?"

Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? the glory of his nostrils is terrible.

He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men.

He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword.

The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield."

Harper's Round Table, the newest juvenile magazine, comes out in an improved form in its seventh number. The cover is more attractive, and the headings more decorative. Mr. Marriott-Watson's story, The Adventurers, reaches its ninth and tenth chapters.

THE quaintest of new journals is The Eagle and the Serpent, a little threepenny monthly "dedicated to the philosophy of Nietzsche, Emerson, Stirner, Thoreau, and Goethe." It is written in an assertive, dishevelled style, with maxims and declarations studded about it in capital letters. "Altruism—that is the Enemy" is its cry, and it waves the banner of Egoism from a window in Fleet-street. The following announcement will bear quoting:

"An apology is due to our patrons for our delay in saving the world. 'Slow but sure' is our motto in everything. Our intention is to publish The Eagle and the Serpent as a bi-monthly through the year 1898, as a monthly through 1899, as a weekly in 1900, as a daily in —. If the demand should justify the step, we would make the journal a monthly or weekly from the start. And we may here note that effectual demand spells 'cash,' or as our printer hath it, 'An ounce of cash is worth a ton of talk.' Barring the improbable, our second issue will appear March 15, but we trust that our readers will be prepared to allow two or three weeks' grace."

The April number of the Eagle and the Serpent has since appeared. In it we learn that the demand for salvation by Egoism has been "fairly encouraging." The Eagle and the Serpent will not embrace each other again until June.

THAT portly, utilitarian annual, the Annual Register, arrives once more in its customary dress, a dress that has altered little in the last one hundred and forty years. We suppose that few people remember that the Annual Register was originally planned, and largely written, by Edmund Burke. Its first number appeared in 1754. Burke was then a young politician, and there can be no doubt that his work on the Register enlarged his grasp of affairs.

MESSRS. LAWRENCE & BULEN, the publishers of the excellent Encyclopedia of Sport, issue their May part within black borders, in respect to the memory of the Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire, who had edited the work from the first. An article by the late Earl on "Shooting" will appear in the June part of the Encyclopedia.

A GOSSIPY, critical account of American authorship of to-day appears in The Windsor Magazine from the pen of Mr. James Ramsay. This airy gentleman's article amounts to this:

1. Emerson, Hawthorn, and Thoreau are dead.

2. Mr. T. R. Aldrich is America's leading poet, but he will rhyme "morn" with "gone."

3. Mark Twain's work is grown old, and himself is in Europe.

4. The humour of "John Phoenix" ("This yer Smiley's yeller, one-eyed, banana-tailed cow," &c.) is also old, and too calm for these wakeful days.

5. Mr. Frank R. Stockton dispenses laughter from Morristown. He is sixty years of age, and writes slowly, "waiting an hour for a word."

6. Mr. W. D. Howells leads in fiction. He now etches his books in New York instead of Boston. "His thick, solid, yet genial face is an appropriate mask from which a hive of Quakers and Abolitionists look out upon the world of to-day."

7. Mr. Francis Hopkinson Smith is a first-rate globe-trotting author; he is the worthiest representative of American curiosity.

8. Miss Mary Wilkins and Miss Sarah Orne Jewett are the kail-yard women of these States. Miss Wilkins's favourite book is Les Misérables; and the busier Miss Jewett gets, the more time she finds to read the Waverley novels.

9. Mr. Thomas Nelson Page is the vindicator of the old South, and his Marse Chan made Henry Ward Beecher cry like a child.

10. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell is in danger of founding a great school of American historical romance.

11. Emerson, Hawthorn, and Thoreau are dead."

The Council of the Royal Irish Academy have appointed Mr. Edward J. Gwynn, Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, to the office of Todd Professor of the Celtic Languages, for a period of three years.

The Royal Academy does not contain many portraits of men of letters. Two come, however, from Mr. Herkomer's brush, a very lively portrait of Mr. Herbert Spencer, and a presentment of Mr. Money Coutts, the poet. To the Saturday Review Mr. Money Coutts contributes the following lines, which he calls "The Inquest." Our contemporary, by the by, has lately taken to giving their poets large and displayed type:

"Not labour kills us; no, nor joy:

The incredulity and frown,

The interference and annoy,

The small attritions wear us down.

The little gnat-like buzzings shrill,

The hurdy-gurdies of the street,

The common curses of the will—

These wrap the cerements round our feet.

And more than all, the look askance

Of loving souls that cannot gauge

The numbing touch of circumstance,

The heavy toll of heritage.

It is not Death, but Life that slays:

The night less mountainously lies

Upon our lids, than foolish day's Importunate fatalities!"

A propos of Mr. Herkomer's portrait of Mr. Herbert Spencer, the following excerpts have an historical, if not an artistic, interest. The Times, reviewing the Royal Academy exhibition, spoke thus of this portrait:

"Mr. Herkomer has not been quite so happy in his portraits as in his subject picture; but perhaps it is hardly his fault if that which ought to have been a masterpiece—the portrait of Mr. Herbert Spencer, to be given to the nation by the subscribers—is very much the reverse. The story of this picture has been more than once told in these columns; a number of very eminent people subscribed for it; it is to be hung in the Tate Gallery during Mr. Spencer's lifetime, and is afterwards to pass to the National Portrait Gallery, as the permanent memorial of one of the great English philologists of our time. But philosophers have their peculiarities. According to the poet, none of them can 'abide the toothache patiently'; and if Shakespeare had known Mr. Herbert Spencer he would have added that one of them cannot abide the sight of a portrait painter. To get proper sittings from him was an impossibility; neither the wishes of illustrious admirers nor thoughts of posthumous fame nor any similar consideration had any effect whatever, and Mr. Herkomer, we believe, had to be content with a few moments at such casual intervals as the moods of the sitter might permit. No portrait so painted could be satisfactory, as the Hanging Committee seem to have thought when they put the picture where few people will notice it."

Which drew this explanation from Mr. Herbert Spencer:

"Your art critic has been misled by a rumour. Not reluctance to sit, nor impatience, caused the difficulty, but mere inability. Nearly the whole of last year, save an interval in the country and the few succeeding days in London, during which arrangements could not be made, my ill-health was such that maintenance of a fit attitude for the needful time was impracticable. At length, in despair, Mr. Herkomer came to me at Brighton (where he had another engagement) and took photographs of me on the sofa, and these, joined with a slight water-colour sketch made to recall the colours, served him for materials. Of course, more than any one else I regret that this had to be done."

MR. ASQUITH has been given a fine choice of criticisms on his address to the University Extension students. For example, the views expressed by the Spectator, the Saturday Review, and the Speaker may be described as being, respectively, enthusiastic, sarcastic, and elastic. The Spectator says:

"The address on criticism delivered by Mr. Asquith to the University Extension students last Saturday was, from every point of view, an excellent piece of work. It was as clear in manner as it was sensible and sound in matter."

The Saturday Review says:

"Did Mr. Asquith really suppose that he had anything to say about Criticism that had not often been said far better than he could say it? And did he suppose that, by telling the students, in his peroration, that 'however much they did for the extension of the boundaries of knowledge, or for the widening of common enjoyment, there still lay before them that unknown world whose margin faded away in the distance for ever and ever—(loud cheers)'—he was making exposition of anything but the barrenness of his own mind and the commonness of his own style?"

The Speaker says:

"Mr. Asquith delivered a very pleasant and entertaining address at the Mansion House last Saturday afternoon on the subject of 'Criticism.' Although there might not be anything very novel in his views, they were undeniably sound, and were illustrated by many anecdotes drawn from the history of letters."

MR. SHAW is now answering his critics. The suggestion that he owes much to Ibsen and De Maupassant (some say one, some say the other) has drawn from him a long letter to the Daily Chronicle. In it he sketches the sanitary condition of St. Pancras and the war between America and Spain, then swiftly remarks: "If a dramatist living in a world like this has to go to books for his ideas and his inspiration, he must be both blind and deaf. Most dramatists are." But the interesting part of the letter is Mr. Shaw's circumstantial account of the derivation of his most noteworthy "unpleasant" play, "Mrs. Warren's Profession." It was founded on a character in a French novel, the plot of which Miss Janet Achurch gave to Mr. Shaw in conversation, his comment at the time being: "Oh, I will work out the real truth about that mother some day." As for her daughter Vivie:

"In the following autumn I was the guest of a lady of very distinguished ability—one whose knowledge of English social types is as remarkable as her command of industrial and political questions. She suggested that I should put on the stage a real modern lady of the governing class—not the sort of thing that theatrical and critical authorities imagine such a lady to be. I did so, and the result was Miss Vivie Warren, who has laid the intellect of Mr. William Archer in ruins. . . . I never dreamt of Ibsen or De Maupassant, any more than a blacksmith shoeing a horse thinks of the blacksmith in the next county."

MEANWHILE Mr. Shaw receives full credit for inventing the forms youd and theyd for "you'd" and "they'd"; his elimination of the apostrophe being, however, little to the taste of some critics. Mr. Shaw defends the innovation in the Glasgow Herald. He says:

"It is admitted on all hands that the Scotch printers who have turned out the book (Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh) have done their work admirably; but no human printer could make a page of type look well if it were peppered in all directions with apostrophes and the ugly little gaps beneath the apostrophes. I am sorry to say that literary men never seem to think of the immense difference these details make in the appearance of a block of letterpress, in spite of the lessons of that great author and printer, William Morris, who thought nothing of re-writing a line solely to make it 'justify' prettily in print. If your reviewer will try the simple experiment of placing an open Bible, in which there are neither apostrophes nor inverted commas, besides his own review of my plays, which necessarily bristle with quotation marks, I think he will admit at once that my plan of never using an apostrophe when it can be avoided without ambiguity transfigures the pages instead of disfiguring them. He will, I feel confident, never again complain of youd because a customary ugliness has been wiped out of it. I have used the apostrophe in every case where its omission could even momentarily mislead the reader; for example, I have written she'd and I'll to distinguish them from shed and Ill. But I have made no provision for the people who cannot understand don't unless it is printed don't. If a man is as stupid as that, he should give up reading altogether."

Unfortunately for Mr. Shaw's device, it breaks down so often. Not only cannot he write shed and Ill, but hell, shell, wed, well, &c., are also impossible.

In addition to the names which have already appeared as visitors at the Annual Booksellers' Dinner to-night (Saturday), we have to add those of Mr. William Archer; Mr. Joseph Conrad, author of The Nigger of the Narcissus and Tales of Unrest; and Mr. H. C. Thomson, author of The Chitral Campaign and The Outgoing Turk.

PURE FABLES.

HOSTESS.

Unto the Mistress of great writing, they brought their newest poet. And she said: "I wish him well."

And upon a succession of honest fictionists she smiled.

And one followed who, to use his own word, "bought 'em all and read 'em all."

Then she looked splendid things.

CRITICISM.

The small birds told the owl that he must not say "This will never do," again. "For," they added, "we are agreed that it is your business to stimulate with praise; to search out ambushed beauty; and to interpret to the advantage of the interpreted."

"You conduct your affairs with singular acumen," remarked the owl.

WISDOM.

A man met a publisher on the top of a mountain. "Hello!" said the man, "what are you doing here?"

"Looking for new talent," answered the publisher.

"You are too high up," observed the man. "Better go down to the middle slope, and discriminate."

But the publisher said he thought he should remain where he was.

PROLETARIY.

"The people are entirely soulless," quoth a poet.

"Yet if you and I do not in some way touch them we perish," quoth another.

THE SEASONABLE LYRIST.

"One can think of nothing more delightful."

"Than what?"

"Than to have to be continually standing tip-toe upon little hills for a living."

T. W. H. C.

THE COUNTRY OF KIDNAPPED.

STEVENSON was not an antiquary, and still less was he the painstaking minute geographer. He did not, after the agreeable fashion of certain novelists (so we are informed by the press) visit the scenes of his romances with the set purpose of collecting information on the spot. Now and then he made use of a tract of country which he knew like a book, as in the first half of Catriona and parts of St. Ives. But, speaking generally, he romanced with his landscapes. It would be hard to say where exactly lay Hermiston and the Cauldstane-slap; and the home of the Master of Ballantrae—Durrisdere, as he calls it—can have no connexion with the parish of that name at the head of Nithsdale, but has the whole south-west corner of Scotland for its possible neighbourhood. His landscape is always subtly correct in atmosphere, for to one who knows the places St. Ives smells strongly of the Lothians and the Master of Galloway; but it is the exactness of a countryside, and not of a village.

In his Highland chapters, where his knowledge was so much less extensive, one would expect to find more licence in romance. And in a sense this is true. The body of horse soldiers who so nearly headed off David and Alan in crossing the moor of Rannoch are something of a freak; how cavalry would cross the moor at all with any speed must seem doubtful to one who knows the peaty wilderness. Then I have never been quite able to believe in David's ride in Catriona from Alloa to Inverary in the short time granted him. Stevenson knew the Western Isles well from expeditions there with his father on lighthouse business, but in the preface to Kidnapped he confesses to an inaccuracy. But in most other points the correctness of the itinerary is marvellous. David Balfour's course through Mull, across the Sound into Morven, and then down Glen Tarbert to the Linnhe shore is a perfectly possible road. Thence he was set across the loch and landed on the point of land at the mouth of Loch Leven, which forms the north-western corner of Appin. Here began his troubles, for above him on the hillside was the wood of Lettermore where Alan was lying, and beside him ran the road where the Red Fox was to be shot. Now it is just in the Appin chapter that the details are most correct; the landscape is irreproachable, and tradition is ready to confirm the author's apparently random guesses.

Appin is a triangle of hilly land, one side guarded by precipitous mountains and the others by the sea. The hills towards the south break down in green woody slopes to the shore, but on the northern side, around Ballachulish and Lettermore, they rise in abrupt rocky brows, many of them above three thousand feet, till they meet the wilder peaks of Glencoe. It was the stronghold of the Stewarts, an excellent folk in their way, but a folk with an untoward partiality for the losing side in any contest. Their chief, Stewart of Ardshiel, was at Culloden, and afterwards lay hid in a cave on this very hill of Lettermore till he could escape to France. Like all the great northern clans they bitterly hated the prosperous and Whiggish Campbells, and it did not mend matters that their lands were granted as a reward to their enemies. It is the fact of this undying hatred which Stevenson has seized upon and worked into drama. A poor people, hopeless alike in its loyalty and its hates, striving to match guile with guile—this is the motive of the tale. The sentiment runs strong in Alan's talk when he tells David that, "he has often observed that low-country bodies have nae proper appreciation of what is right and wrong." In Catriona we find Stewart, the Edinburgh writer, its mouth-piece; and the picture of the trial at Inveraray with the Duke, "the biggest Campbell o' them all cocked on the bench," and the "very macers crying 'Cruchan' (the Campbell watchword)," is what honest Stewarts confessed to themselves in the bitterness of their hearts.

The story of the Appin murder Stevenson first read in the printed account of the trial, but he seems to have visited the country and explored it minutely. Otherwise it is hard to see how he got either his uncommon topographical accuracy or his character of Alan. Alan Breck, or Alan the Pock-marked, is a shadowy and uninteresting figure as he appears in the record of the trial, but in the tradition of the place he is a very real person with more than a hint of the Alan of the novel. An old man whom I questioned had often heard the story from his mother. Alan, he told me, was a "hero," using the word in the queer sense of the Scots Highlands to mean a good-hearted washbuckling fellow. "He was a little wee man," he went on, "but very square; a great fighter, too, with the sword, and so brave that he would face a lion." But in one point tradition is at variance with fiction. The Alan of my informant's memory was an unscrupulous fellow, who did not stick at dark deeds, and who, to crown all, was a monstrous liar. Stevenson makes Alan swear by the Holy Iron that he never fired the shot; and David Balfour records his belief that it was a Cameron from Mamore across the loch who did it; but my informant was positive on the point. The shot was fired by Alan and by no other; and I am sorry to say that he concluded with a Highland version of Meg Dods's "What for no?" Still, in the main the Alan of tradition is the Alan of Kidnapped; and in many other points Stevenson is corroborated by local tales. He mentions, for example, that the Macrobs and Maccolls were the minor clans which shared Appin with the Stewarts. It is true enough, and any peculiarly black deed done in the place is still set down to the credit of those unfortunate gentlemen. After the utter defeat of the Campbells at Inverloch by Montrose and the Camerons, a body of the Lorne men fled down the loch, stole a boat in Mamore, and crossed to Appin. Wearied with travel they lay down to sleep on the shore, and the people of the place came down and annihilated them. But the Stewarts disclaimed any share; it was, of course, the Macrobs and Maccolls. Again, we are told that when David and Alan came to the house of James of the Glens, at Duror, they found his people engaged in carrying the arms from the thatch and burying them in the moss. The incident was probably invented by the author as a likely occurrence at the "House of Fear," for it is a detail which tradition has left unrecorded. But the farmer at Duror, while engaged, a year ago, in ploughing and reclaiming part of the moss, found a large store of swords and pistols. Such a fact makes one agree with Aristotle: art has a deeper truth than even the variegated history of tradition.

The scene of the murder is a little to the west of Ballachulish Pier, some two hundred yards up on the hillside. The place is marked by a cairn, and is close to the old shore-road which wound through the wood of birches. Just above it there is a considerable cliff and a mass of undergrowth where the man who did the deed might very well lie hid. The face of the hill is of the roughest, and it is not hard to believe that two active men, well versed in hillcraft, could baffle a detachment of His Majesty's troops. A little to the east in the same

There is another spot of a more painful interest for the superstitious folk in the neighbourhood. James of the Glens was not hanged at Inveraray, as has been supposed, but here, close to the scene of the crime of which he was innocent, and not six miles from his own house of Duror. There are plain marks of a gibbet on the ground, and the story goes that the grass has never grown in the tracks since that day. His body was left there in chains as a warning to malcontent Stewarts; and when he would have fallen to pieces, soldiers came from Fort William and fixed the bones together with wire. So there it hung for weeks—a ghastly spectacle—till one day a crazy beggar came past. He heard the noise of the thing swinging in the wind, and, moved by some daftness or other, caught at it, pulled it down, and flung it into the loch. So this was the end of the Appin tragedy, save in so far as it lives in tradition and a great romance.

JOHN BUCHAN.

THE WEEK.

THE past week has been prolific of nothing save novels. An attractive book in appearance and subject is Birds in London, by Mr. W. H. Hudson, F.Z.S. It contains sixteen chapters, and is evidently packed with facts and observations. Several of the districts of London are treated separately; the question of the protection of birds in the London parks is considered; and in his final chapter Mr. Hudson makes suggestions as to the species which may be introduced into London with fair prospects of success. The general aim and scope of the work are set forth as follows (we quote from Mr. Hudson's Preface):

"As my aim has been to furnish an account of the London wild bird life of to-day, there is little help to be had from the writings of previous observers. These mostly deal with the central parks, and are interesting now, mainly, as showing the changes that have taken place. At the end of the volume a list will be found of the papers and books on the subject which are known to me. This list will like many readers as an exceedingly meagre one, when it is remembered that London has always been a home of ornithologists—that in the days of Oliver Goldsmith, who wrote pleasantly of the Temple Gardens' rookery, and Thomas Pennant and his friend Daines Barrington, there have never been wanting observers of the wild bird life within our walls. The fact remains that, with the exception of a few incidental passages to be found in various ornithological works, nothing was expressly written about the birds of London until James Jennings's Ornithologia came to the light a little over seventy years ago. Jennings's work was a poem, probably the best ever written in the English language; as he inserted copious notes, fortunately in verse, embodying his own observations on the bird life of East and South-East London, the book has a very considerable interest for us to-day. Nothing more of importance appeared until the late Shirley Hibberd's lively paper on 'London Birds' in 1865. From that date forward the subject has attracted an increasing attention, and at present we have a number of London or park naturalists, as they might be called, who view the resident London species as adapted to an urban life, and who chronicle their observations in the Field, Nature, Zoologist, Nature Notes, and other natural history journals, and in the newspapers and magazines."

Mr. Hudson's book is admirably printed and illustrated.

IN the preface to Mr. Alexander Sutherland's The Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct, the author tells us that this work has engaged him more or less closely for eleven years. The scope and intentions of these two large volumes will be best suggested by Mr. Sutherland's "Finis" paragraph, which is as follows:

"Though we have in this book traced from its humble origin the growth of our conception of right and wrong; though we have found it to be entirely relative to ourselves, our needs, and our capacities; though we have seen it to be in every respect earth-born, we are nevertheless not in the least degree precluded from utilising the ideas thus derived to help us in framing for ourselves our worthiest symbolic conception of the universe. All our other ideas are so derived, all are equally unreal as the statement of ultimate fact, all equally real as being our best attainable symbols for things we know to be really existent. Thus are we justified in projecting out from us into starry space our best conceptions of moral beauty, and seeing them there as enduring principles with an objective existence. In that fitting dream which we call our life—in that long presentment of appearances, rarely felt to be only appearances, because so seldom capable of being tested, and never capable of being set alongside of the truth—among all the phantasms which the healthy mind frankly accepts as facts, because of the invisible facts which they symbolise, we must number not only our concepts of matter and of consciousness, but those of goodness and of wickedness as actually existent verities. So when our mood of sceptic sorrow is passed away because phenomena are not realities, we return to the hearty, practical, common-sense view of mankind; true, moreover, as far as aught we know is true; and we assert as unconditional principles our canons of the right and of the wrong as Goethe did.

'In name of him, who still, though often named,
Remains in essence, ever unproclaimed.'

Right and wrong dwell out in the everlasting heavens, even as beauty dwells in a graceful woman, as coolness dwells in the clear spring water, as glorious colour dwells in the tropic sunset, as vastness dwells in the ocean—things not so in themselves, but ever and inherently so to our natures."

The Golfing Pilgrim on Many Links is Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson's latest contribution to the literature of games. It is a book of breezy small-talk, reminiscences, and golf stories.

Mr. Aubyn Trevor-Battye's A Northern Highway of the Tsar is a sequel to his Ice-bound on Kolguev. The author describes his travels in Northern Russia in the "fifth season" of the year, recognised in that quarter of the globe and called Rasputnya, an uncertain and impracticable season, when it freezes and thaws by turns, and "ice-charged rivers are dangerous for boats, and all the land is morass and swamp." The book is dedicated, by permission, to the Emperor of Russia.

THE BOOK MARKET.

PENNY NOVELETTES.

THEY are many; but the demand is chiefly met by—

The Family Herald Supplement.
The Princess's Novelette.
The Duchess Novelette.
The Illustrated Fireside Library.
The Family Novelist.
The Home Novelette.
The "My Queen" Library.
The Heartsease Library.
Horner's Penny Stories, &c., &c.

Nursemaids never lack the reading they like; for their taste is defined and understood, and a penny is all the loss if the editor has made a mistake. But the editor seldom does that. All he need do is to keep up his stock of MSS. The available plots number about half a dozen, all told; and the end is the important thing. It is good fun to look at the openings and endings of novelettes. Here are a few beginnings and endings from this week's crop:

Beginning:

"Oh! Fanny, I had rather die than go into this company," exclaimed the fair young creature, suddenly sweeping her head of luxuriant golden curls away from the manipulating care of the tender-hearted sewing-maid, and burying her face in her warm, throbbing hands.

"Nay—nay, Miss Agnes, do not give way so. It will be worse for you; and then—then—you will see—it will soon be over—all this fuss and show.

Well, well, if the truth be told, I can't see what has come over your uncle, and—"

"What has come over him, Fanny? Why, wealth! Wealth that should not belong to him—wealth worked hard for by my poor, dead, murdered father. Nay, nay, Fanny!" and she shook her head sadly, yet emphatically—"I know it, for I feel it—and who did it? Ay, Fanny, wealth has come, and come gloriously, over St. Clair Arlington—wealth that should be mine."

Ending:

Then ensued a wondrous solemn scene. The awe-inspiring ceremony was over, and Clavis Warne and Dora Howe were united at last.

"At last—at last! Kiss me, Clavis—my husband."

Then her head went down slowly upon his shoulder, the dark masses falling upon his bosom.

A moment, and the physician said, in a voice that sounded preternaturally solemn—

"DEAD!"

A holy silence settled in the death-chamber. The air was fanned by the sweep of angels' wings.

Eighteen months from the night of that death-bed wedding scene, there was another marriage—a very quiet one—at the mansion. Agnes and Clavis were at last united in holy wedlock.

That is how perambulators are upset in Kensington Gardens.

But such stories must be alternated with stories more idyllic: the garden must smile, and the blue waves flash, and love's young dream be dreamed again. Here is the sort of thing:

Beginning:

It was the time of roses, and Ileana Thornhi looked like a rose herself as she flitted about the sunny garden, which was filled with roses, for the old admiral loved warmth and colour, and now, as he looked around from his place in the verandah, he could not but feel that he had gained a peaceful harbour for the ending of his days.

Very lovely was Ileen, the child of his old age, exquisitely graceful, fascinating, with the luxuriant dark hair and deep-set grey eyes of her mother's nation, and all the true Irish vivacity sparkling in her expressive face. Yet as he looked at her he sighed, and some subtle sympathy between them made her look up with her radiant smile.

"Hallo, who comes here?" he cried, as a shadow darkened the path, and a tall figure emerged from the sunny side of the house. "Why, Horace, have you come to tell us the news? Is Lou to be a duchess?"

Ending :

There was a very quiet wedding, just as soon as things could be arranged. The beautiful bride wore her trim travelling dress, and Bunchy barked himself hoarse on the occasion.

Tom and his wife live at the cottage. Horace has written a book which became the rage, and—well, Bunchy did get a scolding the other day, when he woke up Master Thomas Caltern number two by jumping into the elaborate cot to have a private inspection of that young gentleman who, he thought, absorbed far too much of his beloved master and mistress's attention. After that gentle admonition, the little dog took the intruder under his protection, and now there is not a hitch in the domestic relationships at the Hall.

The young doctor starting in practice is as great a favourite among heroes as the governess going out for the first time is among heroines.

Beginning :

"Well, this is a kind of neighbourhood where they evidently require neither doctor nor undertaker, that's evident," mused a handsome young medico, as he gave a yawn and threw himself on a shiny leather sofa, waiting in readiness for a patient and a modest fee.

"Let me see," he went on meditatively, "five weeks have flown since I set up my gorgeous red lamp, thinking it would bring no end of interesting cases; but even babies don't seem inclined to make their début in this queer place. I wouldn't care for myself, but there's the dear old mater that makes me anxious."

Ending :

In the following spring Muriel and Basil became man and wife, he having promised his father to give up his profession and live at Hemlock Towers, where peace and happiness reigned supreme, and the patter of little feet and the music of children's voices made Lord Hanbury forget that he once had bought tinsel for gold in marrying an abandoned woman.

Love on shipboard, and after, is a mine that nothing exhausts.

Beginning :

The passenger ship Meteor, from Delagoa to Southampton, was already three days on her way, and the weather was all that could be desired, even by the most faint-hearted of fair-weather sailors; but there were unusually few passengers.

Maurice Murchison strolled up the deck to where Miss Hurst stood alone, watching the sunset.

"I have just been talking to the captain," he remarked, as he came up to her. "He has been telling me what an uncommonly dull lot of passengers we are; he accounts for it partly by the fact that you and I are the only two on the right side of forty, 'barring the children,' as he says."

Miss Hurst laughed a little.

Ending :

Surely this was no reality, but a vision belonging to that dream that had haunted her, waking and sleeping, for the last three months—a dream, she had told herself so often, it was worse than folly to encourage; but was it not all that was left to her now that—

The vision became clearer, and a voice that was no dream broke the stillness with a glad, triumphant ring.

"Kathleen!"

"Maurice!"

These stories are innocent, though hardly wholesome. They meet the demand for nonsense and sensibility.

A R T.

THE HUNDRED BEST ACADEMY PICTURES.

It is the easy thing to refer to the Academy exhibition with a sneer. Nor can anyone deny the occasion that is given. No country can produce a thousand good oil-paintings in a year; and that is the number the Academy consents to hang. The profusion is said to be a concession to the artist, who, one would suppose, has almost an author's vanity to see his name in print, in the catalogue; and who prefers, we are assured, to be skied rather than to be unhung. Lord Leighton made a gallant attempt to bring down that sky-line, and to hang fewer pictures; but already whatever he effected by way of reform has been allowed to lapse. The whole system, therefore, under which pictures are selected and hung at Burlington House clamours for revision; and revision, no doubt, will come to it before much time passes. A list of associates that includes such names as Shannon and La Thangue, Clausen and Stanhope Forbes, Bramley and Swan, Harry Bates and Frampton, is big with hope of all sorts for English art, and for the conditions under which it is to be developed.

Meanwhile the visitor may do his own selecting, if he cannot do his own hanging. A pleasant task, too, it is, for he can make—the names already cited are in themselves a proof of the assertion—a delightful Academy of his own. Moreover, after a little experience, he can do this without any great fatigue of eye or loss of spirits. He learns how not to see. With him rests the rejection that the selecting committee shirked; and he can train himself to the task almost by instinct. The good things rise and signal to his sight, even as the bad things recede and are blotted out. Though art has its own laws, tests, and standards, it leaves something to the decision of the individual taste. Indeed, within fixed bounds, there is enough liberty of preference to make it certain that no two men will choose exactly the same best hundred pictures out of so large a collection as is this; no, nor perhaps the same man, on two different days. Nevertheless, the following list, though to that extent a tentative one may serve as a time-saving guide to woul pictures as any House Beautiful would make welcome to its walls. Strong preferences, such as those for Mr. Sargent's portraits, and especially his portrait of Mr. Wertheimer, and for Mr. Adrian Stokes' "Mountains and Hills" among landscapes remain unexpressed in such a list; for the order is not that of mastery, but merely, for convenience, that of the numbering of the catalogue.

29. Nightfall. H. H. La Thangue, A.
37. The White Mouse. J. J. Shannon, A.
42. Near the Keepers. Alfred Parsons, A.
43. Gone Away! G. P. Jacomb-Hood.
46. Mrs. Kenneth Foster. Solomon Soloman, A.
63. Francis Cranmer Penrose, Esq., President, R.I.B.A. John S. Sargent, R.A.
69. Mrs. Harold Wilson. John S. Sargent, R.A.
107. Portrait of the Painter. Frank Brangwyn, A.
109. In Realms of Fancy. S. Meltzer Fisher.
114. Kathleen, Daughter of Hon. M. Justice Mathew. J. J. Shannon, A.
123. Bracken. H. H. La Thangue, A.
138. King Lear. Edwin A. Abbey, A.
149. A Shaft of Light. Edward G. Hobbins.
152. October. Stanhope A. Forbes, A.
155. Ebb Tide. Bertram Priestman.
196. A Waterway. Arnesby Brown.
200. Portrait of a Lady. Richard Jack.
205. Mrs. Herbert Cohen. J. J. Shannon, A.
211. Ariadne. J. W. Waterhouse, R.A.
212. A Pageant of Spring. George Wetherbee.
218. The Golden Horn. Frank Brangwyn.
232. A Placid Stream. George Wetherbee.
250. Johannes Wolff, Esq. John S. Sargent, R.A.
272. Portrait of a Lady. John S. Sargent, R.A.
276. Harbour Lights: Lowestoft. Frank G. Cotman.
288. Miss Sybil Waller. Maurice Greiffenhagen.
303. On the Morrow of Talavera: Soldiers the 43rd Bringing in the Dead Lady Butler.
308. Labourers. Arnesby Brown.
310. Love Triumphant. G. F. Watts, R.A.
311. La Bénédiction de la Mer: à l'Étapa. T. Austen Brown.
317. Moonrise at Twilight. Julius Olsson.
325. Mrs. Pattison. W. G. Orchardson, R.A.
330. The Rt. Hon. The Viscount Palmerston. W. Q. Orchardson, R.A.
331. Fortune and the Boy. John Swan, A.
351. Circe. Richard Jack.

5. Miss Muriel Lubbock. Henry S. Tuke.
2. Mrs. Courtenay Bodley. Léon F. J. Bonnat.
3. A Broken Solitude. John M. Swan, A.
5. The Letter. Stanhope A. Forbes, A.
5. The Children of L. Breitmeyer, Esq. T. C. Gotch.
3. Mountains and Hill. Adrian Stokes.
5. The Pierrots. Walter W. Russell.
7. Evening. Montague Crick.
5. The Story. Frank Brangwyn.
4. The Countess of Warwick. Carolus Duran.
7. Evening. Owen B. Morgan.
3. Mme. Georges Feydeau and Her Children. Carolus Duran.
3. The Godmother. George Hitchcock.
4. Returning Home at Evening. Arthur H. Buckland.
1. The Awakening. T. C. Gotch.
9. And Hop-o'-My-Thumb Guided His Brothers Safely Through the Wood. Elizabeth Forbes.
2. A Cousin from Town. Walter Langley.
9. Wreckage. By C. Napier Hemy, A.
1. Miss Madge Graham. Frank Bramley, A.
2. The Harrow. George Clausen, A.
4. Glimpse of the Lake of Como. Horace van Ruith.
7. Mrs. Noel Guinness and Her Little Daughter. Walter Osborne.
8. A Grey Day: Old Amsterdam. James Maris.
93. Asher Wertheimer, Esq. John S. Sargent, R.A.
7. Sea Frolic. Julius Olsson.
98. Harvesters at Supper. H. H. La Thangue, A.
9. Sir Thomas Sutherland, G.C.M.G., M.P., Chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company. John S. Sargent, R.A.
0. Falling Showers. Julius Olsson.
6. The Promise of March. George Hitchcock.
1. An Idyll of the Sea. H. S. Tuke.
8. A Westminster Priest. George S. Watson.
4. A Water Frolic. Arnesby Brown.
8. Grazing. Bertram Priestman.
71. The Widow. Dudley Hardy.
70. The Little Violinist. Edward Stott.
73. The Fold. Edward Stott.
77. On the Hills. Arthur Wardle.
80. The Market. Dudley Hardy.
83. Glory of Sunset Gold. Cecil Round.
80. Ploughing. E. Beatrice Bland.
84. Suburban Spring. A. S. Hartrick.
83. Life in Connemara: a Market Day. Walter Osborne.
859. In the Gloaming. James V. Jelley.
887. A Humble Home. Percy C. Bovill.
890. Consulting an Expert. Emanuel H. Horwitz.
902. Sir Graham Montgomery, Bart. (Presentation Portrait). J. H. Lorimer.
966. The Rt. Hon. Lord Watson (Painted for Members of the Legal Profession in Scotland). John S. Sargent, R.A.
909. Changing Pastures: Holland. Gaylord S. Truesdell.
915. Work Oxen Returning to Pasture: Populonia. Arthur Lemon.
916. Sisters: "A sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things." A. Chevallier Tayler.
929. A Sussex Cider Press. H. H. La Thangue, A.
930. Opulent Autumn. Alfred East.
936. Mrs. Wertheimer. John S. Sargent, R.A.
951. Mrs. William Fane. T. B. Kennington.
959. A Coming Squall. Thomas Somerscales.
960. A Wide Pasture. J. Aumonier.
969. Mrs. Sims. Charles Sims.
975. Miss Nellie Coates. Percy W. Gibbs.
976. The Making of England. J. Langton Barnard.
983. Reflections. William M. Palin.
990. A Dalesman's Clipping: Westmorland. Frank Bramley, A.
995. The War News. Dionisio B. Verdaquer.
1002. The Haven. J. Langton Barnard.
1004. Sir Thomas Roe (Presentation Portrait). J. J. Shannon, A.
1186. A Cloudy Day. Leopold Rivers. (Water-colour.)

---

D R A M A .

---

THE new Lyceum drama to which Messrs. H. D. Traill and R. S. Hichens have put their names bears strong evidence of having originated with the younger of the collaborators. It treats largely of Mr. Hichens's favourite theme—the occult—in which, so far as I am aware, Mr. Traill has not hitherto dabbled, and this, one may suppose, is the element that has commended the piece to Sir Henry Irving, who first made his mark in "The Bells." Like "The Bells," "The Medicine Man" is concerned with hypnotism. The science is not particularly exact in either piece. In "The Bells" it is absurdly wrong, though, to be sure, the mesmerist is there represented merely as a figure in a nightmare. The authors of "The Medicine Man" could, without difficulty, have brought hypnotism up to date by placing it upon a basis of "suggestion." They have preferred to put forward the popular and erroneous view that a mere exercise of "will power" on the part of the operator is sufficient to influence the patient. Dramatically the point is immaterial, though it would be unwise just at present for Sir Henry Irving to talk of the value of the stage as an educational agent. This is Mr. Hichens's first attempt at dramatic work; Mr. Traill is understood to have written a piece as long ago as the early sixties—the unreformed period of the drama. Virtually, however, this may be regarded as a play of purely literary origin—the work of literary men in contradistinction to dramatists; and it possesses the characteristics that one would look for from such a source. The dialogue is tersely and forcibly written with an agreeable souçon of humour, and the character-drawing is fresh and good. On the other hand the action tends to platitude, containing as it does no emotional crises, no dramatic surprises, with the exception of the closing scene where the mysterious Dr. Tregenna, mesmerist and pseudo-brain specialist, is throttled by a half-witted patient.

FROM the opening episodes one rather anticipates a realistic play of modern society to contrast the life of Whitechapel with that of Mayfair. There are two capital illustrative scenes to that effect, one a rowdy mission meeting of costers and dock labourers invited to listen to a lecture on "will power" by a futile canon of the church, the other a brilliant ball given in a lordly West End mansion. Curiously enough, too, the doctor's patients whose function it is to serve as objects for the exercise of his will power are: the one a dock labourer, a drunken wife-beating brute, and the other a peer's daughter. But the first two acts serve merely as a starting point for the authors, un tremplin, as Zola puts it, pour sauter dans le vide. The rest is mesmerism and dreamland. Is Tregenna a charlatan or a pioneer of mental science? The authors have left us in doubt on this point, but for my part I am inclined to place him in the former category, the more so that Sir Henry Irving exerts himself to bring out the weird and mystic side of the character. It is difficult to realise the existence of such an institution as "The Retreat" at Hampstead, where the hypnotic hocus-pocus is carried on, and where, above all, the Satanic scheme is entered upon which forms the kernel of the plot. This is life à la Hichens. Tregenna has a grudge of old standing against Lord Belhurst, which he proceeds to pay off in truly diabolic fashion. The will power that cures mental maladies can create them. Upon the unhappy woman placed in his care Tregenna exercises all his devilish arts, with the result of rendering her insane, and he only desists on learning that his supposed enemy had unwittingly wronged him.

A STRANGE, fantastic play, which excites curiosity and even horror, but nothing in the way of sympathetic interest! It is not a play that women will care to see. Love is touched upon—the terrible doctor himself has loved and lost; but there is no love story, Miss Ellen Terry applying herself to the delineation of the somewhat "moony" condition of the peer's daughter. Mr. Mackintosh depicts an East End Caliban, whose brutishness gives one a shudder; and Mr. Norman Forbes offers a clever sketch of a foolish parson. For the rest, the dramatis persone consist of types of the East and the West—graphic enough, but illustrative rather than dramatic. The play must have a succès de curiosité. More I can hardly promise it.

WHILE the English drama of the day is sufficiently vigorous and workmanlike, if not as markedly literary as some well-wishers to the stage would desire, farce remains on a deplorably low level. It is as noisy, as empty, and not infrequently as vulgar as it was fifty years ago, sharing in none of the improvement that has marked most other kinds of piece since the days of T. W. Robertson. To be sure, Mr. Pinero did something for farce in the early part of his career when he wrote The Magistrate; but he has long abandoned the lighter vein, and the last state of this class of piece is as bad as the first. Only from French and, to a limited extent, German sources does farce reach us in tolerable form. With rare exceptions, like "A Braco of Partridges" (which consisted in a modernising of the "Comedy of Errors"), the humour of the home-made article is of a quality which, if it tickles the groundlings, makes the judicious grieve. The two most recent examples—"The Club Baby" at the Avenue, and "Shadows on the Blind" at Terry's—turn on the not very exhilarating question of the paternity of a foundling. Why a baby should invariably be regarded as a farcical subject it is not easy to say. But so it is, just as when advanced to the speaking stage it becomes a recognised adjunct of melodrama. In the Avenue piece a baby of unknown paternity is left at the door of a club, and at once becomes the theme of some very obvious joking on the part of the members. They adopt it as the "club-baby," and take turns at nursing it with the aid of its feeding-bottle, the member on duty donning a nurse's cap and apron for the purpose. Roars of laughter greet this playful fancy. Prompted by jealousy, the young wife of one of the members visits the club disguised in a man's dress clothes, and accompanied by a young lady friend similarly equipped. They attempt to smoke and drink. Whereat, more laughter. Then the father-in-law of the suspected member comes upon the scene, also disguised, and is supposed by the members of the club to be a lady; which again convulses the audience. Next the baby is raffled by the club and won by the father-in-law, who takes it home to his son's house, where it naturally provokes further misunderstanding; and eventually it is claimed as her own by a lady who has been prating a good deal about women's rights.

SUCH a story speaks for itself. Less offensive, because more dexterously handled, the same subject crops up at Terry's, the point of departure in this case being that the baby is left by mistake in the laboratory of an elderly professor of chemistry, who is, of course, at once accused by his wife and mother-in-law of being its father. Needless to say, the old dreary round of suspicion and innuendo proper to this sort of piece is pursued until the vexed question of the paternity is satisfactorily cleared up, which, by the exercise of the faintest common sense on the part of any one person concerned, might be done at the beginning. Apart from the question of good taste, the characteristic of the foundling piece is that the fun has to be forced beyond the limits of reason. Everybody is thrown into a state of violent hurry-scurry; the smallest suggestion is caught at by the characters as a ground of fresh misunderstanding. Of the wit or the observation of character that marks the work of a Labiche, a Hennequin, or a Bisson there is not a scintilla. If he can get a quantity of barren spectators to guffaw, the author's aim is achieved. These farces are played by companies comprising in the one case Messrs. Lionel and Sydney Brough, Mr. W. T. Lovel, and Miss Vane Featherston; and in the other, Mr. Edward Terry and the Misses Esmé and Vera Berenger; all capable of much better work. The more's the pity!

J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FIRST ODE OF HORACE.

SIR,—The publication of Mr. A. D. Godley's excellent translation of Horace's Odes naturally leads to a reperusal of the originals, and the reconsideration of supreme works of art invariably suggests that their beauties are inexhaustible and that criticism has never said its last word. The first Ode containing the dedication to Mæcenas has hitherto been regarded as a mere catalogue—however neatly expressed—of different pursuits engaged in by mankind which are isolated from one another except in so far as they are human pursuits, and in this way the point of view which connects them in the poet's mind is overlooked, and our idea of the unity of thought pervading the poem suffers accordingly. Some editors, indeed, have split up the Ode into stanzas of four lines each, without respect either to the sense or to the fact that it is written uniformly throughout in the lesser Asclepiad metre, each line being the rhythmical counterpart of all the others, and that, therefore, if we are to divide it into stanzas at all, the sense is our only guide. It is a sufficient condemnation of the arrangement in stanzas of four lines each which has been adopted by a few that the close of only two—or, at the most, three—of the stanzas coincides with the conclusion of a sentence. However, I hope to show that an arrangement in stanzas is both natural and indispensable, if we wish to appreciate the perfection of the poet's technique, by offering an alternative arrangement, notwithstanding the inconclusiveness of the previous attempt in this direction.

The first two lines contain the invocation of Mæcenas, and the last two contain the poet's wish. The rest of the Ode may be regarded as parenthetical. A review of the different pursuits of mankind terminates in a description of that of the poet himself, and thus breaks the abruptness of an immediate statement of his ambition. We may thus take the last two lines as completing in the metrical system the stanza which the first two begin.

The parenthesis obviously separates into two main divisions, clearly indicated by the correspondence of "est qui" in l. 19, with "sunt quos" in l. 3. And if we follow the sense, the first of these divisions necessarily resolves itself into four stanzas of four lines each; the second, into one stanza of four lines, and two stanzas of six lines; each main division containing the same number of lines.

The significance of this arrangement will appear from the following analysis of the Ode:

(a) Invocation of Mæcenas, a prince by birth, and the poet's patron (ll. 1 and 2).

Paraphrase containing a review of different pursuits of mankind (ll. 3 to 34).

DIVISION I.—Pursuits involving effort, with a view to tangible or material objects, which the poet himself has not sought after.

Stanza (1). The chariot-race for the palm of victory.

Stanza (2). The pursuit of civic honours, and the acquisition of the products of distant lands (probably a reference to the consulship).

Stanza (3). The manual cultivation of an ancestral farm as a means of livelihood.

Stanza (4). The career of a seafaring merchant whose stimulus is the dread of poverty.

DIVISION II.—Pursuits which are their own reward, irrespective of success, all of which the poet has followed in his time, and some of which his experience has led him to forsake.

Stanza (5). The enjoyment of leisure snatched during the intervals of business.

Stanza (6). The delight of military life with its blare of bugle and trumpet, from which even the horrors of war do not deter; the kindred pleasures of the chase apart from the question of success or failure, for l. 28 gives clearly an instance of the latter.

Stanza (7). The poet's own pursuit: poetry and the contemplation of Nature with the companionship of the Muses.

(b) The poet's wish (ll. 35 and 36).

That the lengthening of stanzas (6) and (7) is intentional is, I think, manifest from the careful parallelism of the style of their concluding clauses. The huntsman forgets his spouse if the stag has been sighted by the hounds, or if the boar has rent the nets; the poet disregards the crowd if Euterpe checks not the music of the flute or if Polyhymnia fails not to string the lyre. It may also be observed that the pursuits mentioned in stanza (6) are closely connected by the thought underlying "matribus detestata" and "conjugis ommemor," which is in each case identical, and precludes separation.

In conclusion, I may add that the arrangement I propose gives no support to Maclean's and Munro's view that we should place a full stop at the end of l. 5, and take "terrarum dominos" to signify the Romans as distinguished from the Greeks. It seems to me far more natural to take this expression as referring to "regibus" in the first line, the thought being that even princes,

'the lords of lands,' have their ambitions, as we see from the records of the Olympic contests celebrated by the great lyric poet, Pindar.—I am, &c.,

ALFRED E. THISELTON.

April 16.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

CRITICS differ on Mr. Wyndham's conclusions; but they agree in their judgment of his manner and method. The Daily Chronicle says:

"With this edition of the 'Venus and Adonis,' 'Lucrece,' and 'Sonnets,' Mr. George Wyndham takes a high place among Shakespearean scholars and critics. He has performed his editorial task exceedingly well, and his introduction is a really luminous and masterly piece of work."

Similarly the Athenæum:

"Most valuable work has been done by Mr. Wyndham in this tercentenary commemoration of the first formal criticism of Shakespeare's poems by Meres. Too many nowadays rush into print and darken counsel by a multiplicity of comment, after a short paddle on the margin of the ocean of Shakespearean literature. But Mr. Wyndham has sailed over its wide expanse, has dived into its depths, and brought back treasures worthy to be prized."

Literature's comment is almost identical:

"This is a scholarly, painstaking, and interesting contribution to Shakespearean literature. So much rubbish in the form of fads, baseless hypotheses, speculative fancies, and idle paradoxes has lately been imported into that literature that it is quite a pleasant surprise to come upon an editor and commentator who is content with the humble distinction of being sensible and honest, of thinking more about the elucidation of his author than about his own glory as an ingenious theorist. To this praise—and in our opinion it is high praise—Mr. Wyndham is fully entitled. His knowledge is ample and accurate, and, what is more, pertinent and discriminating, his tone is temperate, his judgment is, generally speaking, sound, holding the scales very evenly when dealing with conflicting evidence and conflicting opinions, and with the many problems and questions adhuc sub judice which confront us at every turn in such a subject as Shakespeare's poems."

The Westminster Gazette's critic goes to the length of writing:

"Criticism so just, so moderate, and yet so persuasive and so appreciative as is to be found in the introduction of Mr. George Wyndham's edition to Shakespeare's poems is almost unanny. There are moments when we could wish that Mr. Wyndham might commit some indiscretion, if only the error of a date or a misquotation, or betray some fad such as most editors of Shakespeare have secretly entertained. Mr. Wyndham never gratifies us. As a critic he hits the golden mean between pedantry and rashness. He is as learned, or appears so, as any German on all the curious questions which have gathered round the Sonnets, and yet he can rush them all aside and approach the poems' poetry pure and simple."

But the same critics make deductions from their praise of Mr. Wyndham's work. The Daily Chronicle's does not entirely accept his transcendental theory of the inspiration of the Poems and Sonnets:

"His desire to make Shakespeare in the poems a conscious and deliberate metaphysician betrays Mr. Wyndham into one of the very few extravagances of interpretation contained in this volume. 'The phrase genio Socratem,' he says, 'applied to him in the epitaph on his monument, attests his fondness for Platonic theories.' This monument doth attest too much, methinks."

Literature quotes the following as one of Mr. Wyndham's very occasional lapses into "'precious' nonsense":

"Works of perfect art are the tombs in which artists lay to rest the passions they would fain make immortal. The more perfect their execution, the longer does the sepulchre endure, the sooner does the passion perish. Only where the hand has faltered do ghosts of love and anguish still complain. In the most of his Sonnets Shakespeare's hand does not falter."

The charge of preciosity is also gently preferred by the Westminster Gazette:

"Mr. Wyndham's style tends a little to the precious. It is difficult for a writer to steep himself in this period without infecting his own writing with archaisms. So we get occasional relapses into 'tis-ing and 'twas-ing, and a more frequent use of the pronoun 'you' than is quite to our taste. But when Mr. Wyndham forgets himself and becomes possessed of his subject, he can be forcible, natural, and vigorous."

Two critics, those of the Athenæum and Literature, complain of Mr. Wyndham's treatment of the text—modernising the spelling, banishing capitals, &c.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, May 5.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &c.

THE VOICE OF THE SPIRIT: LITERARY PASSAGES FROM THE BIBLE RE-WRITTEN, IDEA FOR IDEA, IN MODERN STYLE. Book I. Sampson Low.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. By John Keble. With Notes by Walter Lock, D.D. Methuen & Co. 2s.

FOUR LECTURES ON THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE GOSPELS. By the Rev. J. H. Wilkinson, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CONFLICTS OF METHODISM, 1827-1852. By Benjamin Gregory, D.D. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

AIDS TO THE STUDENT OF THE HOLY BIBLE. With Illustrations Selected and Described by the Rev. C. J. Ball, M.A. Eyre & Spottiswoode.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

TWO HUNDRED YEARS: THE HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE, 1698-1898. By W. O. B. Allen, M.A.; and Edmund McClure, M.A. S.P.C.K.

THE HITTITES AND THEIR LANGUAGE. By C. R. Conder, Lieut.-Col. R.E. Wm. Blackwood & Sons.

THE ROMANCE OF A REGIMENT, 1713-1740. By J. R. Hutchinson, B.A. Sampson Low.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

ÆSCHYLI TRAGOEDIAE. Edited by Lewis Campbell, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 5s.

THE CID BALLADS, AND OTHER POEMS AND TRANSLATIONS FROM SPANISH AND GERMAN. By the late James Young Gibson. Second edition. Kegan Paul. 12s.

THE SPECTATOR. In eight volumes. Vol. VI. John C. Nimmo.

RIZZIO: AN HISTORICAL TRAGEDY. By David Graham. A. Constable & Co. 5s.

LOVE SONGS AND ELEGIES. By Manmohan Ghose. Elkin Mathews. 1s.

DANTE'S TEN HEAVENS: A STUDY OF THE PARADISO. By Edmund G. Gardner, M.A. Archibald Constable & Co. 12s.

MORE LAW LYRICS. By Robert Bird. Wm. Blackwood & Sons. 3s.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

THE FIRST PHILOSOPHIES OF GREECE. By Arthur Fairbanks. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

A NORTHERN HIGHWAY OF THE TSAR. By Aubyn Trevor-Battye. Archibald Constable & Co. 6s.

WITH THE MOUNTED INFANTRY AND THE MASHONALAND FIELD FORCE, 1896. By Brevet Lieut.-Col. F. S. H. Alderson. Methuen & Co. 10s. 6d.

STARK'S GUIDE-BOOK AND HISTORY OF BRITISH GUIANA. By James Rodway and James H. Stark (Boston, U.S.A.).

EDUCATIONAL.

HANDBOOK OF LATIN INSCRIPTIONS, ILLUSTRATING THE HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE. By W. M. Lindsay, M.A. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s.

ELEMENTARY GENERAL SCIENCE. By A. T. Simmons, B.Sc., and Lionel M. Jones, B.Sc. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

FIRST STAGE OF MAGNETISM AND ELECTRICITY. By R. H. Jude, M.A. W. B. Clive. 2s.

L'AVARE: MOLIÈRE'S COMEDY IN FRENCH. Annotated by W. G. Isbister, B.A., and A. Garnand. Isaac Pitman & Sons, Ltd.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEEN. Books II. and III. Edited by Kate M. Warren. Archibald Constable & Co. 1s. 6d. each.

FRENCH SELF-TAUGHT: WITH PHONETIC PRONUNCIATION. By C. A. Themin, F.R.G.S. E. Marlborough & Co.

PITMAN'S PRACTICAL FRENCH GRAMMAR AND CONVERSATION FOR SELF-TUITION. Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons, Ltd. 1s.

A PRIMER OF LATIN GRAMMAR. By William Modlen, M.A. Rivingtons.

FRENCH AND GERMAN READINGS: VOYAGE ATOUR DE MA CHAMBRE. By Xavier de Maistre. With Notes by G. Eugène Fasnacht. Macmillan & Co.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE GRAPHIC ART OF THE ESKIMOS. By Walter James Hoffman, M.D. Government Printing Office (Washington, U.S.A.).

HARVARD STUDIES IN CLASSICAL PHILOLOGY. Vol. VIII. Ginn & Co. (Boston, U.S.A.).

MARCHING BACKWARD. By Ernest Edwin Williams. Ward, Lock & Co.

THE EMPIRE RECITER. The Sunday School Union. 1s.

HISTORY OF CORN MILLING. Vol. I.: HANDSTONES, SLAVE, AND CATTLE MILLS. By Richard Bennett and John Elton. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPHS: THEIR HISTORY, CONSTRUCTION, AND WORKING. By Charles Bright, F.R.S.E. Crosby Lockwood & Son. £3 3s.

THE MINISTRY OF DEACONESSES. By Deaconess Cecilia Robinson. Methuen & Co. 3s. 6d.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

TWO HUNDRED YEARS: the HISTORY of the S.P.C.K., 1698-1898. This Volume gives a fairly full account of the circumstances in which the Society originated, and of the various work carried on by it throughout the world to the present day. The information contained in the Volume is drawn in the main from the Society's Minute Books, and the material thus gleaned furnishes, perhaps, a more complete account of Church life and work during the last two centuries than could be had from any other source. By the Rev. W. OSBORN B. ALLEN, M.A., and the Rev. EDMUND McCCLURE, M.A., Secretaries of the Society. Demy 8vo, with Frontispiece and several Illustrations, buckram boards, 10s. 6d.

COLONIAL CHURCH HISTORIES: the Church in the West Indies. By the Rev. A. Caldecott, B.D. Fcap. 8vo, with Map, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

COLONIAL CHURCH HISTORIES: the Story of the Australian Church. By the Rev. E. Symonds. Fcap. 8vo, with Map, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

A HANDBOOK of BIBLE and CHURCH MUSIC. Part I. Patriarchal and Hebrew Musical Instruments and Terms; The Temple Service; Headings of the Psalms. Part II. A Short Sketch of Ecclesiastical Music from the Earliest Christian Times to the Days of Palestrina and Purcell. By the Rev. J. ASTON WHITLOCK, M.A. With several Illustrations. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE MAGIC of SYMPATHY. Words for Troubled Minds. By Emily C. Orr. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

KING HENRY VIII. and the REFORMATION. An Address delivered in St. Giles's Parish Room, Oxford. By MONTAGUE BURROWS, M.A., R.N., Chichele Professor of Modern History. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

THE BIBLE, in WHAT SENSE the WORD of GOD. By the Right Rev. A. C. A. Hall, D.D., Bishop of Vermont. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

STRENGTH. Τὸ ἀνδρεῖον. For Public School Boys. A Sermon preached in Uppingham School Chapel, on Sunday, October 31st, 1897. By the Rev. F. P. DAVID, M.A. 18mo, limp cloth, 6d.

THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING WORLD. One hundred and ninety-two Photographic Reproductions of Views in the Colonies, the United States, &c. Oblong 4to, cloth boards, 5s.

THE ANCIENT HEBREW TRADITION as ILLUSTRATED by the MONUMENTS. A Protest Against the Modern School of Old Testament Criticism. By Dr. FRITZ HOMMEL, Professor of Semitic Languages in the University of Munich. Translated from the German by EDMUND McCCLURE, M.A., and LEONARD CROSSLE. With Map. Large post 8vo, buckram boards, 5s.

"Under the weight of Dr. Hommel's cumulative evidence the latest fortress of the 'Higher Criticism' will have to be promptly evacuated or surrendered at discretion. The book has been admirably translated by Mr. McClure and his coadjutor."—Daily Chronicle.

"As a protest against the modern school of Old Testament criticism we cordially commend the work as one of the most valuable yet published."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"We are profoundly grateful to Dr. Hommel for work whose results will do much to reassure many a timid and distressed believer."—Record.

"We can recommend Dr. Hommel's well-argued and deeply interesting book to the careful consideration of all Biblical students."—Oxford Review.

HISTORICAL CHURCH ATLAS. Illustrating the History of Eastern and Western Christendom until the Reformation, and that of the Anglican Communion until the Present Day. By EDMUND McCCLURE, M.A. Containing 18 Coloured Maps, besides some 50 Sketch Maps in the Text, 4to, cloth boards, leather back, 16s.

This Atlas is intended to indicate some of the stages of the Church's expansion, and at the same time to show briefly the interdependence of ecclesiastical and secular history. The information given on the maps has been necessarily limited by their size and number, but the main features of the spread of the Christian faith have been, it is hoped, broadly traced, and the allied changes in political geography sufficiently depicted.

"A great deal of useful information has been condensed into small compass at a moderate price."—The Times.

"The one hundred and thirty pages of letterpress into which the fifty sketch maps are incorporated form an extremely careful piece of compressed work designed to explain the large maps. They are in fact an epitome of Church history, and every effort appears to have been made to make the account precise and accurate."—Guardian.

"Every student of the Church's history in the past, or of her world-wide work in the present, should make haste to add this handsome volume to his books."—Record.

"A great deal of labour and sound scholarship has gone to the making of this atlas."—Academy.

A HANDY BOOK of the CHURCH of ENGLAND. By the Rev. Edward L. Cutts, D.D., New and Improved Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

THEODORE and WILFRITH. Lectures delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral in December, 1896. By the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop of Bristol. Small post 8vo, with several Illustrations, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

"The Bishop's polemic is sturdy in argument, but scrupulously temperate in tone, and it need hardly be said that he illustrates his thesis with great ecclesiastical and archaeological learning."—Times.

THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

These Publications are issued under the auspices of the Church Historical Society. President, the Lord Bishop of London.

THE ENGLISH REFORMATION and its CONSEQUENCES. Four Lectures, with Notes and Appendix. By W. E. COLLINS, M.A., Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

XLI. PRIESTHOOD in the ENGLISH CHURCH. A Study of the "Vindication of the Bull APOSTOLICAE CURAE." Demy 8vo, paper cover, 1s.

XLII. THE CORONATION of the QUEEN. By J. Wickham Legg, F.S.A. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 3d.

XLIV. LANCELOT ANDREWES. As a representative of Anglican Principles. A Lecture delivered at Holy Trinity Chelsea, by the Rev. W. H. FRERE. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

A Complete List of the Church Historical Society's Publications may be had on application.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.
BRIGHTON: 129, NORTH STREET.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1358.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1898.

PRICE 3d.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

H. J. GLAISHER'S New CATALOGUE of
H. J. GLAISHER'S, post free on application to H. J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller, 57, Wigmore Street, Cavendish Square, W.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, BELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and especially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 18, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No premium. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May recede with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M. care of Messrs.
Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or a GREAT person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeking Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, FURNIVAL STREET, LONDON E.C.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS OF ART and BELLES
LETTERS.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent.
The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—
Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs.
Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS
caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK AND GENERAL ASSURANCE CO., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London,
S.W. Agents wanted.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses
E. & J. Porz, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done
10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address
Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy paid.—
Apply ACADEMY OFFICE, 43, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.—
The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will be held on TUESDAY, May 17th, at the WHITEHALL ROOMS, HOTEL METROPOLE, at 7 for 7.30 p.m. precisely.
His Grace the DUKE of DEVONSHIRE, K.G., in the Chair.
Dinner Tickets, One Guinea each. DONATIONS to the Chairman's
List should be sent to the Secretary, A. LLEWELYN ROBERTS, 7, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.
(Incorporated by Royal Charter.)
Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—The Right Hon. Sir M. E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.
THURSDAY, MAY 19th, at 5 p.m., at the MUSEUM of PRACTICAL GEOLOGY, Jermyn Street, S.W., the following Paper will be read:—"THE SHERIFF'S FARM," by G. J. TURNER,
B.A., Barrister-at-Law. HUBERT HALL, Director and Hon. Sec.
115, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

HAKLUYT SOCIETY (President: Sir CLEMENTS
L. MARKHAM, K.C.B.)—A Volume on THE FIRST VOYAGE
OF VASCO DA GAMA, 1497-99. Translated and Edited by E. G.
RAVENSTEIN, Esq., is now being distributed to members by Mr.
QUAICH.
The annual subscription is One Guinea. Lists of Works already issued or in preparation may be obtained from WILLIAM FOSTER, Honorary Secretary.
Bordean, Holly Road, Waustead.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.
The PROFESSORSHIP of GERMAN LANGUAGE and LITERA-TURE is VACANT. Applications for the Chair, accompanied by any evidence of qualification which Candidates may desire to submit, should reach the Secretary by Saturday, May 21st.
J. M. HORSBROUGH, M.A., Secretary.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.
WANTED, a HEAD MASTER or HEAD MISTRESS for the PENYGOES COUNTY SCHOOL.
Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications.
Salary £120, and Capitation Fees.
Particulars will be sent on application to
J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,
Clerk to the County Governing Body.
Carnarvon, May, 1898.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.
WANTED, a HEAD MASTER for the BOTTWNOG COUNTY SCHOOL.
Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications.
Salary £120, and Capitation Fees.
Particulars will be sent on application to
J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,
Clerk to the County Governing Body.
Carnarvon, May, 1898.
(* This term includes, per Scheme, Head Mistress.)

SCHOLARSHIPS for SECONDARY TEACHERS.
The Council of the Cambridge Training College OFFER the following SCHOLARSHIPS for September, 1898, to Graduates who intend to teach—One of £30, Two of £25, and Two of £20.
Small Bursaries are also granted to Students of inadequate means.
Applications must be made before June 24th to the Principal,
Miss E. P. HUGHES, Cambridge Training College, Wollaston Road, Cambridge.

AS ASSISTANT LIBRARIAN, LITERARY
ASSISTANT, or in any similar capacity.—GRADUATE (25)
DESIRE EMPLOYMENT. Wide reading in English and French Literature and elementary German; experience in Library management.—Write "READER," care of Willings, 162, Piccadilly.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—FORTH-
COMING EXAMINATION.—JUNIOR ASSISTANT in the ART BRANCH of the SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM (18-23), 1st JUNE. The date specified in the Test at which Applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

TO AUTHORS.—Colonel ROBERT W. ROUT-LEDGE, late Managing Director of George Routledge & Sons, Limited, will be pleased to RECEIVE MSS. with a view to disposing of them for Publication. From his long experience in the Publishing Trade, Col. ROUTLEDGE has special facilities for placing Literary Work, advising as to rates of payment, drawing up agreements, &c.
Terms on application.
Temporary Office: 4, Raquet Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

LIBRARY CATALOGUING.—Mr. HENRY
HIGHAM is prepared to ARRANGE and CATALOGUE PRIVATE LIBRARIES in town or country, or to advise in the selection of books. Terms, from 12s. 6d. per hundred entries, exclusive of expenses. Highest references. More than twenty-five years' experience in the book trade.—Address, HENRY HIGHAM, 20, Wigmore Street, W.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Singing, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an exceptional English Chaperon.
Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 30 Guineas a quarter.—CHAFFRON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

SALE BY AUCTION.

Pall Mall.—Frescoes by Bernardino Luini, alleged to have been removed many years since from the old oratory of San Ambrogio, Milan.

MESSRS. FOSTER respectfully announce for SALE BY AUCTION, at the GALLERY, 54, PALL MALL, on WEDNESDAY, the 8th JUNE, a most remarkable series of FRESCOES, in great part evidently the work of the master. They have been warehoused for many years, and bear no trace of restoration since they were transferred to canvas. They comprise a grand altar piece, the Last Supper, two wings of man-of-war figures in ecstasy, four large panels, the Ascension of Christ, the Virgin enthroned, the agony in the garden, and the hall of Caiaphas; the ceiling in five panels, the lamb, eagles, and winged beasts.—May be viewed privately by appointment, and publicly four days prior to the auction.—54, Mall Mall.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

|  |   |
|--|---|
| TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONSfrom ONE GUINEAper annum.  | COUNTRYSUBSCRIPTIONS fromTWO GUINEAS per annum.   |
| LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (forweekly exchange of Books at thehouses of Subscribers) from TWOGUINEAS per annum. | N.B.—Two or Three Friends mayUNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,and thus lessen the Cost ofCarriage. |

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows Interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

Th BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT Manager.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.

6s. net, claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."

"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.

"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

|  |                      |
|--|----------------------|
| BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.                              | THE OHANNEL ISLANDS. |
| THE NORTH WALES COAST.                                   | THE ISLE of WIGHT.   |
| BRECON and its BEACONS.                                  | THE WYE VALLEY.      |
| ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.                             | THE SEVERN VALLEY.   |
| BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.             |                      |
| BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.        |                      |
| LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.        |                      |
| ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.         |                      |
| BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORIOCIETH and PŴLLHILLI.    |                      |
| MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM. |                      |
| LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.             |                      |

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.

"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

THE CATHEDRAL.

By J. K. HUYSMANS.

Translated by CLARA BELL.

With an Introduction by C. KEGAN PAUL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"In many ways the most astonishing piece of fiction which has been issued for many years."—Bookman.

THE FIRST PHILOSOPHERS of GREECE.

By Dr. ARTHUR FAIRBANKS. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

This volume contains brief biographies of the less-known early Greek philosophers, with analyses of their tenets and extracts from their works.

SIDELIGHTS of NATURE in QUILL and CRAYON:

A Book of Descriptive and Picturesque Papers on Rural Life. By E. T. EDWARDS. Richly illustrated by G. C. Haité, F.L.S., R.B.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Between them, author and artist give us a book that is daintily beautiful in form and spirit, and that gives us pleasure in every page."—Scotsman.

THE CID BALLADS, and Other Poems and Translations from Spanish and German. By the late JAMES YOUNG GIBSON. Edited by MARGARET DUNLOP GIBSON. With Memoir by AGNES SMITH LEWIS. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 12s.

"One of the most important contributions made of recent years to our knowledge of this great branch of study."—Scotsman.

"The perusal of the ballads will show how completely Mr. Gibson has seized the heroic spirit and rendered the quaint expression of the originals."—Morning Post.

"They are far superior to Lockhart's."—Athenæum.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION of BUTLER'S

"ANALOGY." By the Rev. HENRY HUGHES, Author of "Religious Faith," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE JOURNAL of EMILY SHORE. New Edition. With Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This book is one of the most remarkable of its kind."—Saturday Review.

London: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER, & CO., LTD.,
Paternoster House, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.*POPULAR NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

At all Libraries, Booksellers', and Bookstalls.

NOW READY.

THE SECOND EDITION of JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE PEACEMAKERS. By the AUTHOR of "BOOTLE'S BABY," "THE TRUTH-TELLERS," &c.

WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S NEW NOVEL.

SCRIBES and PHARISEES. By the AUTHOR of "THE EYE of ISTAR," "WHOSO FINDETH a WIFE," &c.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

LITTLE MISS PRIM. By the Author of "THE GIRLS at the GRANGE," "THE HOUSE on the MARSH," &c.

BY L. T. MEADE.

THE SIREN. By the Author of "The WAY of a WOMAN," "A SON of ISHMAEL," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BEETLE."

THE HOUSE of MYSTERY. By RICHARD MARSH.

"It is a clever tale, and deserving of many readers." Scotsman.

BY ESME STUART.

THE STRENGTH of TWO. By the AUTHOR of "ARRESTED," "A WOMAN of FORTY," &c.

JEAN MIDDLEMASS'S NEW NOVEL.

BLANCHE CONINGHAM'S SUR-RENDER. By the AUTHOR of "DANDY."

NEW NOVEL BY E. YOLLAND.

MISTRESS BRIDGET. By the Author of "IN DAYS of STRIFE."

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1897.

SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF ISSUE OF ANNUAL CATALOGUE.

THE

ENGLISH CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

FOR THE YEAR 1897.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 224, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

It contains a much longer List of Works than last year's Catalogue, including an addition of some 1,400 more Titles, but the price remains the same, viz., 5s. net, cloth limp; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S ' S

CRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

Writer's Cramp.

"G. J., aged 33, wrote 7-8 hrs. daily. ...after about 7 yrs. of this employment the initial symptoms of writer's cramp first declared themselves...I learn the cramp now affects the whole arm and he intends to abandon his present occupation for another of a totally different description."

B'ham Medical Review.

"I may add in my practice as a surgeon, I have found the gold-nib a preventative as well as a corrective of writer's cramp—no slight recommendation, I think."

Herbert Vine, M.B., C.M.

Send for Illustrated Price List or call—

MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
Manufacturers of Gold Nibs and the
Swan Fountain Pen,
93, Cheapside; 95, Regent Street;
21, High Street, Kensington.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

New Spring Announcement List, beautifully Illustrated, will be sent post free on Application.

A SPLENDID NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. With Frontispiece by Frances Ewan.

A Stolen Life.

By M. McDONNELL BODKIN, Q.C.,
Author of "White Magic," "Lord Edward Fitzgerald," &c.

"A remarkable story of the transference of two souls into other bodies. It would be difficult for the most skilful novelist to utilise the idea more cleverly.....It may safely be said that the reader, young or old, who is not interested and entertained by this amazing excursion into the regions of hypnotic phenomena is not worth writing for."
The Morning Leader.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each.

Just ready. A New Novel by E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

As a Man Lives. 3s. 6d.

The Author of "False Evidence," "The World's Great Snare," "The Amazing Judgment," &c., &c., has never written a more powerfully interesting and dramatic work than this. From the first page to the last the reader's interest is enchained.

Just ready. RICHARD MARSH'S New Novel.
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

The Datchet Diamonds. 3s. 6d.

By RICHARD MARSH,
Author of "The Crime and the Criminal," "Philip Bennion's Death," &c.
"Clever, amusing, original, and surprising..... As exciting as any reader could desire."
Scotsman.

Just ready. A New Story of Adventure, by the Author of "Titus," of which over 1,000,000 copies have been sold in America.

Prisoners of the Sea. 3s. 6d.

By FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

The Author has based this absorbingly interesting story upon the mystery of the Men in the Iron Mask. It is written with force and skill, and the interest of the reader never flags.

With Frontispiece by Frances Ewan.

Sir Tristram. 3s. 6d.

By THOROLD ASHLEY.

A powerful story, full of humorous touches and pathetic incidents, and written in a bright and crisp literary style. Sir Tristram, although a baronet, is not one of the conventional type.

Now ready. With Frontispiece by Raymond Potter.
J. S. FLETCHER'S New Romance.

Pasquinado. 3s. 6d.

"An exceptionally well-told tale. The pathetic verisimilitude imparts an irresistible fascination."—The Daily Telegraph.

Illustrated by Powell Chase.

Philippi the Guardsman. 3s. 6d.

By T. R. THRELFALL.

This is a stirring novel, dealing with one of the most critical periods in the history of Europe, the scene being laid in the very midst of the Napoleonic Wars. From the first page to the last the interest never flags, and the characters are drawn with a strong hand.

A WORK OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE.

Now ready. Long 8vo, sewn, 1s.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "MADE IN GERMANY."

Marching Backward 1s.

By ERNEST E. WILLIAMS,

Author of "Made in Germany," "The Imperial Heritage," &c., &c.

A brilliant treatise on the burning question of increased foreign competition and depressed home industries, with the causes and remedies of those evils.

Marching Backward. 1s.

By ERNEST E. WILLIAMS.

Commerce called Mr. Williams' previous book

"One of the most opportune and important commercial works ever written."

JUST READY.

A NEW NOVEL BY GUY BOOTHBY.

THE LUST OF HATE.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

With 6 Full-Page Illustrations by STANLEY L. WOOD.

The SCOTSMAN says:—"Intensely interesting. . . . Mr. Boothby in 'The Lust of Hate' has recreated his famous Dr. Nikola. . . . A story of such exciting incident that the reader recovers breath only when the hero is well away from the shores of England. With artistic realism he describes the thrilling and romantic incidents, and gives free scope to his powerful descriptive pen. . . . Fairly captivates the reader."

The NEWCASTLE CHRONICLE says:—"There is enough excitement tery to satisfy the most insatiable appetite."

The WESTMINSTER GAZETTE says:—"The story is brimming over with incident. . . . The author has never written anything better."

GUY BOOTHBY'S POPULAR NOVELS

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, bevelled, 5s. each.

Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

BUSHIGRAMS.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

DR. NIKOLA.

A BID FOR FORTUNE.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL.

THE MARRIAGE OF ESTHER.

IN STRANGE COMPANY.

JUST READY.

"AN INTENSELY INTERESTING BOOK."—SPORTING CHRONICLE.

Crown 8vo, wrapper, 2s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Illustrated by Eighty Photographs.

WITH BAT AND BALL:

OR,

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF INTERNATIONAL CRICKET.

WITH HINTS TO YOUNG CRICKETERS.

By GEORGE GIFFEN

(The "W. G. Grace" of Australia).

"A book which we may say we like immensely, and which we unhesitatingly recommend to our readers. It is honestly worth a good deal more than the figure at which it is offered. The illustration alone are well worth the money."—Athletic News.

"There is not a dull page from first to last. Indeed, Mr. Giffen is to be congratulated upon having given us a book on cricket which is worthy to rank beside any that have yet dealt with the game."—St. James's Gazette.

Just ready. Vol. VII. of the

WINDSOR MAGAZINE.

Royal 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.

CONTAINING:—

KRONSTADT. By MAX PEMBERTON.

Complete with about Forty Illustrations by A. FORESTIER.

Together with Hundreds of Brilliant Stories and Articles by

|               |                |                  |
|---------------|----------------|------------------|
| GRANT ALLEN.  | GUY BOOTHBY.   | WILLIAM WESTALL. |
| W. W. JACOBS. | HARRY FURNISS. | I. ZANGWILL.     |
| IAN MACLAREN. | L. T. MEADE    | ADA CAMBRIDGE.   |
| ROBERT BARR.  | PERCY ANDREÆ.  | ETHEL TURNER.    |

Nearly 800 Pages, Magnificently Illustrated.

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

AMÉLIE RIVES'S New Novel,
MERIEL, by the Author of "The Quick or the Dead?" "Barbara Dering," &c., will be ready immediately. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE HERITAGE of EVE. By H. H. SPETTIGUE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A RACE for MILLIONS. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Good wine needs no bush, neither does this first-rate detective story need further recommendation than the advice to get it at once. The first chapter once begun, the reader is bound to go on until the last is reached; then—so successfully has Mr. Christie Murray cultivated the 'soul of wit'—he will probably wish there were more."
Vanity Fair.

ACADEMY NOTES, 1898 (originated by HENRY BLACKBURN), now ready, contains a number of Copyright Pictures not found in any other publication. 1s.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of the PARIS SALON. With over 300 Drawings. 3s.

THROUGH the GOLD-FIELDS of ALASKA to BERING STRAITS. By HARRY DE WINDT. With 34 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

"The story of his rescue at half-past the eleventh hour by a belated whaler is one of the most dramatic and thrilling bits of romance in real life I have read for some time."
Pall Mall Gazette.

LIFE of NAPOLEON III. By Archibald FORBES. With 37 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

"It carries the reader breathless to the closing scene at Chislehurst."
Punch.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A WOMAN TEMPTED HIM. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Second Edition. "The book is in every respect a delightful one."
Daily Telegraph.

WAS SHE JUSTIFIED? By FRANK BARRETT, Author of "Folly Morrison," &c. "The story is a capital one from beginning to end."
World.

MISS BALMAINE'S PAST. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Beyond the Pale," &c. "A very enchanting story... a very delightful novel."
Vanity Fair.

FORTUNE'S GATE. By ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity." "One of the wholesomest and most delightful excursions into fiction."
Morning Leader.

A WOMAN WORTH WINNING. By G. MANVILLE FENN, Author of "The White Virgin." "The book should not fail to prove enjoyable to everyone who takes it up."
Scotsman.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY, Author of "Rujub the Juggler." "A rattling good story."
Daily Mail.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE PROFESSOR'S EXPERIMENT. By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.

MARRIED or SINGLE? By B. M. CROKER.

LADY KILPATRICK. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

IS HE THE MAN? By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

THE RIDDLE RING. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

LONG ODDS. By HAWLEY SMART. [May 19.]

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

A FOUNTAIN SEALED. By WALTER BESANT. With Frontispiece.

A MODERN DICK WHITTINGTON; or, A Paragon of Letters. By JAMES PAYN. With Portrait of the Author.

NŪLMA. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "Mrs. Tresaskiss."

LOVICE. By Mrs. HUNGERFORD, Author of "Lady Patty."

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

HORACE MARSHALL & SON'S
NEW BOOKS.

The STORY of the EMPIRE SERIES.
The STORY of the EMPIRE SERIES.

Edited by HOWARD A. KENNEDY.

Handsomely bound in red art-linen.

Price 1s. 6d. per volume.

The TIMES says: It may be said generally of these useful little volumes that no English schoolroom should be without them, and many people who have long left the schoolroom may be glad to find within reach so easy and agreeable a means of increasing their knowledge of the British Empire.

NEW ZEALAND.
NEW ZEALAND.

By the Hon. W. P. REEVES,
Formerly Minister of Education in New Zealand, now Agent-General in London for the Colony.

A valuable addition to the literature of empire-building.—Daily Chronicle.

A model of what such books should be... so ingeniously are facts, figures, and story woven together. A brilliant little essay.—Daily News.

The STORY of SOUTH AFRICA.
The STORY of SOUTH AFRICA.

By W. BASIL WORSFOLD.

A thrilling and impressive story.—Church Times.
The best elementary primer of South African history yet published.—Critic.

THE STORY of CANADA.
THE STORY of CANADA.

By HOWARD A. KENNEDY.

A well-told and sympathetic tale.

Daily Chronicle.

A picturesque yet none the less historically accurate narrative.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE STORY of AUSTRALIA.
THE STORY of AUSTRALIA.

By FLORA L. SHAW.

An excellent short history.—Athenaeum.

Reads like a delightful romance.—Spectator.

THE STORY of INDIA.
THE STORY of INDIA.

By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.

A sterling little hook.—Morning Post.

Will supply much new knowledge.—The Times.

THE RISE of the EMPIRE.
THE RISE of the EMPIRE.

By Sir WALTER BESANT.

Written with all the author's practised charm.
Daily Chronicle.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S
New and Recent Novels.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE

By JOHN BERWICK.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

BY THE SAME.

THE SECRET of SAINT FLOREL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"A fascinating story.....The thrilling interest of the narrative is continuously sustained.....Teems with novel incidents and bristles with exciting adventures."

THE CONCERT-DIRECTOR.

By NELLIE K. BLISSETT,

Author of "The Wisdom of the Simple,"

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MAN OF THE FAMILY:

A Story of Fortunatus and the Barbarians.

By F. EMILY PHILLIPS.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Academy.—"A clever story."

BY THE SAME.

THE EDUCATION of ANTONIA.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"She has keen observation, and her characters are drawn with clearness and decision of touch."

THE FOREST LOVERS:

A Romance.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Ready May 17.]

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

CORLEONE: a Tale of Sicily.

In 2 vols. Globe 8vo, 12s.

Times.—"The most attractive tale he has yet written..... It is many a day since we have read a better one."

Speaker.—"Almost, if not quite, the strongest and most striking of the brilliant series of romances to which it belongs."

A ROSE of YESTERDAY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily News.—"We cannot but admire this poignant and beautiful story."

TAQUISARA. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Cannot fail to be read with interest and pleasure by all to whom clever characterisation and delicate drawing make appeal."

BY MRS. HUGH FRASER.

A CHAPTER of ACCIDENTS.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Literature.—"Her tale is at once exquisite and full of life."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"A thoroughly enjoyable, mirthful comedy."

PALLADIA. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Saturday Review.—"It has a capital plot, fascinating characters, and much dramatic interest. .... A good piece of work, full of interest and humour."

BY JAMES LANE ALLEN.

Ninety-fifth Thousand.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Church Quarterly Review.—"A charmingly sweet and pathetic story.... It is long since we met in fiction a more fascinating creation than Mrs. Falconer."

Edinburgh Review.—"The book is a real effort of the creative imagination, a real addition to the literature of its country, and one which should serve as a fruitful and permanent example."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS:                                   | PAGE    |
|--|---------|
| Italian Literature .....                   | 513     |
| Old Ballads .....                          | 514     |
| A Man of Parts .....                       | 515     |
| A Poetess, Novelist, and Lady Farmer ..... | 516     |
| Through China with a Camera .....          | 518     |
| Journalism for Women .....                 | 518     |
| Canada a Nation .....                      | 519     |
| BRIEFER MENTION .....                      | 519     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT .....               | 521-524 |
| NOTES AND NEWS .....                       | 525     |
| PURE FABLES .....                          | 528     |
| A MEMORIAL: AND A MORAL .....              | 528     |
| HERMANN SUPERMANN .....                    | 528     |
| POLYLOT PUBLISHING .....                   | 529     |
| PARIS LÉTTRE .....                         | 529     |
| THE WEEK .....                             | 530     |
| ART .....                                  | 530     |
| DRAMA .....                                | 531     |
| CORRESPONDENCE .....                       | 532     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED .....                | 533     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED .....                       | 534     |
| Announcements .....                        | 534     |

REVIEWS.

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

A History of Italian Literature. By Richard Garnett. (Heinemann.)

THIS volume is the fourth in the series of Short Histories of the Literatures of the World. It is well arranged and perspicuous, written in lucid and cultivated style, with the scholarly refinement and wide knowledge of various literatures which we associate with Dr. Garnett. Only here and there are we disturbed in the full acceptance of his conclusions by a passing doubt as to the entire impeccability of his taste; when, for example, he classes Byron with Goethe and Shelley as modern masters of sublimity, or talks with most unnecessarily exalted respect of Bryant's respectable Thanatopsis. The one real failing on which we are inclined to remonstrate with him is an insistent obtrusion of controversial matter, which might have been avoided or minimised in a history of literature, and a naïf partiality where such matter presents itself. A single instance is so unconsciously amusing that we may cite it. Cardinal Guido Bentivoglio, a Papal nuncio, wrote a history of the revolt of the Netherlands. It is, says Dr. Garnett, "necessarily defective as coming from the wrong side." Not, you observe, because it is the work of a partisan, but because it is the work of a partisan "on the wrong side"—the side, that is, opposed to Dr. Garnett's sympathies. If a book happen to be the work of a partisan on the "right side," Dr. Garnett figuratively backs it for all it is worth. Another drawback inevitable to all such work is the inefficiency of most poetical translations. In the early portion we have the invaluable aid of Rossetti's versions; but in the later part, except for the late Mr. Symonds and some very pleasing specimens by Miss Ellen Clarke, the translations mostly leave us in darkness, with an impression that the merit we are invited to see in the originals must be wholly a merit of diction and external form, which has vaporated in transmission. The first sensation, when we have laid down the book, is a sensation of disappointment. Accustomed to our own opulent literature, Italian literature seems such an unexpectedly small thing. We expect that behind the world-wide names known by repute to every cultivated general reader we shall be introduced to a feast of lesser, yet distinguished glories. But expectation is foiled. When the trees are cleared whose spreading branches fill the foreground of literary history, there is revealed only a sparsely verdurous tract, which would pass unnoticed in any of the great spaces of English literature. The reason of this is indicated by Dr. Garnett in his preface. Italian literature, great though it be, is not the chief outcome of the Italian mind. Why this should be so Mrs. Moynell has shown in an unrepublished essay. The racial gift of the Latin nations, she says, is intelligence, of the Teutons intellect. The Latin has the outward eye, the quick, sympathetic receptivity of the child: he is intelligent. And this makes for art, for acting. The Teuton is not a born actor, a born artist (take him in general); he lacks the childlike intelligent receptivity, the quick telepathy between eye and hand, passion and word, impulse and gesture: he is too slow, inward, and reflective; he is too intellectual. But this, which is our loss in art and acting, is our gain in literature. It is our prerogative that we are an intellectual nation, that our greatness is unsurpassably seated in literature. Our masterpieces do not fill the galleries of Europe, because our gallery of poets is the richest the world has seen. Our actors are hopelessly inferior to the actors of the South, because our drama is the greatest in Europe. From this distinction of national character it comes that Italian literature is after all a limited thing by the side of ours. Coventry Patmore, in what Dr. Garnett calls "a very just remark," though he does not quote it textually, observed that Italian poetry was marked by acuteness rather than breadth; that Dante was to Shakespeare as the Peak of Teneriffe to the Table-land of Thibet. And on Dante really rests the greatness of Italian literature—at least its main greatness. Besides Shakespeare, we have ourselves only one other poet of supreme rank. But our poetry does not drop plumb from Shakespeare as does the poetry of Italy from Dante to Ariosto, Tasso, and Petrarch. It descends by equal steps through Milton, Chaucer, Spenser, to Wordsworth, Coleridge, and the rest—Wordsworth and Coleridge, if essence is to rank before length, being in our humble opinion greater than any of Dante's successors. But the stream of Italian energy which flowed into the mould of literature was a small portion of the nation's energies. The intelligent genius of Italy was mainly occupied in producing the most wonderful succession of artists in Europe. The marvel is that she had yet energy left over to create the second greatest literature in Europe.

It is a curious fact, disclosed by Dr. Garnett, that Italian literature can hardly be said to have had beginnings. A little ring of poets singing at Palermo, under the patronage of Frederick II. of Germany, on Provençal models, but in Tuscan dialect—that is the first trace we get of it. And then we come immediately upon the fore-runners of Dante. Here is a charming lyric by Frederick himself, who wrote better than his namesake the Great, if he did not fight better.

"Each morn I hear his voice bid them
That watch me, to be faithful spies
Lest I go forth to see the skies;
Each night to each he saith the same;
And in my soul and in mine eyes
There is a burning heat like flame."

Thus grieves she now; but she shall wear
This love of mine whereof I spoke
About her body for a cloak,
And for a garland in her hair,
Even yet; because I mean to prove,
Not to speak only, this my love."

By this Sicilian school the seed was sown, and it was from Provence that the inspiration came, as from Italy came the inspiration of the early Elizabethans. The seed sprang up with marvellous rapidity. Guittone di Arezzo is the first conspicuous name of the indigenous Italian school which quickly followed these Provençalised Sicilians; conspicuous because he was the first who gave its permanent shape to that peculiarly Italian form, the sonnet. Then the Florentine school starts into being with Guido Guicelli, and treading on his heels came Guido Cavalcanti, who eclipsed him, in turn to give place to Dante, the eclipser of all. Thus, in the very outset, with unparalleled swiftness, Italian poetry reached the greatest height it ever attained. The two forms which Dante's predecessors established in permanent use were the sonnet and the less-known canzone—less-known in England. The canzone has variations in form; but of the most typical Dr. Garnett gives a specimen in a fragment from Cavalcanti. Since the form is so unfamiliar to Englishmen, we may quote it.

"But when I looked on death, made visible From my heart's sojourn brought before mine eyes,
And holding in his hand my grievous sin,
I seemed to see my countenance, that fell,
Shake like a shadow: my heart uttered cries,
And my soul wept the curse that lay therein.
Then Death: 'Thus much thine urgent prayer shall win:
I grant thee the brief interval of youth
At natural pity's strong soliciting.'
And I (because I knew that moment's ruth
But left my life to groan for a frail space)
Fell in the dust upon my weeping face."

Over Dante himself we need not pause. Dr. Garnett himself recognises the necessity of taking the reader's Dantean knowledge largely for granted, so vast is the theme. Along with him was a band of other poets, who may be studied in Rossetti's Dante and his Circle; most conspicuous, perhaps, after Cavalcanti, at once his predecessor and contemporary, being Cino da Pistoia, in whom may be recognised echoes of Dante, as in Dante the influence of Cavalcanti is traceable enough. But one thing should be noted, which is generally overlooked, that in Dante we have also the beginnings of Italian prose, as well as the high-water mark of Italian poetry. The greater part of the "Vita Nuova" is, after all, prose, and very distinguished prose.

After the passing of Dante and the trecentisti, another flower-time of Italian literature bursts upon us in the latter fourteenth century, with the advent of Lorenzo de Medici and the Renaissance. Lorenzo was himself a poet, elegant if not powerful; and about him arose a race of poets. Politian, famous for his Latin writings, left us also vernacular poems of great grace and polish. His lyric tragedy, "Orfeo," marks the beginnings of the Italian drama—never a very strong plant. The Giostra celebrates a tournament of which Giuliano di Medici was the hero, and that prince's love for Simonetta. But Politian's minor poems are his best. Of this period, however, the ultimate outcomes are Petrarch and Boccaccio. What Boccaccio did for the prose of Italy needs no recounting. Italian became a prose language in his hands. But his poems are also among the permanent things of literature, though overshadowed by the glories of Petrarch. Petrarch's famous series of sonnets and canzoni, the zenith of Italian lyric poetry, is known to all men by name; but beyond the fact that his mistress was named Laura, and that he was crowned in the Capitol, few Englishmen have any practical knowledge of him. Truth is, he does not bear translation. Only a Rossetti would have had much chance with poems so dependent on their beauty of diction; and Rossetti's tastes did not lie in the Petrarchan line. From Surrey and his compeers downward, Petrarch has been sometimes translated, more often imitated, by Englishmen; but no poet and no versifier has succeeded in naturalising him, as Dante has been naturalised by Rossetti, or Tasso by Fairfax. We quote a specimen of his sonnets, which is perhaps as near the original as our language will allow:

"Exalted by my thought to regions where
I find whom earthly quest hath never shown,
Where Love hath rule 'twixt fourth and second zone;
More beautiful I found her, less austere.
Clasping my hand, she said, 'Behold the sphere
Where we shall dwell, if Wish hath truly known.
I am, who wrung from thee such bitter moan;
Whose sun went down ere evening did appear.
My bliss, too high for men to understand,
Yet needs thee, and the veil that so did please,
Now unto dust for briefest season given.'
Why ceased she speaking? Why withdrew her hand?
For, rapt to ecstasy by words like these,
Little I wanted to have stayed in heaven."

Mr. Symonds's versions are as good as anything we possess, short of Rossetti's poetic inspiration. Assuredly we get beauty here. Yet, in English, we feel the Dantean mysticism, without the arduous simplicity which compels belief in Dante. No, Petrarch must be read in the original.

This period also saw the flourishing of the Italian novelisti, on whom our dramatists drew so largely for their plots; masters of the "short story" as it presented itself to the naïf and leisurely mind of that age. Some of them were also poets; and from one of them (Sacchetti) we take a charming lyric of the pastoral order, which exemplifies the concluding phase of fourteenth century lyricism:

"I think your beauties might make fair complaint

Of being thus shown ever mount and dell;
Because no city were so excellent

But that your stay therein were honourable.

In very truth, now does it like you well
To live so poorly on the hill-side here?

'Better it liketh one of us, pardie,
Behind her flock to seek the pasture-stance,
Far better than it liketh one of ye

To ride unto your curtained rooms and daunce.

We seek no riches, neither golden chance Save wealth of flowers to weave into our hair.'

Behold, if I were now as once I was,
I'd make myself a shepherd on some hill,
And without telling anyone, would pass,

Where these girls went, and follow at their will.

And 'Mary,' and 'Martin,' we would murmur still,

And I would be for ever where they were."

With the fifteenth century, prose subsided, giving place to Latin, the learned tongue; and poetry developed in the direction of the romantic epic. Sannazzaro also set the model of the pastoral romance, followed by Montemayor in Spain, and by Sidney's "Arcadia" in England. The cycle of the Charlemagne legends was exploited. Pulci wove it into the "Morgante Maggiore," whence ultimately came Byron's "Don Juan," through Pulci's more burlesque successor, Berni. Boiardo constructed from the same source the "Orlando Innamorato," only to be overshadowed by Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." Yet how little it deserved such a fate may be seen from the lovely passage quoted by Dr. Garnett, in which Rinaldo is attacked by Love and his attendant ladies. They beat him with rose-garlands, pelt him with flowers, and Love strikes him down with a tall lily-stem; leaving him bruised and discomforted by the magical assault—a charming allegorical fancy.

The sixteenth century saw the restoration of prose by the great historian Guicciardini and the famous Machiavelli. It saw also the learned and artificial genius of Cardinal Bembo, the friend of Michael Angelo's friend, Vittoria Colonna. Alas for romance! He seems to have possessed more authority with her than the great painter. But the poets of the age were a poor set. It was the day of the Petrarchists, who possessed nothing of Petrarch's genius—Molza, Bernardo Tasso, Annibale Caro. But the great Torquato Tasso came to redeem it with the "Jerusalem Delivered" and the "Aminta." Guarini followed with the "Pastor Fido"—the model of Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess." The seventeenth century saw the ascendancy of Marini, whose "conceited" style did much to mar Crashaw and other English poets of the same day. Chiabrera, Redi, Filicaja, struck a manlier lyric note; so did Campanella, the author of some very fine and noble sonnets. But it was the setting of the sun. The eighteenth century paralysed poetic poetry in Italy as in England; though it saw the culmination of the Italian drama in Metastasio, the virile Alfieri, and the comedies of Goldoni. But Italy's drama was a poor thing at its best compared with France or Germany, much less England or Spain. With the nineteenth century came revival. Monti, Ugo Foscolo, Manzoni, all introduced a fresh lyric fervour, leading up to the modern Italian literature of Leopardi and his successors. It is a feature of Dr. Garnett's excellent little book that he brings it down to date, considering at length even so recent a writer as "D'Annunzio."

It is, you will see, a scanty succession of really great names compared with our own gloriously rich literary history. For that very reason Dr. Garnett has been able to do better justice to it within a brief compass than would have been possible in the case of our own literature. A similar review of English authors would become a mere dry skeleton of a book. That Dr. Garnett's emphatically is not. It is well-proportioned, interesting, and scholarly, from start to finish, and should become a useful and popular handbook for those who seek an introduction to the second greatest literature of Europe. FRANCIS THOMPSON.

OLD BALLADS.

English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Edited by Francis James Child. Vol. X. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

THE late Prof. Child, of Harvard, did not live to see the publication of his tenth and final volume of ballads. It is yet more unfortunate that he left only a few blurred pages of his general ballad theory. Nobody has had the courage to supply this want in the volume edited by Mr. Kittredge. Yet, however imperfectly, the lacuna ought to be filled. The materials, in unexampled richness, have been supplied by Mr. Child himself.

The history of ballad study is well known, from Mr. Pepys to Bishop Percy, from Percy to Scott, from Scott to Child. There was the age of collection of printed ballads; the age of collection of oral versions; and the age of comparative study of the ballads of all races, with their kinsfolk, popular tales or Märchen, and devinettes, or riddles. The second period was contaminated by impostures, by ballads forged en bloc, and by editorial interpretations. Bishop Percy treated the oral versions in his famous folio "with a free hand," and the echoes of Ritson's indignation are sounding yet. Surtees forged ballads which took in Scott, and it is difficult or impossible to be certain that Scott did not improve some of the Border chants. The mystery of "Auld Maitland" remains as deep as ever, for it has not a genuine air, yet seems beyond the skill of Hogg, on whom alone suspicion can rest. The supercheries of the eighteenth century are easily detected, but who could have stamped "The Red Harlaw" as modern if Scott had given it as old?

Sir Walter already had glimpses of the comparative method, especially as to Märchen. Analogues of the ballads were found in Scandinavian countries by Jamieson; then in Germany, then in France, Italy, Spain, Greece, and the Slavonic lands. Moreover, stories parallel to the plot of the ballads are discovered among savage peoples.

Mr. Child, in 1857-58, published, mainly from printed sources, the best collection of ballads then accessible. He next, with Dr. Furnivall, secured the publication of Percy's folio, and its sins against orthodox tradition were conspicuous. Finally, aided by the zeal of Mr. MacMath, Mr. Child won his way to all known MS. sources. In 1890, Mrs. Maxwell Scott gave him access to Sir Walter's unpublished collections. The Skene, Buchan, and other MSS. did not escape him. He had allies everywhere, who found for him oral variants in all directions from Norfolk to New York. He compared all foreign collections, all the masses of chap-books and broadsides. The result is his great work, with every known variant and every attainable foreign parallel. No doubt there are still gleanings; examples are given in the present volume. A few additions may be made, but Mr. Child's great work must remain classical and monumental. Either English or American scholarship ought to sum up the evidence, and draw such conclusions as may be drawn. We ask, What is the age and origin of the romantic ballads; what was the method of diffusion? How, for example, does "The Bonny Hynd" find its way into the Finnish Kalewala? Why are certain Märchen "balladised" while others only occur in prose? The question of the historical ballads and of their relation to history must be discussed. It appears that the ballad of "Johnny Armstrong" is itself the source of the statements about that hero in Pitseottie's Chronicle and other Scottish prose versions. On the other hand, is "Kinmont Willie" the source of Satchell's version, or vice versa? These are among the problems of ballad lore, and they need to be examined with the unsparing method of Comparetti's treatment of the Kalewala. Nobody could have executed the task like Mr. Child, but it should not be left undone.

In the present volume is a variant of the ballad of "Riddles wisely Expounded," from a Rawlinson MS. in the Bodleian, of about 1450. "The Elfin Knight" is illustrated from the Croatian, and from Massachusetts. The Kurds contribute to "Lady Isabel and the Elfin Knight" in a detail. The Turks add to learning about "Earl Brand," and the Basutos have a prose parallel to "The Two Sisters." As for "Lord Randal" the donnée is just as likely to have inspired the historic legend of the Lombard Queen, Rosamunda, in the sixth century, as to be derived from the legend, and this we take to be a general rule when what is historic legend in one place is ballad or tale in another. "The Twa Brothers," in a local variant, is still sung after a St. George play, when men go "souling" on All Souls' Day, at a village near Chester—so tenacious is tradition. A fact much more singular is the actual occurrence of sympathetic suffering by the husband during his wife's confinement, as in the Cowade (note on "Fair Janet," with authorities, and an explanation by "suggestion." The prudent medical authorities are not named.) The belief is not unpopular in England, and perhaps the Cowade rests on the primitive prevalence of this psychological condition. The "poor whites" of North Carolina have preserved a form of "The Wife of Usher's Well"; it is more English and less mystic than the familiar version. In fact, thanks to Miss Emma Backus, North Carolina yields several variants.

The ballad of "The Queen's Marie" has caused much controversy. Does it date from 1563, when a French maid of Mary Stuart was hanged for child-murder, or only from 1719, when a certain Mary Hamilton died for the same crime, at the Court of Peter the Great? Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe suggested the latter opinion, followed by Mr. Child, and, we think, by Mr. Courthope. The discovery of an apothecary in an Abbotsford MS., and of a real apothecary as lover and accomplice in Randolph's letters to Cecil from the Court of Holyrood, finally led Mr. Child to prefer, on the whole, the orthodox theory that "The Queen's Marie" is of the sixteenth, not the eighteenth century. The present writer takes some pride in having altered Mr. Child's opinion (actual certainty is impossible), for it is next to inconceivable that a ballad of the first merit should have been composed in the year of the Glenshiel Rising. He also rescued an oral variant:

"O little did my mither think
At night when she cradled me,
That I wad sleep in a nameless grave,
And hang on the gallows tree."

This is much inferior to the well-known lines scratched by Carlyle on a window-pane:

"What countries I should wander o'er,
And what death I should die."

Where a ring is used instead of a crystal, for seeing a distant person (in "Northumberland Betrayed by Douglas"), Mr. Child cites an Irish folk tale. He would also have found a parallel—looking through a hole in a small stone—in Mr. Mackenzie's "The Brahan Seer." It is curious to find the Scottish naval hero, Andrew Barton, of Henry the Eighth's time, remembered in a ballad sung by a cadet of West Point. King George takes the rôle of Henry VIII., and Captain Charles Stewart that of the Howards, who put down Barton, thus leading to the quarrel that was fought out at Flodden. There was a Charles Stewart, said to be a son of Prince Charles, in the French Navy about 1780. If one may hint a defect, it is that Mr. Child, in editing historical ballads—at least in this one—went to Lesley, Hall, and Buchanan for facts, rather than to the authentic State Papers. In the famous "Dead Brother" (or "Suffolk Miracle") Mr. Child recognises a very strong probability for ultimate derivation from the modern Greek. If this could be made out, much light would be thrown on the problem of diffusion. The ballad is certainly strongest, and has most variants, in Albania, Bulgaria, Servia, and Greece. But in these countries the conditions favourable to popular poetry most prevail.

These are only scattered notes from the latest gleanings, but they illustrate the extent and curiosity of the topic. A brief biographical notice of Mr. Child, by Mr. Kittredge, an excellent glossary and index, and a number of ballad airs, with a capital bibliography, complete this really monumental work of learning. Let us hope that "the unfinished window in Aladdin's tower" need not "unfinished remain." The pupils of Mr. Child owe to his memory the general statement of his results. They, if any one, have a knowledge of his conclusions as to the main problems of the ballad. Where popular ballad and literary mediæval romance coincide in theme, which is, as a rule, borrowed from the other? We think that popular fancy is usually the real source, but the opposite theory has its partisans.

ANDREW LANG.

A MAN OF PARTS.

The Honourable Sir Charles Murray, K.C.B.:
A Memoir. By the Right Honourable
Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M.P.
(Edinburgh: Blackwood.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL is to be congratulated on having achieved a fine success in this biography. Yet the subject and material were not very promising. The career of Sir Charles Murray was one of honour and credit. He was an excellent scholar, a writer of note, an efficient member of the diplomatic service, a courtier, and a sportsman, but in no branch of activity did he assume a place of the first importance. Again, although he lived in close intimacy with the most distinguished men of his time, no record of it was kept, and the book has less than the usual percentage of ana. Indeed its poverty in this respect is at times disappointing. We are told, for instance, that the intercourse "between Murray and the philosopher of Chelsea continued till Carlyle's last years of decrepitude," yet it is represented here by only one letter and one allusion. No mention whatever is made of Tennyson, Thackeray, Dickens, or Ruskin, the most brilliant of Murray's literary contemporaries. Of John Henry Newman, who was his tutor at Oxford, Murray gives only this singular description:

"He never inspired me, or my fellow graduates, with any interest, much less respect: on the contrary, we disliked or rather mistrusted him. He walked with his head bent, abstracted, but every now and then looking out of the corners of his eyes quickly, as though suspicious. . . . At lecture he was quiet, what I should call sheepish; stuck to the text, and never diverged into contemporary history or made the lecture interesting. He always struck me as the most pusillanimous of men—wanting in the knowledge of human nature; and I am always surprised, and indeed never can understand, how it was he became such a great man."

The impression made by genius on cleverish commonplaceness was never recorded more frankly. Samuel Rogers filled the Murray ideal more adequately than Newman. It is doubtful, however, if Sir Herbert Maxwell has done well in printing so many of the banker poet's letters. They must have been pleasant to receive, filled as they are with the most amiable prittle-prattle, and we do not wonder that they were treasured by the family, but they lack the vividness of phrase and colour that alone would have given them a public interest. When in Germany young Murray, by a piece of adroitness, managed to interview Goethe, and to obtain an autograph from him. The quatrain selected for the purpose is such a fine specimen of the deep and tranquil wisdom to which the poet attained that we cannot forbear transcribing it:

“Liegt dir Gestern klar und offen,
Wirkst du heute kräftig treu;
Kannst auch auf ein Morgen hoffen,
Das nicht minder glücklich sey.”

They are lines which Carlyle, writing in 1869, says he had known by heart for forty years; yet his translation, though not unfaithful, is inelegant and fails to do the original justice. Sir Walter Scott was known to Murray in his youth, but there is nothing about him except a bare chronicle of the fact. The same remark may be applied to Fennimore Cooper, whose work supplied the model for Murray's most successful novel, The Prairie Bird. Sir Herbert Maxwell does not rely for interest on a collection of tit-bits about celebrities. He touches a deeper and more powerful note. However pleasantly it may be written, the retrospect of a long life is always touching and mournful. It vividly realises that evanescence which is, at the root, the most pathetic feature of human life; it calls voices and names and faces from the irrevocable past; it enforces the lesson of the sun-dial—Time passeth. Sir Charles Murray was almost ninety when he died, so that his childhood synchronises with the first years of the century. The changes he witnessed, therefore, intensify our regret that he never wrote the autobiography which he began on several occasions. The most capable biographer, especially if, as in this instance, he had no personal acquaintance with his subject, can only give us the dry bones of a life. He dare not, as the novelist does, imagine or “divine” the million of trivial incidents and details that give colour and atmosphere to the story. For instance, there is not much to awaken interest in the mere fact that young Murray spent much of his boyhood in Hamilton Palace. Luckily, he left behind some notes which help us to picture society as it was when the century was in its teens. He shows us the ninth duke (who died in 1819) with the ceremonious manners of the preceding hundred years, and still wearing a wig tied behind with a ribbon, just as if he had lived in the days of “the wee wee German lairdie.” And here is a droll little anecdote concerning a dessert-spoon, an article unknown in Scotland in the beginning of the century, though it had lately been introduced at the Palace:

“A rough county squire dining for the first time at Hamilton had been served in the second course with a sweet dish containing cream or jelly, and with it the servant handed him a dessert-spoon. The laird turned it round and round in his fist, and said to the servant:

“What do you gie me this for, ye d—d fule? Do ye think ma mooth has got any smaller since a lappit up ma soup?”

At Glen Finart, the home of the Murrays, manners were even more primitive. The Waverley Novels had not yet flooded the Highlands with tourists, and, indeed, as steamship and railway lay still in the womb of the future, travelling was a very difficult matter. Just as Cooper pictured the nobler qualities of his Indians, and attempted no realistic presentation, so Scott gives us the Highland chief with his tail of adherents and stately surroundings. Here, however, we get him in the rough, surrounded by no glamour of poetry or romance. We quote a sketch of one whose very name might have been the invention of Sir Walter or R. L. S.—Fletcher of Bearnish, the Laird of Auchnashalloch:

“He paid a morning visit, and the drawing-room door was thrown open just as my mother was in the middle of a piece she was playing on the harp. Of course she got off the stool on which she was playing to come and meet him, but in a very uncouth way he led her back towards the harp, intimating that she should go on with what she was doing. As a matter of course he had never seen a harp before, and, after she had played a few bars, he put his hand upon her wrist, and, drawing it away, said, ‘Thank ye, my lady, I only wished to hear what kind o’ noise she made.’ Lunch having been announced, of course he was invited to go into the dining-room, and he looked with some surprise at the display of fruit on the table. We had no hothouse fruit at the Glen, but a supply was sent every fortnight from Dunmore Park. After he had despatched the solids, he pointed to a dish on which there were three or four very fine peaches, and he said, ‘What kind of an apple is yon?’ So my mother told him that we called it a peach, and he said, ‘Well, I’ll just take yon to taste.’ He accordingly took a peach and stuck half of it into his mouth and bit hard into it. The juice ran out of the sides of his mouth and he said, ‘Oh, it’s a gran’ apple; but siccan a pip as it’s got!’”

Childhood, as is often the case, furnishes the most salient and essential part of the biography. In after life we feel that Murray is indeed a highly accomplished, well-bred, pleasant companion, but his personality is not a dominant one. He goes to Eton and Oxford and then visits the Continent. His book of “Travels” has familiarised some of us with the next stage in his career, the period of American wanderings. Its interest now lies chiefly in the observations having been made while America was still in its infancy—some of its largest towns unbuilt, tribes of Indians still roaming the forest, hunting buffalo on the prairie, and waging internecine war. The natural step from that was Parliament: education, the grand tour, politics, following close upon one another in those days. He was an unlucky candidate, and lost his chance of entering St. Stephen's through no fault of his own—a fact recognised by Lord Melbourne when he offered him the post of Groom-in-waiting. His entrance to the Diplomatic service, his life in the East and in Lisbon, his love-story with its touches of romance and sadness, his first and second marriage, his home life and favourite pursuits, his last years, and his death in 1895, complete the history of a typical English gentleman.

In narrating it, Sir Herbert Maxwell has found a subject exactly according to his mind, and we know of nothing of his more praiseworthy in every respect than this biography. He has the advantage of being in full sympathy with his hero, of being, in fact, the same kind of man himself—descendant of a good Scottish family, sportsman, scholar, and littérateur, gifted with abundant knowledge, haunted by none of the fantastic dreams and visions that have led so many astray; not brilliant, but sound; pedestrian, but not incapable. And we shall conclude this notice with an extract to show that in a fanciful reverie on life's might-have-beens, something akin to filial piety may well have inspired the task:

“Ardgowan, the beautiful home of the Shaw Stewarts on the Clyde, was not far distant from Glen Finart by water, and the Murray boys spent much of their time there. Sir Michael had three daughters—little girls—to whom the three brothers promptly betrothed themselves. Dis aliter visum. Margaret, the elder, became Duchess of Somerset; Catherine married Captain Osborne of the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons; and Helenora, the youngest, married Sir William Maxwell of Monreath.”

In other words, she became the mother of Sir Herbert Maxwell.

POETESS, NOVELIST, AND LADY FARMER.

Reminiscences. By M. Betham-Edwards. (George Redway.)

MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS holds a position that is probably unique in the modern world of letters; at least we are aware of no other lady whose novels have a steady sale, and whose poems are recited at penny readings, who has farmed a Suffolk occupation on her own account, and writes wisely and well of agriculture. Her reminiscences have therefore two separate interests—that attaching to a successful literary career, and that which belongs to a keen observer's notes on English country life. The latter naturally come first, because they are based on her earliest recollections. One could scarcely expect even “the meekest of silvery-haired little ladies,” as she calls herself, to give her own age, but there is internal evidence to show that it is the Suffolk of more than fifty years ago she contrasts so vividly with that of to-day. In other words, it is the same period as was dealt with by Thomas Arch in his Autobiography reviewed here a few weeks since. We notice the coincidence because this meek little lady is even more bitter than Arch in describing the rural clergy of her day. To be frank, however, much as we relish the trenchant, clever style of these memoirs, it is least successful when directed against the Church. Miss Betham-Edwards is carried off her feet by an extreme Rationalism, just as Mr. Arch was by the prejudices of Dissent.

Upon this theme alone does she allow partisan feeling to overshadow the sense of humour that plays so wholesomely over most of her themes. For instance, she works up her indignation over the offences of the rector of her native parish, and expresses a regret that ecclesiastical courts, public censure, and the rest of it, were not brought to bear on his shortcomings. Yet all that she proves is that he was a choleric, hot-tempered, slightly autocratic parson, who did not scruple to give one of his sons a thump on the head for misbehaviour just after the Benediction was closed; who reproved a gossiping clerk before the congregation; and who offended a fond mother by christening her child Frederick when she had resolved that his name should be Fred. But Miss Betham-Edwards is very candid, and tells us much that prevents us from judging him harshly. Firstly, it was a very poor living, and he had twelve children—"It is as much as we can do to cover their nakedness," said the mother—and it incidentally comes out that even food was scarce in the rectory. Yet "he paid his way and lived uprightly." Nay, more, let any one try to read this passage without being blinded by the author's prejudice:

"As I have before mentioned, narrow means did not stand in the way of routine (the italics are ours) benevolences. When labourers' wives lay in, gifts of broth and arrowroot accompanied the parish bag, and even infectious diseases failed to deter visits of condolence or charity. But there existed no real liking or sympathy between class and class, no tie binding rectory and cottage. This is the parody I heard in our clergyman's nursery:

'Whene'er I take my walks abroad,
How many poor I see
Eating pork without a fork,
Oh, Lord, what beasts they be.'"

But perhaps this was only an early effort of the precocious youth who got himself cuffed after Benediction. Seriously, it appears to us—though much in sympathy with the beliefs of Miss Edwards—merely absurd to get up so great an indignation over so small a matter. If the sins of the rector had been red as scarlet, the following passage would have washed them white:

"As I have before said, under the rector's rough, even bearish exterior, beat a kindly heart. He would laughingly recount how a poor parishioner once begged the loan of his black trousers in order to attend his father's funeral. The request was granted."

Did not this argue some slight bias between the cottage and the rectory? Two men were surely on the verge of friendship when one lent the other a pair of breeches. Another curious act of kindness related of this parson was that, after the chalice had gone round on Sunday, he gave the rest of the wine to the feeble and infirm.

"No sooner had the solemn rite been administered than a sonorous deep drawn quaffing was heard from the lower end of the rails, the poor old men and women gratefully swallowing the remains of the wine. It might have been better to go through this little performance in the vestry. Anyhow, who can doubt that such a custom proved a snare?"

Rustics are capable of mingling irreverence with piety to a grotesque extent.

Only four or five years ago a gross scandal occurred in a Presbyterian church in the North of England. At the half-yearly Sacrament the communicants gulped down the wine so freely that nearly four dozen bottles were consumed. It led to an inquiry that filled many pages of the local prints, and proved that intoxication with communion wine was by no means uncommon.

While filling in real life the rôle played by Bathsheba Everdone in fiction, Miss Betham-Edwards picked up many curious stories and anecdotes that vivify her memories of country life. Of these the following is an excellent example, much of the fun, however, lying in the grave moral which serves as a pretext for introducing the story:

"The following anecdote will illustrate the innate self-respect and true gentlemanliness often underlying these uncouth exteriors.

My younger brother noticing one day that the breeching (that part of harness round the breech of a horse—Webster) of a cart-horse attached behind a waggon had slipped, ran after the driver to call his attention to the fact.

'Good God, sir!' exclaimed the poor fellow beside himself with mortification, 'I passed two women just now!'

He was very deaf, and imperfectly catching the words, thought that the caution applied to his own nether garment, and that a brace button had given way."

Probably, however, our readers will be more interested in her adventures as an authoress. The story of her first novel illustrates the change that has taken place in publishing. She despatched it to London through "the agency of the family grocer" about the year 1856. The "foremost publishing house" which accepted it agreed to pay in kind, "that is to say, I received twenty-five copies of new one, two, and three volume novels," a remuneration that would stagger the "livery gent" of to-day, surely! She adds:

"The curious part of the business is this: Before me lies the original edition, in two handsome volumes (of The White House by the Sea), dated 1857, beside it the last popular issue dated 1891. Between these two dates—a period of just upon thirty-five years—the book had contrived to keep its head above water—that is to say, had been steadily reprinted from time to time, yet from its first appearance to the present day, when it is still selling, not a farthing of profit has accrued to the author!"

One would like to see the publisher's ledger for the period. Yet Miss Betham-Edwards is of opinion that the old conditions were more favourable than the new. She says:

"An author's step first and successfully made there is no doubt whatever that his chances both of recognition and money were infinitely better in those days than now. . . . Publishers were a mere handful compared to their present numbers. They brought out fewer works and exercised more literary discrimination. Public taste had not been vitiated by the imitators of bad French models. The good old system of selling a book just as you sell a house had its advantages. There was no suspense, no delusive waiting for royalties or half-profit. An accredited author, despite the absence of newspaper syndicates, American copyright and other advantages, had only himself to blame if he failed to amass a little fortune in those days."

In support of this opinion she quotes Mr. W. E. Norris, who thinks the young writer has a worse chance to-day than he had forty years ago, since the enormous sales of a few authors so completely fill the market that the new-comer is overlooked. There is a grain of truth in it, and yet so many fresh names have been made during the last ten or fifteen years that there must be another side to the argument.

Miss Betham-Edwards did not come much into contact with the more illustrious of her contemporaries, except it were with George Eliot. Of her she speaks with the bated breath of an adorer. Yet she makes us feel that the great novelist must have been a kill-joy in company. Here is an account of conversation at one of Mme. Bodichon's dinners, Mr. and Mrs. Lewes being the chief guests. Topic—how the world would come to an end.

"I think I hear George Eliot's many-toned fervid voice as she put forward one hypothesis after another: 'And yet, dear Barbara, it might happen thus,' and so on. I believe when we rose from the table the casting vote had been in favour of combustion by the tail of a comet. Somehow, even Mme. Bodichon's usually high spirits flagged, and no wonder. There are moments when all of us need a little relaxation, a little hum-drum human laugh. This wonderful pair seldom enjoyed either. Their intellects had no repose. They were worn out at a period when many men and women may still be considered in their prime."

Among the many admirable gifts of Miss Betham-Edwards, the faculty of sound criticism is scarcely to be numbered. She thinks Middlemarch "the great prose epic" of George Eliot, and calls it Shakespearean, "a canvas to be set beside the half-dozen great imaginative creations of the world." But as the creator of Mrs. Proudie gets an almost equal share of admiration this excessive praise is discounted. It is true that for the latter opinion she has the authority of one of Goethe's descendants whom she met at Weimar, but the great German could not transmit his genius as though it were a British peerage. Among other celebrities who are glanced at in these pages are John Stuart Mill, Louis Blanc, and Charles Bradlaugh.

As was to be expected in a writer whose material has been so largely drawn from abroad, some of the most attractive reminiscences of Miss Betham-Edwards are connected with the Continent. The first time she met the Abbé Liszt was at a table d'hôte, where he was suffering the attentions of a love-sick middle-aged Baroness, whose daughter of twenty and imbecile husband were the spectators of her folly. An extraordinary account she gives of the sentimentalists and coquettes who fluttered round the great musician, the girl pupils rushing to kiss his hands, the young women dying for love of him. Undeterred by the scandal all this created, she managed to break through the barriers by which he tried to shut out the world, and has succeeded in presenting an intimate picture of the daily habits of this most gifted, most immoral priest. She sums up the matter thus:

"That daemonic irresistibility, that magnetic influence felt not only by the other sex but by his own, was an ever present thorn in the flesh; to a passionately artistic and creative nature like his it could not be otherwise. And unfortunately Pandora had not accorded a counterpoise, the wholesome gift of meanness, the power of being irresponsible and occasionally irresponsible."

We have not space for many more quotations, but the following glimpse of Vienna thirty years ago is extremely interesting as showing how continental civilisation lagged behind ours :

"Will it be believed that at the time I write of—i.e., only a generation ago, domestic servants in rich Viennese households slept like cats and dogs where they could? For some time after my installation in the Von J——'s handsome and spacious flat, I was puzzled by certain noises outside my door late at night and very early in the morning. I soon unearthed the mystery. When the family had retired to rest, the Vorsaal or entrance-hall was strewn with mattresses and rugs, and here slept the three or four maids composing the household. At dawn, as quietly as might be, the bedding was cleared away, the Vorsaal swept and scoured, elegant lamps, hatstands, and other pieces of furniture replaced, not a vestige remaining of the bivouac. We English, I admit, are a very boastful race. I must aver, however, that the English nation may well be proud of two inventions—that of the bed-chamber and of another and smaller apartment which shall here be nameless."

The representative passages quoted render it unnecessary to pass any elaborate opinion on this bright, vivid, brusque little book of memories. A great many opinions are very decidedly expressed, and we as decidedly differ from a number, perhaps a majority of them. But the good faith and sincerity of the author are so transparent, she so candidly relates even what tells against her own belief, that disagreement is never a cause of ill-humour or the slightest barrier to enjoyment.

THROUGH CHINA WITH A CAMERA.

Through China with a Camera. By John Thomson. (A. Constable & Co.)

MR. THOMSON has many and various merits as a writer upon China, but he is not, alas! a conscientious man of letters. His book is, we gather from the preface, in the nature of a patchwork, part of it being newly written, part merely "written up" out of old materials already made use of. Now, we have not the smallest objection to this. An author is quite at liberty to boil down and edit and re-issue portions of an earlier work if that work be interesting, and the demand for it justify such a re-issue. But we feel it only right to protest when the boiling down and editing is badly done, when the patchwork is careless and slovenly. And this, unhappily, is the case with Through China with a Camera. The illustrations are beyond praise, the matter interesting, and some parts of the text admirably written; but the author, merely for the want of a little care in dove-tailing his materials and correcting his proofs and his grammar, leaves his reader with an uncomfortable impression of bad and hasty workmanship.

We are loth to dwell on this side of his book, however, because in all other ways it is delightful reading. Its subject is, of course, a fascinating one. China stands to us moderns much as Egypt stood to the Greeks when Herodotus wrote the second book of his history. The pity of it is that Mr. Thomson is not Herodotus. If he were, with the mysterious land which he has to describe, and the wonderful stories he has to tell, his book would be another "Euterpe." If Herodotus had only had a knowledge of photography when he made his journey to Egypt, and had been able to hand down to us an illustrated text, how much would have been told to us which he now fails to reveal! Mr. Thomson's wanderings in China carry him over a vast stretch of country. Not only does he enable us to visit the various Treaty Ports and their vicinity in his company, but he takes us by boat some hundreds of miles up the Yangtze-kiang, the Min, and the Peiho, besides showing us a good deal of the interior of the island of Formosa. In all these places he is followed by his faithful camera, and the excellent views which he reproduces of each of them are of great assistance in helping us to realise perhaps the most fascinating people on the face of the earth.

The great characteristic of the Chinaman is his relentless logic. True, his logic is of the topsy-turvy order, and at times reminds us strongly of Alice through the Looking-Glass, but in form, at least, it is very real and thorough-going. For instance, half a dozen men place their cargo on board the same junk. Each of those men, therefore, is captain of the junk as far as concerns that compartment where his own goods have been separately stored. Thus if the compartments be six the captains are six, and each captain has a sixth share of the vessel under his own command. The result of this equitable arrangement, as Mr. Thomson explains, is that the craft is sometimes required to travel in six different directions simultaneously and to stand for six different points at a time, and in the end the crew take the steering into their own hands or else consult Joss, who stands in his shrine in the cabin unmoved though tempests rage. The logic of the position taken up is unassailable, but it is the logic of "The Mikado," and Mr. Gilbert ought to have placed the scene of his masterpiece in China, not in Japan.

The parallel between the Egypt of Herodotus and the China of to-day, which we have already touched on, goes farther than might be imagined. Herodotus noted how often Egyptian customs were the precise reverse of those prevailing in Hellas. This is, of course, even more frequently the case with China and ourselves. At a Chinese fishshop you choose your fish alive in a tank. It is then caught and handed over to you. (Mr. Thomson calls it a "finny occupant"! ) The Canton boatwomen do not paint their faces. The Chinese, therefore, consider them of doubtful respectability. Your Chinese detective is a mere Jonathan Wild, who is acquainted with all the thieves, and takes a percentage from you for all property he traces. Should the thief be not in the profession, so that he cannot be traced, the detective is whipped. Everybody gambles in China, both men and women. The pedlar is quite as willing to gamble with you for his goods as to sell them. When a husband cannot pay his wife's gambling debts he commits suicide. In almost every point Chinese ideas appear to be the precise contrary of our own, and always they are characterised by that queer half-humorous logic which is peculiar to this solemn race. Mr. Thomson has an observant eye for curious practices. He notes, for example, the Chinese custom of fishing with trained otters on the Upper Yangtze, or with cormorants, trained to dive and bring up fish for their owners on the River Min. He describes with considerable fulness the few remains of the famous Summer Palace which the Foreign Devils spared, and the photographs of these make one feel that too high a price may be paid even for the enforcement of treaties. To destroy this wonder of the world may have been war, but it was hardly magnificent, to invert a familiar phrase. It is impossible within the limits of a brief review to notice a tenth of the interesting things in Mr. Thomson's book, and our readers must read them for themselves. They will find it no unpleasant task.

JOURNALISM FOR WOMEN.

Journalism for Women: a Practical Guide.
By E. A. Bennett. (John Lane.)

THIS clever little brochure is destined to teach woman how to be a journalist instead of a woman-journalist, and thus, incidentally, to lighten the editorial load. For its author is an editor; and as his paper is consecrated to the "forward, but not too fast," among the fair, one may take it that he knows his subject as well as a man may.

To gain a livelihood by forcing one's rosy fallacies upon the weary world is, according to Mr. Bennett, the whole duty of a journalist. It is better to be press-ridden than bored, so the average householder takes three papers with his morning coffee, and two before bed-time. If he springs with the light heart of illusion into the 9-15 train, let the journalist—he, she, or it—be praised. But the fabrication of rosy fallacies is an art—"it is the art of lending to people and events intrinsically dull an interest which does not properly belong to them." The ideal journalist is he who can gather grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles; to whom naught is trivial, and nothing prosaic. To gild with words, to dress up the commonplace in the motley of romance, is his trade; and few there be who learn it. Of course, the great journalist, like the great poet or painter, is born for his craft. But most successful journalists are made by goodwill and experience. The majority of women journalists are, on the other hand, neither born nor made. Mr. Bennett, it would seem, has found a good many under gooseberry bushes, and is trying to incubate them. This is the purpose of his book. A most excellent purpose—a most excellent book.

"In Fleet-street," the author remarks, "femininity is an absolution, not an accident." The woman journalist is forgiven much, not because, like the Magdalen, she loves much, but because she works hard and cheaply. It is true that she never—almost never—works well; but Mr. Bennett denies that her faults "are natural or necessary, or incurable, or meet to be condoned." "They are due," he opines, "not to sex, but to the subtle, far-reaching effects of early training . . . to an imperfect development of the sense of order, or to a certain lack of self-control." In the beginning and in the end she fails to realise that "business is business." She is unreliable in a profession whose success depends wholly upon undeviating regularity and constant co-operation. Above and beyond this is her "inattention to detail." Women enjoy a reputation for slipshod style. They have earned it. Mr. Bennett further states that very few of them can spell, and none of them can punctuate. Inaccuracy is, of course, a general human failing, but it is whacked out of most little boys in the schoolroom. It is not considered necessary to teach girls that carelessness in business spells ruin, so how can one expect them to have a nice sense of the parts of speech when they flutter into Fleet-street? Their style further suffers from a constitutional lack of restraint. It is like a garden wherein pied verbs and painted adjectives, like noxious weeds, abound. "Women," we are told, "have given up italics, but their writing is commonly marred by an undue insistence, a shrillness, a certain quality of multiloquence." To counteract this tendency, Mr. Bennett recommends "suitable moral and intellectual calisthenics," though what he means by this is not quite clear. The ensuing chapters, which are devoted to training up the aspirant in the way she should go, are, however, eminently lucid and practical. Though not precisely teaching journalism without tears, their counsel is grateful and comforting. That "the practice of journalism does not demand intellectual power beyond the endowment of the average clever brain" is an encouraging statement. To this the woman journalist may append the reflection that a few men journalists may be found in London who are conspicuous for quite remarkable incompetency. And, although there are no average women left, there are still a good many clever ones who would rather be journalists than wives—"what time their eyes are dry."

CANADA A NATION.

A History of Canada. By Charles G. D. Roberts. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

CANADA makes stronger appeal to us and is richer in heroic association and story and romance than any other part of the Western Hemisphere. The citadel of Quebec stands for memories sacred alike for England and France and the United States. Wolfe died to win it, Montcalm died in vain to save it, and Montgomery threw away his life in trying to conquer it from the conquerors. And long before the days of Wolfe, England and France had battled there for the supremacy of the Western World, and Champlain had capitulated to Kirke. When, in 1632, the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye gave back Quebec to the French Monarchy, it was the beginning of a time made illustrious by the deeds of De la Tour and of Frontenac, known to this day as "the old lion of Canada." The pathetic expulsion of the people of Acadie was destined to have its counterpart when, after the Treaty of Versailles, the American Loyalists followed the flag across the border for the sake of an allegiance which had cost them all they possessed. Finally, no Canadian will forget the repulse of the invasion during the campaign of 1812, or the glorious field upon which Brock fell in the hour of his victory.

These are memories well calculated to keep alive the fire of patriotism, and to feed a full and rich national life. Yet it was left for the engineer to complete what generations of soldiers and administrators had failed to accomplish. It was the Trans-continental Railway which first awakened a national consciousness in Canada, and the sense of the nation's unity. In the few years since that great achievement, the Canadian Pacific Railway has worked this wonder—the creation of a single people out of the inhabitants of six separated provinces. The thought of the memories that lie behind in the past has strangely quickened the process, and no better evidence of the intensity of the feeling that Canada now stands for one of the free peoples of the earth could be desired than the volume before us. The passion of patriotism which vibrates through its pages has a certain quality of separateness which is directly born of the fact that here we have a nation young in years and old in traditions, a new people now consciously entering upon an ancient heritage of glory and romance.

The author is proud of all the men who have fought for the great prize of Canada, and is as ready to render justice to Champlain and Frontenac as to Wolfe or Sir Guy Carleton. However else they differed, the leading figures in the history of Canada are united in their common desire to serve her, and to be associated with her; and that suffices. With the element of partisanship quite banished from his pages Mr. Roberts tells his story quietly and lucidly, and in a way that does full justice to his theme: the travail and the birth of the Dominion. Incidentally we may note that the evidence accumulated in these pages of the constant employment of Indian allies on both sides during generations of war between England and France serves to diminish somewhat the horror of repentance with which we recall our forefathers' use of similar methods against their fellow countrymen a few years later.

BRIEFER MENTION.

Prince Patrick: a Fairy Tale. By Arnold Graves. (Downey & Co.)

THERE is a splendid eagle adventure in this fairy tale. Prince Patrick was ordered to prove his birth before he could be chosen taniat (heir to the throne) of Kerry; for he had been stolen from his cradle. So he went forth alone to find his foster-father, Teague, the flaiith (head man) of the village of Ballysallagh. On his way he became tired and weak, and a great eagle seized him, and flew with him to her nest, which was full of pecking, gawky eaglets; and away again to bid her husband to the feast. But when the eagles returned Patrick was not so much a meal as a prince, and he hurled his spear at the nearest bird. All bleeding, the eagle shot up into the "blue ether," clutching Patrick, who still held his spear. Then Patrick drove the weapon upward into the eagle's breast; and, the next moment, he was falling—alone—to the rocks.

"The poor boy felt that now his last moment had come, so, muttering a prayer, he shut his eyes and prepared for death. But just as a gorged gull will drop its prey, and another, swooping earthwards, will catch it in mid-air, so the still living eagle swooped after the falling Patrick, and just as he was within fifty feet of the rocks caught him in its talons and flew with him towards the lake. Then, hovering over the black waters, the angry bird began to strike at him with its beak. Poor Patrick had little strength or sense left, but still he clutched his sword. And thus it was that the eagle, striking at him, struck the sword; and the highly tempered blade, passing through its eye, entered its brain; and Patrick fell from its nerveless grasp into the deep waters of the lake beneath."

What he then did, let Irish boys, and others, find out for themselves. It is a bright, brave story, with the sea in it; and the Princess—ah, the Princess!—but we do not think that Mr. Graves should have made Patrick "bold with wine" when he kissed her for the first time. Surely love makes boys bold and girls willing.

The Book of Glasgow Cathedral. Edited by George Eyre Todd. (Morison Brothers.)

THIS nobly produced quarto volume is suitably named "the book of Glasgow Cathedral," for it is a compound of history, description, catalogues, &c., and is the work of several writers. Saint Kentigern was Bishop of Glasgow in the years 543 to 603; and he died in such a blaze of heavenly splendour—an angel appearing at his bedside—that his attendants were afraid. So shines Kentigern, and shines alone; for his successors are nameless until 1115, when John Achaius was appointed to the see by Prince David of Cumbria, afterwards King David I. Achaius began the Cathedral; his successors completed it. The administration of the Catholic bishops is fully treated by the editor; and the architectural history of the cathedral is related by Mr. John Honeyman. In the middle of the book we have the story of Knox's hurricane movement, the signing of the Articles of the Congregation, the overturn of the bishopric, the destruction of the thirty-two altars of the cathedral, and the flight of Archbishop Beaton to France with the plate, the vestures, and the book. He never returned; the treasures were never seen again in Scotland. But that wave of prejudice and later waves are spent; and to-day Glasgow's cathedral is a shrine in which her worthiest citizens sleep, or are perpetuated by monuments and stained-glass windows. These windows and monuments are described by Mr. Stephen Adam and the Rev. P. M'Adam Muir in separate chapters. An historical chapter on the old castle of the bishops—which survives only in the name of Castlestreet—a catalogue of bishops, archbishops, and ministers, and a description of the ancient thirty-two altars, are among the other contents of this comprehensive and dignified work. Four photographs, and many "process" and line illustrations are mingled with the text.

Records of Old Times. By J. K. Fowler. (Chatto & Windus.)

THOSE who have read either of Mr. Fowler's previous books will rejoice to find that he is still spared to us and in his "anecdote." In the present volume he has given a more antiquarian turn than usual to many of his subjects—which, of course, relate mainly to Bucks and especially Aylesbury—but we must confess we prefer his own reminiscences to dry bones from Leland or Fuller. Many good stories are to be found in his latest book, much information on social and agricultural topics during the century, and (what lends a peculiar charm to its perusal) there is not a single word or anecdote from beginning to end likely to give pain to the most sensitive. Mr. Fowler is nothing if he be not optimistic, and pleasantly leads his reader onwards through politics, steeplechasing and hunting, to the end of his book, where occurs the apotheosis of English agriculture. "Let us do our best for this ennobling science," he sums up,

"and we may then see the exodus of the labourer from the country arrested, and the fearless, industrious and grateful countryman will again rally round the country parson, the country gentleman, and the British farmer; while the village tradesman and mechanic will become once more prosperous and happy, and continue to be, as they were in old times, the backbone of old England."

It is a gorgeous vision, a Tory paradise, resembles the conclusion of many speeches on Ireland's future happiness under Home Rule.

Whatever may be said of the morality of the raccourse at present, there is no doubt that it stands infinitely higher than it did in the days of our fathers, when the scandal of Running Rein and Leander in the Derby took place. Such a conspiracy would not be now for a moment tolerated, or even devised. Mr. Fowler tells the story again. The history of the once renowned Aylesbury Steeplechase is much better worth recounting with the humours of the Oxonian undergraduates who naturally frequented it. The beauty of the Vale of Aylesbury as a hunting country leads to some pleasant hunting gossip. The repetitions in the book (of which there are several) are easily condoned, and if in one place Mr. Fowler ascribes the foundation of Eton to Henry III., in another chapter the "distant spires,"

"Where grateful science still adores, Her Henry's holy shade," are ascribed to the proper king. Perhaps the best chapter in this book treats of old inns and the manner in which they were connected with the coaches and post-horse business. Modern travel in the express has entirely lost the leisurely picturesqueness which marked our fathers' mode of journeying, and reminiscences of what may be called the Dickens style of travelling are always welcomed.

More careful editing would have improved the book. There are several English solecisms, so that we can the less wonder at the usual Latin misquotation, "Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur." "Fontalia" for "fontinalia" is also venial. Again, the old-fashioned brown pheasants are not "nearly given up" by breeders, but are almost extinct; having been exterminated by the numerous breeds which have been introduced from Japan, and by the Siberian pheasant. These have frequently left a white ring on their offsprings' necks.

The Franks. By Lewis Sergeant. ("The Story of the Nations" Series.) (T. Fisher Unwin.)

IN the complex amalgam which goes to the making of the nations of modern Europe, many another race or nation is lost to the view of all but the historian. Of all the races which went to the building up of the France and Germany of to-day none was more important than the Franks, who ran their meteor-like course in the dying days of the Roman Empire and then disappeared as suddenly as they arose, leaving, however, an ineffaceable mark on the face of the Europe of their own and modern time. Their history lies buried in the colossal work of Gibbon, which nowadays is more often quoted than read, and so Mr. Lewis Sergeant has done us a service in writing this monograph.

The Franks were first mentioned about 260 A.D. and were probably the descendants of Caesar's Sigimbrians with a Roman nickname. At first, these German tribes were held in check, but when aliens became Emperors of Rome they broke the frontier, and for the next two hundred years continually fought with the legions. The first important appearance of the Franks in history is when, under Merowig, they fought in the army of Aëtius against Attila at Chalons in 451. Thirty years later Merowig's grandson, Clovis, established the Frankish monarchy in Gaul, and then for four hundred years his descendants ruled over the nation, the height of power being reached in the reign of Charlemagne, who in 800 A.D. was crowned Emperor of the Romans by Pope Leo III. before the high altar of St. Peter's. It was a great proof of the eternal vitality of Rome that the descendants of the men who fought in the van of Teutonism against the Cæsars, were in 800 the undisputed masters of Gaul and Italy, while their chieftain had no higher ambition than to call himself Roman Emperor and to identify himself and his followers with the Latin Empire which they had replaced. It was their turn now to represent law and learning and to endeavour to stay the flood which was pouring in from the north. When Charlemagne died his empire fell to pieces under the hands of his incapable successors, and soon the Frankish nation disappeared and became merged in the modern nations of France and Germany. The story of the Franks is really a side issue of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, and would have been more lucid had it been told with greater brevity and conciseness. An abundance of detail occasionally obscures the scanty history of the Franks, but, on the whole, Mr. Lewis Sergeant has done his work well.

Dr. W. Moon and his Work for the Blind.
By John Rutherford. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

IT has been given to few men to confer such lasting benefit on so large a section of society as has been accomplished by Dr. William Moon in the invention and application of his embossed type for the blind. Various systems were in use long before his time. He himself writes, in 1873: "More than three centuries have elapsed since the first attempt was made to provide means by which the blind could read; and it is about ninety years since books were first printed for them." But the learning of all previous types was attended with great difficulty. Dr. Moon, who himself became blind at the age of twenty-one, and whose infirmity, instead of depressing and stultifying his naturally strong mental faculties, seemed rather to quicken them, turned his attention to the best means of helping the blind, with the eager sympathy born of fellow feeling. He formed classes for teaching, and it was in thus teaching that he learned the need of a simpler form of type. "The difficulties which I experienced in teaching my pupils led me to devise the easier plan before referred to, and by it a lad who had in vain for five years endeavoured to learn by the other system, could in ten days read easy sentences." He, with the co-operation of Miss Graham, began "Home Teaching for the Blind," and the society so started has been an incalculable blessing to the afflicted poor. The new system made rapid progress, and the number of languages to which Dr. Moon ultimately adapted his alphabet was four hundred and seventy-six. Dr. Moon died in 1894, in his seventy-sixth year, leaving the testimony, that "God gave me blindness as a talent to be used for His glory. Without blindness I should never have been able to see the needs of the blind."

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE GIRL AT COBHURST. BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.

There is a blessed certainty of humour and well-drawn character in any story by Mr. Stockton. Here he turns from the romantic-scientific vein of The Great Stone of Sardis to quietness and domesticity. We have a pair of lovers, a delightfully original match-making old maid, and a doctor and his wife, whose conjugal relations make good reading. (Cassell & Co. 408 pp. 6s.)

SOWING THE SAND. BY FLORENCE HENNIKER.

A clever story, by the author of In Scarlet and Grey, showing how Charley Crespin, the son of a rich manufacturer, would not be restrained from entering the Army—whither he took the adoring good wishes of his sister, Mildred (the heroine), and of his parents. How Charley fell into the hands of the "notorious Mrs. Eden," and returned home with a suicidal wound on his temple, to patch up his life and live in rather inglorious comfort and respectability, is the main story. (Harper & Brothers. 231 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE CONCERT-DIRECTOR. BY NELLIE K. BLISSETT.

A strong story, showing how an impresario bribed a Greek Jew to bring back his prima donna, the Princess Tarasca, who, on the death of her husband, had resolved to enter a convent. The Jew's plan is to marry the widow first. (Macmillan & Co. 307 pp. 6s.)

SONS OF ADVERSITY. BY L. COPE CORNFORD.

A romance of Elizabethan days, mainly concerned with the defence of Leyden against the Spanish. The clash of steel alternates with the words of lovers—and all is brave. "See you these candlesticks, shipmate," says one; "once they graced the cabin of the San Rafael, of Coruña; now, you see, they light poor British seamen to their liquor. Which thing, comrade, is an allegory." It is before the Armada! (Methuen & Co. 309 pp. 6s.)

REGINA; OR, THE SINS OF THE FATHERS. BY HERMANN SUDERMANN.

A powerful and very deliberate tragedy; the scene laid in East Prussia; the time, the breathing space of Napoleon's imprisonment in Elba. The lines upon which the drama is built are precisely those suggested by the English title; Regina is one victim, and there is another. "The Cats' Bridge"—a secret pass by which the German force was treacherously surprised—gives its name to the German version of the novel. Miss Beatrice Marshall—a daughter of the well-known writer of stories for young people—is the translator, and on the whole Herr Sudermann may consider himself fortunate. (John Lane. 347 pp. 6s.)

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE. BY JOHN BERWICK.

The philosopher, who writes in the first person, is a professional letter-writer in the little Italian town of Soloporto on the Canale Grande. We move among wherry and felucca folk, Dalmatian coasters and Sicilian craft, fruit barges and quayside cafés. The philosopher adjusts and conducts many romances, but himself achieves only the happiness of leaving life's turmoil behind him and chewing "the bitter-sweet herb of experience." (Macmillan & Co. 265 pp. 6s.)

FOR THE SAKE OF THE FAMILY, AND OTHER STORIES. BY ANNIE S. SWAN, AND OTHERS.

The family will enjoy them, we have no doubt. (Hodder & Stoughton. 1s.)

THE ST. CADIX CASE. BY ESTHER MILLER.

A Cornish story in which love runs to marriage through the rough experience of a murder trial. The heroine, thrown suddenly by the death of her father among rough-mannered relatives, is wooed and married almost forcibly by her cousin, Jim Hendra, who is murdered on the day he marries her. By the way, we are not aware that a judge, when passing sentence on a murderer, says, "Till you be dead—dead—dead." He is usually satisfied that the criminal should be dead once. (A. D. Innes & Co. 376 pp. 6s.)

LIFE'S WHEEL. BY LOLA MORLEY.

A long novel, full of novelette sentiments and incidents. The hero is Lord Roy Alderleigh, and we are not permitted to forget it. "Lord Roy Alderleigh came down to breakfast. . . . For a moment Lord Roy Alderleigh stood in silence. . . . Lord Roy Alderleigh glanced up quickly." And there are mysteries, and birth-marks, and detectives forestalled by death, and many other things before Lord Roy, "handsome and strong, with the deep love-light still in his eyes," rose in his carriage to thank the tenantry for their reception of himself and the duchess at the old manor. (Digby Long & Co. 308 pp. 6s.)

WHERE THREE CREEDS MEET. BY J. CAMPBELL OMAN.

This is a story, partaking of the nature of a series of sketches, of modern Indian village life. The rivalries of Hindoo and Mussulman supply much of the groundwork of the plot. There is a strong love-story, and Mr. Oman makes the village of Mozung and its affairs—even the games of its children on the maidan—very real. (Grant Richards. 224 pp. 6s.)

THE LAST LEMURIAN. BY G. FIRTH SCOTT.

A West Australian romance. The Lemurian figures as a gigantic Yellow Queen, who stalks the night mourning the death of her mate—the bunyip—"monarch of all pools and waters . . . and the chosen of the reptiles . . . who comes but once in the lifetime of a moon to view the world." The juxtaposition of repeating rifles and phantasmal game of the "bunyip" order should be effective—with boys. (James Bowden. 339 pp. 3s. 6d.)

ENTANGLEMENTS. BY FRANCIS PREVOST.

Mr. Prevost is a conscientious artist. He showed himself that in False Dawn and Rust of Gold; he does so again in these five short stories. The first is a love-story, in which a chivalrous girl holds a revolver at the head of the man who she believes has wronged her girl friend. The dialogue during this bad quarter of an hour is the story, and it is a firm piece of work with the right upshot—revolver upshot and matrimonial. (Service & Paton. 204 pp. 3s. 6d.)

AN ANGEL OF PITY. BY FLORENCE MARRYAT.

Miss Marryat's eighteenth (we think it is her eighteenth) novel is written to expose vivisection and the experimental treatment of dying patients in our hospitals. In an Author's Note we are bidden to send for certain pamphlets which will confirm Miss Marryat's testimony. The heroine is a sympathetic and observant nurse with a knowledge of medicine. (Hutchinson & Co. 366 pp. 6s.)

HER LADYSHIP'S ELEPHANT. BY DAVID DWIGHT WELLS.

A farcical little story of several men and women who, by railway and other indiscretions, become seriously misassorted. Also of an elephant who wandered promiscuously in the grounds of an English country house, and of what he thought and did there. The story is, perhaps, hardly so overpoweringly mirthful as the ingenious chapter-headings might give you to understand, but it is funny in spots. (Heinemann. 259 pp. 3s. 6d.)

OF NECESSITY.

By H. M. GILBERT.

Islington, Camberwell, Kennington, Brixton; upholsterers, journeymen jewellers, law-writers; the decivilised cockney host at home. Stories, these, of mean dissipation and strong selfishness on the one hand; on the other, of impotent prayers and lachrymose remonstrance. A world in which evil is a positive essence, good a mere negation. Ugly enough and heartily depressing in its result, the work seems seriously and conscientiously done. (John Lane. 276 pp. 3s. 6d.)

REUBEN DEAN.

By WILLIAM LESLIE LOW.

We should call this a boy's story. Reuben Dean as boy lover-soldier dominates the book. In fact, every illustration is entitled simply "Reuben Dean," with a reference to a page of the text. The fighting is done on the Indian frontier. (Olyphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 304 pp. 3s. 6d.)

A WOMAN'S PRIVILEGE.

By MARGUERITE BRYANT.

A story of a young lady who acted and of several men, to some of whom she was more or less betrothed, and of a quarter of a million, and of a father fraudulently routed out of a captivity of eighteen years to enter into the inheritance. It may sound tangled, but in that it does no injustice to the story. The confusion seems to be confounded with some dexterity. (A. D. Innes. 424 pp.—no less. 6s.)

GLADLY, MOST GLADLY.

By NONNA BRIGHT.

A collection of short stories, appropriate to the bookshelves of the convent school. They are rather pretty ones. (Burns & Oates. 208 pp.)

REVIEWS.

The Open Boat; and other Stories. By Stephen Crane.
(Heinemann.)

HERE is Mr. Crane again: this time with a volume made up out of odds and ends; excellent odds, laudable ends. He is the same Mr. Crane we know: when he is objective a cinematograph, astonishing in spite of the drawbacks incidental to a machine in the process of evolution; when he is in the subjective realm, where as often as not he delights to be, the analytical chemist of the subconscious and the occasional betrayer of the night side of heroism. In this capacity it is his function to tell us what a man thinks when he thinks he is thinking of nothing, or of something else. And this is a task of singular difficulty, because, in order successfully to perform it, the observer, having but one subject to experiment upon—himself—has first of all to set himself thinking vacuity and then to think how he thinks it; and this demands a clear head. To exemplify Mr. Crane, first, in his objective mood, here is an occasional interlude:

"The kids said: 'Well, so long, old man.' They went to a table and sat down. They ordered a salad. They were always ordering salads. This was because one kid had a wild passion for salads and the other didn't care. So at any hour of the day they might be seen ordering a salad. When this one came they went into a sort of consultation session. It was a very long consultation. Men noted it. Occasionally the kids laughed in supreme enjoyment of something unknown. The low rumble of wheels came from the streets. Often could be heard the parrot-like cries of distant vendors. The sunlight streamed through the green curtains, and made little amber-coloured flitterings on the marble floor. High up among the severe decorations of the ceiling—reminiscent of the days when the great building was a palace—a small white butterfly was wending through the cool air spaces. The long billiard hall led back to a vague gloom. The balls were always clicking, and one could see countless crooked elbows."

From The Open Boat comes the following example of the author in his capacity of analyst of the subconscious; and it is fair to premise that, standing alone, it gives but a faint notion of the curious and convincing scrutiny to which, through some forty pages, the minds of the crew are subjected:

"'If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees?'"

To chime in with the notes of his emotion, a verse mysteriously entered the correspondent's head. He had even forgotten that he had forgotten this verse, but it suddenly was in his mind:

'A soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers,
There was lack of women's nursing, there was dearth of women's tears;
But a comrade stood beside him, and he took that comrade's hand,
And he said: "I shall never see my own, my native land."'

In his childhood the correspondent had been made acquainted with the fact that a soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers, but he had never regarded the fact as important.

Now, however, it quaintly came to him as a human, living thing. It was no longer merely a picture of a few throes in the breast of a poet, meanwhile drinking tea and warming his feet at the grate; it was an actuality—stern, sorrowful, and fine.

The correspondent plainly saw the soldier. He lay out, straight and still, while his pale left hand was upon his chest in an attempt to thwart the going of his life; the blood came between his fingers. In the far Algerian distance a city of low, square forms was set against a sky that was faint with the last sunset hues. The correspondent, plying the oars and dreaming of the slow and slower movements of the lips of the soldier, was moved by a profound and perfectly impersonal comprehension. He was sorry for the soldier of the Legion who lay dying at Algiers."

There is Mr. Crane's most personal note. It may or may not be great art, but we jump to a recognition of it as an expression of truth. And no one has done the thing just that way before. Therefore, one may say of him what can be said of but few of the men and women who write prose fiction: that he is not superfluous.

* * * * *
Between Sun and Sand. By William Charles Scully.
(Methuen.)

WEARIED of drawing-room analytics and the problems of civilisation, you may breathe refreshment from the open-air outdoor life and simple emotions with which Mr. Scully deals. The opening of Between Sun and Sand is, perhaps, a little too minutely descriptive of South African fauna and flora; but that is a natural and excusable failing when the setting of the story is so little known to the Mudie subscriber. The manners portrayed are primitive, the characters, with rare exceptions, unpleasing, and the scenery monotonous. Yet the book holds you by its free movement, and the large simplicity of its design. Between Sun and Sand is the substantial story: "Noquala's Cattle," a description of the rinderpest, forms a not uninteresting make-weight. The Trek-Boers are the nomadic Dutch inhabitants of Bushmanland, a tract of arid country lying south of the Orange River. Their wealth lies in their flocks and herds, and they wander from place to place on the track of the storms which yield scanty and all-precious water. According to Mr. Scully, the Trek-Boer is not an attractive gentleman, being incredibly ignorant, untruthful, lazy, dirty, and cunning. His virtues consist in his hospitality and his trustfulness when once his confidence has been bestowed. He lives in a mat house which can be packed up in five minutes, and owns a waggon in which to follow the spring-buck, the annual harvest of which supplies his meat for the year. Susannah was a good-looking she Trek-Boer and had a Jewish lover, Max Steinmetz, who kept a general shop in the village of Namies. These two supply the small spice of love-making in the story, which is more concerned with the equally primitive pursuits of hunting and murdering, varied by a little civilised money-grubbing on the part of the Jews. A pathetic and picturesque figure is the Hottentot, Gert Gemsbok, cruelly kicked to death by a Boer at the instigation of Max's brother, Nathan Steinmetz.

"This Hottentot was an artist carrying in his heart a spark of that quality which we call genius, and which might be called the flower that bears the pollen which fertilises the human mind, and without which the soul of man would not exist, nor would his understanding have sought for aught beyond the satisfaction of his material senses. Gert Gemsbok was a musician. His instrument was of a kind which is in more or less common use among the Hottentots, and which is known as a 'ramkee.' The ramkee is very like a banjo rudely constructed. In the hands of a skilful player its tones may be pleasing to the ear. One peculiarity of the performance is that a great deal of the fingering—if one may use the term—is done with the chin. There are usually four strings, but some instruments contain as many as seven.

In Gert Gembok's ramkee the drum was made from a cross section of an ebony log, which had been hollowed out with infinite labour until only a thin cylinder of hard, sonorous wood was left. Across this was stretched the skin of an antelope, and inside were several layers of gum—this for the sake of enriching the tone. The bridge was the breast-bone of a wild goose. The strings were made of the sinews of a number of wild animals, selected after a long series of experiments as to their respective suitability to the different parts of the gamut.'

Between Sun and Sand can be recommended to anyone who appreciates the art of a well-written, vigorous narrative, and whose tongue or imagination can get round such names as Schalk Haltingh, Zingelagahle, and "gqira."

* * * * *

His Grace o' the Gunne. By J. Hooper.
(Adam and Charles Black.)

His Grace o' the Gunne carries us back to the days when highway robbery was considered a not wholly unsatisfactory career for impecunious younger sons. The hero of this story of 1664 claims gentle blood from the father whom he never knew, and to whose name he has no right. His mother sells him at the age of five to be trained as a thief. Fortune has so far favoured him as to endow him with a handsome face and a bold and daring character, combined with a gentlemanly bearing which fits him for the higher branches of his profession. For these reasons he is chosen as a tool by my Lord Lulworth, whose intentions are thus described :

" 'Look you, Kirke,' said Flemming ; ' this noble gentleman is my Lord Lulworth. His lordship hath a young cousin left in his ward, a lad of some six or seven years. The child is very sickly, and my lord would send him a tutor.'

He paused. I stared at him in great surprise.
'The young gentleman is the son of my lord's uncle, on the mother's side, and he will succeed to fair estates in the West. But if the poor babe should not live, then faith! the estates would come unto my lord.'

He looked at me and smiled.
'And my lord would have a tutor to care for the young gentleman,' I said, 'so that learning may preserve his life?'

'Aye,' answered Flemming, 'or end it.'
'Speak plainly, Dickon,' said my lord. 'This knave will not need nice dealing. Fellow, this child is a cripple, and is like to be sickly all his life, be it long or short. A pure young soul is better in heaven. By God's grace, I purpose to send it there. He is in the care of his mother's schoolmate, Madam Catherine Challoner, of Pyne. I propose to send you thither as a young gentleman of good family, but poor estate, who purposeth to be a parson. When there you shall have your orders. Carry them out well, and you shall have a hundred pounds; bungle, and you shall swing.'

'My lord,' said I proudly, 'I do not bungle at my trade.'

With this commission Lurlin Kirke sets forth. How he is transformed by love is shown in the working out of the story, which is well told and full of excitement.

* * * * *

Against the Tide. By Mary Angela Dickens.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

A CHILD'S passionate, undisciplined love for her twin brother the brother's preference for his elder and less emotional sister, and the jealousy roused by such conditions, form the groundwork of this tragic story. The tale opens on the eve of the elder sister's marriage. Accident leads to the child overhearing a conversation between the bridegroom-elect and his best man, from which she learns that there is urgent reason why the marriage should not take place. At the time she is racked with jealousy of her sister, convinced that it is only her presence that makes her brother so indifferent to her, and longing for the marriage that shall leave her in full possession of her brother. She is aware that she ought to make known what she has heard, but the bitter jealousy will not let her speak. The marriage takes place, and for eight years all seems to go well; but at the end of that period the married couple, who have hitherto lived abroad, the husband holding a diplomatic appointment, return home, and the child, grown into a woman of disciplined character, the heroine of the book, finds herself, as the outcome of her childish jealousy, involved, together with those she loves, in a whirl of troubles, becoming more and more tragic as the story develops.

The characters are portrayed with a firm touch and are convincing, and the story is one that arrests and holds the attention. The harsher features of the book are softened by the love story of blind David Frere and the heroine, Hilary Cheslyn, though the circumstances under which it is developed and the incidents that threaten to destroy it are of the most sombre character. There is more than a slight touch of melodrama in the book, but it is eminently readable.

A SHEAF OF MAXIMS.

UNDER the title Leaders in Literature (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier), Mr. P. Wilson—a writer whose name is new to us—has put forth nine lively essays on Emerson, Carlyle, Lowell, George Eliot, Mrs. Browning, Robert Browning, Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, and John Ruskin. Mr. Wilson's style is easy and colloquial, and his matter, if not particularly illuminative, is at least sincere. One of the features of his book is the collection of maxims or aphorisms from the writings of Emerson, Lowell, George Eliot, and Ruskin.

EMERSON.

"Emerson's sayings," says Mr. Wilson, "are like bits of broken glass. His style has been called 'a difficult staccato.' He is nothing if not epigrammatic; he is oracular, and is so purposely. Let the following suffice as illustrating his tendency to epigram":

Everyone can do his best things easiest.
Right Ethics are central, and go from the soul outwards.
We must not be sacks and stomachs.
Life is a sincerity.
Great is Drill.
Hitch your waggon to a star.
Difference from me is the measure of absurdity.
Every hero becomes a bore at last.
You are you, and I am I, and so we remain.
Plato is philosophy, and philosophy is Plato.
All things are double, one against another.
The Devil is an ass.

LOWELL.

"Many of Lowell's utterances are proverbial, full of uncommon common sense. Here are a few proverbs, picked out of his writings":

One learns more Metaphysics from a single temptation than from all the Philosophers.
It needs good optics to see what is not to be seen.
All Deacons are good, but there's odds in Deacons.
To be misty is not to be a mystic.
Clerical unction in a vulgar nature easily degenerates into greasiness.
The world never neglects a man's power, but his weaknesses, and especially his publishing them.
Real sorrows are uncomfortable things, but purely æsthetic ones are by no means uncomfortable.
'Truth is the only unrepealable thing.
Treason against the ballot-box is as dangerous as treason against a throne.
The foolish and the dead alone never change their opinion.
The only argument with an east wind is to put on your overcoat.
It is cheaper in the long run to lift men up than to hold them down.
Don't never prophesy unless you know.
That is best blood that hath most iron in't.
A world, made for whatever else, not made for mere enjoyment.
Nothing pays but God.

GEORGE ELIOT.

From George Eliot's works Mr. Wilson quotes rather oddly :
A woman's hopes are woven of sunbeams; a shadow annihilates them.
Miss Jermyn is vulgarity personified, with large feet, and the most odious scent on her handkerchief, and a bonnet that looks like the fashion printed in capital letters.
Esther went to meet Felix in prison; they looked straight into each other's eyes, as angels do when they tell the truth.
I like to differ from everybody; I think it is so stupid to agree.
He was short—just above my shoulder—but he tried to make himself tall by turning up his moustache and keeping his beard long.
You let the Bible alone; you have got a jest-book, haven't you, as you read, and are proud on—keep your dirty fingers to that.

To hear some preachers, you'd think that a man must be doing nothing all's life but shutting's eyes and looking what's a-going on inside him. I know a man must have the love of God in his soul, and the Bible's God's word, but what does the Bible say? It says that God put His sperrit into the workman as built the tabernacle, to make all the carved work, and things as wanted a nice hand: this is my way of looking at it. There's the sperrit of God, in all things and all times, week-day as well as Sunday, and in the great works and inventions, and i' the figuring and mechanics.

I'll stick up for the pretty woman preachers; I know they'd persuade me a deal sooner than ugly men.

I am afraid the drink helped the brook to drown him.

Two things cannot be hidden—love and a cough.

If I am not as wise as the three kings, I know how many legs go into one boot.

Savonarola tells the people that God will not have silver crucifixes and starving stomachs.

If you want to step into a round hole, you must make a ball of yourself.

As Voltaire said, "Incantations will destroy a flock of sheep if administered with a certain quantity of arsenic."

Upon my word, I think the truth is the hardest missile one can be pelted with.

Men do not want books to make them think lightly of vice, as if life were a vulgar joke.

JOHN RUSKIN.

Of Ruskin's epigrams Mr. Wilson gives the following specimens:

The most beautiful things in the world are the most useless—peacocks and lilies, for instance.

There is material enough in a single flower for the ornamenting of a score of cathedrals.

To be baptized with fire, or to be cast into it, is the choice set before all men.

I believe that stars and boughs and leaves and bright colours are everlastingly lovely.

I do not wonder at what men suffer, but I wonder at what they lose.

Nothing must come between Nature and the artist's sight.

Nothing must come between God and the artist's soul.

To paint water is like trying to paint a soul.

To live is nothing, unless to live he to know Him by whom we live.

No royal road to anywhere worth going to.

To see clearly is Poetry, Prophecy, and Religion.

The sky is not blue colour only; it is blue fire, and cannot be painted.

When you have got too much to do, don't do it.

Women and clergy are in the habit of using pretty words without understanding them.

If you can paint a leaf you can paint the world.

Anybody who makes Religion a second object makes Religion no object.

He who offers God a second place, offers Him no place.

GLADSTONE AND THE "DREAM OF GERONTIUS."

MR. J. B. GREENWOOD sends the following letter to the Manchester Guardian:

I make no apology for transcribing Mr. Gladstone's acknowledgment of the copy of Newman's "Dream of Gerontius" sent to him by Mr. Lawrence Dillon, of our Reference Library—to whom General Gordon's sister sent a facsimile of the scored copy inscribed to "Frank Power, with kindest regards of C. G. Gordon, 18 February, '84," as set forth in Mr. C. W. Sutton's letter, which appeared in your columns September 11, 1888. I have Mr. Dillon's sanction for giving publicity to this letter:

"Dear Sir,—In the interim you describe I must thank you for the 'Dream of Gerontius.' I rejoice to see on it, 'Twenty-fourth edition.' It originally came into the world in grave-clothes, swaddled, that is to say, in the folds of the anonymous, but it has now fairly burst them, and will, I hope, take and hold its place in the literature of the world.—Your very faithful and obt.,
"6, 29, 88." (Signed) "W. E. GLADSTONE.

The scored copy referred to above was forwarded by poor Frank Power, the Times correspondent, who very shortly afterwards was murdered, to his sister in Dublin, with these words:—"DEAREST M.,—I send you this little book which General Gordon has given me. The pencil-marking throughout is his.—FRANK POWER, Khartoum." This tiny, well-thumbed 12mo copy Miss Power forwarded to Cardinal Newman, who replied: "Your letter and its contents took away my breath. I was deeply moved to find that a book of mine had been in General Gordon's hands, and that, the description of a soul preparing for death. I send it back to you with my heartfelt thanks, by this post, in a registered cover. It is additionally precious as having Mr. Power's writing in it." The deep incisive pencil marks drawn under certain lines, almost all of which refer to death, and cry for the prayers of friends, are touching in the extreme. "Pray for me, O my friends!" "'Tis death, O loving friends, your prayers—'tis he." "So pray for me, my friends, who have not strength to pray!" "Use well the interval!" "Now that the hour is come, my fear is fled." The last words underlined before he gave the book to young Power are these:

"Farewell, but not for ever, brother dear;
Be brave and patient on thy bed of sorrow!"

THE CHILD'S GUIDE TO LITERATURE.

- Q. Who is this Omar, anyhow?
A. Omar was a Persian.
- Q. Yes?
A. A philosopher and a poet, and a tent-maker, and an astronomer.
- Q. When?
A. At about the time that William II. and Henry I. were reigning here.
- Q. And what did he write?
A. He wrote rubaiyat.
- Q. Ru—?
A. Rubaiyat—stanzas. A "rubai" is a stanza.
- Q. What are they about?
A. Oh, love and paganism, and roses and wine.
- Q. How jolly! But isn't some of it rather steep?
A. Well, it's Persian, you see.
- Q. And these Omarians, as members of the Omar Club call themselves; I suppose they go in for love and paganism and roses and wine too?
A. A little; as much as their wives will let them.
- Q. Wives?
A. Yes; they're mostly married. You see, Omar serves as an excuse for meeting more than anything else.
- Q. But they know Persian, of course?
A. No; they use translations.
- Q. Are there many translations?
A. Heaps. A new one every day.
- Q. Which is the best, the most O. K.
A. FitzGerald's is the most poetical. But John Payne's, just published by the Villon Society, is completest. And you can also have Whinfield's, and McCarthy's, and Heron-Allen's, and—
- Q. No; I don't want them all. I think I'll join the fashion, and make a version for myself.
- A. It will give the Club fits.
- Q. Fitz?—They ought to like that.
- A. No; they'll bar you evermore.
- Q. All right, then, I'll stop where I am. So long as the mater's as decent with coin as she now is, I'll have an Owe Ma Club of my own. To change the subject, I see that the definitive edition of Byron is coming out.
- A. Yes.
- Q. Does that mean the last?
A. It ought to.
- Q. And is it complete?
A. Quite.
- Q. But will that do? Wasn't he awfully improper?
A. He was—once.
- Q. Not now?
A. Oh, no, we don't mind Byron now.
- Q. But how about Don Juan in the harem, and Catherine of Russia, and the Duchess of Fitz Fulke, and—?
A. Here, I say, you oughtn't to know all that.
- Q. And—?
A. S-h-h-h-h!

From "Books of To-day." Edited by Arthur Pendenys.

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1898.

No. 1358, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .               | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom. . . . .                | 0 15 3  | 0 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W. C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN the preface to the new volume of Mr. Murray's edition of Byron, the editor, Mr. Rowland E. Prothero, pays the following generous tribute to the editor of the rival edition:

"No one can regret more sincerely than myself—no one has more cause to regret—the circumstances which placed this wealth of new material in my hands rather than in those of the true poet and brilliant critic, who, to enthusiasm for Byron, and wide acquaintance with the literature and social life of the day, adds the rarer gift of giving life and significance to bygone events or trivial details by unconsciously interesting his readers in his own living personality."

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S new novel will be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. on June 10. Helbeck of Bannisdale has been fixed upon for the title of the story, which deals partly with social Catholic life in the north of England.

MR. MEREDITH'S Selected Poems appear this week while their author is making one of his rare visits to London. Messrs. Archibald Constable & Co. have contrived a pretty little pocket-book of the collection in brown paper covers with parchment backing. As the selection has been made under the supervision of the author, Meredithians may care to see a list of the contents:

Woodland Peace. The Lark Ascending. The Orchard and the Heath. Seed-time. Outer and Inner. Wind on the Lyre. Dirge in Woods. Change in Recurrence. Hard Weather. The South-Wester. The Thrush in February. Tardy Spring. Breath of the Briar. Young Reynard. Love in the Valley. Marian. Hymn to Colour. Mother to Babe. Night of Frost in May. Whimper of Sympathy. A Ballad of Past Meridian. Phoebus with Admetus. Melampus. The Appeasement of Demeter. The Day of the Daughter of Hades. The Young Princess. The Song of Theodolinda. The Nuptials of Attila. Penetration and Trust. Lucifer in Starlight. The Star Sirius. The Spirit of Shakespeare. The Spirit of Shakespeare (continued). The World's Advance. Earth's Secret. Sense and Spirit. Grace and Love. Winter Heavens. Modern Love. Juggling Jerry. The Old Chartist. Martin's Puzzle. A Ballad of Fair Ladies in Revolt. The Woods of Westernmain.

In this volume Mr. Meredith has retained four only of the fifty "Modern Love" sonnets—Nos. 16, 43, 47, and the last.

KIRKCONNEL Churchyard, in Dumfriesshire, famous as the scene of the tragedy described in the well-known Border ballad of "Fair Helen"—referred to in the ACADEMY last week as "so fierce and loving, desolate and defiant, a cry imperishable and perfect"—is at present the subject of a curious dispute. Mr. J. E. Johnson-Ferguson, M.P., who some time ago purchased the estate of Springkell (formerly Kirkconnel) from Sir John Heron-Maxwell, claims the sole right to grant or refuse permission to bury in the picturesque little churchyard. His claims, however, are disputed, and, indeed, two burials have been made in defiance of a notice he has posted up. Legal proceedings are to be taken in the Scottish courts, it is understood, and there will be some knotty points for the lawyers.

"FAIR HELEN," the heroine of the ballad, is buried in Kirkconnel Churchyard, side by side with her lover, Adam Fleming. Two flat slabs mark the spot where they lie, and a sandstone cross, about fifty yards from the graves, marks the place where the tragedy is supposed to have occurred. It was in the churchyard, a romantic spot surrounded by the river Kirtle, that Helen and her lover, obliged to meet in secret, held their stolen interviews, and it was while they were walking there that Fleming's rival appeared on the opposite bank of the stream, and Helen, throwing herself in front of her lover, received the bullet intended for him, and died in his arms, "on fair Kirkconnel Lee."

THE verses that follow have come such a long way—from a ranch in New Mexico—that we have not the heart to refuse them. Besides, they are rather nice:

"And are they curst or are they blest,
The segregate, whose souls are stirred
To sadness by the fading west,
To rapture by the lilting bird?"

Who feel a spirit's fingers drawn
Across their heart-strings as they mark
The crescent glories of the dawn,
The flashing diamonds of the dark:

Who see in Nature Nature's God
Revealed, and worship at the shrines
That consecrates the golden rod
And sanctifies the columbine?

Who shall decide? Not they who count
The gains of life by put and call,
And reckon the exact amount
Of horse-power in the waterfall:

Who see so many cubic feet
Of lumber in the sailing pine,
Who dream of corners in the wheat,
Of loss or profit in the mine.

Each with the other wages strife,
Each nourishes his native grudge;
The Farmer of the field of Life
Who sowed the seed alone can judge."

THE Press View of the International Art Exhibition, at Knightsbridge, is fixed for to-day (Saturday); the Private View for Monday.

No. 5 of the Dome, just issued, is quite a distinguished little number, for it contains ten poems by singers of such note as Mr. Francis Thompson, Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. Laurence Housman, Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. Arthur Symons, and Mr. Stephen Phillips. Mr. Francis Thompson has written a Tom o' Bedlam's song "round" certain selected verses from the well-known mad song in Wit and Drollery, beginning "From the Hag and Hungry Goblin," &c. Mr. Housman's poem is entitled "The Prison Tree." Mr. Arthur Symons, in a "Prologue: Before the Theatre," pleads for the actors:

"How well we play our parts! Do you ever guess,
You as you sit on the footlights' fortunate side,
That we, we haply falter with weariness,
And haply the cheeks are pale that the blush-paints hide,
And haply we crave to be gone from out of your sight,
And to say to the Author: O our master and friend,
Dear Author, let us off for a night, one night!
Then we will come back, and play our parts to the end?"

Mr. W. B. Yeats sends three songlets, Celtic in every word, entitled "Aodh to Deictora."

THE Unicorn Press, whence the Dome emanates, is now the custodian of the Yellow Book's yellow. The Dome is issued in a rather happy combination of this colour with brown paper. But yellow—the utter yellow which contiguity with black alone can give—is the colour note of another "Unicorn" publication, A Book of Images, by W. T. Horton and W. B. Yeats. This book will not be generally understood of the people. Mr. Horton's symbolical drawings have—some of them—a certain beauty and fascination. They are weird and imaginative and black. Mediaeval towns and streets and city spires are their commoner themes, but we have also "The Path to the Moon," which we observe is a zigzag cliff path; and in such drawings as "Sancta Dei Genitrix," "Ascending into Heaven," and "Rosa Mystica" we have Christian symbolism of the kind which Blake produced. Mr. Horton belongs, we are told, to "The Brotherhood of the New Life," which finds the way to God in waking dreams." These are Mr. Horton's dreams, and naturally they mean more to him than they do to anyone else. Sometimes Mr. Horton produces an effect that is interesting to the lay mind, as in his drawing "The Viaduct." Here in blackest silhouette we have a long receding line of crazy chimney-pots, from out of which there issues the fine, firm viaduct on which a train is rumbling. This symbolises a good deal even to those who are not Brothers of the New Life. "The Old Pier," too, tells its story, and "Notre Dame de Paris" is impressive. In brief, we like Mr. Horton's drawings best when we understand them most.

MR. LE GALLIENNE, who is now living in America, has written the following War Poem, which is published in Collier's Weekly:

"WAR POEM.

Strike for the Anglo-Saxon!
Strike for the Newer Day!

O strike for Heart and strike for Brain,
And sweep the Beast away.

Not only for our sailors,
The heroes of the Maine,
But strike for all the victims
Of Moloch-minded Spain.

Not only for the Present,
But all the bloody Past,
O strike for all the martyrs
That have their hour at last.

Old stronghold of the Darkness,
Come, ruin it with light!
It is no fight of small revenge,
'Tis an immortal fight.

Spain is an ancient dragon,
That all too long hath curled
Its coils of blood and darkness
About the new-born world.

Think of the Inquisition!
Think of the Netherlands!
Yea, think of all Spain's bloody deeds
In many times and lands.

And let no feeble pity
Your sacred arms restrain,
This is God's mighty moment
To make an end of Spain."

THE Booksellers' Dinner, held last Saturday at the Holborn Restaurant, produced a great deal of light and airy opinion about books, authorship, and the future of literature. We doubt if anything of much value emerged from the talk. But our readers may judge for themselves. Here are some of the chairman's, Mr. Bryce's, obiter dicta:

"The test of the intellectual level of a town is to be found in the number and contents of the shelves of the booksellers' shops.

I have found no persons who are such capable critics as those who sell books.

The writing of books is an epidemic—an epidemic of increasing violence. Can nothing be done to check literary composition?

The mildness of modern criticism may account for the boldness with which people rush into print.

The vehement publication of newspapers and magazines is an evil: can nothing be done to stop people reading them?

Away with the Circulating Library.

Books ought to be cheaper. The first generation of authors may be losers, but let the heroic suffer.

The best books have been produced with no thought of profit."

MR. I. ZANOWILL gave the toast of "The Trade," which he considered was really the toast of the evening. The Daily Chronicle picked out of it the following, among other, happy remarks:

"I once met a lady in an omnibus, who said to me 'Are you Mr. Zangwill? I said I was. She said, 'I have read one of your works six times.' 'Madam,' I replied, 'I had rather heard that you had bought six copies.'

It is a mistake to suppose that literary men do not want money. They do not embrace literature because there is money in it, but they expect to make money out of it. It is the difference between marrying a woman with money and marrying a woman for her money.

It is better to sell a good book than a bad book, if the profit is the same.

We write books too quickly nowadays. There was once an author who wrote just as many books as his wife gave him children. But one year she produced twins, and he was a book behind. There are a good many authors nowadays who keep pace with triplets.

We get books too easily nowadays: we get them from circulating libraries, and return them: we borrow them from friends, and do not return them: and we get them from philanthropic libraries free of charge, and these libraries add insult to injury by begging a free copy of his book from the author."

MR. ANDREW LANG, responding to the toast of "Literature," said snappy things like these:

"For the consumers of literature I have a profound contempt, because they do not consume enough, nor is what they consumed of the right sort.

Among things which prevent an author from getting on is the Circulating Library.

The curses of literature are education, bicycles, golf, the art of fiction, and printing."

THE point on which the most agreement seemed to exist was that the Circulating Library is eating up the livelihood of authors who are dependent on the sale of their books. But the Circulating Library is at bottom a reply on the part of the public to the high prices of books. The public, unable or unwilling to give six shillings for a novel, clubs to buy it—Mr. Mudie and his imitators being their agents. If we were to venture on a prediction, it would be that the next ten years will see a general lowering of the prices of books. The movement has begun, and there is every sign of its continuance. The six-shilling book for three shillings and sixpence, and the three-and-sixpenny book for two shillings will come, and will stay.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. having achieved a success with their sixpenny edition of King Solomon's Mines, have proposed to the proprietor of the copyright of the late Mr. Stevenson's works a sixpenny edition of Treasure Island. We understand that the negotiations for this edition are now completed.

THE many admirers of Mr. G. W. Cable will be glad to know that during his stay in London he will give three readings from his works. At 133, Gloucester-road (kindly lent by Mrs. J. M. Barrie, next Tuesday, at 3 p.m., Mr. Birrell in the chair, Mr. Cable will read from his story Dr. Sevier:

Part 1. NARCISSE BORROWS "TWO AND A HALF FROM THE WIDOW RILEY."

Part 2. MRS. RILEY AND RICHLINO DISCUSS MATRIMONY.

Part 3. THE WIDOW CHANGES HER NAME FROM IRISH TO ITALIAN.

Part 4. NARCISSE CHEERS RICHLING IN HIS LONELINESS.

Part 5. A SOUND OF DRUMS: DEATH OF NARCISSE.

Part 6. MARY'S NIGHT RIDE.

At 88, Portland Place (kindly lent by Lady Lewis), on May 26, at 3 p.m., Sir Henry Irving in the chair, Mr. Cable will read from his story Bonaventure:

Part 1. HOW THE SCHOOLMASTER CAME TO GRANDE POINTE.

Part 2. HOW THE CHILDREN RANG THE BELL.

Part 3. THE SCHOOL EXAMINATION.

Part 4. VICTORY OF LIGHT AND LOVE.

On both occasions Mr. Cable will sing some of the Old Creole Songs. Tickets for the above readings (10s. 6d.) may be obtained from Mrs. J. M. Barrie, at 133, Gloucester-road, S.W.

BETWEEN the above dates, on May 21, Mr. Cable will give a reading, of which the programme has not reached us, at Bay-tree Lodge, Froggnal, kindly lent by Mrs. Robertson Nicoll, from whom tickets may be obtained.

MISS FESTING, having undertaken to edit the papers of the late Mr. J. H. Frere, would be very glad to avail herself of any of his letters, or of any information in regard to them, that may still be in the possession of his friends, and to receive any communication on the subject addressed to her at 3, The Residence, South Kensington Museum.

SIR CHARLES TENNANT's generous gift of Sir John Millais's portrait of Mr. Gladstone to the nation appears to have been prompted—like many other good deeds—by dinner talk. Sir Charles was present at Mr. Henry Tate's Academy dinner. The conversation turning on portraits of Mr. Gladstone, it was jestingly said that Sir Charles Tennant ought to bequeath his portrait to the nation. The suggestion became almost an entreaty; but Sir Charles held out no hope. Yet within three days he had taken his decision, and at the Saturday Academy banquet Sir Edward Poynter was able to announce the gift.

SOME day it may be worth while to make a psychological inquiry into the influence of Browning on Walworth; for in this dingy suburb many hundreds of children are being reared—so far as literary aliment goes—on Browning's poems. Last Saturday evening at the Robert Browning Social Settlement the children again gave oral proof of their acquaintance with the poet's life and works. Mr. Herbert Stead is saturating the Walworth school children—wild creatures of the streets—with Browning's teachings, and the annual competition in essay writing and recitation is a social event of significance.

Apropos Goethe's quatrain quoted in our review of Sir Charles Murray's biography, a correspondent of Notes and Queries draws attention to a letter written by Sir Charles to the ACADEMY, in which, recounting a visit he paid to Goethe in 1830, Sir Charles wrote:

"I ventured to ask if he would complete his kindness by writing for me a stanza which I might keep as an autograph memento of my visit. After a minute's reflection he wrote for me the following quatrain:

'Liest dir Gestern klar und offen,
Wirkst du heute kraftig treu:
Kannst auch auf ein Morgen hoffen,
Das nicht minder Glücklich sey.'

"It is pretty clear," says the correspondent, "from the words I have italicised, that Sir Charles believed these lines to be an impromptu specially composed for himself, and took the 'minute's reflection' to be a pause for the poet's inspiration. It is, therefore, rather amusing to learn from Hempel, in a note in his edition of Goethe's works, that the poet frequently wrote this stanza (of which he seems to have made also English and French renderings) when asked for a specimen of his autograph. The lines will be found in Book IV. of the Zahner Xenien (Werke, ed. Hempel, Vol. II., p. 377)."

The antiquity of Sir Charles Murray's treasure is established by the correspondent in another way:

"Lately, in a house in Abercromby-place, Edinburgh, I came across an ancient-looking portrait of Goethe with these same lines written underneath, apparently in the poet's handwriting. The owner of the house has since informed me that on taking this picture out of the frame, he found the words, 'Weimar, 7 Nov., 1825'—an appearance of the 'impromptu' five years before it was written for Sir Charles Murray. Was this an amiable weakness on the part of the sage of Weimar—a confirmation of Carlyle's fear that 'the World's-wonder in his old days was growing less than many men'?"

Sir Charles mislaid the autograph, and never could find it again, though, he adds, 'the stanza was indelibly engraved on my memory.' He does not seem to have had the faintest suspicion that it was inscribed in a good many albums besides his own."

M. J. K. HUYSMANS' personality continues to interest at least three reading publics. From Le Temps we learn—hardly, indeed, for the first time—that M. Huysmans lives in a humble lodging on the fifth floor of a monastic-looking house in the Rue de Sèvres. Here he may be found sitting by his fireside with a magnificent cat for his companion. It may be that M. Huysmans has adopted Voltaire's idea of the summum bonum: to sit by the fire, stroking a long, black, writhing Persian cat. M. Huysmans told his interviewer how he fared among the Trappists, to whom he went to obtain material for his novel, En Route.

"He rose at 2 a.m. for service in the chapel, and did not retire to rest until 8 p.m. However, he found it impossible to conform to the monastic diet of lukewarm soup and vegetables cooked in oil without any seasoning, for which he substituted three fresh eggs and a piece of bread, which calmed his appetite without satisfying it. He was allowed the run of the monastery, but not to talk with the monks. The result of M. Huysmans' monastic experiences as embodied in En Route has been the sending of a pretty considerable number of penitents to the order."

When writing La Cathédrale, M. Huysmans joined the learned Benedictines of the Abbey of Solesmes. Here he spent much time examining the parchment MSS.,

"looking at the illuminations through a magnifying glass, and deciphering Latin texts, in which task he received valuable aid from the more experienced monks, some of whom are specialists whose erudition is quite remarkable. They have pierced the obscurity of mediæval symbolism. One has made a speciality of flowers, another of animals, another of perfumes, and another of precious stones. Each brought his tribute to M. Huysmans, who has recast all these materials in his book. In La Cathédrale will be found the signification of the colours employed in the making of stained glass and of the precious stones used in ecclesiastical vestments and ornamentation."

THE new edition of Thackeray's works is raising a crop of stories about their author, more or less new. Mr. Edward Wilberforce sends the following personal recollection to the Spectator:

"Just after the completion of The Newcomes, he told me how he was walking to the post-office in Paris to send off the concluding chapters when he came upon an old friend of his, who was also known to me. 'Come into this archway,' said Thackeray to his friend, 'and I will read you the last bit of The Newcomes.' The two went aside out of the street, and there Thackeray read the scene of the Colonel's death. His friend's emotion grew more and more intense as the reading went on, and at the close he burst out crying, and exclaimed, 'If everybody else does like that the fortune of the book is made!' 'And everybody else did!' was my comment. 'Not I,' replied Thackeray, 'I was quite unmoved when I killed the Colonel. What was nearly too much for me was the description of "Boy" saying "Our Father." I was dictating that to my daughter, and I had the greatest difficulty in controlling my voice and not letting her see that I was almost breaking down. I don't think, however, that she suspected it.' Perhaps a future volume of the 'Biographical Edition,' the one containing The Newcomes, will throw light on this subject, and tell how far Thackeray was right in his conjecture."

THREE novels we received last week from Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. were incorrectly priced in our "Guide for Novel Readers": The Datchet Diamonds, by Mr. Richard Marsh; Prisoners of the Sea, by Miss Florence Morse Kingsley; and Sir Tristram, by Mr. Thorold Ashley. The prices of these books are all 3s. 6d.; not 6s., as we stated.

THE vocabulary, modes of expression, and turns of thought employed by Mr. Douglas Sladen in his new novel The Admiral: a Romance of Nelson in the Year of the Nile, are derived partly from Nelson's own letters, and partly from the journals of Mr. H. W. Brooke, a person of some note in his day. Mr. Brooke was godfather of Mr. Sladen's father, Mr. Douglas Brooke Sladen, and bequeathed his papers to him. He was head of the now abolished Alien Office, and as such was thrown much in contact with the French Royal Family during their exile in England, and was present at their restoration in 1814. Mr. Brooke may be taken as a fair specimen of the educated Kentish gentleman of his time, though his grammar was constantly faulty by our standards. In some instances, however, as in the employment of "I have wrote," instead of "I have written," it is not his grammar that is at fault, but the idiom of the time. Mr. Brooke spent the last years of his life at Walmer, where the story is supposed to have been written.

THE Christian Budget and News of the Week, a new popular penny paper, will be issued, on June 10, by the Chandos Publishing Company. It will be run on entirely new lines. The Editor promises that it will be "bright, up-to-date, and interesting to people of all ages, classes, and creeds."

SOME of the American literary papers make brave attempts to be amusing. Here are two examples. The first is from the Literary World (Boston), the second from the Bookman (New York):

"Sir Henry Smith has written a book on Reviewers and How to Break Them, which the Messrs. Blackwood will shortly publish. P.S. The foregoing is a printer's error; for 'Reviewers' read Retrievers."

"At the corner of a street in an English town a well-known newspaper office recently advertised on a placard a new serial story, 'The Price of a Soul.' At the opposite corner of the same street the passer-by was confronted with an announcement on the notice-board outside of a fishmonger's shop to this effect, "Soles, 1s. per pound!"

A NEW Irish weekly journal, published in London, will be published on Saturday. New Ireland, as the journal is to be styled, will be independent of all parties and sects in Ireland. Its main object—according to the prospectus—will be to interest Irishmen and Irishwomen throughout the world in Irish literature, art, sport, and the social development of the country. A special feature will be biographical sketches, with a view to showing what Irishmen and Irishwomen have achieved and are achieving in all parts of the globe.

THE mania for discovering literary parallels is on the increase. An American reader rushes into print to proclaim the similarity between Mr. Paul Leicester Ford's novel, The Story of an Untold Love, and M. Edmond Rostand's play, Cyrano de Bergerac. In the play a stupid cadet gains the love of the précieuse Roxane through "the intellectual mediation of Cyrano," who writes love-letters for the cadet. In Mr. Ford's novel, Whitely, the stupid editor, takes credit for the work of the brilliant, but obscure Rudolph Hartzman in order to win a modern précieuse. Other, and minor, resemblances are indicated. But the writer might as well have contended, while he was about it, that the idea, common to the French play and the American novel, was derived from Mr. Anstey's story, The Giant's Robe, in which a third-rate scribbler actually wins a woman by publishing, as his own, the work of a better man supposed to be drowned.

PURE FABLES.

HARD KNOCKS.

A young man sat in a rose-garden and wooed Death with sonnets.

And later he was sore stricken in spirit, and Death came to do him courtesy; but he said, "Nay, nay, not yet! . . . I have sundry heartening things to write."

SUCCESS.

A man of letters was accused of harbouring Success.

"It is true," quoth the culprit. "She came to my door in the night; I took her in; my wife was charmed with her; and we decided to let her stay. Also: we have not regretted it."

MAD.

They brought a mad poet before the king.

"Give us something fine, now," said the king.

"Faugh!" the poet exclaimed, "I do not dabble with words!"

"There is a certain greatness in that," remarked the king.

THE MERELY MARKETABLE.

Apollo told the Muses that a mediocre writer was making too much play with his pen, and compassing a great deal of supererogatory tarantara.

And the Muses said that it was scarcely their fault, inasmuch as not one of them had been near the man.

THE BENIGN MOTHER.

"Poverty never did any good in the world," cried the reformer.

"Yet she appears to have stood in a maternal relation to considerable fine writing," observed the philosopher.

THE SINGLE ART.

A swan who dwelt on the bosom of a mere was vastly admired by a fox, who one day said to her, "How gracefully you swim! Now, though envious people tell me otherwise, I make no doubt that you would cut an equally elegant figure on the grass here."

Pleased with this flattery, the swan came ashore and essayed to walk; but waddled so that the fox laughed consumedly.

"Ah, madam," quoth he, "I am afraid it is given to few of us to do more than one thing really well."

T. W. H. C.

A MEMORIAL: AND A MORAL.

A SCOTTISH correspondent writes:

Judging from the history of the movement for the erection at Mauchline of a 'National' memorial of the Scottish national bard, Burns monuments and memorials are, to use a colloquialism, 'played out.' It requires some courage, undoubtedly, to even hint that this is so; but the fact remains. And facts, as the poet himself has it, are 'chiefs that winna ding,' although, his dictum notwithstanding, they may be disputed. True, the memorial has been erected, and was on Saturday last formally opened amid the plaudits of assembled Burnsites. But even at this opening ceremony there was a doleful note sounded. The scheme, said the treasurer, had been made known in every land where the English language was spoken, and the promoters had hoped for great things. But, he significantly added, they had been 'wofully disappointed.'

Three years ago certain 'pious Burnsites' assured the public that it had 'long been a matter of reproach' that there was no 'monument or memorial' at Mauchline; and, looking to the number of Burns statues in Scotland, in America, in Australia, and elsewhere, it was, unquestionably, somewhat remarkable that there was none at Mauchline—than which no place was more closely associated with the life and the poetry of Burns. The celebration of the centenary of the poet's death was looked forward to as a suitable occasion for removing the 'reproach,' and in July, 1895, an appeal was issued for subscriptions for a 'National Burns Memorial at Mauchline,' which memorial, it had been resolved, should take the form of Cottage Homes, combined with a Tower, the lower portion of which latter would be suitable for holding relics of Burns, while the upper portion would be provided with a balcony from which visitors could view the surrounding country—Mossgiel, the home of Jean Armour, the residence of Gavin Hamilton, Poosie Nansie's Hostelry (of 'Jolly Beggars' fame), the scene of the 'Holy Fair,' and many other classic scenes.

The total amount required, including a sum for the endowment of the Homes, was £5,000; and in view of the fact that at least £50,000 had been expended (so it has been estimated) on Burns memorials and Burns statues, £5,000 certainly did not seem a very extravagant demand for the erection, equipment, and endowment of a National Memorial. Moreover, a bequest of £1,000, a grant of £250 from the Cobb Bequest Trustees, and two subscriptions of £100 each were received—substantial items to account. But the 'common Burnsite' resolutely refused to draw his purse-strings. The 'Idol' continued to be worshipped with as much zeal and enthusiasm as ever, and as each recurring 25th of January came round, the 'Immortal Memory' was pledged with 'potations pottle deep'; but the great mass of the devotees remained deaf to all appeals—for cash. One after another such appeals were sent out; but not even yet, after the lapse of three years, has the £5,000 for the 'National' Memorial been subscribed. Including the bequests, the total sum raised is only a little over £4,000.

Nor is this an altogether solitary instance. A scheme was started in Montrose so far back as the year 1882 for the erection of a Burns statue there, at an estimated cost of £700, and at the end of sixteen years the subscriptions amount to £245. Two proposals have been made: one, that the £245 be kept in the bank until with accumulated interest it reaches the sum needed for the statue; the other, that the amount subscribed be utilised for the erection of a memorial fountain to a recent Provost of the burgh!

Is it too much to say that Burns monuments are played out?"

HERMANN SUDERMANN.

In appearance Hermann Sudermann—a translation of whose latest novel, under the title of Regina; or, the Sins of the Fathers, is published this week—suggests the man of action rather than the man of letters. A muscular giant, bearded and blue-eyed, he resembles the ideal Wotan of Wagnerian drama, if one can imagine Wotan in a frock-coat of irreproachable cut. Yet lines of thought are to be discerned on the lofty forehead, and a poetic melancholy lurks somewhere in the depths of the fine eyes, which on the surface only reflect a smile of rare geniality.

There is something paradoxically sunny and bracing about Sudermann's vigorous personality that shines behind the clouds of even his most pessimistic pages.

Apart from the intrinsic merits of his work, the fact that he has accomplished the uncommon feat of producing successful novels with one hand and equally successful plays with the other, makes Sudermann an interesting figure in contemporary Continental literature. In this island, especially, where the belief prevails that the art of the novelist and the art of the playwright are things distinct and separate, because our Hardys and Merediths do not write plays, or our Pineroes and Joneses novels, Sudermann's achievement may well be regarded with astonishment.

He was born in that rural Eastern Prussia which provides the milieu of his two first novels, Frau Sorge and Der Katzensteg. Frau Sorge is to be accepted, indeed, as largely autobiographical in the sense that Le Petit Chose and David Copperfield are autobiographical. The touching dedicatory verses to "Meinen Eltern" tells of the author's humble origin, of his strong filial loyalty, and a boyhood of hardships and poverty. The story itself contains one of the most charming pictures of the friendship between a mother and son to be found in modern fiction. In reticent tenderness and freshness it is only comparable with the immortal twentieth chapter of Heine's Wintermärchen. By the early nineties Frau Sorge and Der Katzensteg had passed through many editions, while Die Ehre had been received with éclat as an "epoch-making" drama in every theatre of importance in Germany. This meteoric start has so far been well sustained by Sudermann's subsequent career. Among the most conspicuous of his later triumphs may be mentioned his monumental novel Es war; Die Heimath, whose heroine, Magda, the revolting daughter par excellence of the stage, has given two great foreign actresses a favourite rôle; Sodom's Ende, a masterly and lurid epic of Berlin morals; and Fritzchen, the second in a miniature trilogy of one-act plays called "Morituri," because each deals with a different manner of facing death. For sheer constructive balance and restrained tragic force this small masterpiece is unsurpassed by Sudermann's longer dramas, not excepting his last and longest, Johannes.

Excitement ran high in Berlin literary circles last January when it was announced that the Kaiser had magnanimously revoked the veto of the Censor, and given his imprimatur to Johannes. The demand for tickets was unprecedented, and incredible sums were paid for a single stall to witness this great sacred drama. The qualities of Sudermann's genius are too complex to be hit off in a slight sketch; they demand exhaustive study. His fame rests mainly, perhaps, on superb technique in the building of a play, and masterly psychology in the delineation of a character. That he has created a gallery of heroines of quite Meredithian individuality is not one of the least of his claims to distinction. His women, old or young, married or single, one and all are individualities first and Germans afterwards.

Sudermann is a jealous guardian of the rights of his literary confères, and the reputation of the literature he has done so much to revolutionise. One winter he took up his abode in Dresden on purpose to attend the sittings of a prolonged conference on copyright and the ethics of publishing. Berlin is now his headquarters; but he is constantly on the wing, and has witnessed performances of his plays in most of the capitals of Europe. When he is writing a new work he leaves both wife and children at home, and buries himself in some obscure nook in Italy or the Tyrol. No correspondence is forwarded to him till the MS. is complete.

A Gelegenheitsgedicht, delivered by Sudermann in May, 1897, at the unveiling of Scheffel's statue in the Sabine Mountains, was published for the first time in Cosmopolis for April. The poem is a graceful tribute from the modern favourite to one of a past generation. The once popular author of Ekkehard excited the enthusiasm of readers whose grandchildren now schwärm for Der Katzensteg and Es war; yet Sudermann maintains in his poem Scheffel still lives and will continue to live on in every German heart that cherishes the "dumme, deutsche Maiensehnsucht." The oration exhibits Sudermann in his lighter mood, the mood that inspired his volume of contes, Im Zwielfichte, his Iolanthe's Hochzeit, and Das ewig Männliche. All of these elaborate trifles are characterised by a most un-Germanic daintiness of touch, and prove Sudermann, the writer of tragedies which provoke so profoundly emotions of "pity and terror," to possess the saving gift of humour.

POLYGLOT PUBLISHING.

MR. HEINEMANN'S announcement that he will publish in the autumn Mr. Landor's book on his experiences in Thibet has appeared in the newspapers this week. It heralds a big publishing enterprise, for we are told that besides the English edition there will be an American one, and French, German, Hungarian, Bohemian, Russian, and Italian translations. Behind such an announcement—though it come in a few cold, type-written sentences—there must hide an immense amount of organisation and activity. A representative of the ACADEMY induced Mr. Heinemann to talk a little about the work involved.

"Yes," said Mr. Heinemann, walking up and down his room, and fingering piles of Mr. Landor's photographs that were lying on the table, "it is, of course, a big enterprise, and most of the work is done here."

"Is your copyright protected in all these countries?"

"Not in all. You are wondering, I suppose, whether the book is not liable to be pirated, and so taken out of our hands. There is small danger of that. For one thing, Mr. Landor's is a costly work to produce. Again, its illustrations are essential to it, and these are in our keeping. A pirated edition could only be made from the editions we or our agents publish, and then it would be too late."

"About the translations—these are made, of course, in the countries concerned?"

"Yes; the translators are appointed and controlled by the publishing houses with whom we have negotiated."

"Will the translations be in all cases complete?"

"Oh yes, quite complete."

"And the foreign editions will contain the same illustrations?"

"The same. These will be sent out by us in the form of blocks, the photographs and drawings having been worked up and engraved here."

"Do you control in any way the style of printing and binding in the various countries?"

"No; these are matters for the firms issuing the book. They purchase the MS. and the blocks, and enter into other financial arrangements with us; the rest is their own affair. These firms are, of course, of the highest standing."

"It is clear that you consider Mr. Landor's book has a world-wide interest."

"There can be no doubt of that."

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

In these tragic days for poor picturesque Spain it is good to read in the Figaro one pretty little sentence of Loti's which effectively gives us the measure of Iberian spirit. He paints an afternoon scene in the familiar Prado and Castellana, now at their brightest and best in their rich purple flush of Judas blossom and sparkling leaf:

"The long avenues, a mingling of lawn and boskage, like the Champs Elysées of Paris, overflowed with people and carriages. Beside the fresh hue of new leafage, the big Judas trees, covered with flowers, spread in heavy purple bunches; the sky was limpid, and the air warm; everything wore an aspect of joy. Public vehicles, drawn by companies of mules with scarlet bobbins, or luxurious carriages, emblazoned with liveried lacqueys, flashed by in resplendent style, close upon one another, innumerable; and handsome señoras, lying back in open landaus, in passing flung officers on horseback the pretty hand salutation of the madrileña. Truly, when one knows from elsewhere with what an impulse all these pleasure-seekers have at this moment offered their fortune and their life one cannot withhold admiration from such haughty gaiety and such disdainful smiles."

Such a book as Le Duc de Richelieu, by Raoul de Cisternes, is convincing evidence of the appalling dulness and mediocrity of French history from the Restoration until our own troubled times. Even the melodramatic figure of Chateaubriand and the gentle and lovely Récamier are insufficient suggestions of more effective ages, as, for all his genius, there is incontestably a note of vulgarity about Chateaubriand, and the century is barely relieved by the memory of his Byronic pose and long boots. Who today remembers the accomplishments of the Count of Serre? Yet in 1818 he was regarded as the greatest orator of the age, who astonished France by the facility of his sudden improvisations and inflamed worn politicians. Thureau-Dangin likened him to one of the legendary heroes of chivalry who kept entire armies at bay by the might of their single sword. For that matter the hero of M. de Cisternes is far from striking us as a portentous figure. He answered to a magnificent collection of names and titles—Armand Emmanuel Joseph Septimanie de Vignerot du Plessis-Richelieu, Count of Chinois, Duke of Fronsac, and Duke of Richelieu. Grandson of the brilliant marshal, the great Cardinal's nephew, we are told that he was an admirable administrator and a matchless negotiator. It needs something considerably more to interest us in so near a contemporary figure as the minister of Louis XVIII. The man is neither witty nor picturesque, nor paradoxical. His opinions are unimpeachable and he expresses them correctly, that is all. Speaking of Monsieur's party spirit, he writes:

"In all my conversations with him, as I found him on entering his cabinet so I left him on departing; I ever beheld the head of a party, never the heir presumptive of the kingdom of France. May he, on ascending the throne, recognise that a king cannot be a party king, and that all France belongs to him, as he belongs to all France."

Still at its worst and dullest there is always something to be learnt from carefully written history, and a wet afternoon may advantageously be spent over M. de Cisternes' Duc de Richelieu.

The old-fashioned Frenchman is in a dyspeptic stage of revolt against the new French young girl. He sits in his library and snarls at her on paper. The horrid creature is, of course, fashionable, superlatively well-dressed, not with the primitive simplicity of blue sash and white muslin gown, but with all the usurped impertinence and insistent vogue of the emancipated matron. He accuses her of all sorts of monstrous crimes. She rides a bicycle in bloomers (truly a crime against art and beauty); she follows the hunt in knickerbockers, tunic, and long boots like her brother; she smokes cigarettes and drinks wine without water; she "cheeks" her elders, sings music-hall songs, fishes, studies pornographic literature in secret, kisses her fiancé, even (if we are to believe Rétrogrades, by the Count de Saint-Aulaire) proposes to him, and inveigles him into a love-scene; she swears; has, of course, no heart, and less conscience. The bilious mind is proverbially unjust and bitter. The unfortunate slave of French civilisation has only begun to suspect the imbecility of her voiceless resignation. Her follies are harmless enough, and if we are to judge of her conventional superior, the old-fashioned maiden of high life, in the pages of the eloquent and indignant count, the new scamp of fiction is vastly more intelligent and more entertaining. There is no particular harm in drinking wine without water—if one does not drink too much; nor either in innocent philandering in moonlight with an enamoured young man who wants to marry you and whom you desire to marry; but the retrograde count seems to regard all this as black iniquity. He reserves his admiration for the young lady who lifts her eyes to heaven, and sings divinely with lowered lids. Over her he gushes, and at the other he scowls. Personally, I prefer to talk to a girl who sees the sun in the mid-day heaven, and who has the pluck to dot her i's. But that's a detail. If the virtuous count preached less against the poor new young girl, and took her as he found her, with her follies and amiable vices, if he were a little less inhumanly aristocratic, Rétrogrades would be a clever novel.

Very much more dull is another French novel with a purpose, La Socialiste. Politics in fiction are even worse than literature. The hero, a Socialist, is a colourless young man who once wrote ten pages of a novel he had the grace and sense not to finish. So that his literary tastes are of an inconsequent kind. But he "drops" into politics on every occasion, falls in love with an artisan's daughter, leads a strike, and loses his love by a bullet, which pierces her heart and lays her beside his dead rival.

H. L.

THE WEEK.

MR. EDMUND G. GARDNER has written a learned commentary on Dante's Paradiso. He calls it Dante's Ten Heavens, and the book is divided into seven chapters, or essays, entitled: "Dante's Paradise," "Within Earth's Shadow," "Prudence and Fortitude," "Empire and Cloister," "Above the Celestial Stairway," "The Emyrean"; the seventh section deals with Dante's letters. Mr. Gardner's work is founded on an exhaustive study of the best early and modern editions and commentaries. In the following passage from the first chapter the Paradiso is compared with the Inferno and Purgatorio.

"The description of . . . eternal glory and the mediæval conception of Paradise as the mystical union of the soul with the First Cause in vision, love, and enjoyment, and the comprehension of the most sublime and secret things of the celestial mysteries, is . . . the theme of Dante's Paradiso. It is, perhaps, still the least popular, the least generally intelligible part of the Divine Comedy. Ruskin has somewhere spoken of the difficulty of having nobility enough in one's own thoughts to forgive the failure of any other human soul, to speak clearly what it has felt of the most divine. Perhaps in the Inferno the dramatic side of Dante's genius is more obvious, in those clear and terrible pictures of human passion and suffering against a background of lurid flame. In the Purgatorio Dante seems more the spokesman and poet of all humanity: his teaching in that second canticle, even for non-Catholics who reject the doctrine of Purgatory, seems to be of more general and universal application, corresponding to something in the heart and conscience of man. In the Paradiso Dante appears as essentially the man of the Middle Ages. Here, perhaps more than in any other part of the poem, does Dante show himself in thorough sympathy with his age, its doctrines and rudimentary science, its yearnings for knowledge, its delight in the beauty of intellectual satisfaction. It is such works as the Paradiso that enable us to realise what were the noblest thoughts and aspirations of those ages, whose exceeding light has so dazzled weak modern eyesight that they have sometimes been called dark."

THE late Mr. Du Maurier's papers on Social and Pictorial Satire make a pleasant volume now that they are garnered from Harper's Magazine.

To the Master of Medicine series is added a life of William Stokes by his son, William Stokes. Dr. Stokes, the great Dublin doctor, died in 1878, in his seventy-fourth year. His son gives a picture of his father's inner life, his home pursuits, tastes, and accomplishments.

THE new volume just issued of Mr. Murray's Byron contains letters bearing dates down to August 22, 1811. There are 168 letters in all. Moore's edition of Byron's correspondence, published in 1830, gave only sixty-one letters for the same period; Halleck's edition, in 1847, gave seventy-eight; Mr. Henley's, last year, gave eighty-eight. It will be seen, therefore, that the present volume contains much that is new and interesting to students of Byron; for the additional letters are not those which have been seen and rejected by earlier editors, they are fresh from the Murray archives. Mr. Protheroe points out that the letters contained in this volume were written by Byron from his eleventh to his twenty-third year.

"They therefore illustrate the composition of his youthful poetry, of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, and of the first two cantos of Childe Harold. They carry his history down to the eve of that morning in March, 1812, when he awoke and found himself famous—in a degree and to an extent which to the present generation seems almost incomprehensible."

We dip at random into these lively letters and read: "Trin. Coll., Cambridge, Nov. 23, 1805. . . . I sit down to write with a Head confused with Dissipation, which, tho' I hate, I cannot avoid." In the same letter we read: "My mother and I have quarrelled, which I bear with the patience of a philosopher; custom reconciles me to everything." But three years later he abandons his philosophy, or at least changes it:

"I once thought myself a philosopher, and talked nonsense with great decorum . . . at last, a fall from my horse convinced me bodily suffering was an evil . . . so I quitted Zeno for Aristippus, and conceive that pleasure constitutes το καλον."

The book has for frontispiece an unfamiliar portrait of Byron, taken between 1804 and 1806.

A R T.

THE SKY-LINE AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE sky-line at Burlington House repays, as usual, the upward glances of visitors. These are difficult to give, especially in a crowd, for one must step backwards, even across the floor of the room, to discover in some cases even the bare subjects; and what you lose of beauty of lighting and of dexterity of handling you mainly have to guess. Yet it is obvious at a glance that the sky-line contains some forty or fifty pictures that ought to have been better hung, just as a glance along the eye-line discovers a number of canvases that, if they were to be hung at all, should have been hung as far as possible out of sight. Of some few of these forty or fifty works it may be said that they are particularly fine. They had a place even on our list of the best hundred pictures in all the Academy. It is safe prophesying to say that they will stand as high in the estimation of future generations of picture-lovers as they now stand on the walls of Burlington House. The following list—on which the appearance of Mr. Brangwyn's name repeats a similar scandal of past years—is made up of pictures to which the Academy visitor ought to turn, and which will well reward him for his pains—in the neck.

5. On the River Coquette: Moonlight. H. Charles Clifford.
13. Pale Queen of Night. Robert Goodman.
14. Wind and Rain. E. Leslie Badham.
31. Southdown Sheep. José Weiss.
38. Juno's Herd Boy. Emily R. Holmes.
44. In a Cornish Cottage. Harold C. Harvey.
54. Moonrise. Arthur Meade.
96. Evening. Folliot Stokes.
119. Early Morning on a Mediterranean Shore. Florence H. Moore.
155. Ebb Tide. Bertram Priestman.
166. "Fine Feathers make Fine Birds." Ida Lovering.
196. A Waterway. Arnesby Brown.
213. Christ and the Man Possessed with Devils. Horace M. Livens.
218. The Golden Horn. Frank Brangwyn.

224. Jubilee Procession in a Cornish Village. G. Sherwood Hunter.
259. The Pied Piper of Hamelin. Arthur A. Dixon.
273. Kate-a-Whimsies. Constance Halford.
306. St. Ives Harbour on a Grey Day. Hugh Blackden.
311. The Benediction of the Sea. T. Austen Brown.
317. Moonrise at Twilight. Julius Olsson.
324. Mrs. Harrington Mann. Harrington Mann.
350. Portrait of a Gentleman. George Thomson.
383. Vivian Caulfeild. Val Havers.
389. A Sail. John W. Whiteley.
417. Evening. Montague Crick.
500. Sunshine and Shade. Thomas F. Catchpole.
501. Zennor: a Lonely Parish. Alice Fanner.
513. White Gigs. Mary McCrossan.
579. South Queensferry-on-Forth. Archibald Kay.
580. Poppies. William Ayrton.
599. *A Breton Interior. A. K. Brodie.
605. Sunlight and Shadow. Alex. Frew.
611. Lechlade, Gloucestershire. William D. Adams.
628. A Westminster Priest. George Spencer Watson.
641. In the Streets of Dort. George C. Haité.
906. The Right Hon. Lord Watson. John S. Sargent, R.A.

Mr. Sargent himself was one of the hangers, and this fact ought to be known in view of the place given to the last named, as well as in explanation of that assigned to the fine portrait of Mrs. Wertheimer. The whole question of the hanging of the pictures at Burlington House is one which needs an open discussion. This is no merely domestic matter in the case of a semi-national institution, which occupies a site for which it did not pay a penny. The nation in general, the great body of artists in particular, are entitled to an opinion, and to the perfectly free expression of it, as to the anomalies of the Academy's present system of accepting and of placing its pictures.

And if this reform is to be accomplished, the studios ought in the first instance to decide. They may find their protection in the plebiscite of Paris, where every hanger is responsible to a constituency of artists who elect him. From the ruling President, it appears, neither the artist nor the public is to expect co-operation; even so obvious a reform as the reduction of the height to which pictures are to be crowded on the walls, a reform the influence of Lord Leighton inaugurated, has been allowed to lapse. The growing public dislike for acres of pictures, such as men would not hang on their own walls, but are invited to inspect by the official leaders of art culture, finds every year a more distinct expression; and some means, we must suppose, will shortly be found to translate it into action.

DRAMA.

THE MEDICINE MAN: FURTHER CONSIDERATIONS.

FROM the performance of the "Medicine Man" at the Lyceum two considerations arise to which the newspaper critic, writing au pied levé, has hardly given sufficient attention. The first is concerned with a new claim put forth on behalf of the stage, a claim asserted by no less an authority than Sir Henry Irving himself, and supported more or less emphatically by other leading actors—namely, that the function of the better class of drama is not solely to entertain, but also to instruct, to educate the public, and under "drama," of course, one naturally includes acting and mounting. This claim involves another with which it is usually coupled, the subsidising, or the municipalising, of the theatre; but that I do not propose to discuss, if only because the one claim must be made good before the other can be entertained, since the subsidising of mere entertainment as opposed to instruction would bring forward Mr. Arthur Roberts, Miss Letty Lind, and even the burning and shining lights of the music-hall, as worthy objects of State or municipal bounty. Well, on the score of education, here are Messrs. Traill and Hichens proclaiming in "The Medicine Man," with Sir Henry Irving's countenance and support, a theory of hypnotism which belongs not to science but to the show-booth. In presenting "will-power" as the source of the mysterious, Dr. Tregenna's influence over his patients and the secret of his miraculous cures, they degrade a scientific principle to the level of the practices of the professional conjuror and illusionist. For twenty years or more, ever since the researches and experiments of the Paris faculty placed hypnotism upon the strictly scientific basis of "suggestion," "will-power" has been relegated to the same limbo as "oddylic force" and "electrobiology"; it is the pretence of the trickster and charlatan of the platform. To be sure, this exploded theory of will-power has recently been revived as a pseudo-scientific speculation under the name of telepathy, but in that form it does not come before us in the Lyceum play, which crudely inculcates as a modern fact the mesmeric superstition of a hundred years ago. How is this to be reconciled, I would ask, with the educational pretensions of the stage?

If the inquiring student went to the Lyceum for instruction in hypnotism—a really useful and promising branch of psycho-physiology with important bearings upon a variety of phenomena, including insanity, somnambulism, dreams, genius, and even the working of spells, charms, fetiches, and other occult influences which, surviving all the scientific contumely poured upon them, are at length perceived to have some foundation in fact—he would come away with a wholly erroneous idea. For this I am not blaming the authors, who have no views, so far as I am aware, about the educational influence of the drama, and who are at liberty, like Molière, to take their material where they find it. They have judged, rightly or wrongly, that the hocus-pocus of the quack is more effective for stage purposes than the science of the Salpêtrière, and they are entitled to their opinion. Unfortunately there is no intimation in the play that Dr. Tregenna is a quack. On the contrary, he is represented as an up-to-date brain specialist, who ought certainly to be aware that the only valid agency in hypnotism is "suggestion," a command conveyed through one of the patient's senses—sight, hearing, smell, taste or touch—or several combined, as when a pillow placed in the patient's arms arouses the idea of a baby. All would be well with Dr. Tregenna's hocus-pocus but for that new-fangled educational theory.

NOR is it alone where science is concerned that the ill-considered pretensions of the stage come to grief. The dramatist notoriously takes liberties with history which would not meet with the approval of a Cambridge Local Examiner. In "Charles I." the late W. G. Wills and Sir Henry Irving between them depicted the Stuart king as a paragon of the domestic virtues, and Cromwell as a low, self-seeking adventurer; and doubtless the historian would have something to say to the Lyceum sketch of Napoleon and his Court as given in Sardou's "Madame Sans Gêne." Shakespeare himself is one of the greatest offenders against historical truth. Where the drama may legitimately aim at educational accuracy is in the matter of costume, but even within this limited field its teaching can only be approximately correct. Much of the archæological detail of modern mise-en-scène is indeed lost upon the public. There remains the acting to be considered. "Surely the best acting," it will be said, "gives us a valuable insight into human nature." I am not so sure that the critic, professional as well as amateur, does not labour under a delusion in this respect. The actor, it seems to me, is always at his best (and the dramatist too) when he is telling us something we already know. It is the recognition of a truth on the stage—the reproduction of emotional conditions with which one is already familiar—that gives the spectator a thrill of satisfaction. When actor and author wander off into the abstruse or the didactic or the unknown—that is to say, when they may be supposed to be most educational—they are least impressive.

THE second consideration suggested by "The Medicine Man" is the subtlety, the curious indefiniteness of that gift which belongs to the born dramatist as distinguished from the man of letters. In point of literary workmanship, "The Medicine Man" ranks high; its characterisation also stands out well. But as a drama it lacks something—it is difficult to say what. The authors appear to have fashioned a beautiful model into which they have failed to breathe the breath of life. After seeing the Lyceum production, one realises the truth of the younger Dumas' remark (in one of his innumerable prefaces), that dramatic effect is sometimes so intangible that the spectator "cannot find in the printed text of a play the point which charmed him in its performance," and which may be due not merely to a look, a word, a gesture, but to "a silence, a purely atmospheric combination." In this case the text is irreproachable, but one misses the charm. Not that this casts any reflection upon the intellectual capacity of Messrs. Traill and Hichens! Dumas goes on to say that "a man of no value as a thinker, as a novelist, as a philosopher, as a writer, may be a man of the first order as a dramatic author"; and conversely. Legouvé, the collaborator of Scribe, puts forward the same view. "The talent of the dramatist," he observes, "is a very singular and very special quality. It is not necessarily united to any other intellectual faculty. A man may have much wit, much learning, much literary skill, and yet be absolutely incapable of writing a play. I have seen men of real value and of high literary culture bring me dramas and comedies which seem to be the work of a child. On the other hand, I have received from persons of no great intelligence, in which was to be found a something that nothing else can take the place of, a something which cannot be acquired, which is never lost, and which constitutes the dramatist." In the great dramatists, no doubt, this special gift is united with the literary gift, with philosophy, psychology, poetry. But there it is, the one indispensable condition of success on the stage; the other qualities are but accessories. "The drama," as M. Brunetière declares, "can, if need be, live on its own stock, on its own resources, relying solely on its own means of expression." If I might hazard an explanation of the difference subsisting between the born dramatist and the literary man pure and simple I would say that the former is governed by a sense of movement, of action, while the latter relies instinctively upon the fashioning of ideas by means of language. It is not in what the dramatis personæ say, but in what they do that the force of a play consists. Mr. Brander Matthews very shrewdly remarks that "if Hamlet were performed in an asylum for the deaf and dumb there would be no fear that the interest of the spectators would flag." They could take in so much of the story by the eye alone. How would "The Medicine Man" emerge from such a test? While the literary man is preoccupied with literary form, the dramatist thinks in action. Racine is recorded to have told a friend that a new play of his was nearly completed—as he had only to write it. And Beaumarchais once said of the characters of one of his plays still unwritten: "What they will say I don't know; it is what they are going to do that interests me."

J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ALAN BRECK.

SIR,—We can get nearer to Alan Breck, by tradition, than the local description of him as "a little wee man, but very square." This account, followed by Mr. Buchan in his article on "The Country of Kidnapped," was adopted by Mr. Stevenson. But a friend of Sir Walter Scott's met Alan (or Allan) in Paris, about 1789. He described the hero as "a tall, thin, raw-boned, grim-looking old man, with the petit croix [sic] of St. Louis." There follow details, and Alan is represented as talking Lowland Scots. Mr. Stevenson has been blamed for giving Alan this dialect: he only followed Sir Walter's report—second-hand evidence, indeed, but better than any now attainable. Alan might possibly be traced in French Army Lists. As to the actual Appin murderer, an unbiassed Badenoch man at Loch Awe assured me that tradition assigned the deed to a Cameron, and Sergeant Mohr Cameron (betrayed by another Cameron and hanged in 1753) appears to be indicated. The Sergeant, however, was "justified" on other counts, naturally, as Government was pledged to the theory that Alan slew Glenure. Information was privately laid against Fassifern by the betrayer of Sergeant Mohr, as instigator of the Appin murder. The charge was too absurd to be pressed. Mr. Buchan probably did not find the place where Alan and David leaped the Coe. That is poetical topography, for in the blazing weather described anyone could wade the Coe almost anywhere. Scott's account of Alan is in a note to p. cxi., vol. i., of Rob Roy, 1829.

A. LANG.

Kensington: May 7.

THE SPELLING OF SHAKSPERE'S NAME.

SIR,—We can all sound the name of Shakspeare. We can weigh it with any other in any language or literature. We often conjure with it; but when we come to write it we have our doubts. Shakespeare, Shakspeare, Shakespere, Shakspere are all familiar to all of us; and each method of spelling has a number of serious students and lovers of Shakspeare to back it with authority, to many of whom the spelling of the greatest name in literature is an article of faith as strong as their religious belief—sometimes stronger. But, in addition to these familiar methods, there are three other ways of spelling the name which are to the majority of readers quite unknown.

Shaxpere is the spelling in the record of the poet's father having his name removed from the roll of aldermen of Stratford-on-Avon, September 6, 1586. And the same spelling is used in the civil copy of registry of marriage dated November 28, 1582.

Shackspere is the spelling in a certificate signed by Sir Thos. Lucy against John S., the father of the bard, dated (I think) 1586, under the recusancy law.

Shagspere is the spelling of the copy of the marriage license dated November 27, 1582, at Worcester Cathedral. And also in the excommunication of Henry S., of Spitterfield (brother of John S., the poet's father), dated November, 1581, the excommunication being for not paying tithes to the Rev. Thos. Robbins.

The New Shakspeare Society has adopted, with strong reason, the method of spelling I have used in this letter—Shakspeare—which is the spelling the poet used in signing his will. Could you open your columns to a little discussion on the subject, so that, if possible, we may arrive at an accepted form of spelling for the greatest name in our or any other language? For even in the few plays published by the New Shakspeare Society the editors use one method and the publishers take it upon themselves to use another (Shakespeare).—Faithfully yours,

JOHN E. YERBURY.

Emsworth, Hants: May 6.

MR. SWAN EXPLAINS.

SIR,—I have read your brief notice of my version of the Book of Job, and should be sorry to have it thought that my object was merely to paraphrase or vulgarise this magnificent book. My object specially was rather to show that, put into ordinary idiom, the answer of Elihu to Job was really one that would and did satisfy him as to the continued presence and guidance on earth of the Spirit; and that the last speech, "The Voice of the Lord from the Whirlwind," was spoken by Elihu himself for and on behalf of the Spirit, as he himself says, "in God's stead." In some cases, as in that quoted by yourself and the Daily Chronicle, there is little or no gain in clearness in the new version; in others I venture to think there is such a gain. It is difficult to give quotations which will fully show this on account of space, as the effect is cumulative in continued use of plain idiom throughout; but possibly you will allow me one or two quotations to show the intent. I may also say that one object of the version was to give ordinary English rendering for the purpose of spreading a wider knowledge of these texts among students of English in foreign lands; as well as to bring into greater prominence the main idea in Elihu's speech that, when a man is moved by the Spirit within him against injustice or wrongdoing, his duty is to "speak out" against it, and not "palter with his conscience" by attempting to make peace with evil for fear of suffering affliction. This sentiment, which lies at the root of the book, on account of the quaint idiom, is not so clear as it might be, so much so that most readers do not see that there is any answer at all given to this great problem to Job, who nevertheless announced himself satisfied.

I give the following parallel quotations to illustrate the contention—brackets instead of italics showing the words inserted by the translators in the Bible version:

THE BIBLE.

Surely there is a vein (or mine) for the silver, and a place for gold where they fine it.

MR. HOWARD SWAN.
[Descriptive.]

Surely first must be mines for silver, And a place to refine the gold.

THE BIBLE.

Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten (out of) the stone.

He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection: the stones of darkness and the shadow of death.

The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant: (even the waters) forgotten of the foot: they are dried up, they are gone away from men.

[NOTE.—This is a description of the sinking of a shaft in the Hebrew.]

(As for) the earth, out of it cometh bread: and under it is turned up as it were fire.

The stones of it are the place of sapphires: and it hath dust of gold.

(There is) a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen:

The lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed it.

He putteth forth his hand upon the rock [or flint]; he overturneth the mountains by the roots.

He cutteth out rivers among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing.

He bindeth the floods from overflowing; and (the thing that is) hid bringeth he forth to light.

Job xxviii.

For he will not lay upon man more (than right); that he should enter [go] into judgment with God . . .

When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether (it be done) against a nation, or against a man only:

That the hypocrite sign not, lest the people be ensnared.

Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne (chastisement). I will not offend any more):

MR. HOWARD SWAN
[Descriptive.]

Iron is dug from the earth,
And copper smelted from ore.

Man makes nought of the darkness;
He mines to the farthest depths
The rocks of darkness and the shadow of death.

He sinks a shaft below haunts of men,
And lets down a frail support;
They hang on by their hands and feet,
And fearfully sway to and fro.

Out of the earth comes their bread,
And the underpart is blasted by fire;
For the worthless rock is the setting of sapphires,
And in dust is the glitter of gold!

The path that no bird of prey has known,
Nor falcon's eye has seen,

Where proud beasts never have set their foot,
Nor has the fierce lion roamed:

There man puts forth his hand on the flinty rock;
He uproots the very mountains.

He cuts him passes amongst the rocks;
And his eye searches for precious things.

He dams back the streams that they flow not down,
And hidden things brings to light.

[Argumentative.]

For one need not further consider a man

If he go before GOD in judgement . . .

When HE gives the earth quietness,
Who then shall condemn?

And when HE hides his face,

Who then can see him?
But whether it be to a nation

Or to a man, it is so:

That a Godless man should not rule,

Lest the people themselves be ensnared.

For surely it is right to say to the Spirit,
"I have suffered, I will not offend."

THE BIBLE.

(That which) I see not, teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more.

(Should it be) according to thy mind? he will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose; and not I: therefore speak what thou knowest.

Job xxxiv.

[Or again]

How thy garments (are) warm, when he quieteth the earth by the south (wind).

Hast thou with him spread out the sky, (which is) strong, (and) as a molten looking-glass?

Teach us what we shall say unto him; (for) we cannot order (our speech) by reason of darkness.

Shall it be told him that I speak? if a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

Job xxxvii.

—Yours, &c.,

MR. HOWARD SWAN.
[Descriptive.]

That which I see not, teach thou me:

If I have done ill deeds, I will do so no more. Should it not come from you first?

He will reward your acts,
Whether you refuse to ask,

Or whether you choose to do so,—
And certain it is not I: Then speak out what you think!

You whose garments feel warm

When he soothes the earth with the South wind,

Can you with him spread over the sky
Thick as a molten mirror?

Teach us how we must speak for him;

For now we cannot order our speech by reason of utter darkness.

Shall it be simply said that "I speak"?

If a man speak so, surely he would be swallowed up!

HOWARD SWAN.

Authors Club: May 9, 1898.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE critics have been very kind to Mr. Harland's attempt "to naturalise the conte on these inclement shores." The phrase is used by the critic of the Daily Chronicle, who finds the attempt successful as far as it goes. He praises Mr. Harland very prettily:

"This reviewer cannot call to mind the name of anyone writing in English who works in the same medium in which Mr. Harland does supremely well. He is a pastelist. He reminds one of that magician of the pantomime who, dropping a little powder into a saucer and setting light to it, coloured rose or green a theatre full of common people. His first paragraph is Mr. Harland's saucer, a dozen words his powder, his arrangement of them sets them aflame, and lo!—it is spring-time in Rome; it is May in Paris; the almond-blossom is out in Kensington Gardens. A moment later, and one of Mr. Harland's well-seen women takes the stage, and she is proud and fine and tender and witty; somehow you know, though you are not told, that she walks on slim, arched feet, has the slender waist and throat of delicate breeding, and never a mean thought from head to feet. Enter one of Mr. Harland's men—a manly man (though his appearance is never described), a man who pulses with the right ardours, a man who not only talks but understands well. Then a love-scene, instinct with charm, with humour, warmth, esprit!"

The Daily Telegraph's reviewer has found the same delicate flavour and intention in Mr. Harland's work.

"Full of a quaint and engaging mannerism, with pleasant little tricks of style—such as the repetition of a given adjective or the echo of an old phrase repeated with constant variations, as though he were composing a fugue—he enlists our confidence and appeals, as a musician might do, to receptive and appreciative ears. He is delightfully frank, full of bonhomie, a skilful manipulator of words, endowed with a delicate literary instinct, above all, with a capacity of suggesting a great many more thoughts than he actually expresses. When all is said and done, there is only a sequence of some half a dozen notes, more or less a kind of 'Tirala-tirala,' which, detached from its proper context, might be considered fortuitous, haphazard, futile. Nevertheless, the stories haunt us because they open for us the ivory gate of dreams."

Each of these critics has something to say about Mr. Harland's future. Thus the Chronicle:

"Some [of these stories] have appeared before, if we mistake not, in the regretted Yellow Book: erstwhile the single hope of young writers who had not got over their silly dream of 'doing something good some day.' The decease of the Yellow Book was, we suppose, the reply on the part of the public to Mr. Harland and those writers. It is comforting to think that, in spite of this reply, Mr. Harland has found courage to publish this book. . . . But we bid him rather to hope, to work on. Publics are made, not born; his may be in the making now."

The Telegraph:

"He is more of a creator and less of a critic [than Walter Pater], perhaps some day he will even achieve the same kind of literary distinction as that which adorned his older rival. The deuce of it is—'You permit the expression,' says one of Mr. Harland's characters, to which his companion replies, 'I am devoted to the expression'—the deuce of it is that Mr. Henry Harland will some day be tempted to write a long novel, and then it is conceivable that, very much against our wills, we may find him out."

Mr. Harland has still to reckon with the Saturday Reviewer, and the Saturday Reviewer is not pleased with Comedies and Errors. He finds Mr. Harland's art ineffective and derivative; he will barely tolerate its best:

"The stories of the present volume are mostly told in the first person, and it is rather forced upon the reader that they possess some sort of autobiographical significance; excluding, of course, those stories which are sheerly fantastic. If this is a just inference we are scarcely captivated by the personality, by the ghost of a personality, which they disclose; they suggest a bore, and one of the least tolerable of his kind—a bore who has been to Rome and who has an Aunt Elizabeth. It is, we fear, all in vain that Mr. Harland carries himself with an air, that he tips his hat, flourishes his cane, and raps out his Italian and French phrases. His mimicry, clever as it is, has not convinced us that he belongs to the aristocracy of letters, or that his stories represent anything but the comedy of high life below stairs. He has read his Henry James, his Maupassant, his De Musset, even his Thackeray, with a result that is a little too obvious; and to these we might add the name of Mr. Jerome when we read such a witticism as, 'A woman who plays Chopin ought to have three hands—two to play with, and one for the man who's listening to hold.' The main defect, however, of Mr. Harland's art is not that it is pretentions, not that it is almost wholly derivative, but that it is elaborately uninteresting, an inexcusable defect in the art of the short story. From Mr. Henry James he has learnt the value of the significant detail in fiction, and he over-estimates it; he has not Mr. James's nice faculty of observation, his sense of proportion. Nevertheless, of Mr. Harland's various manners his Henry James manner is perhaps the most successful; he has acquired something of his model's elusive felicity of phrase, something of his ineffective fidelity in portraying character. All his characters indeed talk like one and the same person, hesitatingly, like a person who is searching for the mot juste, with a non-committal air that is unspeakably tantalising. Where, as in the case of De Musset, Mr. Harland attempts to follow a writer, more of inspiration than of artifice, he follows him at a much greater distance. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Harland struts about in borrowed plumes, there are two stories, in the book, 'P'tit-Bleu' and 'Rosemary for Remembrance,' which can be read without fatigue, which are almost convincing bits of artistry."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, May 12.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &c.

SHORT STUDIES ON VITAL SUBJECTS. By the Rev. P. W. de Quetteville, M.A. Elliot Stock.

CHRIST THE SUBSTITUTE: A SERIES OF STUDIES IN CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, BASED UPON THE CONCEPTION OF GOD'S UNIVERSAL FATHERHOOD. By E. Reeves Palmer, M.A. John Snow & Co.

THE DOCUMENTS OF THE HEXATEUCH, TRANSLATED AND ARRANGED IN CHRONOLOGICAL ORDER. With Introduction and Notes. By W. E. Addis, M.A. Vol. II.: THE DEUTERONOMIC WRITERS AND THE PRIESTLY DOCUMENTS. David Nutt.

CHARACTERISTICS FROM THE WRITINGS OF NICHOLAS, CARDINAL WISEMAN. Selected by Rev. T. E. Bridgett. Burns & Oates, Ltd.

PHILOLOGY OF THE GOSPELS. By Friedrich Blass, Dr. Phil. Macmillan & Co. 4s. 6d.

ESSAYS IN AID OF THE REFORM OF THE CHURCH. Edited by Charles Gore. John Murray.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

MASTERS OF MEDICINE: WILLIAM STOKES, HIS LIFE AND WORK (1804—1878). By his Son, William Stokes. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.

LADY FRY OF DARLINGTON. By Eliza Orme, LL.B.

LIFE IN AN OLD ENGLISH TOWN: A HISTORY OF COVENTRY, FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES, COMPILED FROM OFFICIAL SOURCES. By Mary Dormer Harris. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 4s. 6d.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS IN BRITISH GUIANA. By Henry Kirke, M.A. Sampson: Low.

A MIDDY'S RECOLLECTIONS, 1853—1860. By Rear-Admiral the Honourable Victor Alexander Montagu. A. & C. Black. 6s.

JOHN AND SEBASTIAN CABOT: THE DISCOVERY OF NORTH AMERICA. By C. Raymond Beazley. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

THE LAW'S LUMBER ROOM. Second Series. By Francis Watt. John Lane.

THE TEMPLE CLASSICS: THE HIGH HISTORY OF THE HOLY GRAIL. Translated from the French by Sebastian Evans. Vol. I.

SIDE-LIGHTS OF NATURE IN QUILL AND CRAYON. Written by Edward Tickner Edwardes. Drawn by Geo. C. Haité. Kegan Paul.

SOCIAL PICTORIAL SATIRE. By George Du Maurier. Harper Brothers. 5s.

DANTE AT RAVENNA: A STUDY. By Catherine Mary Phillimore. Elliot Stock.

THE DOME. No. 5. The Unicorn Press.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

SCIENTIFIC METHOD IN BIOLOGY. By Dr Elizabeth Blackwell. Elliot Stock.

KARL MARX AND THE CLOSE OF HIS SYSTEM: A CRITICISM. By Eugen v. Böhm-Bawerk. Translated by Alice M. Macdonald. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

THE SCIENCE OF LAW AND LAW-MAKING. By R. Floyd Clarke. The Macmillan Co. 17s.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, INCLUDING CEYLON AND BURMA: BIRDS. Vol. IV. Taylor & Francis.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

LOCKHART'S ADVANCE THROUGH TIRAH. By Capt. L. J. Shadwell, P.S.C. W. Thacker & Co.

LITTLE'S LONDON PLEASURE GUIDE, 1898. Simpkin, Marshall. 1s.

CARLISLE CATHEDRAL. By R. S. Ferguson, F.S.A. Isbister & Co. 1s.

A GUIDE TO THE GUILDHALL OF THE CITY OF LONDON. Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 6d.

NEW EDITIONS OF FICTION.

MADMOISELLE IXE. By Lanoe Falconer. T. Fisher Unwin. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

HIGHER ARITHMETIC AND MENSURATION. By Edward Murray. Blackie & Son. 3s. 6d.

THE PALMERSTON READERS: BOOK VI. Blackie & Son.

MISCELLANEOUS.

INDUSTRIAL EXPERIMENTS IN THE BRITISH COLONIES OF NORTH AMERICA. By Eleanor Louisa Lord. The John Hopkins Press (Baltimore).

GARDEN-MAKING: SUGGESTIONS FOR THE UTILISING OF HOME GROUNDS. By L. N. Bailey. The Macmillan Co. 4s.

A BOOK OF IMAGES. Drawn by W. T. Horton, and Introduced by W. B. Yeats. The Unicorn Press. 3s. 6d.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Mrs. TYNAN HINKSON—better known, perhaps, as Katharine Tynan—will at once publish, through Mr. Grant Richards, a new volume of poems, entitled The Wind in the Trees: a Book of Country Verse. In a sense the volume is almost a calendar of the rural year.

"THE BALLAD OF READING GAOL" has been translated into French by M. Henry Davray, and appears in the May number of the Mercur de France. It is later to appear in book form, with the French and English on opposite pages.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE BUILDERS OF GREATER BRITAIN."

JOHN and SEBASTIAN CABOT: the Discovery of North America. By C. RAYMOND BEAZLEY. Edited by H. F. WILSON. Frontispiece Portrait and Map. Cloth, 5s.

THROUGH THE GREAT NORTH-WEST.

ACROSS the SUB-ARCTICS of CANADA 8,200 Miles by Canoe and Snowshoe through the Barran Lands. By J. W. TYRRELL, C.E., D.L.S. With List of Plants collected en route, a Vocabulary of Eskimo Words and Phrases, and a Route Map and full Classified Index. With 65 Illustrations from Photographs and from Drawings by Arthur Heming. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

RALEGH'S EL Dorado.

BRITISH GUIANA; or, Work and Wanderings among the Creoles and Coolies, the Africans and Indians of the Wild Country. By the Rev. J. CROOKALL, Author of "Books: How to Read and What to Read," "Topics in the Tropics," &c. With 25 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE MASTERS OF MEDICINE" SERIES.

SIR WILLIAM STOKES: His Life and Work (1804-1878). By his Son, WILLIAM STOKES, Surgeon-in-Ordinary to the Queen in Ireland. With 2 Photogravures. Cloth, 3s. 6d. "The book before us is excellent.....Will be read far beyond the bounds of the profession.....This fascinating book."—Daily Chronicle.

KARL MARX and the CLOSE of his SYSTEM: a Criticism. By EUGEN V. BOEHM-BAWERK, Counsellor in the Austrian Ministry of Finance, and Honorary Professor of Political Economy in the University of Vienna. Translated by ALICE M. MACDONALD. With a Preface by JAMES BONAR, M.A., LL.D., Author of "Malthus and his Work," "Philosophy and Political Economy," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

MR. BENJAMIN SWIFT'S LATEST NOVEL.

THE DESTROYER. Green cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Thoughtful, analytical, and clever.....There can be no doubt of the grace and almost Meredithian wealth of the author's style. Every page is rich in epigrams—real bright turns of fancy, not platitudes turned topsy-turvy.....The rhythm and beauty of the language reach a very high level."—Pall Mall Gazette.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PEOPLE OF CLOPTON."

THE WHITE-HEADED BOY: a Novel. By GEORGE BARTRAM. Unwin's Green Cloth Library, 6s.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

A WINNING HAZARD. By Mrs. ALEXANDER. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

GINETTE'S HAPPINESS. By Gyp. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"'Ginette's Happiness' is a delightful story, and loses little of its original freshness in its new form. Mr. Derechet could scarcely covet a higher compliment."—Academy.

A CHEAP REISSUE.

THE WORD OF GOD. Being the Yale Lectures on Preaching for 1893. By R. F. HORTON, M.A., D.D., Author of "Inspiration and the Bible," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW VOLUMES of the CENTURY SCOTT. GEIERSTEIN—FEVERIL—SURGEON'S DAUGHTER—RED GAUNTLET. Cloth, 1s.; leather, 2s. 6d.

SIXPENNY EDITION.

MADMOISELLE IXE. By Lanoe FALCONER. Paper, 6d.

* * * This is a reprint of the celebrated story which led off the "Pseudonym" Library.

WORKS ON SPAIN.

THE MOORS in SPAIN. By Stanley LANE POOLE. Sixth Edition.

SPAIN: from Moorish Conquest to Fall of Granada. By H. E. WATTS. Each with Maps and Illustrations, cloth 5s.

London:

T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S LIST.

READY IN A FEW DAYS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

With an Introductory Note

By J. M. BARRIE.

THE GRANDISSIMES.
THE GRANDISSIMES.A Story of Creole Life.*

By GEORGE W. CABLE.

NEW NOVEL BY ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY.

By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

"Will be placed among the most brilliant novels of the year"—

H. W. LUCY in the Daily News."The most brilliant book my Baronie has read this year."—Punch.WORKS BY J. M. BARRIE.*MARGARET OGILVY. By her Son,J. M. BARRIE, LL.D. With Etched Portrait by Manesse.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. Fifth Edition, completing 43,000.A WINDOW IN THRUMS. Fifteenth

Edition. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

MY LADY NICOTINE. Eighth

Edition. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 8s.

AULD LIGHT IDYLLS. Eleventh

Edition. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 8s.

WHEN a MAN'S SINGLE. A Tale of Literary Life. Eleventh Edition. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

SECOND EDITION, crown 8vo, cloth, 8s.

OTHER PEOPLE'S LIVES. By Rosa

NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," etc.

"A gentle, fragrant book."—Academy.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

ROBERT BURNS and MRS. DUNLOP.Correspondence now Published in Full for the First Time, with Elucidations. By WILLIAM WALLACE. With Portrait of
Mrs. Dunlop and Facsimiles."It is extremely fortunate that the work has been undertaken by an editor like Mr. Wallace, whose enthusiasm, thoroughness, and minute knowledge of his subject ensure a satisfactory result. He has brought together nearly all the letters of Robert Burns and Mrs. Dunlop; not only those which have been already published, but a large number which Mrs. Dunlop retained unprinted till her death. These new letters have been interwoven with the old, elucidations and connecting explanations added, and the whole presented skilfully in an almost unbroken narrative."—Saturday Review.

SECOND EDITION, completing 23rd thousand.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 8s.

THE IDEAL LIFE, and Other Un-published Addresses. By HENRY DRUMMOND. With Introductory Sketches by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL and IAN
MACLAREN."These addresses are written in a singularly beautiful style, and contain much beautiful thinking, showing that the writer had pondered deeply on one of the most spiritual aspects of religion. They will, we are sure, be much prized by the many admirers of their author."—Glasgow Herald.

FOURTH EDITION, Revised with New Preface.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

THE MIND of the MASTER. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. (Ian MacLaren).

FOURTH EDITION, 8vo, with Map, 10s. 6d.

ST. PAUL the TRAVELLER and theROMAN CITIZEN. By W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L. LL.D., Professor in Aberdeen University, formerly Fellow of Exeter and of Lincoln College, and Professor of Classical Archaeology, Oxford."The light thrown by Professor Ramsay on the career of the Apostle Paul is often startling in its freshness. There is, indeed, scarcely a single incident in the Apostle's life upon which he has not something new to say."—Glasgow Herald.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

FIFTH EDITION, with Maps and Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, 12s.

THE CHURCH in the ROMAN EM-

PIRE BEFORE A.D. 170.

"This volume is the most important contribution to the study of early Church history which has been published in this country since the great work of Bishop Lightfoot on the Apostolic Fathers. It is, too, unless our memory fails us, without a rival in any foreign country."—Guardian.With Additions, Corrections, and New Index of Scripture References.
8vo, cloth, 15s.THE HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY ofTHE HOLY LAND. By GEORGE ADAM SMITH, D.D., Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis, Free Church College, Glasgow. With Six specially prepared Maps."For the convenience of those who already possess the previous Editions, the Additions, Corrections, and New Index of Scripture
References may be had separately, price 6s.""A very noteworthy contribution to the study of sacred history, based upon the three indispensable conditions of personal acquaintance with the land, a study of the explorations, discoveries, and decoverments . . . and the employment of the results of Biblical criticism."—Times.London: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.SERVICE & PATON'S
NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY GERTRUDE ATHERTON,

Author of "Patience Sparhawk."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

AMERICAN WIVES AND ENGLISH HUSBANDS."One of the most brilliant 'society' novels published of late years."—Pall Mall Gazette."There is not a dull page in the book."—Daily News.

JUST OUT.

Crown 8vo, art vellum, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

ENTANGLEMENTS:

The Woman's Weaving.

By FRANCIS PREVOST,

Author of "False Dawn," &amp;c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

ARMY REFORM.

By Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, Bart., M.P.

"A more competent man to write on Army Reform than Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., it would be difficult to find."
Regiment.

JUST ISSUED.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE HISTORY OF EARLY CHRISTIANITY.

By the Rev. LEIGHTON PULLAN, M.A., Oxford.

Being the Third Volume in

"THE POPULAR BIBLICAL LIBRARY."

SERVICE &amp; PATON,

5, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Elliot Stock's New Publications.

In crown 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, price 6s.

DANTE at RAVENNA: a Study. ByCATHERINE MARY PHILLIMORE, Author of "Studies in Italian Literature," "The Warrior Medic," "Fra Angelico," "Selections from the Sermons of Padre Agostina Da Montefeltrio," &c.

NEW NOVEL.

In crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth, price 6s.

JOHN MAVERELL: a Tale of the Riviera.By J. DUNCAN CRAIG, D.D., Soci Dou Felibrige, Author of "Real Pictures of Clerical Life in Ireland," "La Debanado; or, Scenes during the Franco-German War," "Miejour; or, Language and Literature in the Land of the Felibre," "Lady Wimmerding of Maison Rouge," "The Handbook of the Provençal Language," &c.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 5s.

UNCONSIDERED TRIFLES. By GEORGEDALZIEL, Author of "Mattie Gray, and other Poems," "Faces in the Fire," "Only a Flower Girl," &c."Well worth reading, some exquisite sentiments being exquisitely expressed. Lovers of good poetry will highly value this attractive little volume."—Western Daily Mercury.Tastefully printed on antique paper, royal 16mo, and bound in half-parchment, 2s. 6d.DANTE VIGNETTES. By NORLEYCHESTER. A Sequence of Sonnets.
"Possesses the charm of sweet and satisfying melody."—Academy.
"Norley Chester is steeped in Dante."—Aberdeen Free Press.
"Thoroughly poetical in thought and expression. . . . To lovers of Dante. . . . must be welcome."—Queen.In demy 8vo, handsomely printed and bound, with a Map of Sheffield in 1780, 10s. 6d. net; Large-paper copies, £1 1s. net.THE RECORDS of the BURGERS of SHEFFIELD, commonly called the TOWN TRUST. By JOHN DANIEL LEADER, Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, one of the Town Trustees of Sheffield, &c."Mr. Leader has given us a very useful book, and one which to persons connected with Sheffield cannot fail to be of very high interest."—Antiquary.
"Contains many curious and precious grains of information with regard to the local life, customs, and institutions of Sheffield, and even the public events of the time."—Scotsman.

In crown 8vo, price 2s.

SCIENTIFIC METHOD in BIOLOGY.

By Dr. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO'S
LIST.*THE ORIGIN and GROWTH of the MORAL INSTINCT. By ALEXANDER
SUTHERLAND, M.A. 2 vols., 8vo, 28s."A work which, from the fulness of its information, the interesting way in which that information is conveyed, the importance of its subject, and the ability and skill which it everywhere displays, should not fail to gain the writer cordial recognition."—Scotsman.THE ANGORA GOAT (published under the auspices of the South African Angora Goat Breeders' Association) and a Paper on the Ostrich (reprinted from the Zoologist for March, 1897). By S. C. CROWWRIGHT SCHREINER.
With 26 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

NEW WORK BY MR. W. H. HUDSON.

BIRDS in LONDON. By W. H. Hudson,
F.Z.S., &c. With 17 Plates and 15 Illustrations in the Text, by Bryan Hook, A. D. McCormick, and from Photographs from Nature by R. B.
Lodge. 8vo, 12s.THE ANNUAL REGISTER: a Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad for the Year 1897. 8vo, 18s.** Volumes of "THE ANNUAL REGISTER" for the Years 1863-96 can still be had, 18s. each.W. G. WILLS: Dramatist and Painter.By FREEMAN WILLS. With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo, 10s. 6d.BOYHOOD: a Plea for Continuity of Education. By ENNIS RICHMOND. Crown
8vo, 2s. 6d.ELECTRO-DYNAMICS.—The DIRECT
CURRENT MOTOR. By CHARLES ASHLEY
CARUS-WILSON, M.A. Cantab., Member of the Institute of Electrical Engineers, Professor of Electrical Engineering at McGill University,
Montreal. With numerous Diagrams. Crown
8vo, 7s. 6d.SONNETS on the SONNET: an Anthology. Compiled by the Rev. MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.ON FAILURE of BRAIN POWER:
its Nature and Treatment. By JULIUS ALPHAUS, M.D., Consulting Physician to the Hospital for Epilepsy and Paralysis, Regent's Park. Fifth Edition. With Coloured Plate and Engravings. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

NEW EDITION OF

PROF. MAX MÜLLER'S WORKS.MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO. are now issuing a Collected Edition of the Works of the Right Hon.
Professor Max Müller. The Volumes are published Monthly, at a uniform price of 5s. each, in crown 8vo.NATURAL RELIGION: the Gifford
Lectures, delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1888. [Ready.]PHYSICAL RELIGION: the Gifford
Lectures, delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1890. [Ready.]ANTHROPOLOGICAL RELIGION: the Gifford Lectures, delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1891. [Ready.]THEOSOPHY; or, Psychological Religion: the Gifford Lectures, delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1892. [In June.]

London: LONGMANS, GREEN &amp; CO.

MESSRS. C. ARTHUR PEARSON'S NEW BOOKS.

WITH PEARY NEAR THE POLE.

By EIVIND ASTRUP.

Illustrated with Sketches and Photographs by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

"The most interesting portions of the book are those that deal with the Eskimo of the far north."—TIMES.

"Mr. Astrup's story would have been most welcome anyhow, but the ability with which it is told makes it trebly so.... His own personal experiences make up a book, on a smaller scale than Nansen's of course, but not at all its inferior in fascination."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"His book may be confidently recommended to all readers interested in Arctic research as the outcome of genuine personal adventure, and of a keen faculty for accurate observation."—GLOBE.

AUTHORISED TRANSLATION.

THE HOPE OF THE FAMILY.

By ALPHONSE DAUDET. Translated by LEVIN CARNAC. 8vo, buckram, 6s. [Shortly.]

The PALL MALL GAZETTE on the French Edition: "Is destined, we think, to rank among the very best of his novels."

"Is to be classed with Daudet's better work. In his best style."—LITERATURE.

THE KEEPERS OF THE PEOPLE.

By EDGAR JEPSON, Author of "Sybil Falcon," "The Passion for Romance." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Absorbingly interesting."—SCOTSMAN.

"It certainly ranks among the powerful and original books of the season."—STAR.

"The reader cannot fail to enjoy a story so well written—so vivid, strong, and stirring as this."—ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

THE MASTER-KEY.

By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

The most exciting and mysterious story by this author which has appeared since "The House on the Marsh." It has all the vividness and strength of Miss Warden's earlier work.

HAGAR OF HOMERTON.

By Mrs. HENRY E. DUDENEY, Author of "A Man with a Maid." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Next week.]

This is a study of lower middle-class life in London, and shows with photographic fidelity how the elements of tragedy can be evolved from the most unlikely surroundings. The tragedy of the book is so unexpected that it takes the reader entirely by surprise.

THE SHROUDED FACE.

By OWEN RHOSCOMYL, Author of "Battlement and Tower," "The Jewel of "Yvns Galon." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Next week.]

This is a tale of the time of Elizabeth, and the scene is placed in Wales. At that period many Welsh gentlemen took to the sea as rovers, finding their swordland on the Spanish main, as their fathers had found a swordland on the English marshes.

A MAORI MAID.

By H. B. VOGEL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Just published.]

The author, a born New Zealander, who has been brought much into contact with the Maori tribes, has given us in this novel a most interesting picture of New Zealand life interwoven with a touching love-story and adventures in search of gold.

LUCKY BARGEES.

By HARRY LANDER, Author of "Weighed in the Balance," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Some very remarkable and striking sketches of the life lived by those who earn their living on the lower reaches of the Thames distinguish Mr. Lander's new novel. His spirited descriptions of 'the Pool' are full of life and movement; his pictures of riverside life in the East-End are notable for their lifelikeness. The plot, too, is good, and the pretty romance of the hero's love-story relieves the general greyness and squalor of its atmosphere. The character of Bulldog Bill, the hard-fighting, hard-swearng navy, with his love for 'the Duchess' and his loyalty to his pals, is a very clever bit of portraiture. Everyone who begins to read the fortunes of the 'Lucky Bargees' will follow them through their many curious and ever-shifting phases with unflagging interest."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIDE-SLIPS; or, Misadventures on a Bicycle.

By R. ANDOM, Author of "Wo Three and Troddles." Numerous Sketches by A. FREDERICS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

This volume deals in a lively way with the manifold humorous and practical affairs incidental to cycling and cyclists. It contains details of a brief but not uneventful tour in the Eastern counties, and much supplementary matter of a fictitious and factitious nature of interest to all cyclists, would-be cyclists, and have-been cyclists.

LATTER-DAY STORIES.—Crown 8vo, cloth, with Portrait, price 2s. 6d. each.

VOL. III.—AN EGYPTIAN COQUETTE.

By CLIVE HOLLAND, Author of "My Japanese Wife," &c.

"Full of go and brightness, and never becoming dull."—GLASGOW DAILY MAIL.

NEW VOLUME (Next week).

AN EPISODE IN ARCADY.

By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE, Author of "The Eleventh Commandment," "A Tragedy in Grey," &c.

Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on receipt of post card.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1359.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1898.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE,

No. 575, just published for MAY, consists of a LARGE COLLECTION of WORKS in ENGLISH LITERATURE and BELLES LETTRES.

Post free from H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C., and 37, Piccadilly, W.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application. DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

3D. in the 1s. Discount off most New Books. CATALOGUES post free on application.

Orders despatched by return of post. HENRY J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller, 57, Wigmore Street, London, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE. IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SEIL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 15, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 85121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply Academy Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

BOOKS FOR SALE.

Advertisements are inserted under this heading at 4d. per line, prepaid)

£75 CASH OFFERED for the following:—Tennyson's Lover's Tale (1833)—Euclid and Nimrod (1857)—True and the False (1859)—The Falcon; a Play (at St. James's Theatre) (1879). Will friends of late Lord Tennyson and Mr. Moxon kindly search their archives?—Apply, "Aurora," care of Messrs. Jaggard's Bookshop, Liverpool.

Price 3s. 6d. net, postage free.

IN THE WAKE OF SPRING.

A New Book of Love Songs and Lyrics by RICHARD C. JACKSON.

(The Sweetest book of its kind since the days of Ovid.)

Beautifully printed and bound.

London: THE BOWKER PRESS, Camberwell, S.E.

Agents: SIMPKIN & MARSHALL.

AS ASSISTANT LIBRARIAN, LITERARY ASSISTANT, or in any similar capacity.—GRADUATE (25) DESIRES EMPLOYMENT. Wide reading in English and French Literature and elementary German; experience in Library management.—Write "Reader," care of Willings, 102, Piccadilly.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK and GENERAL INSURANCE CO., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—FORTH-COMING EXAMINATION.—JUNIOR ASSISTANT in the ART BRANCH of the SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM (18-25), 1st JUNE. The date specified is the latest at which Applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Singing, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an unexceptional English Chaperon. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 30 Guineas a quarter.—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No premium. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May receive with Manager.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to contract with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London E.C.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.,

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS of ART.

A SELECTION FROM THE COMPANY'S COLLECTION OF FAMOUS LANDSCAPES BY MASTERS OF THE BRITISH SCHOOL.

The following Autotypes are issued of the uniform scale of about 18 inches longest line, and are produced in rich Sepia Permanent Pigment. Price 12s. each, unframed; or, framed in oak or walnut mouldings of special design, from 27s. to 35s. each complete.

J. CONSTABLE.
The Cornfield.
The Valley Farm.
The Glebe Farm.
The Bridge at Gillingham.

D. COX.
The Vale of Clwyd.

J. CROME.
Mousehold Heath.
The Windmill.
The Porlingland Oak.

T. GAINSBOROUGH.
The Watering Place.
View of Dedham.

J. GLOVER.
Landscape with Cattle.
J. LINNELL.
The Windmill.
The Coming Storm.
Downward Rays.

A. NASMYTH.
Stirling Castle.

J. M. W. TURNER.
A Frosty Morning.
Crossing the Brook.
Chichester Canal.

G. B. WILLCOCK.
A Country Lane (Chilston, Torquay).
A Devonshire Mill.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, New Edition of 180 pages.

With upwards of One Hundred Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and Twenty-three Tint Block Illustrations.

For convenience of reference, the Publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' names.

Post free, ONE SHILLING.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET LONDON, W.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.

WANTED, a HEAD MASTER or HEAD MISTRESS for the PENYGOES COUNTY SCHOOL. Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications. Salary £120, and Capitation Fees. Particulars will be sent on application to

J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,
Clerk to the County Governing Body.

Carnarvon, May, 1898.

CARNARVONSHIRE COUNTY SCHOOLS.

WANTED, a HEAD MASTER* for the BOTTWNOG COUNTY SCHOOL. Must have taken a Degree in the United Kingdom or British Possessions, or have other equal qualifications. Salary £120, and Capitation Fees. Particulars will be sent on application to

J. H. BODVEL-ROBERTS,
Clerk to the County Governing Body.

Carnarvon, May, 1898.

(* This term includes, per Scheme, Head Mistress.)

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

|   |  |
|---|--|
| TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.   | COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.  |
| LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum. | N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage. |

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now Offered at

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT Manager.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.

6s. net, claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."

"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.

"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Feap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNELED ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETWYSYCOED and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH and ABERDOWEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORICIEITH and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.

"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations.

3s. 6d. net.

Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately.

|                          |         |                                 |          |
|--------------------------|---------|---------------------------------|----------|
|                          | 1896.   | WILKIE COLLINS ...              | March 20 |
| BEN JONSON ...           | Nov. 14 | JOHN MILTON ...                 | 27       |
| JOHN KEATS ...           | 21      | WILLIAM COWPER ...              | April 3  |
| SIR JOHN SUCKLING ...    | 28      | CHARLES DARWIN ...              | 10       |
| TOM HOOD ...             | Dec. 5  | ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON }         | 17       |
| THOMAS GRAY ...          | 12      | HENRY WADSWORTH } LONGFELLOW }  | 24       |
| ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON } | 19      | ANDREW MARVELL ...              | May 1    |
| SIR WALTER SCOTT ...     | 26      | ROBERT BROWNING ...             | 8        |
|                          | 1897.   | THOMAS CARLYLE ...              | 15       |
| SAMUEL RICHARDSON.       | Jan. 2  | PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY            | 22       |
| THOMAS DE QUINCEY        | 9       | CHARLES DICKENS ...             | 29       |
| LEIGH HUNT ...           | 16      | JONATHAN SWIFT ...              | June 5   |
| LORD MACAULAY ...        | 23      | WILLIAM MAKEPEACE } THACKERAY } | 12       |
| ROBERT SOUTHEY ...       | 30      | WILLIAM BLAKE ...               | 19       |
| S. T. COLERIDGE ...      | Feb. 6  | SIR RICHARD STEELE              | 26       |
| CHARLES LAMB ...         | 13      | ALEXANDER POPE ...              | July 3   |
| MICHAEL DRAYTON ...      | 20      | DOUGLAS JERROLD ...             | 10       |
| WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR }   | 27      | FRANCIS BACON ...               | 17       |
| SAMUEL PEPYS ...         | March 6 |                                 | 1898.    |
| EDMUND WALLER ...        | 13      | HENRIK IBSEN ...                | March 20 |

A PERFECT LEAD PENCIL.*THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."—Black and White.

"Surely a boon to all busy people."

Westminster Budget.

"A design in lead pencils that deserves popularity."

Morning Leader.

"I hope he may make a fortune by it."—Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpener Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

But it lasts at the very least twice as long, because there is none of the waste that occurs through breakage of the lead in sharpening a cedar pencil. This is more especially noticeable in the case of blue and red pencils. In using an ordinary coloured pencil, probably half the crayon-lead is wasted in cutting, and another quarter by the lead breaking in use. The Blaisdell coloured pencils waste none of the crayon in cutting, for there is no cutting to be done, and the crayon does not readily break in use. Hence the saving in lead alone is very great, and the saving of time, trouble, and annoyance is greater still. There are no chips, no dirty smears from crayon dust, and a perfect point is produced instantaneously whenever needed. The same is true of the black-lead Blaisdell Pencil.

The paper covering holds firm until it is desired to remove it. Then all that is necessary is to break the outer cover with a knife or pin, and pull off a spiral of paper. The new point is then ready for use.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best; but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

USED BY

THE WAR OFFICE.
BANK OF ENGLAND.
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT OFFICE.
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE.
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OFFICES.
OXFORD UNIVERSITY.
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.
ETON COLLEGE.

UNITED STATES ARSENAL.
UNITED STATES NAVY.
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES.
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE.
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES.

If not obtainable at your Stationer's, send for Specimens—Red, Blue, and Black, post free (in the United Kingdom), 1s.

BLAISDELL PENCIL CO., Limited,

46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

AUTHORS and their PENS.

HALL CAINE: "I wrote the 'Manxman' with the Swan Pen."

S. R. CROCKETT: "Your Gold Pen suits me most admirably."

GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA: "I have lately taken to writing with a Gold Pen."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES: "You may like to know I used this pen from the days of a book of mine called 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table' (1857)."

PHIL MAY: "It is the most successful pen I have ever used."

W. R. BRADLAUGH: "I write over 8,000 words a day, and your pens are a perfect boon."

"TOBY'S DIARY" daily written with it."

Send for Illustrated List, &c., to MABIE, TODD & BARD, 93, Cheapside; 95, Regent Street; 21, High Street, Kensington.

MABIE, TODD & BARD,

Manufacturers of Gold Nibs, and the Swan Fountain Pen.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.—ONE SHILLING.

Nearly 200 pages, superbly illustrated.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

JUNE NUMBER.

WHAT THE SIBERIAN RAILWAY WILL SUPPLANT. Frontispiece. Illustration by W. A. Rogers, for "The Czar's People."
 THE CZAR'S PEOPLE. . . . . JULIAN RALPH.
 Twenty-six Illustrations (including Frontispiece) from Drawings by E. de Thulstrup. W. A. Rogers, W. Louis Sonntag, Jun., G. W. Peters, and Harry Penn; and from Photographs.
 What the Siberian Railway will Supplant—Headpiece—A Bit of Sebastopol—An Imperial Sentry—Helsingfors, the Capital of Finland—St. Isaac's Cathedral, St. Petersburg—The Esplanade, Helsingfors—Nevsky Perspective—The Station at Mooravioff—Amoorsky, Eastern Siberia—Railway Construction near Khabarovka, Eastern Siberia—A Summer Cab, St. Petersburg—A Winter Cab, St. Petersburg—Types of Russian Cabbies—An Omnibus to the Suburb of Moscow—A Manchurian Scene—Troika Convent near Moscow—A Father Superior—A Village Winter Scene—A Muzhik Family—A Village Merchant—Winter Dress—A Peasant Girl in Nurse's Dress—A Village Policeman—Winter Dress—A Prosperous Peasant—Muzhik—Tailpiece.
 OLD CHESTER TALES.—MISS MARIA. MARGARET DELAND.
 Two Illustrations by Howard Pyle.
 CURRENT FALLACIES UPON NAVAL SUBJECTS. Captain A. T. MATHAN, U.S.N.
 THE SPIRIT OF MAHONGUI: a Story. FREDERIC REMINGTON.
 Three Illustrations by Frederic Remington.
 THE TROLLEY IN RURAL PARTS. SYLVESTER BAXTER.
 Six Illustrations by Peter Newell. Headpiece—A Sunday-school Ponie—A Through Traveller—"They call each other by their front Names"—"Sometimes the Conductor does Errands for his Friends"—"A cosy little Picnic."
 RODEN'S CORNER: a Novel. Part VI. HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.
 Four Illustrations by T. de Thulstrup.
 WILLIAM'S MOOSE. . . . . HAMBLEN FEARS.
 Heading by E. B. Edwards, and Four Illustrations by A. B. Frost.
 MRS. PETTINGREW'S QUESTION: a Story. ELLEN DOUGLAS DELAND.
 Three Illustrations by W. T. Smedley.
 A REBEL CIPHER DESPACH. . . . . DAVID HOMER BATES.
 A WOMAN WHO LOST HER PRINCIPLES: a Story. LOUISE BETTS EDWARDS.
 Two Illustrations by E. L. Blumenschein.
 A STUDY OF A CHILD. . . . . LOUISE E. HOGAN.
 Forty Illustrations from Drawings made by the Child before his Seventh Year.
 A CENTURY OF CUBAN DIPLOMACY, 1795 to 1895. PROFESSOR ALBERT BUSHNELL HART.
 WITH MUSIC and WHITE LIGHT: a Story. ARBY SWAIN MERRILL.
 THE SITUATION IN CHINA. . . . . CATHAY.
 DICTATED: a Story. . . . . ALEXANDER BLACK.
 EDITOR'S STUDY. . . . . CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.
 Life in Mexico—Mexican Archaeology—Christian Science and Crowns.
 EDITOR'S DRAWER. With Introductory Story by RUTH McENERY STUART.
 Illustrations by Peter Newell, Louise L. Heustle and O. Herford.
 Annual Subscription, including postage, 15s.

London: HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Abchurch Lane, W.

SECOND EDITION.—AT ALL LIBRARIES.

REMINISCENCES.

By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

The ACADEMY (May 14) devotes Four Columns to "THIS BRIGHT, VIVID, BRISQUE LITTLE BOOK OF 'MEMORIES,'" and other Leading Journals fill Thirteen Columns with its praises.

GEORGE REDWAY, Publisher, London.

Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s.; half-calf, 10s. 6d., post free.

HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."—Times.

"Readers will find here, in a clear and attractive form, much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."—Pall Mall Gazette.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Fumival St., London, E.C.

EPPS'S COCOAINE

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & CO., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE UNKNOWN SEA.

By CLEMENCE HOUSMAN.

"A delicate fancy and a rich imagination have enabled the author to invest it with singular impressiveness.....hardly a page fails to indicate the author's delicate methods and robust individuality."

Nottingham Guardian.

"We own a sense of admiration for the gallant effort of Clemence Housman."—Sunday Special.

"Clemence Housman's story is one of the most remarkable that has been put into our hands for a considerable time."—Aberdeen Free Press.

A MONTE CARLO STORY.

JOCELYN. By JOHN SINJOHN.

"Two of the best comedy characters that we have encountered in recent fiction."—Outlook.

"The Riviera setting is aglow with colour and life."—Daily Mail.

"This powerful piece of fiction should have a wide popularity. It has the strenuousness of life in it."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE FIRE OF LIFE. By C. K. BURROW.

PROSPECTUSES AND LIST OF ANNOUNCEMENTS SENT ON APPLICATION.

3, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

IMPORTANT.

All who are interested in books, either as readers, authors, purchasers, or vendors, should subscribe to the

PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

ESTABLISHED 1837.

Among the many attractions of its columns the following may be mentioned:—

Literary articles (including leader on some prominent topic of the moment) announcements of forthcoming volumes, notes on current events in connection with the publishing world, reviews (often illustrated) of new books and magazines, correspondence, &c., &c. An exceedingly valuable feature of the paper is the list of

NEW BOOKS OF THE WEEK

(the most complete list issued) giving the full title, size, price, and publisher, with an index of subjects and name of book and author in one alphabet. Also in every number upwards of a thousand

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

are advertised for, thus affording readers an excellent opportunity either of disposing of their own scarce volumes or purchasing others that they may be in need of; and attention is particularly drawn to the fact that annual subscribers have the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in this column. They also receive a gratis copy of the large special Christmas Number—a handsome quarto volume containing over 250 illustrations.

As an advertising medium in connection with books, the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record stands unrivalled.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR can be had by sending Postal Order or Stamps to Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Limited, the Proprietors, St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, London, to whom all money-payments should be made.

For One Year, post-free to any part of Great Britain and Ireland ... .. 8s. 6d.
 „ Six Months ditto ditto ditto ... .. 4s. 6d.
 „ Three Months ditto ditto ditto ... .. 2s. 6d.
 To America and the Continent, the Annual Subscription, including postage ... .. 11s. 0d.

London :

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD., St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

New ready, demy 8vo, cloth extra, price 10s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES and METHODS of MISSIONARY LABOUR. By EDWARD BEAN UNDERHILL, Honorary Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society.

"The large knowledge, the sound judgment, the strong practical sense, and the high-toned Christian enthusiasm of our dear friend has never been more conspicuously displayed."—Baptist Magazine.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, 21 and 22, Fumival Street, E.C.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1897.

SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF ISSUE OF ANNUAL CATALOGUE.

THE

ENGLISH CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

FOR THE YEAR 1897.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 224, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

It contains a much longer List of Works than last year's Catalogue, including an addition of some 1,400 more Titles, but the price remains the same, viz., 5s. net, cloth limp; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue' is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books' is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London :

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD., St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC MEETINGS. By J. HUNT COOKE. A clear and concise Manual for all Public Speakers.

"We make no apology, even during the holiday season, for drawing attention to this little book."—Spectator.

"The whole duty of man in a chair."—Expository Times.

MR. MURRAY'S ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW WORKS.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 12 vols., 6s. each.
The NEW EDITION of LORD BYRON.

FIRST VOLUME OF PROSE AND FIRST VOLUME OF POETRY

NOW READY.

A New Text, with many hitherto Unpublished Additions.

The POETRY Edited by E. H. COLERIDGE.

The LETTERS Edited by R. E. PROTHERO.

"If the succeeding volumes are as careful and thorough as the first, no other edition is likely to be desired for many years to come. The work promises to be in all respects a complete success."—Times.

"Mr. Coleridge has performed a very difficult task with both knowledge and judgment."—Literature.

FIVE YEARS IN SIAM:

A Record of Journeys Up and Down the Country, and of Life among the People from 1891 to 1896, with some Remarks on the Resources and Administration of the Kingdom.

By H. WARINGTON SMYTH, M.A., LL.B.,
F.G.S., F.R.G.S.,

Formerly Director of the Department of Mines in Siam.

2 vols., crown 8vo, with Illustrations from the Author's Drawings and Maps, 24s.

[Now ready.]

"Here at last is the kind of book for which all English readers interested in Siam have been waiting. It gives us an impartial and sympathetic estimate of the Siamese character, an account of the reformed administration..... a description of the natural resources, of sea, river, and land scenery, and a hundred other subjects. It is the work of a writer whose conclusions are the result of personal observation."—Daily News.

HYDROGRAPHICAL SURVEYING.

A Description of the Means and Methods Employed in Constructing Marine Charts.

By Rear-Admiral

Sir WILLIAM J. L. WHARTON, K.C.B.,
Hydrographer to the Admiralty.

A NEW EDITION REVISED THROUGHOUT.

With Diagrams and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 18s.

[Nearly ready.]

WHAT IS GOOD MUSIC?

Suggestions to Persons desiring to Cultivate a Taste in Musical Art.

By W. J. HENDERSON,

Author of "The Story of Music," "Preludes and Studies," &c.

Crown 8vo, 5s. [Now ready.]

ESSAYS ON CHURCH REFORM

Edited by the Rev. CHARLES GORE,
M.A., D.D. (Edin.), Canon of Westminster.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Now ready.]

Contents:—1. General Lines of Church Reform—2. The Original Position of the Laity in the Christian Church—3. The Actual Methods of Self-Government in the Established Church of Scotland—4. An Ideal of Church and State—5. A Practicable Ideal of Self-Government—6. Legal and Parliamentary Possibilities—7. Parish Councils—8. Patronage—9. Pensions for the Clergy—10. Increase of the Episcopate—11. Church Reform and Social Problems.

Bishop HALL, of Vermont, U.S.A., the Rev. J. WATKIN WILLIAMS, of Cape Town, the Rev. Canon TRAVERS SMITH, of Dublin, and Mr. R. T. N. SPEIR, of Muthill, Perthshire, will give accounts of the methods of Self-Government in their respective Non-Established Churches, with special reference to the position of the Laity.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' Educational List.

BLACKWOODS'

SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE.

Edited by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

EACH PLAY COMPLETE, WITH INTRODUCTION,
NOTES, AND GLOSSARY.

In crown 8vo volumes, price 1s. 6d.

NOW READY.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.

Others in preparation.

HIGHER LATIN UNSEENS. Selected, with Introductory Hints on Translation, by H. W. AUDEN, M.A., Assistant Master at Fettes College, Edinburgh. 2s. 6d.

HIGHER LATIN PROSE. With an Introduction by H. W. AUDEN. 2s. 6d.

HIGHER GREEK UNSEENS. Selected, with Introductory Hints on Translation, by H. W. AUDEN. 2s. 6d.

LOWER GERMAN. Reading, Supplementary Grammar with Exercises, and Material for Composition. By LOUIS LUBOVIVUS, German Master in the Secondary Schools of the Govan School Board, Glasgow. 2s. 6d.

LATIN VERSE UNSEENS. By G. MIDDLETON, M.A., Lecturer in Latin, Aberdeen University, 1st Scholar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

LATIN HISTORICAL UNSEENS. For Army Classes. By L. VAUGHAN WILKES, M.A., 1st Classical Scholar of Hertford College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 2s.

GREEK VERSE UNSEENS. By T. R. MILLS, M.A., late Lecturer in Greek, Aberdeen University, formerly Scholar of Wadham College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

A TEXT-BOOK of MODERN GEOMETRY. By J. A. THIRD, M.A., Head Master, Spier's School, Beith. [In a few days.]

HISTORY of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A., Senior English Master, Edinburgh Ladies' College. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s.

OUTLINES of ENGLISH LITERATURE. For Young Scholars, with Illustrative Specimens. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

ENGLISH VERSE for JUNIOR CLASSES. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON. In 2 Parts. Part I.—CHAUCER to COLERIDGE. Part II.—NINETEENTH CENTURY POETS. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net each.

ENGLISH PROSE for JUNIOR and SENIOR CLASSES. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON. Part I.—MALORY to JOHNSON. Crown 8vo. [In a few days.]

PARAPHRASING, ANALYSIS, and CORRECTION of SENTENCES. By D. M. J. JAMES, M.A., Gordon Schools, Huntly. Crown 8vo, 1s.

ELEMENTARY GRAMMAR and COMPOSITION. Based on the ANALYSIS of SENTENCES. With a Chapter on Word-Building and Derivation, and containing numerous Exercises. New Edition. Fcap. 8vo, 1s.

A WORKING HANDBOOK of the ANALYSIS of SENTENCES. With NOTES on PARAPHRASING, FIGURES of SPEECH, and PROSBODY. New Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

STORMONTH'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Pronouncing, Etymological, and Explanatory. Revised.

I. LIBRARY EDITION. With Supplement. Imperial 8vo, handsomely bound in half-morocco, 18s. net.

II. SCHOOL and COLLEGE EDITION. Crown 8vo, 500 pp., 7s. 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

New and Enlarged Edition. In demy 8vo, tastefully printed and bound, price 7s. 6d.

WITH A BEAUTIFUL FRONTISPIECE OF STUDIES OF CLOUDS AT VARIOUS ALTITUDES.

WEATHER LORE.

A Garner of Knowledge, Tradition, Proverbs, Folk-sayings, Wise Saws, Rhymes, &c. Concerning the Weather. By RICHARD INWARDS.

"Possesses something more than a literary and antiquarian interest."—Spectator.

"An excellent collection of the proverbial sayings, rhymed or unrhymed, which have been passed on from generation to generation."—Athenæum.

"We believe this is the largest collection ever brought together.....The author has ransacked all sorts of ancient and modern publications in search of treasures, and the result cannot fail to be instructive and entertaining to a large circle of readers."—Morning Post.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

The GROWTH and INFLUENCE of MUSIC in RELATION to CIVILISATION.

By HENRY TIPPER.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 6s.

DANTE at RAVENNA: a Study.

By CATHERINE MARY PHILLIMORE, Author of "Studies in Italian Literature," "The Warrior Medic," "Fra Angelico," "Selections from the Sermons of Padre Agostina Da Montefeltro," &c.

"The outcome of enthusiasm and scholarship.....will be heartily welcomed by the lovers of Dante."—Globe.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth, price 6s.

JOHN MAVERELL: a Tale of the Riviera.

By J. DUNCAN CRAIG, D.D., Author of "Real Pictures of Clerical Life in Ireland," "La Debanado; or, Scenes during the Franco-German War."

"An interesting and cleverly-planned story."—Booksellers' Review.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

LUTES and RIFTS.

By LOUISA SAHN.

"The author writes with pleasant vivaciousness."—Sheffield Independent.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 4s. 6d.

THE SCHOOL SYSTEM of the TALMUD.

With a Sketch of the Talmudical Treatise "Baba Kama." By the Rev. B. SPERS (Dayan).

In crown 8vo, parchment, price 1s. 6d. net.

Large-paper copies, price 7s. 6d. net.

BRENTFORD: Literary and His- torical Sketches.

By FRED. TURNER (Librarian: Brentford Public Library).

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

In foolscap 8vo, paper cover, price 3d.

FAMOUS OLD MSS. and BOOKS.

No. 2, Caedmon's "Paraphrase of Holy Scripture."

In crown 8vo, price 2s.

SCIENTIFIC METHODS in BIOLOGY.

By Dr. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL.

"It is surprising how much suggestiveness and controversial matter can be introduced within a small number of pages, when every paragraph has been carefully considered and is expressed in weighty language."—Manchester Courier.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :   | PAGE    |
|---|---------|
| Byron as a Letter-Writer ... ..                         | 541     |
| The "Free Old Hawk" Again ... ..                        | 542     |
| A Dublin Doctor ... ..                                  | 543     |
| Jeffreys Reconsidered... ..                             | 544     |
| Psychology and Art ... ..                               | 544     |
| History for Schools ... ..                              | 545     |
| Some Recent Theology ... ..                             | 546     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..                           | 547-550 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..                                   | 551     |
| BETWEEN THE MOUNTAINS AND THE SEA. By Sir               |         |
| Lewis Morris ... ..                                     | 554     |
| PURE FABLES ... ..                                      | 554     |
| THE "NEWDIGATE" ... ..                                  | 554     |
| THREE BARDS OF THE BUSH: III., Mr. A. B. Paterson... .. | 555     |
| STEINLEN'S CATS ... ..                                  | 556     |
| THE BOOK MARKET ... ..                                  | 557     |
| THE WEEK ... ..   | 559     |
| ART ... ..  | 559     |
| DRAMA ... ..  | 560     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..                                   | 561     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..                                   | 563     |
| Announcements ... ..                                    | 563     |

REVIEWS.

BYRON AS LETTER-WRITER.

The Works of Lord Byron: Letters and Journals. Vol. I. Edited by R. E. Prothero, M.A. (Murray.)

"IT is not easy," wrote Johnson, in criticising Pope's Letters, "to distinguish affectation from habit; he that has once studiously formed a style rarely writes afterwards with complete ease. Pope may be said to write always with his reputation in his head." Those pregnant sentences seem peculiarly applicable to the first volume of Byron's letters, edited by Mr. Rowland E. Prothero, who has had access to much that is now new to the world. But there is this difference: Pope's style had been "studiously formed"; Byron's was—studiously?—forming. If ever the child was father to the man that child was Byron before yet he had accomplished twenty years of his few and evil days. Every letter bears upon it the sign of that exaggerated self-esteem, that ridiculous inequality between his actual and supposed accomplishment which later on was to fill Europe with brilliantly rhetorical complaints, with claims most successfully emphasised, and with the imposition of a very unworthy poetical, but a splendidly oratorical, achievement on the most discriminating and far-seeing minds of his own generation.

The art of letter-writing, in truth, is necessarily one of the most difficult possible, since it is the only art which demands the submersion of self-consciousness. Swift wrote letters, says Johnson, like a man that remembered he was writing to Pope, but Arbuthnot "like one who lets thoughts drop from his pen as they rise into his mind." That is the most difficult achievement of all; and despite Macaulay, Byron by no manner of means—at all events in his early letters—ever came near its accomplishment. His letters, says Macaulay, are among the best in our language. "They are less affected than those of Pope and Walpole; they have more matter in them than those of Cowper; . . . if the epistolary style of Lord Byron was artificial, it was a rare and admirable instance of that highest art which cannot be distinguished from nature." It is true enough that the early letters reveal the nature of the man pretty conclusively, but precisely on account of the artifices which even the boy had accumulated over the natural pile of his personality. But since affectation of the most frantically grotesque and ludicrous kind was the keynote to all Byron's utterance and public expression, it is utterly absurd to maintain that the very fact of revealing that affectation is a reason for considering his letters less affected than those of Pope. Nevertheless, when all these points are thoroughly understood, when it is granted that Byron the letter-writer is no more and no less than Byron the poet, Byron, not so much a creature of God's hands as the manufactured product of one of the most absurd romantic ideals that ever entered into the brain of man, his letters still remain an extraordinarily complete personal revelation. We are ashamed to remember that part of that romantic ideal had its foundation in no more solid a substance than the fact of his rather laughable nobility of birth. The sentiment of one stanza from his juvenile poems is the very essence of half the rant of independence, the mock assumption of strength, the silly superiority which are the chief note of the letters. Thus wrote the noble poet, at the age of nineteen, to his ancestors:

"Shades of heroes, farewell! your descendant, departing
From the seat of his ancestors, bids you adieu!
Abroad or at home, your remembrance
imparting
New courage, he'll think upon glory and you."

When you read Mr. Prothero's quiet and keenly impartial account of the heroic shades here appealed to, you cannot but recall Pope's couplet on Addison with a peculiar sense of its applicability to Byron:

"Who but must laugh if such a man there be?
Who would not weep if Atticus were he?"

We have used certain phrases concerning Byron's character—rant of independence, mock assumption of strength, silly superiority—which demand justification. Let us justify them out of the letters themselves. Here is an extract from a Harrow letter written when the boy was sixteen:

"That you are unhappy, my dear Sister, makes me so also; were it in my power to relieve your sorrows you would soon recover your spirits; as it is, I sympathize better than you yourself expect. But really, after all (pardon me, my dear Sister), I feel a little inclined to laugh at you, for love, in my humble opinion, is utter nonsense, a mere jargon of compliments, romance and deceit; now, for my part, had I fifty mistresses, I should in the course of a fortnight forget them all, and, if by any chance I ever recollected one, should laugh at it as a dream, and bless my stars for delivering me from the hands of the little mischievous blind God. Can't you drive this Cousin of ours out of your pretty little head (for as to hearts I think they are out of the question), or if you are so far gone, why don't you give old L'Harpagon (I mean the General) the slip, and take a trip to Scotland, you are now pretty near the Borders."

"Now, for my part, had I fifty mistresses, I should in the course of a fortnight forget them all": what is it, after all (the fanatic admirer will say), but the tall talk of immaturity? That is true enough; but the strange part of the business is that this is almost exactly the attitude which the mature man was destined to take in regard to such points through all his years, through all his poetry, and all his conversation, and in all his ridiculous poses.

Take another extract upon a subject which Mr. Prothero kindly describes as a "misunderstanding" on the part of Byron, on the subject of the allowance made by the Court of Chancery for his furniture. The unfortunate point in the matter is that Byron was never without his "misunderstandings" in any circumstance of life, and the man who never ceases to understand his friends wrongly need not be described as a creature requiring particular sympathy. The letter is addressed to his solicitor, Mr. John Hanson:

"After the contents of your Epistle, you will probably be less surprised at my answer than I have been at many points of yours; never was I more astonished than at the perusal, for I confess I expected very different treatment. Your indirect charge of Dissipation does not affect me, nor do I fear the strictest inquiry into my conduct; neither here [Cambridge] nor at Harrow have I disgraced myself, the 'Metropolis' and the 'Cloisters' are alike unconscious of my Debauchery, and on the plains of merry Sherwood I have experienced Misery alone. . . . Mrs. Byron and myself are now totally separated, injured by her I sought refuge with Strangers, too late I see my error, for how was kindness to be expected from others, when denied by a parent? In you, Sir, I imagined I had found an Instructor; for your advice I thank you; the Hospitality of yourself and Mrs. H.—on many occasions I shall always gratefully remember, for I am not of opinion that even present Injustice can cancel past obligations."

Were we not right in that phrase "silly superiority"? Is it possible to read such trash without a sense of shame for the man who shook the world with his egotism and who never, in point of reality or in the understanding of life, advanced one step beyond the spirit of this kind of utterance? Harken to Manfred lisping in sentiment from the boy's lips in a later passage of the same letter:

"Before I proceed, it will be necessary to say a few words concerning Mrs. Bryon [his mother]. You hinted a possibility of her appearance at Trinity; the instant I hear of her arrival I quit Cambridge, though Rustication or Expulsion be the consequence. Many a weary week of torment have I passed with her, nor have I forgot the insulting Epithets with which myself, my sister, my father, and my family have been repeatedly reviled."

When one remembers the real and human meaning of that phrase, "my father and my family"—the father whom he never remembered, the family which he never knew—one begins to understand something of the character of this bard. This particular letter from which we have made quotation is, in truth, a mine of information as to the youngster's character, which was really as fixed at the age of seventeen as at the age when he produced his most influential and popular works. He was not allowed, it appears, to incur the superfluous expense of "repairing" his rooms. "Hear my determination," says he to Mr. Hanson. "I will never pay for them out of my allowance, and the disgrace will not attach to me but to those by whom I have been deceived." He had already availed himself of the fruits of that tremendous truth that no man can shirk a burthen without transferring it to somebody else's shoulders. It was Byron's habit to practise this particular form of shirking, and if we add to this list of strange characteristics which we have already detailed an absurd vanity which this letter-writer was for ever attempting to pass off under a thin disguise of humour, we have the character fairly complete. He writes to his half-sister:

"I presume you were rather surprised not to see my consequential name in the papers amongst the orators of our second speech-day, but unfortunately some wit who had formerly been at Harrow, suppressed the merits of Long, Farrer and myself, who were always supposed to take the Lead in Harrow eloquence, and by way of a hoax thought proper to insert a panegyric on those speakers who were really and truly allowed to have rather disgraced themselves. Of course for the wit of the thing, the best were left out and the worst inserted, which accounts for the Gothic omission of my superior talents. Perhaps it was done with a view to weaken our vanity, which might be too much raised by the flattering paragraphs bestowed on our performance the first speech-day; be that as it may, we were omitted in the account of the second, to the astonishment of all Harrow."

The contradictory explanation of his neglected performance, described, first as a hoax, and then as a means of chastening his vanity, proves quite sufficiently that, whether by hoax or by serious intention, that vanity needed chastening indeed. He allows himself to use the following agreeable language in regard to his mother:

"I have at last succeeded in pacifying the dowager, and mollifying that piece of flint which the good Lady denominates her heart. She now has condescended to send you her love, although with many comments on the occasion and many compliments to herself. But to me she still continues to be a torment, and I doubt not would continue so to the end of my life. However, this is the last time she will ever have an opportunity, as, when I go to college I shall employ my vacations either in town; or during the summer I intend making a tour through the Highlands, and to visit the Hebrides with a party of my friends whom I have engaged for the purpose. . . . I by that means will avoid the society of this woman, whose detestable temper destroys every Idea of domestic comfort. It is a happy thing that she is my mother and not my wife, so that I can rid myself of her when I please, and indeed if she goes on in the style that she has done for this last week that I have been with her, I shall quit her before the month I was to drag out in her company is expired, and place myself anywhere rather than remain with such a vixen."

Now, without for a moment indulging in the customary phrases about filial duty, and quite recognising that even a maternal temper may be too overwhelming on occasions, this was surely a uniquely Byronic way of writing of a woman, who within three weeks of that letter did herself write—as Mr. Prothero, with his customary impartiality instantly informs us—"I give up the five hundred a year to my son, and you will supply him with money accordingly. The two hundred a year in addition I shall reserve for myself; nor can I do with less, as my house will always be a home for my son whenever he chooses to come to it." In those far more dignified phrases there are hints of another's "detestable temper," if the writer had only cared to make the revelation.

Mr. Prothero's first volume brings us down to the eye of that historical March day when Byron awoke to find himself famous. Just before that celebrated occasion death released the "vixen" with whom he refused to live, probably with excellent reasons. But this is the way in which he expresses his loss, in a letter to R. C. Dallas:

"Peace be with the dead! Regret cannot wake them. With a sigh to the departed, let us resume the dull business of life, in the certainty that we also shall have our repose. Besides her who gave me being, I have lost more than one who made that being tolerable. The best friend of my friend Hobhouse . . . has perished miserably in the muddy waters of Cam, always fatal to genius."

At that point of rhetoric, of sham Stoicism, of vacuous bragging, the tattered demalion hero of Mr. Prothero's volume is, as we have said, left. The editing of the book, however, could not have been done better. The task has been accomplished with rare skill, fine impartiality, and distinguished deference to rivals in the same field. The only result, however—though the lesson is as instructive as any which this century of letters can show—is to prove Byron to be a more completely thorough impostor than we had ever before supposed. We notice that one Byronic has been filtering his aroused feelings in an evening paper against Mr. Lionel Johnson's claim in these columns, that Byron was a twopenny poet and a farthing man. If sympathisers with Byron (Colonel Newcome included) would care to study this volume of letters intelligently, they would find, we rather think, much to give pause to their sensibilities and emotions on the subject of the "noble poet."

THE "FREE OLD HAWK" AGAIN.

The Wound-Dresser. By Walt Whitman. Edited by R. M. Bucke. (Putnam's Sons.)

LAST year a little collection of Walt Whitman's letters to Peter Doyle, one of his boy friends, was published under the title Calamus. Now comes another contribution to our knowledge of the Free Old Hawk (as in one of the Doyle letters Walt calls himself), in the form of a bundle of correspondence sent to his mother from Washington in 1862-3-4, when he was nursing the wounded soldiers of the Civil War. Every one knows that Whitman played the ministering angel (disguised as a hairy, open-shirted, warm-hearted, tobacco-carrying Republican) to some hundreds of America's sick fighters: his account of his experiences are accessible in Specimen Days and Drum Taps; but the more spontaneous, unofficial story of his Hospital benefactions, as told in familiar day-to-day letters to his mother, is new. In this little book that story may be read. Its title is The Wound-Dresser. "The Heartener" would be more accurate, for Walt did not, as The Wound-Dresser would suggest, so much fulfil the duties of surgeon or nurse as supplement and complete them by countless little sympathetic offices which it needed a comprehensive and partly feminine mind such as his to think of. First and foremost, he set himself to cheer the men, to put hopefulness into them, to oust impatience, to divert their thoughts, to minimise their forebodings. He passed through the crowded wards like a sun-warmed breeze of spring.

There have been critics who held that Whitman might have done better to have fought for the cause he had at heart; but it seems to us that the nobler way was his. It may be contended, without any aspersion on the fair honour of Bellona, that to ease the dying hours or assist the recovery of numbers and numbers of those who had fought and fallen in the war was at least as serviceable an action for the North as the individual slaughter of a dozen or so Southerners. Moreover, while the bodily privations through which Whitman had to pass were trifling (although he often sat up all night), his mind was severely assailed. "Mother," he says somewhere, "it is the most pitiful sight, I think, when first the men are brought in. I have to bustle round to keep from crying." And Dr. Bucke states in his final note that Whitman's ill-health and paralysis dated from this period. None the less, though he suffered from it, Walt liked his self-imposed work. "Mother," he wrote, "as I have said in former letters, you can have no idea how these sick and dying youngsters cling to a fellow, and how fascinating it is, with all its hospital surroundings of sadness and scenes of repulsion of death."

Walt's inexhaustible federating imagination was needed for the success of the enterprise. Other ministering angels doubtless shed light upon these overstocked hospitals, but none were like unto him. He alone had magnetism and solicitous, inspired thought.

"Above all [he writes], the poor boys welcome magnetic friendship, personality (some are so fervent, so hungry for this)—poor fellows, how young they are, lying there with their pale faces, and that mute look in their eyes. O, how one gets to love them—often, in particular cases, so suffering, so good, so manly and affectionate. . . . Lots of them have grown to expect, as I leave at night, that we should kiss each other, sometimes quite a number; I have to go round, poor boys. . . . I spend my evenings altogether at the hospitals—my days often. I give little gifts of money in small sums, which I am enabled to do—all sorts of things indeed, food, clothing, letter stamps (I write lots of letters), now and then a good pair of crutches, &c., &c. Then I read to the boys. The whole ward that can walk gathers around me and listens."

And again:

"I have been feeding some their dinners. It makes me feel quite proud. I find so frequently I can do with the men what no one else at all can—getting them to eat (some that will not touch their food otherwise, nor for anybody else)—it is sometimes quite affecting, I can tell you. I found such a case to-day, a soldier with throat disease very bad. I fed him quite a dinner; the men (his comrades around) just stared in wonder, and one of them told me afterwards that he (the sick man) had not eat so much at a meal in three months."

And here is an account of one of Walt's happy thoughts:

"Oh, I must tell you, I [gave] in Carver Hospital a great treat of ice-cream, a couple of days ago—went round myself through about fifteen large wards (I bought some ten gallons, very nice). You would have cried and been amused too. Many of the men had to be fed; several of them I saw cannot probably live, yet they quite enjoyed it. I gave everybody some—quite a number [of] Western country boys had never tasted ice-cream before."

And in another letter Walt says: "Mother, I have real pride in telling you that I have the consciousness of saving quite a number of lives by saving them from giving up." A noble record, is it not?

The letters are not wholly given to the description of patients and Walt's methods. There are many asides. Often they are concerned with clothes, for Walt, though he was now over forty, still stood to his mother somewhat in the relation of schoolboy. Boy he was, of course, to the end: boy in heart and enthusiasm and naturalness; but in the matter of clothes, particularly shirts, he was boy more actually still. Thus: "Mother, I have neglected, I think, what I ought to have told you two or three weeks ago, that is that I have discarded my old clothes." And, "O, mother, how welcome the shirts were," and so on. And looking at the excellent portrait of Louisa Whitman which accompanies this book, it is not hard to understand the Free Old Hawk's persistent dependence and minute filial regard: a full, strong face, with soft, kindly lines and plenty of chin, shrewd, humorous eyes, hair parted in the middle and a white cap over the head, ending in two ribbons—a most lovable old lady. Walt occasionally touches on other matters less personal than wearing apparel. Now and then he is strong in praise of O'Connor, with whom for a while he lodged—O'Connor, his most eloquent champion, the author of The Good Gray Poet; in another place he drops in a passage touching President Lincoln:

"I had a good view of the President last evening. He looks more careworn even than usual; his face with deep-cut lines, seams, and his complexion grey through very dark skin—a curious looking man, very sad. I said to a lady who was looking with me: 'Who can see that man without losing all wish to be sharp upon him personally?' The lady assented, although she is almost vindictive on the course of the administration (thinks it wants nerve, &c.—the usual complaint). The equipage is rather shabby—horses, indeed, almost what my friends the Broadway drivers would call old plugs. The President dresses in plain black clothes, cylinder hat. He was alone yesterday. . . . I really think it would be safer for him just now to stop at the White House, but I expect he is too proud to abandon the former custom."

Later, we find Walt writing: "I have finally made up my mind that Mr. Lincoln has done as good as a human man could do." In another place he has a pretty reference to two little nieces:

"Mother, you don't know how pleased I was to read what you wrote about little Sis. I want to see her so bad, I don't know what to do; I know she must be just the best young one on Long Island—but I hope it will not be understood as meaning any slight or disrespect to Miss Hat, nor to put her nose out of joint, because Uncle Walt, I hope, has heart and gizzard big enough for both his little nieces, and as many more as the Lord may send."

And here is a picturesque scrap of recollection, addressed in parenthesis in a letter to Mrs. Whitman, to Martha, the wife of his brother Jeff:

"Matty, I send you my best love. Dear sister, how I wish I could be with you one or two good days. Mat, do you remember the good time we had that awful stormy night we went to the Opera, New York, and had the front seat, and heard the handsome-mouthed Guerrabella? and had the good oyster supper at Fulton Market ('pewter them ales!'). O Mat, I hope and trust we shall have such times again."

"We'll have it in a tankard, please," is the colourless English formula. "Pewter them ales!" said the Free Old Hawk, child and prophet of a younger, more idiomatic civilisation.

And here we must leave a kindly book, which although in the main it deals with such a sad subject as the wreckage and sorrow that must ever crowd the wake of a war, is yet a piece of literature to be prized, for it shows us yet deeper into the heart of this bountiful and guileless nature. Well were it for the poor fellows destined to suffer in America's present struggle could Walt Whitman stand beside their beds.

A DUBLIN DOCTOR.

William Stokes: His Life and Work (1804-1878). By his Son, William Stokes. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

WILEN Foley had finished the statue of William Stokes which now stands in the hall of the College of Physicians in Dublin, he said: "I think I have caught the expression of the mouth; it was no easy task to give that mouth!" In the photograph of the statue which forms the frontispiece to this book, one can guess the difficulty, and almost attest the triumph. The figure answers to Stokes's life, as it is here recorded—"His life was gentle." It burned with a gem-like flame; and this marble embodiment, with its bowed head and folded hands, reveals, as Sir William Stokes says, "a spirit that has attained a massive wisdom and almost a gnomic calm, yet can be still enkindled from within, and shake off the sense of the weight and mystery of life and death, of sin and sorrow that threatens to overwhelm it."

William Stokes was born in 1804. He came of good family, and his father, Whitley Stokes, was a Dublin surgeon of some eminence. His boy William was not precocious, nor even promising. He battered on Scott's Border Ballads, to the neglect alike of games and lessons. But he had a mother. One day lying on the grass asleep he was awakened by her hot tears of regret and doubt falling on his face. It was an awakening from more than physical sleep; thenceforward the youth was strenuous: he plunged into his medical career. Many advantages were his: he had the entrées into the best Dublin society; the priceless backing of a kind, a successful, and a popular father. At Edinburgh, whither he went to complete his studies, he came under the magnetic teaching of Prof. Alison: "Alison was the best man I ever knew," he said in after life.

"From nine at night to two or three o'clock in the morning we seem to see this wise and grand physician attended by William Stokes, the ardent youth of twenty-one years of age, as full of love for his just teacher as of zeal for his art, passing through snow and storm down the Cowgate and up the high stairs leading to the topmost flat on some old house in the wynds of Edinburgh, bringing medicine and healing to the dark haunts of poverty and misery, comfort and sympathy to the wounded souls at whose bedside they ministered."

In Edinburgh Stokes published a treatise on the stethoscope, an instrument still new, and, therefore, in the eyes of many, ridiculous. But Stokes saw the value of Laennec's theory of auscultation and percussion, and he made himself master of that now indispensable servant. Thus early in his career—he had not yet qualified for practice—Stokes became something of a pioneer. He remained a mild pioneer all his life; but his name cannot be said to be associated with any discovery which strikes the imagination. In conjunction with Dr. Robert James Graves he introduced opium in the treatment of peritonitis; but only doctors remember the fact. He also improved the system of clinical teaching in Dublin—but how make this eloquent? It is the man himself, not his professional achievement, that shines in these pages. And behind the man, it is not the history of medicine nor the economy of Meath Hospital that next takes our eye; it is the state of Ireland, and the ravages of cholera and famine in Dublin.

One of the most interesting passages in the book is a foot-note in which Sir William Stokes quotes Miss Jane Barlow's account of his father's humane treatment of Clarence Mangan, in the last moments of his life. It is a touching story of the ministration of a doctor to a poet:

"One morning, as Stokes was going his rounds in the Meath Hospital, the porter told him that admission was asked for a miserable looking man at the door. He was shocked to find that this was Mangan, who said to him, 'You are the first who has spoken one kind word to me for many years'—a terrible saying. Stokes got him to a private room, and had everything possible done for him; but not many days after he died. Immediately after death, such a wonderful change came over the face that Stokes hurried away to Sir Frederic Burton, the artist, and said to him, 'Clarence Mangan is lying dead at the hospital. I want you to come and look at him, for you never saw anything so beautiful in your life!' So Sir Frederic came, and made the sketch which is now in the National Gallery. And so, 'suddenly and quietly as the shutting of a glow-worm's little lamp,' on the 20th of June, 1849, his life went out. Only three persons are said to have followed his body to the grave."

Another of Stokes's contacts with literary men—they were many—is not less interesting. In 1849 Carlyle visited Ireland, and brought an introduction to Stokes, who asked a party of friends—including Drs. Todd and Petrie and Sir Frederic Burton—to meet him. It was not a very happy occasion:

"The impression that Carlyle made on Stokes was the reverse of favourable. His self-assertiveness, intolerance of any opposition to his views, vanity, and unconcealed contempt for everything and everyone in the country in which he was an honoured guest, struck Stokes as being ill-mannered as it was low-bred. He used to say that he had during his life-time met many men who were in every sense of the word bored, but that 'Carlyle was hyperborean!' It is not surprising, therefore, that Stokes, whom Carlyle described as being a 'rather fierce, sinister looking man,' became, as the evening wore on, 'more and more gloomy, emphatic, and contradictory,' and we can well believe that after eleven o'clock p.m. Carlyle was 'glad to get away.'"

The love of literature was never more happily allied to the love of medicine than it was in William Stokes. See how they join hands in this story of a cobbler of Carry Breacc, where Stokes had his country seat. The man was in broken health, and had often experienced the doctor's kindness and skill:

"He was fond of reading, and Stokes lent him an odd volume of Scott's novels from time to time. Walking beside him one day on the road Stokes said: 'Well, Denny, what did you think of the last book I lent you?' 'It's a great book intirely, docther, an' Sir Walter Scott's a true historian.' 'I'm inclined to agree with you,' said Stokes; 'but what do you mean exactly by calling him a true historian?' 'I mane, your honour, he's a thrie historian, because he makes you love your kind.'"

The amazing thing is that the class which produced a man capable of making this memorable criticism was so sunk in ignorance and superstition that a story like the following is far more typical of its intellectual condition. Stokes, it should be premised, liked to inform himself of the popular remedies believed in by the peasantry. The treatment for epilepsy in South Kerry in Stokes's day was, to say the least, heroic:

"Mr. Bland, of Derrequin Castle, met one of his tenants. 'Well, John,' said he, 'how is the boy?'

'He's well! sir.'

'How did you cure him?'

'I deluded him to your honour's bog.'

'And what did you do to him there?'

'I drowned him, your honour.'

'How was that?'

'I brought him to the edge of your honour's bog-hole and threw him in suddint, and leapt down upon him, and held him under the water till the last bubble was out of him, and he never since had a return of the complaint, glory be to God!'"

There is a subtle affinity between this story and that narrated earlier in the book, of the Dublin jobber who sold a diseased cow to the Protestant clergyman of a small parish. Compelled by the clergyman to take back the animal and refund the money, the man replied: "Don't be angry with me, your reverence, I'm only a lame boy, and have no way of livin' but by stratagem!" Thus murder and cheating lost their wickedness among these folk of lame minds and bodies.

The passage in this book which we should select as being the most humanly interesting is contained in a letter which Stokes wrote to his wife. It shows us the inside of a doctor's mind—his private tumults and ghastly regrets:

"My profession is on the whole not a depressing one to most men. Nor does its ordinary routine depress me. But when a death of importance happens, and some busy devil within you whispers that had you done something else the result would have been different, and when such an idea from your own weakness becomes fixed, then there is a misery produced which corrodes one's very vitals. The deaths of George Greene, of Curran, of Davis, and of McCullagh, struck me down heavily, for in my treatment of all these cases I feel something to regret. In many such instances the feeling is a mistaken one, for we fret for not having done that of which we had no knowledge we ought to have done; and if we do our best, why should we be dissatisfied. But still the feeling is irresistible, and comes over one like a winter cloud."

When we remember that the man who wrote these words was a perfectly trained and, by nature, a brilliantly equipped medical man—to whom the highest success came as by right—we shall see that Foley might find it "no easy task to give that mouth."

JEFFREYS RECONSIDERED.

The Life of Judge Jeffreys. By H. B. Irving, M.A. (Heinemann.)

INSENSIBLY, the popular conception of public men is coloured for posterity by the prejudices and predilections of their earliest biographers, and if they have had the misfortune to have been on a losing side and to have exercised the pens of victorious adversaries, then they must suffer for it accordingly for all time. Richard Crookback, as we know him, is the creation of Lancastrian chroniclers, and it is to the jaundice of Whig pamphleteers that Mr. Irving would trace the familiar but distorted features of that other bogey of childhood, "Judge" Jeffreys. Macaulay, Lord Campbell, and the rest who dish up once more the stale scandals of The Bloody Assizes, shall be arraigned at last before the bar of veracious history. Mr. Irving is a master of the use of depreciatory epithets; and throughout this interesting biography no opponent, personal or political, of Jeffreys is allowed for a moment to come upon the stage without some damnatory label affixed to his intellect or character, intended subtly to discredit the value to be attached to his evidence. The Norths (Francis and Roger), William Russell and Algernon Sidney, Lady Lisle, and the sufferers of the Western Circuit, each in turn must be bespattered in the interests of their rival or their persecutor. Seen thus, against a darkened background, instead of against the holy-stoned whiteness ascribed by Whiggish writers to Whiggish martyrs, even the lineaments of Jeffreys are bound, as Mr. Irving calculates, to appear less sable than of yore.

It need hardly be said that a biography of Jeffreys on these lines is extremely entertaining reading. Mr. Irving's ingenuity and audacity are astonishing and full of surprises. His narrative is lucidly and vigorously composed. And, after all, the falsification of portraiture is not serious, the whole design is so transparent. Occasionally, indeed, you have a lurking suspicion that the whole thing is meant as a huge jeu d'esprit. If so, Mr. Irving keeps it up uncommonly well, and never winks. He chooses to adopt the rôle of whitewasher. The attempt to make the worse appear the better cause pleases his histrionic and forensic instincts. He gravely lays stress on every trifle which may tell in Jeffreys's favour, and narrates his iniquities apologetically, if the case will strain to an apology, and otherwise without comment. But, after all, he is at bottom a serious historical student. He will put a false colour upon evidence, out of sheer gaiety of mind and delight in his own art; but he will not slur or withhold the evidence itself. Through the thin veils of his interpretative leniency, the bare facts of Jeffreys's career, on which after all history must form its judgment, are revealed clearly enough. And the resultant Jeffreys does not, after all, differ so much from the Jeffreys, say, of Macaulay, as might have been expected. Mr. Irving's substantive modifications in the traditional portrait rarely touch essentials. He proves that Jeffreys when young was more of a gentleman than Roger North cared to allow; he shows that his legal acquirements were not after all so despicable; he blows away some of the more irresponsible charges of vice that have gathered about his name. But he does not effectively minimise the judicial brutality that has made his name a byword; and he brings into a clearer light, if possible, than ever the shameless cynicism with which he sold himself to a foul cause, and prostituted the dignity of the bench to serve the necessities and aims of an unscrupulous and unpatriotic party.

PSYCHOLOGY AND ART.

Outlines of Descriptive Psychology. By George Trumbull Ladd. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

PROF. LADD is known in two very different capacities. He is a synthetic philosopher, who laid down in his Introduction to Philosophy a scheme of the philosophical sciences—a project to which his Philosophy of Mind and Philosophy of Knowledge may be regarded as contributions. On the other hand, he is a psychologist of some reputation, and, as is fitting in an American professor, an enthusiast for his science. His work is less widely known than that of Prof. James, for it has little of its racy humour and aptness of illustration. On the other hand, it is his peculiar merit that his claim for psychology is more modest than we have been taught to expect from a disciple of Münsterberg. In this work it is peculiarly so, perhaps for the reason that the book is avowedly a text-book. He defines the science as "the systematic description and explanation of the phenomena of consciousness as such"; and though one might object to the word "explanation," we are reassured when we find that the author uses it only in a rough and proximate sense. He is no bigoted champion of the "psychological laboratory" school, and he has the modesty to recognise the limits of his subject. "The ultimate nature of the mind," he says, "the reality of things, and the actuality of those causal relations which every one assumes to exist between things, are subjects for profound philosophical inquiry." Psychology takes the "naïve and common-sense point of view." It deals with an aspect of things; its results are abstract, in so far as they are not the whole truth. And in this recognition of limit lies the value of the science, and we are spared many painful efforts after a dogmatism which would reduce the world to the terms of a fraction of it, and explain away metaphysical theories by a wilful misunderstanding of their import.

But we are less concerned here with a review of Prof. Ladd's work than with a question which the reading of it has suggested. As one of the sources of psychology the author mentions "the artistic delineations of human mental life." "These," he says, "include the drama, poetry, and especially, at present, the novel, or prose romantic composition. All true art requires and displays insight into soul life. It is not, however, the so-called 'psychological' dramas or novels which ordinarily have most of genuine or valuable insight."

The question, indeed, is one which meets us on every hand. Of late years the "objective romance," as it is called, has gone out of critical esteem if not out of popular favour, and the world has gone a hankering after psychology in fiction. In the ordinary romance the chief figure, if he is done with skill, may be revealed to the reader "on the inside," but the other people must be mere shells and fragments. So the psychologically-minded novelist girds up his loins and sets himself to write little essays on each of his characters. If he have the gift of the thing he may analyse motives with a subtlety which is more than their desert, and exhibit simple folk passing through the most dazzling mental gyrations. If he be a novice he is reduced to mere crude invention. But the result in both cases is the same—work which may be clever, scientifically valuable, or even verbally exquisite, but work which is wholly beyond the true purpose of art.

Let us admit at once that there is a good deal of sense in the bitter cry of the psychologist. The first and indispensable requisite in fiction is the emotional or dramatic, but the second postulate—in great fiction at any rate—is that the drama be a spiritual one, and not merely the stirrup-and-bridle affair of the romancer. The psychologist, then, seeks the same end as the artist, but he is misled because he takes the wrong means to attain it.

He will tell you he aims at truth. Well, so does the artist, but there are truths and truths, and between them is a great gulf fixed. There is one truth for science and one truth for art, and this must be recognised. A man may compile a narrative of events from the daily papers, he may be able to give day and hour for every incident, and yet the whole may be crudely and palpably false. A police-court register is truth, even dramatic truth, but it is not the truth of the drama. Let us suppose that a novelist of enterprise and leisure started a psychological laboratory; that he deliberately experimented upon people whom he had chosen for his characters, chronicled their sensations, arrived inductively at some estimate of their mental processes, and set it all down in black and white. It would be extremely interesting from a scientist's point of view. It would be valueless as art unless qualities were added which bore no relation to the psychologist's note-book. But more—and this is the point we would insist on—the art of the thing (supposing the other qualities to be there) would be no whit improved by the elaborate results of the experiment. Truth is art's beginning and end, but it is independent of sums and formulæ. When, in a word, a scene, an action, a man's whole world is epitomised and made immortal—there we have the truth of art. The conflict between the two is the old antithesis between the dead letter and the spirit which lives.

But even the psychologist has his suspicion of a need for the dramatic and emotional, and he seeks to attain them by a careful choice of the milieu of his experiments. He runs blindly to the morbid and eccentric, and becomes a pathologist. Drama he certainly finds—of a kind; but he cuts himself further off than ever from the truth of art which "follows the main march of the human affections." "In psychology," says Prof. Ladd, "abnormal and pathological phenomena require expert investigation. Such investigation is often a fruitful source of psychological knowledge. Hence the value of studies in hypnotism, insanity, criminology, idiocy, for the science of psychology." Exactly; the fact of their abnormality being recognised and allowed for, the results can be made use of; but the unhappy novelist, whose genre forbids him to explain the limitations of his work, presents his results, which at the most have only a limited truth for science, as the essential truth of art. Nor is the spectral unreality of it redeemed by the false air of drama.

Art, when all is said, is a suggestion, and it refuses to be explained. Make it obvious, unfold it in detail, and you reduce it to a dead letter. In fiction the men and women who live in memory are not those who are analysed in sets of little essays. Take Major Pendennis, surely one of the most fully known inhabitants of the half-world of art. Thackeray had too much good sense to unfold his character in a chain of analyses; but in that supreme moment when the middle-aged man looks back upon his past, and feels that he is getting too old for wet fields and country houses, and that he has outlived his day—then the whole tragic comedy of the elderly butterfly's life is laid bare and clear before us. So, to take another instance, it is Scott's failures on whom he writes essays. His intolerable heroes are analysed from the inside as far as he was capable of such fatuity, but who shall say that Redgauntlet, or Monkarns, or Bailie Nicol Jarvie, or any one of the immortals, ever suffered such an indignity?

The truth, of course, is where the truth generally is, midway between two schools. On the one hand we demand a spiritual crisis, and on the other we declare that such a crisis cannot be represented for art by any barren analysis. The fashion is in vogue to-day, for a great writer, who has all the shining gifts of the artist, has this alien subtlety to perfection. The result is, that little mimics, who have none of the first and little of the second, ape not the artist's proper qualities, but his adventitious endowments. And when this has been done they defend themselves in the name of art, for "such is the excellent foppery of the world,"

HISTORY FOR SCHOOLS.

History of England for the use of Middle Forms in Schools. Part II.: From the Accession of Henry VIII. to the Revolution of 1689. By T. F. Tout, M.A. (Longmans.)

BOTH the writers, to whose collaboration this series is ultimately due, have added far too little to the copious stream of historical literature which pours year after year from almost every press. Prof. York Powell, who wrote Part I. of this series, is a notorious delinquent in this respect—perhaps no man has gained so great a reputation on so little positive performance. But if Prof. Tout does not make haste he will be amenable to the same serious charge. Hitherto, the Dictionary of National Biography has claimed a large share of his time. The present volume will not, of course, substantially enhance his fame as an historian. It is too slight and too much on the old familiar lines. But Prof. Tout is also a very successful teacher, and every page of this little book bears the impress of the trained lecturer. Clearness and accuracy of statement we should naturally expect in anything from the author's pen. An especially noticeable point is the stress laid upon Scotch and Irish history. The book is further equipped with a number of useful genealogies, both foreign and English, and with a set of maps which, considering their size and absence of distinguishing colours, may be pronounced almost unrivalled for their clearness. The map of Wales before Henry VIII.'s reforms (p. 135) seems to us an original contribution of considerable value. It very materially alters the ordinary conception of the extent and position of the Welsh Marches. In the letterpress technical terms and names are freely used, but always with careful explanations of their origin or import. We are not left to vague generalities. The facts are carefully chosen, and compactly and skilfully grouped and marshalled. In fact, despite the alleged rapidity of composition, everything has been done to make the little volume a first-rate text-book of the ordinary type.

We confess, however, that we are thoroughly discontented with the type of text-book from which English history is at present taught. The simple narrative form of treatment tends to give as much space to the small as to the important facts. The endeavour to cover the whole ground leaves no opportunity for the writer to be picturesque or even interesting. If we are to have a mass of facts presented to us, it would be equally enlightening and more useful for reference to find them tabulated in chronological order. Chronology is one thing, and a very important thing; but history is another thing altogether. Chronology in a narrative form is like plum-pudding from which the plums have been omitted. In justice to Prof. Tout, it should be said that he has added as many plums as the particular form of pudding allows. But full chronological tables should be supplementary to a narrative which would centre round crucial facts and periods in the life of a nation. Our ideal would be such as is attained in Mr. Wakeman's admirable History of the Church of England. It is a narrative, but it deliberately dwells, in considerable detail, on certain episodes, to the subordination, if not to the actual exclusion, of others of less significance. We are inclined also to resent the old-fashioned method of relegating the amount of constitutional, social, and literary history which seems fit to be inserted, to a separate chapter at the end of each period. It would seem more natural and educative to work these important matters into the texture of the general story; and such a treatment as has just been suggested would give ample opportunity for so doing. As things stand, these by-chapters, which Mr. Green would have called the history of the English people, run the risk of being omitted altogether.

But we do not look to see these ideas carried out at any early date. At present too many people are of the mind of the old Oxford don who met the proposition to found a School of Modern History with the scornful remark that "every gentleman knows history." Until even schoolmasters recognise that history is not merely an interesting branch of literature, but a scientific study, writers of historical text-books must be contented to turn out more or less accurate accounts, couched in strictly narrative form, of the doings of kings and parliaments and armies. Comment and criticism must be present in a strictly subordinate position.

SOME RECENT THEOLOGY.

The Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius in Syriac. By the late William Wright, LL.D., &c., and Norman McLean, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

A WELL-PRINTED book containing a Syriac version of Eusebius' Church History, compiled from a St. Petersburg and a British Museum MS. The variations between this and the Greek text usually current are few and unimportant, and the fact lends strength to Prof. Wright's conjecture quoted in the Preface, that "these books (he is speaking of this along with some other translations of Greek works) were translated into Syriac in the lifetime of the authors themselves, or very soon after." The regretted death of Prof. Wright occurred before the present volume was ready for the press, but his place has been worthily filled by his old pupil, Mr. McLean. Prof. Merx, of Heidelberg, contributes some valuable notes on the Armenian version, which was itself made from the Syriac and has been collated with the present text throughout.

St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. By Charles Gore, D.D., &c. (John Murray.)

A COMMENTARY on, or, as the author prefers to call it, a "practical exposition" of the Epistle. Canon Gore thinks that his text was not addressed to the Ephesians specially, but to the churches of Asia, "of which Ephesus was the chief." This epistle is remarkable among other things for the clearness with which it sets forth St. Paul's demonological beliefs — which were, of course, the popular ones of the time — and we therefore turn with interest to the pages in which Canon Gore handles them. He does so in no mincing terms. "There are," he tells us, "invisible rebel spirits. . . . These rebel wills are unseen by us and in most respects unknown, but they organise and give a certain coherence and continuity to evil in the world." And again, "St. Paul has no doubt at all that moral evil has its origin and spring in the dark background behind human nature — in the rebel wills of devils." This is plain speaking, and even if we do not agree with Canon Gore in his theory — for logical proof of which he seems to refer to personal experience only — we must all admire his candour in not fencing with the question. To avow openly so robust a doctrine in an age when, as he here says, "it has become customary to regard belief in devils or angels as fanciful and perhaps superstitious," requires courage which popular preachers do not always exhibit.

Studies in Texts. By Joseph Parker, D.D. (Horace Marshall & Son.)

VERY different from the last-named is this, the first of a series of volumes which will represent the most recent public discourses of this famous Nonconformist preacher, The People's Bible, twenty-six volumes of sermons having already been published. In his lecture, Ad Clerum, he strikes the keynote of a faith as sturdy as it is sincere:

"To my view, the Bible is a unit. One part belongs to another. One part explains another. . . . The parts of the temple come together most wonderfully, as if proportioned and fitted by the same architect. So wondrous is the effect on my own mind that if any teacher should explain the marvel by saying, 'Holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' I should accept the solution; my reason, my imagination and my heart would unite in exclaiming 'Lo, God is here, and I knew it not; this is none other than the word of God and this is the light of heaven!'"

The secret of Dr. Parker's success as a preacher appears plainly in these simple and direct studies.

Religious Pamphlets. Selected and Arranged by the Rev. Percy Dearmer, M.A. (Kegan Paul.)

HERE we have such well-known works as Knox's Monstrous Regiment of Women, Defoe's Shortest Way with Dissenters, and Swift's Abolishing of Christianity collected in one handy little volume, with an epitome of the Marprelate controversy, and specimens of Prynne and Bastwick's diatribes and of the milder method of Richard Baxter, George Fox, Sydney Smith and John Henry Newman. The following is godly Master Bastwick's account of the clergy of his time:

"And in those good pastors' and ministers' places — they have installed, foisted in and put priests secundum ordinem diaboli for the most part, such a generation of vipers, of proud, ungrateful, idle, wicked, and illiterate asses, and such profane scorners of all piety and goodness, and so beastly, lascivious and lecherous as no pretty wench can keep her honesty for them, and men of such conversation for the generality of them as they are not fit for civil society, and fellows so treacherous and perfidious as no man can be secure in their company. . . ."

In a learned and most readable introduction, Mr. Dearmer gives a clear history of religious pamphleteering in general, and of the circumstances under which the particular ones he has chosen came to be written. Here is a sentence worth remembering at a time when a revival of ritual prosecution seems possible:

"The growth of toleration has been very slow, and the belief in it confined at first to those who were persecuted. We cannot credit any sect or party with its possession, except those which never attained to power; we can only be certain that the idea has grown painfully from age to age, leaving each generation a little more tolerant than that which preceded it. Cromwell, for instance, was more genuinely tolerant than Elizabeth, but he could not extend his toleration to Anglicans and Papists; which meant, in fact, that he was tolerant to his fellow-Puritans, and to them only."

A book to be heartily recommended.

Aids to Bible Students. By Various Authors. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

IT was a happy thought of the Queen's Printers to reprint this Appendix to their "Variorum" Bible in a separate form. Here the student will find papers on such matters as the different versions of the Old and New Testaments, the Apocrypha, the ethnology of the Bible, and the daily life of the Hebrews and the nations among whom they were cast, together with well-executed illustrations from the monuments, a singularly complete concordance, and a small Bible atlas. The whole volume is more convenient, both in size and price, than the larger one of which it formerly made part, and forms in itself an excellent introduction to the study of Biblical archaeology. The names of the Rev. C. J. Ball as editor, and of Profs. Cheyne, Sayce, and Swete among the collaborators, are a guarantee that the work is trustworthy.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE MACMAHON; OR,
THE STORY OF THE SEVEN JOINS.

BY OWEN BLAYNEY.

Mr. Blayney informs us that he has sent a copy of his book to the American President, and the American President likes it. What more can author want? In connexion with this information it is amusing to find a character named McKinlay saying, "There's no dalin' wi' the Irish as ordinary mortals." The story is Irish through and through. The date is 1690 and thereabouts, and the book opens on the Battle of the Boyne. Thus does another of the characters speak: "Dthraw the cork, Colonel, if ye please; dthraw the cork this blessed minit; I don't mane on paper, but out av the jar. Be the piper that played afore Moses, I'll back that dthrawin' agin the best copperplate that Petty—a rogara maddhu ruah—iver laid down in his Down Survey," and so on. Arrah, but 'ts a pathriotic buk intoirely. (Constable. 351 pp. 6s.)

THE RENUNCIATION OF HELEN.

BY LEADER SCOTT.

Mr. Lang will not like this book. For why? Because of the Dorset dialect in it. "Well, zir, I were agoin' auver to Wynchford to see poor wold bedridden Harriet Taylor"—that is the kind of thing. But the dialect is only a detail; the story is of quiet, middle-class life, and misunderstandings, love, and self-communings eke it out. Also it has a music-publisher, whose "face gave one an idea of a knobby pear." We are glad to see the attention of novelists at last drawn to music-publishers; the ordinary variety of publisher has been fair game for long enough. (Hutchinson. 398 pp. 6s.)

THE OLD ADAM AND THE NEW EVE.

BY RUDOLF GOLM.

A translation from the German by Edith Fowler, with an introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse, showing that Germany hath her New Women no less than England. In the author's own preface (for we come to the author after a while) he says: "I had no intention of writing a novel with a purpose, a 'Tendenzroman'! I wanted to represent the fate of a woman, who, standing at the turning-point of two epochs, experiences in her own person all the tragedy involved in transition." The particular new Eve's name is Kütthe; the old Adam's, Herr von Buggenrieth. (Heinemann. 250 pp. 2s. 6d.)

ONE OF NATURE'S GENTLEMEN.

BY ALEX. SURTEESE.

There are tokens that Alex. is a woman. On the first page we meet with a "spaniel dog." There is also a Sir Geoffrey Vane. There is also a house called The Cedars. Furthermore, there is a Lady Victoria Scudamore. And when a man is killed in a point-to-point race it is said of him that "he has gone to meet a greater Judge than any here." This is the last sentence: "'You know,' he added, slapping the man's shoulder good-naturedly, 'we all, sooner or later, have to bow before the shrine of Love.'" (Digby & Long. 321 pp. 6s.)

COUNTESS PETROVSKI.

BY ORME AGNUS.

Here we are offered a peep behind the veil of Imperial politics. A baron and the bewitching countess, intrigue and frustration: these ingredients make up an entertaining story, which the author is at great pains in a dull introduction to persuade us to believe true. As if it mattered! Among the characters is Lord Salisbury, of whose conversational manners this is a specimen: "And now, Mr. Sollache," said the Marquis with a kindly smile, "just one more question—have you dined? . . . Then you shall dine with us. No—no excuses. . . . My valet shall take you to a dressing-room and give you a cup of tea. Dinner is at seven, and I should advise an easy chair and a cigar until that hour." (Ward, Lock. 184 pp. 1s.)

HIDDEN WITCHERY.

BY NIGEL TOURNEUR.

The witchery is hidden under a strange style, and an alleged symbolism. The stories are mostly eighteenth century, but we have scenes like this: "Now the maid appeared, and, drawing forth a cover-table made of ebony inlaid with silver Arabic symbols, set it between us, and put thereon divers dishes; amongst others, pasties of peacocks' hearts and tongues of jays, confections of candied quinces, and pomegranates were brought; and ruddy pomewater, and sugared poperin abed to red roseleaves. All had a luscious flavour, soon cloying the appetite; so that both but toyed with the dainty fare." We are not inclined to do more than toy with Mr. Tourneur's pages. (Leonard Smithers. 244 pp. 4s.)

AS A MAN LIVES.

BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

Three people, Bruce Deville, Adelaide Fortress, and Mr. Ffolliott, the new curate in charge of a small village, have "pasts." Bruce Deville is unkempt and unapproachable, and takes his dogs about the moor, Adelaide Fortress lives alone on his estate, Mr. Ffolliott trembles, and his daughter, the heroine, wonders and waits. On page 177, her father is saying to her, "Very soon you may know, but not yet—not yet——." (Ward, Lock & Co. 304 pp. 6s.)

THE WHITE-HEADED BOY.

BY GEORGE BARTRAM.

This is a biography in novel form, the hero being one Edmund Clancy Mullens, a friend of the author, known to him for many years as "Rory." Rory was a character, "ready to cheer and stand by Grattan and Emmett, or to carry a pike at the heels of Lord Edward." A hot-hearted southern Irishman was Rory. He used to say, when he wished to excuse himself, "There must be men of all kinds in this world." (T. Fisher Unwin. 228 pp. 6s.)

TOLD IN THE COFFEE HOUSE.

COLLECTED AND DONE INTO ENGLISH BY CYRUS ADLER AND ALLAN RAMSAY.

Mr. Adler explains that he heard these stories told in coffee-houses in Constantinople, where turbaned Turks sat cross-legged smoking nargilehs and chibooks, and sipping coffee. When an argument arose someone would try to settle it by relating a story to illustrate his view. Many of the stories are adaptations from Arabic and Persian literature with a new Turkish setting. (Macmillan & Co. 174 pp. 3s.)

DOWN OUR WAY.

BY MARY JAMESON JUDAH.

Nine stories of Southern and Western American character. (Chicago: Way & Williams. 266 pp.)

THE YOUNG QUEEN OF HEARTS.

BY EMMA MARSHALL.

The Queen of Hearts is Princess Elizabeth. Mrs. Marshall has followed history closely, using Mrs. Everett Green's Lives of the Princesses of England as her authority. The characters are mostly historical.

THE FOREST LOVERS.

BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

"My story," says the author, "will take you into times and spaces alike rude and uncivil. Blood will be spilt, virgins suffer distresses; the horn will sound through woodland glades; dogs, wolves, deer, and men, Beauty and the Beasts, will tumble each other, seeking life or death with their proper tools. There should be mad work, not devoid of entertainment." There should. (Macmillan & Co. 384 pp. 6s.)

BATES AND HIS BIOCYCLE.

BY FRED WHISHAW.

This volume, says the author, "possesses neither plot nor moral . . . it appeals only to those men and those women who have fallen off a bicycle." A large constituency! (James Bowden. 133 pp.)

PHILIPPI THE GUARDSMAN.

BY T. R. THRELFALL.

A romance of Napoleon's march to Moscow and the tragedy of the Grand Army. (Ward, Lock & Co. 302 pp. 6s.)

THE CHRONICLES OF MR. POTTERSBY. BY JAY HICKORY WOOD.

By the author of The Cricket Club of Red Nose Flat! (James Bowden. 154 pp.)

SCRIBES AND PHARISEES.

BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

Mr. Le Queux has turned from great wars and weird adventures to literary London, whereof this story treats. It is dedicated "To my brother 'Vagabonds'—those merry Bohemians," &c. Among Mr. Le Queux's obiter dicta we note this: "To the popular author, as to the actor, advertisement is everything in these degenerate days of boom and bunkum." (F. V. White & Co. 304 pp. 6s.)

A MAORI MAID.

BY H. V. VOGEL.

When a man's marriage is only his marriage, and his love is unreturned, he is face to face with temptation. And if he lives in New Zealand the temptation may be a Maori woman. It was so with John Anderson, who stooped to drink of the cup. "The first taste was passion, the last was punishment and penitence." For details see this story. (C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 400 pp. 6s.)

THE LOOMS OF TIME.

BY MRS. HUGH FRASER.

The Prologue tells how Spaniards died among the Cordilleras and left their bones and battered helmets in a cave. The story which follows is modern and charming—Mrs. Edmondson, the mysterious passenger on the ss. Corotaxi, fascinates the reader—and in the course of the pleasant love tale the principal characters find the battered helmets and skulls aforesaid. (Isbister & Co. 295 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

The Londoners. By Robert Hichens.
(Heinemann.)

On the title-page of this story Mr. Hichens assures us that it is "an absurdity"; and as it is the business of an absurdity to be absurd, we have no right to complain that it is a farce and not a comedy. Yet there is so much excellent comedy, especially in the first fifty pages, that we cannot help feeling a touch of annoyance when the author lands us into rough-and-tumble farce, and invites us to laugh because a footman, who is an ill-disguised detective, drops aspic into the Duchess's corsage. The story may be described as a sort of inverted "Charley's Aunt"; for Chloe Van Adam, being an American divorcée—though innocent—and wanting to get into London Society, masquerades as her own husband, while Mrs. Verulam, her friend, wanting to get out of Society, determines to compromise herself with the supposed Mr. Van Adam. For Mr. James Bush has inspired her with a longing for a peaceful country life. Here is an example of Mr. Hichens's frivolous vein. Mrs. Verulam is talking to Chloe, who is in bed. Marriner, the well-informed maid, is reading her pocket Schopenhauer:

"Chloe plunged on her pillows so as to get a clearer view of her friend's face, on which she fixed her sparkling, boyish eyes with a merciless scrutiny.

'Ah,' she said, 'now tell me all about him. Who is he? What is he? Where is he?'

Mrs. Verulam clasped Chloe's hand on the quilt softly.

'Chloe,' she said, 'he is a man!'

'I gathered that. Very few women are called James.'

'That's not enough. It is not a christening that makes a man; it is life.'

The faithful Marriner looked up from her pocket Schopenhauer with respectful appreciation of this reasoned truth.

'Well, then, what life does he lead?' cried Chloe.

'A life of wholesome labour, of silent communion with the earth—a life devoid of frivolity and devoted to meditation and sheep and bees and things of that kind.'

The conclusion was a little vague, but the intention to praise was obvious, and Chloe was deeply interested.

'Meditation, sheep, bees,' she repeated—'isn't all that what is called small culture?'

'Oh, indeed, there is nothing small about James Bush,' explained Mrs. Verulam. 'Oh no! He is immense, powerful, calm! He is my idea of Agag!'

The faithful Marriner again glanced up. The word 'Anak' trembled upon her well-informed lips, but respect for her mistress held her mum. Only a slight rustle betrayed the thrill of deep learning that ran through her.

'Really!' said Chloe. 'Go on, dear.'

'I met James Bush in the country at a time when I was just beginning fully to feel the emptiness of Society.'

'Emptiness! Oh, how can you!'

'I remember our first meeting so well,' Mrs. Verulam continued with a soft rapture of romance. 'He came towards me with his head in a sort of meat safe, holding in his strong hands the lid of a saucepan, upon which he beat with a wooden spoon with all his might and main.'

Chloe sat up in bed and gasped.

'But why—why was he dressed so?' she asked.

'To protect him in his duties.'

'What duties—among the sheep?'

'No—oh, no! He was swarming bees. Ah, how beautifully he swarms! If only these London creatures who call themselves men could see him!'

'I didn't know one person could swarm alone before. Go on, dear. Did he raise his meat-safe to you?'

'No. He took no notice of me at all, except to tell me to get out of the way. That struck me directly. It was so different from what a London man would do.'

'I should say so. Gracious!'

'It was only afterwards that we talked, and that I learned what a man's life can and should be.'

She glowed tenderly, and Chloe's suspicions were confirmed. She shuffled on the sheet towards her friend, and whispered in her right ear:

'Daisy, you're in love with Mr. Bush!'

Mr. Hichens knows his way about Society, and is quick to note its foibles and its meannesses. Mr. Rodney, the man about town, is excellent; so, too, is the Duchess, who does not mind staying with Mrs. Verulam at Ascot, though she fully intends to cut her when the race week is over. But the boisterous farce of the closing scenes in the palace of the Bun-Emperor is a little disappointing after the admirable comedy of the opening pages.

* * * *

Bijli the Dancer. By James Blythe Patton. With Six Illustrations by Horace Van Ruith. (Methuen & Co.)

In Mr. Patton's romance of Northern India, the mem-sahib, the sporting subaltern, the grass widow, and the dialect-talking British soldier have no share. There is not a single white-face in the book, and scarcely a reference to the British Raj, the shadow of which, however, falls naturally across the story. The author has followed no ancient models, and is to be complimented on his success. The story, untainted by melodrama, is written with what seems to us a complete knowledge of Oriental life and of native Indian customs in all classes. In fact, the Eastern setting of the story leaves nothing to be desired, and, perhaps, not quite enough to the imagination. Mr. Patton's novel is so very Eastern that the Western reader loses his way in it. The Oriental atmosphere will be a little too much for some, and the suspended interest, which is necessary in a work of fiction, is occasionally lost amid the novelty of the surroundings. For Bijli the Dancer is not a book to be skimmed. Its fate will be to be read carefully by the curious and to be thrown aside by the superficial, who will be choked off by the Indian names.

The impression left, however, is most creditable to Mr. Patton's talent. He describes the Eastern world he evidently knows so well with singular sympathy and the widest knowledge, and the pictures he gives us are picturesque, striking, and occasionally very pathetic, especially in the murder of Kasim and his lover. The description of Bijli's dance and song before the Nawab is excellently done:

"The torches, which had been raised and lowered in the cadence of the music, were now held on high, and for a moment the instruments were silent. The tall dancer stood forward alone, and a love song of Hafiz burst from her lips in passionate tones, the liquid of the Persian verse pouring in long interlacing harmonies through a melody suggestive of despairing love."

The song itself is prettily rendered from the Persian poet. The following are the first and third verses:

"When I whispered a prayer to entreat
But a glance, 'twas in vain;
When I fell on the path at his feet
I was spurned with disdain.

"As the torch at the dawn sinks its fire
In the breeze's caress,
I await his approach to expire
In the waft of his dress."

The story is simple and the plot slight and natural. Mr. Patton has represented native life as it appears to a European when he is sufficiently saturated in Oriental literature and customs to understand its significance. The human interest is well sustained. Bijli is an artist; the struggle between the love awakened by the Pathan nobleman and her love for her art is well described; her final parting with him is a touching piece of picturesque comedy; the tragic story of Kasim and Muntazan is dramatically related by Jamiran, the old woman who brought them together. The characters of the Nur Hasan, the headman of Gambira and of Nasrat Ali, his enemy, are well drawn, and the Oriental tact with which the nobleman deals with the two claimants for his assistance is cleverly suggested. As a vivid picture of Indian life, Bijli the Dancer deserves the attention which it can hardly fail to attract.

* * * *

Where the Trade-Wind Blows: West Indian Tales.
By Mrs. Schuyler Crowninshield.
(Macmillan & Co.)

THIS is a collection of short stories of West Indian life, in which the same people and the same places occur repeatedly. The British or American farmer, peon workmen, half-cast women, priests, inn-keepers, Spanish doctors, and Scotch traders are some of the company who play parts in the little dramas of the book. "Candace," "A Christmas Surprise," and "Paul's Orange Grove" are variations upon the eternal theme which Mr. Rudyard Kipling used once and for all in his "Without Benefit of Clergy"—the relations of the white man to his informal half-caste wife. The author knows the emotional use of weather and landscape, and there is truth and skill in the use of this dark background to the tragedy of unrequited love.

"A violent rain began to fall while Emmanuel was speaking. The mist began to fade away, for a wind was sweeping down from the mountains and, like a pair of strong hands, was rolling the thick white blanket over and over, leaving the valley bare and green behind. Emmanuel's voice had for accompaniment the scattering patter of great drops of silver; molten bullets they seemed as they dropped upon the broad fan-like banana leaves and bounded thence to the ground."

There is one grim little study in human inconsistency, "Anastasio's Revenge," in which a peon sets out light-heartedly to murder a man who has robbed him, finds him dying of thirst in the bush, tries to save him at the risk of his own life, and nurses him till he dies in his arms. Indeed, it is a charming inconsequent life which Mrs. Crowninshield tells of, a place where every one talks casually of murder and yet loves his neighbour sincerely, the happy home of cock fights, bull fights, anarchy, and easy morals. Most of the tales turn upon irregular love; "Flandreau," for example, is a wonderful and tragic sketch of marriage in the island mode. But some are bits of pure adventure, such as "Willie Baker's Good Sense," and finally there are two delightful studies of children. The "Value of a Banana Leaf" is a faithful account of the disreputable doings of the little Cristina who robbed the thieves of their stolen goods, and the small Tomacito who cried libertad all the day; and in "Plumero the Good" we hear of the doings of an island Tom Sawyer, one Little Arnel. Here is the tale of Cristina's soliloquies in the underwood when she is spying on the thieves and pretending to be asleep:

"They strolled up the river bank and came upon the child.
'That girl of Felipe's, the brat!' said Francisco.
'The stocks for thee,' said Cristina to herself.
'How she sleeps! Could she have heard, Francisco?'
'No! If I thought she had heard, I should pitch her into the river.'
'Also the cep', Francisco.' Cristina could think without moving her lips.

'Poor child! The sun is hot,' said Cito Mores. He bent a broad green banana leaf above her head.

'Thou shalt not go into the stocks,' resolved Cristina.
'Mercedes, her mother, is a devil,' said Cito Mores.
'Thou shalt go in the stocks and the cep' also,' whispered Christina.
'The child is also bad; I could not trust her,' said Francisco.
'For thee the cep', the stocks and some lashes on the bare back,' sentenced the listener.
'Not so bad,' argued Cito Mores; 'she bound up my leg when I fell through the bridge at Rojo Piedra.'
'No prison, no lashes; the cep' for only one day,' decided this vacillating judge."

It is a very curious and entertaining collection, full of humour, vigorous narrative, and some power over the pathetic. To be sure, some of the tales lack art, beginning nowhere and ending in the middle; for the author knows the reality of the life better than the tricks of her craft. But, failing the highest technical skill, we would any day choose uncouth wealth before a meagre and barren neatness.

PHYSICAL EXERCISE FOR WRITERS.

THIS is the subject of an interesting article by Mr. Philip G. Hubert, Jun., in The Bookbuyer. It is certain that no writer can afford to neglect physical exercise; and in England most writers, we think, are given to it. But there is always a danger of exercising irregularly, as weather or circumstances vary; and in most cases daily exercise could be made more a matter of conscience with advantage. Mr. Hubert writes:

"My friend, Mr. William Blaikie, the well-known lawyer and author of that valuable little text-book, How to Get Strong and Stay So, used to preach to me years ago the advisability of exercising with light dumb-bells and punching a leather bag every morning before breakfast in order to counteract the evil effects of desk work in a newspaper office. And for some months, and even years, I did try to give from five to ten minutes every morning—when I happened to think of it—to lifting dumb-bells up and down. I went further. I spent a good many dollars upon a sort of bedroom gymnastic apparatus of straps and weights, warranted to make a new man of whoever used it faithfully for five years. I kept up the prescribed exercises, more or less faithfully, for about a year; whether I became a new man, or a fifth of a new man, I cannot say. My next experiment in this direction was the purchase of what was called a lifting machine, an apparatus that came into vogue at about the same time as blue glass as a sure cure for all our ills, and disappeared about as quickly. Every morning for months I put myself into a sort of harness and lifted enormous weights. The professor of physical culture from whom I bought this lifting machine declared that my strap apparatus was slowly killing me.

'It's a wonder you are alive,' he said, when I told him what I had been accustomed to do.

After a few months of lifting, when I felt that another brick, added to the fifteen or twenty already in the machine, would be equivalent to the camel's last straw, I met another professor who urged me to try his patent rowing machine. He looked at my lifting machine, and declared it was a wonder I was still alive.

All this was a good many years ago, and I still live. Probably each and all of the gentlemen from whom I bought devices for making me a Hercules would declare that it was solely due to their inventions that I have so far escaped the grave. Perhaps they are right. Nevertheless, while it is now ten or fifteen years since I have touched a dumb-bell, or a lifting-machine, or punched a leather bag filled with sawdust, my general health is probably better than it was twenty years ago. At the same time, I am a fanatic believer in exercise. I am quite sure that without lots of walking, life would be a misery to me. Far better give up your dinner than your five-mile walk if you want to be well and keep well, is the result of my twenty years' study of the matter. For a number of years during which I was tied down to city work, my invariable rule, except in very stormy weather, was to walk from my home to my office, which was nearly four miles, and often back again, making eight miles for the day. When in the country I take my regular daily walk at half-past eleven, going five miles before dinner at one o'clock. Then in the afternoon, when the wheeling is good, I supplement this with eight or ten miles on the wheel. In hot weather the regular walk is given up in favour of sailing and a surf bath, with wheeling in the afternoon.

By walking, I mean walking, not sauntering. Slow walking is the most exhausting and demoralising apology for exercise I know. In my humble judgment the daily walk for a man of average strength should not exceed six miles in distance, and should be done inside of an hour and a half. The pace must be brisk enough to set the blood a-going and the lungs pumping. It was Mr. Bryant who first called my attention, or, as I have mentioned Mr. Bryant, let me say 'directed,' my attention to the value of walking—he never allowed the use of 'called' for 'directed'; it was one of the words in the Index Expurgatorius that he prepared for the use of writers upon the Evening Post. Mr. Bryant practised what he preached. I have in my scrap-book the following letter:

'New York, March 30, 1871.

To Joseph H. Richards, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR,—I promised some time since to give you some account of my habits of life, so far at least as regards diet, exercise, and occupations. I am not sure that it will be of any use to you, although the system which I have for many years observed seems to answer my purpose very well. I have reached a pretty advanced period of life without the usual infirmities of old age, and with my strength, activity, and bodily faculties generally, in pretty good preservation. How far this may be the effect of my way of life, adopted long ago and steadily adhered to, is perhaps uncertain.

I rise early; at this time of the year about half-past five: in summer, half an hour or even an hour earlier. Immediately, with very little encumbrance of clothing, I begin a series of exercises, for the most part designed to expand the chest and at the same time call into action all the muscles and articulations of the body. These are performed with dumb-bells, the very lightest, covered with flannel; with a pole, a horizontal bar, and a light chair swung around my head. After a full hour, and sometimes more, passed in this manner, I bathe from head to foot. When at my place in the country, I sometimes shorten my exercises in the chamber, and going out, occupy myself for half an hour or more in some work which requires brisk exercise. After my bath, if breakfast be not ready, I sit down to my studies till I am called.

After breakfast I occupy myself for a while with my studies, and then, when in town, I walk down to the office of the Evening Post, nearly three miles distant, and, after about three hours, return, always walking, whatever be the weather or the state of the streets. In the country, I am engaged in my literary tasks till a feeling of weariness drives me out into the open air, and I go upon my farm or into the garden and prune the fruit trees, or perform some other work about them which they need, and then go back to my books. I do not often drive out, preferring to walk.—I am, sir, truly yours,

W. C. BRYANT.

When the elevators in the Evening Post building broke down and all the employees upon the editorial departments of the paper had to climb nine flights of stairs several times every day, Mr. Bryant was the only one who did not groan over the hardship. He thought so little of climbing to the top of the building, even at the age of eighty-three, that unless the elevator was waiting when he arrived he would trot, not walk, up the whole nine flights, and this after his three-mile walk from home. . . .

For those unfortunates who do not know how to walk and will not learn, walking being a lost art to most of us Americans, and especially to our women, and for those to whom rowing and riding are out of the question, the dumb-bells, the parallel bars, and the punching bag recommended by all teachers of gymnastics, are of course excellent and perhaps absolutely essential to all men who would keep their bodies in condition for good work. A bedroom gymnasium is the easiest thing in the world to fit up. Two small cleats screwed into the jambs of a doorway will support a bar at such a height that a person can get arm exercise by raising the body up till the chin reaches the bar. From a small hook in the ceiling can be suspended a leather bag filled with sawdust for punching or boxing purposes. Ten or fifteen minutes' work with a good heavy bag, and then a cold bath, might suffice for the morning exercise of most people. The arrangement of weights attached to straps running over pulleys can be bought anywhere, and, according to experts, offers an admirable exercise for developing the arms and chest. The fact that one exercises sufficiently every day to set the whole body in a tingle, the lungs pumping and the blood coursing, is probably of more importance than the particular kind of exercise. The great advantage of walking and wheeling over all bedroom gymnastics is to me that the outside air is better, and that there is apt to be more mental recreation in a walk than in lifting dumb-bells in one's bedroom, where the air may not be quite pure, and where the scenery is certainly not stimulating."

"NUMBER THREE."

THE editor of the Conservator, a paper published in Philadelphia to the glory of Walt Whitman, welcomes poems after the manner of Whitman, and, no doubt, "Number Three," by Mr. Crosby, was very welcome to the Conservator's readers:

"Here I am in the station lunchroom, standing at the counter and eating what supper I may while our locomotive is drinking at the pump.

I have my eye on the thickset greybearded conductor perched on a stool opposite me, for I know that I am safe so long as he does not move.

In his blue cloth and brass buttons, and with the carnation in his buttonhole, he is as dignified as an admiral, and far more useful.

He is talking with the girl who waits on him, but there is a quiet reserve and sense of strength beneath the surface which show that he feels the panting of his iron charge outside.

He and the girl are on an easy footing, as befits co-operators in the great work of transportation.

I like the pride and comradeship of these railroad people.

Even the women who were washing car windows at the Grand Central Station this afternoon seemed conscious of a joint interest in the whole line and of the fact that these were no common panes of glass.

The newsboy on the way up stalked through the train as if it was his quarterdeck, and he was acknowledged by the conductor and brakemen as a man of consideration.

Their looks seemed to say, We are members one of another.

A whistle sounds from the north. 'There's "Number Three,"' whispers to her neighbour the aproned damsel who presides over my repast—and she quietly glides to the door.

I follow her, fearing unreasonably that my portmanteau may somehow go off without me.

I am just in time to see the dazzling headlight of the Western Express burst forth from the cutting with a thundering roar like a mad monster in a nightmare.

The bell on the engine rings out deafeningly, the platform fairly shakes, and the rush of wind almost carries away my hat.

There is a glimpse of the glowing faces of the engineer and the fireman at their volcanic hearth.

The heavy mail cars and then the unwieldy sleepers, giving gleams of electric light and upholstery, plunge by us into the darkness.

On the last platform I see a trainman waving his handkerchief at me above the bloodshot bull's-eye lamp in the rear.

But no, it is for the girl, whom I had well-nigh forgotten.

She waves her napkin and looks smiling after the apparition until it is swallowed up in the night like a stone in a black pool.

Now she is again in her place at the counter.

In a half-minute she has contributed her share of sentiment to 'Number Three' and to the great iron system of which it forms a part.

She has helped knit together the numerous band of the comrades of the road.

What would not Wagner have given could he have chained this dragon, 'Number Three,' with its rush and roar and romance, to his art?

It is our turn now to dash along, ponderous and rumbling, to the north.

The conductor has descended from his pinnacle and I follow him out to the train.

I am proud to be borne on my way by these railway workers and to be fed by them, though the eggs be hard and the doughnuts harder.

As I sit in my seat, looking out at the shadows flying by, I wonder why we cannot run our world as they do theirs.

We only need the same esprit de corps, which, when exalted and extended, we call religion.

Is our orbit less worthy of it than the steel rails of the Central Road?"

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1898.

No. 1359, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .               | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom. . . . .                | 0 15 3  | 0 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Office: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

AS we go to press the mind of the civilised world is in that bedroom over the terrace at Hawarden Castle where Mr. Gladstone lies dead. More than once he snatched moments from a busy life to be kind to us—to this journal. He gave the ACADEMY, it will be remembered, a ready permission to publish a curious little chapter of his autobiography as a book-collector. Now and again it was our privilege to send him new books which we thought might interest him—not without trepidation, lest this gleaner and gladiator in so many fields should consider such attentions supererogatory. But no! He was always grateful, always ready to say how he was sure he would profit by such and such a book. He is dead:

“ Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame; nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.”

MR. GLADSTONE has published books and pamphlets for sixty years, and the list which appears under his name in the British Museum Catalogue fills twenty-two pages. It must be understood, of course, that many of these entries are republished speeches, and that many more represent replies to and attacks on Mr. Gladstone by his opponents in Church and State. Mr. Gladstone's purely literary works are not very numerous. The list is, roughly, as follows:

Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age, 1858.
Eccæ Homo (critique on Prof. Seeley's work), 1868.

Juventus Mundi: the Gods and Men of the Homeric Age, 1869.

Homeric Synchronism: an Enquiry into the Time and Place of Homer, 1876.

Gleanings of Past Years. At intervals during the last few years.

Landmarks of Homeric Study, 1890.

The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture, 1890-92.

A Translation of Horace, 1894.

Butler's Works (edited), 1896.

Studies Subsidiary to the Works of Bishop Butler, 1896.

Mr. Gladstone's first book, The State in its Relations with the Church (1838) was reviewed by Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review.

MR. G. W. CABLE's first reading, in Mrs. Barrie's drawing-room, last Tuesday afternoon, delighted his audience. To be accurate, it was not a reading at all, but a dramatic recitation, in the late Mr. Brandram's manner; but Mr. Cable allows himself a greater latitude in emotion and gesture. It was his own work he recited (scenes from Dr. Sevier); he felt it strongly, and he communicated the thrill to his audience. For properties Mr. Cable allowed himself a book and a handkerchief, and he used them only for the Widow Riley—the book as a fan, the handkerchief for her Irish tears. The text itself was in the author's head. Neat, sincere, and gay is his literary style; neat his manner; and neat, intimate, and mobile is his method of delivery. He passes easily from the lightest of light comedy to the imminent tragedy of battle. But best of all his characters he loves to put on the flexible, caressing voices that go with the short-stepping nimble movements of his own Creoles. Mr. Cable's rendering of the quaint, cunning utterances of the matchless Narcisse was comedy at its best, and “Mary's Night Ride” was admirable narrative tragedy. In fact, the hour and a half's traffic with Dr. Sevier called up so many delightful reminiscences that at least one of the audience went away hot-foot to the Kensington bookshops. But none of them had Dr. Sevier in stock, or, indeed, any of Mr. Cable's books; which must be remedied. Perhaps some publisher will give us Mr. Cable's works on the Edinburgh Stevenson model.

IN appearance Mr. Cable is slim and slight, with a high, broad forehead. He wears a bristling gray moustache, and might be mistaken for a military man were it not for the sensitive play of expression of his features. Not the least interesting incident of the afternoon was his rendering of a story told by a Creole woman to a child; and his crooning of a Creole song.

ALL who care for fine literature and fine acting should make a note of the two other readings Mr. Cable will give in London—at Bay Tree Lodge, Froggnal, to-day (Saturday), and at 88, Portland-place, next Wednesday.

CRITICS rarely disagree so thoroughly as do the reviewers of the Spectator and the Daily Chronicle in dealing with Mr J. C. Tarver's recent book, Debatable Claims: Essays on Secondary Education. These gentlemen do not even agree on the title of the book, for whereas the Chronicle reviews it under the above title, the Spectator calls it The Debatable Land. And their judgments on Mr. Tarver's work conflict curiously:

THE SPECTATOR.

THE CHRONICLE.

“It may be doubted whether during recent years there has been published a more important or suggestive book dealing with secondary education than this volume of essays by Mr. Tarver.

Mr. Tarver is an unhelpful writer.

Apart from the importance of the subject matter, the style will be found specially attractive.

As shingle is distressing to the feet of the walker, so is Mr. Tarver's style distressing to the mind of the reader.

Mr. Tarver has opinions of his own, and does not hesitate to give expression to them.

Of definite suggestions, of even a presentment of existing needs, he is singularly chary.

There is something very like ‘the vanished hand’ of Matthew Arnold in such a passage as this, which appears in the ‘Epistle Dedicatory’ to Archdeacon Sinclair . . .

The ‘Epistle Dedicatory’ (the very term ‘epistle dedicatory’ sends a shudder of apprehension through the reader's frame) opens in most alarming fashion. . . . It is simply terrible. It is like bad soup.”

This divergence of opinion is but another proof of the way in which Education sets the educated by the ears.

TOWARDS the end of the annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund last Tuesday (the 108th anniversary dinner) there was a breath of wind that blew a little colour into a cheek or two. The Duke of Devonshire, who is clearly not an omnivorous reader of Belles Lettres or of our Fiction Guide, said in his speech that in art and literature we were not further advanced than the men of 2,000 years ago; or to quote his own words:

“I am tempted to ask the elementary question, Why should the writing of books be encouraged, and the demand for modern literature be stimulated? But a clear and broad distinction may be drawn between science on the one hand, and art and literature on the other. It may be that modern brains are better than those of old times, but science at least is progressive, and new methods and increased certitude and accuracy have assuredly been obtained. The knowledge of the forces of nature is ever increasing, and the limits of the science of the future can by no forecast be determined. The same thing, probably, cannot be said of literature and art, and it may be that we are no further than the men of 2,000 years ago.”

As there were many friends of modern authors, and students of Shakespeare, Dante, Velasquez, and Rembrandt present, it can well be believed that this utterance provoked some dissenting cries. The incident passed; but the noble chairman remembered, and when some hours later he responded to Lord Crewe's excellent speech proposing his health, the Duke referred with considerable animation to the cries of dissent, and repeated the charge, but he hedged a little about the period. The 2,000 years dropped to 1,000, and then hopped back to 2,000. The final phrasing was 2,000 or 1,000.

THE best comment on Mr. Bryce's speech concerning the need for cheap literature, at the Booksellers' Dinner, comes from a Birmingham firm. "Mr Bryce," writes our correspondent, "spoke of a general lowering of prices; it is instructive to note that his Holy Roman Empire was first issued at 6s. The second edition was 9s.; the third, 7s. 6d.; and this was followed by a library edition at 14s."

A REMARKABLE piece of editing reaches us from Christiana: the first of a series of commentaries upon English books chosen for use as school readers. The work to which this honour has fallen is Thackeray's Book of Snobs, and the editor is Mr. H. Eitrem, for whose desire to be thorough we have nothing but praise. In aiming, however, at thoroughness he has fallen into temptation, and the result is the most extraordinary collection of unnecessary fact and fancy. Thackeray, for example, in chapter iii., refers to a marchioness who in her memoirs complains of being brought into contact "with all sorts and conditions of people." The note is: "All Sorts and Conditions of Men is a novel by Besant. This current expression is borrowed from the Book of Common Prayer," and so on. In the same chapter Thackeray mentions Pall Mall. "Pall Mall," says the note, runs "from Haymarket to Trafalgar Square." Similarly, Baker-street is said to run "from Regent's Park to Hyde Park."

In chapter xi. Thackeray alludes to "Noah in his cups." Mr. Eitrem explains: "i.e., drunk." And when at the end of the same chapter Thackeray speaks of "poor old Polly Rabbits, who has her thirteenth child," the young Scandinavian is informed that "rabbits are very teeming animals." "Diddlesex" is a "pun upon Middlesex very often found in Thack's works." (Thackeray, by the way, is always Thack., such is the editor's hurry.) "Sir West," a mysterious authority from whom quotations now and then are made, turns out to be Sir Algernon West, just as the "Mr. Leslie" who married Thackeray's second daughter turns out to be Mr. Leslie Stephen. A "gig whip" is explained to be "a whip used in driving a gig." We have, it is true, picked out deliberately some of the less sensible notes, but the book, though informing enough now and then, is a good specimen of hyper-editing.

CONTINUING her pleasant, gossipy introductions to her father's novels, in the new Biographical Edition of Thackeray, which Messrs. Smith & Elder are issuing, Mrs. Ritchie this month tells the story of Pendennis. Here is a passage relating to that book's beginnings, taken partly from a letter from the author to his mother:

"My father proposes 'to go to the sea, or somewhere where he could work upon Pendennis, which is to be the name of the new book. In October you will be at Brighton,' he continues. 'I wonder whether you will take a house with three extra rooms in it, so that we could stow into it coming down. I should think for £60 a year one might easily find such a one. As for the dignity, I don't believe it matters a pinch of snuff. Tom Carlyle lives in perfect dignity in a little £40 house at Chelsea, with a snuffy Scotch maid to open the door, and the best company in England ringing at it. It is only the second or third ching great folks who care about show. "And why don't you live with a maid yourself?" I think I hear somebody saying: Well, I can't. I want a man to be going my own messages, which occupy him pretty well. There must be a cook, and a woman about the children, and that horse is the best doctor I get in London; in fine, there are a hundred good reasons for a lazy, liberal, not extravagant, but costly way of life.'"

Mrs. RITCHIE tells us that she can remember the morning on which her father told of the death of Helen Pendennis: "My father was in his study in Young-street, sitting at the table at which he wrote. It stood in the middle of the room, and he used to sit facing the door. I was going into the room, but he motioned me away. An hour afterwards he came into our school-room, half-laughing and half-ashamed, and said to us: 'I do not know what James could have thought of me when he came in with the tax-gatherer just after you left, and found me blubbering over Helen Pendennis's death.'"

JUST at this moment the most illustrious periodical in the world is the School Budget, a tiny and infrequent sheet circulating among the scholars of Horsemonden School, in Kent. A week ago it was not heard of; to-day a copy is worth its weight in platinum, and all because Master Medhurst and Master Chinnery, its owners and editors, had the happy thought to write to Mr. Rudyard Kipling for a contribution.

THE story, as told by the Daily Mail, is that the editors sent a copy of their magazine to Mr. Kipling, drawing his attention to an article on "Schoolboy Etiquette" in its pages, and asking for a contribution. Their rate of remuneration, they explained, was threepence per page; and, says our contemporary, this quotation seeming to have touched their consciences for the moment, they went on to observe that they knew they ran the risk of being considered cheeky, but he ought to make good his statement:

"The song I sing for the good red gold
The same I sing for the white money;
But best I sing for the clout o' meal,
That simple people given me."

In case Mr. Kipling should not be amenable to argument and reasoned appeal, the editors undertook to stifle his next book in its birth by an adverse critique in the School Budget.

EITHER the threat was too much for Mr. Kipling, or he had hints on schoolboy etiquette which had only been awaiting such an opportunity of publicity, for he replied at once. This was his letter:

"Capetown,
Easter Monday, 1898.

To the Editors, School Budget.

GENTLEMEN,—I am in receipt of your letter of no date, together with copy of the School Budget, February 14; and you seem to be in possession of all the cheek that is in the least likely to do you any good in this world or the next. And, furthermore, you have omitted to specify where your journal is printed and in what county of England Horsemonden is situated.

But, on the other hand, and notwithstanding, I very much approve of your 'Hints on Schoolboy Etiquette,' and have taken the liberty of sending you a few more, as following:

(1) If you have any doubts about a quantity, cough. In three cases out of five this will save you being asked to 'say it again.'

(2) The two most useful boys in a form are (a) the master's favourite, pro tem., (b) his pet aversion. With a little judicious management (a) can keep him talking through the first half of the construe, and (b) can take up the running for the rest of the time. N.B.—A syndicate should arrange to do (b's) imposts in return for this service.

(3) A confirmed guesser is worth his weight in gold on a Monday morning.

(4) Never shirk a master out of bounds. Pass him with an abstracted eye, and at the same time pull out a letter and study it earnestly. He may think it is a commission for someone else.

(5) When pursued by the native farmer, always take to the nearest ploughland. Men stick in furrows that boys can run over.

(6) If it is necessary to take other people's apples, do it on a Sunday. You can then put them inside your topper, which is better than trying to button them into a tight 'Eton.'

You will find this advice worth enormous sums of money, but I shall be obliged with a cheque or postal order for 6d., at your earliest convenience, if the contribution should be found to fill more than one page.—Faithfully yours,
RUDYARD KIPLING."

And now there is not a post but brings Mr. Kipling a request for a contribution from some school-boy editor; and cheek is enormously on the increase.

IN the new part—No. XI.—of Mr. Quaritch's Dictionary of English Book-collectors, Sir Richard Burton is reached. He is treated, however, less as book-collector than book-man. "True," says the writer, Mr. Herbert Jones, "he collected, but he had little, if any, interest in the book for its outward and visible points, whether of value, rarity, beauty, or condition. Its contents and its contents only—in so far as they were important to the thousand and one subjects of thought and action, that his many-sided and accomplished mind was ever concerned with—were the sole credentials that secured a book a place on his shelves. The most sumptuous book was little or nothing to him if it yielded no new facts or fancies. The most unpretentious volume was given the minutest attention if it held something either new or true, that would in due course be serviceable. In short, books were Burton's tools."

MISS JOURDAIN sends us the following :

"JOHN KEATS.

He should have lived where through a June of nights

The lifting moon whitens the ashen grass,
And quiet ponds where lie the tasselled
lilies;

Where a fluting Satyr with a golden beard Plays to the birds his double pipe of the woods,

Urging their answer; and through the forest breathing

Runs the old smell of cypress and of laurel,
That would redeem his quiet mind, and quite Obliterate the sense of foregone pain!"

An ingenious publisher's enterprise takes an ingenious form in connexion with a novel which he has recently issued. By welding sentences from eight independent reviews of this work he has produced, as an advertisement, the following concise encomium :

"This remarkable book, this powerful study (1), is vibrant with life all through (2). The conception is finely carried out and with a master hand (3). At times the rhythm and beauty of the language reach a very high level (4). Mr. — is a brilliant artist; he is original, cultured, witty; he has tremendous power in the differentiation of character (5). The rogue — is excellently drawn; indeed, there is much admirable work in the book (6). The whole narration is clothed in language studded with luminous metaphors, thought-compelling epigrams, and haunting snatches of song (7). The story is a notably powerful and fascinating one (8)."

From the index to the numerals, which the publisher appends, we discover, with a little start, that the first few words are from our own criticism. The others are from the Chronicle, the St. James's, the Pall Mall Gazette, the Daily Mail, the Scotsman, the Echo, and the Glasgow Herald.

At any rate, this latest method is an improvement on the old practice of doctoring reviews, in order to arrive at pure eulogy. Praise by elision, it might be called. A reviewer, for example, would write of a book: "It is, in short, intolerable. Anything less winsome, tender, humane than Mr. Blank's method is not to be imagined." Opening an advertisement of the book a day or so later, he would read: "What the Censor says of Mr. Blank's new novel: 'It is . . . winsome, tender, humane.'"

A WELL-KNOWN publisher entitles his catalogue of historical and biographical works "History, Biography, and other Essays in Veracity." "Essays in Veracity" is good. It suggests the dominance to which fiction has arrived in modern letters.

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, the American novelist and descriptive writer, who has gone to Cuba in the interests of the Times, the Boston Herald, and the New York Herald, submitted, before he left, to be photographed in his war paint. Some idea of the paternal solicitude shown by American journalists in their illustrious comrade may be gathered from the comments on this picture in various papers. One wrote:

"In this picture Dick is as impressive as a golf hero and as haughty as Emperor Bill. He wears a bicycle cap and is armed with a field glass and a quiver of Fabers. Leather-covered flasks are attached to his belt, to encourage his descriptive powers when his adjectives run low and facts are scarce. It seems to us that copies of this picture ought to be presented to all the volunteers before they leave for the front, in order that Valor may be inspired to break its own record. In our humble judgment, it is worth an army with banners."

Said another:

"He has had his picture taken in all his new togs, including a golf cap, high laced boots, two pairs of spy-glasses—one for the Spaniards and one for the Americans—a pistol, a blouse that doesn't fit, trousers ditto, and a double turn-down collar. He is filled with determination and courage too, so there is no room for bullets."

And yet a third:

"'El Capitan' is a Sunday-school superintendent beside him. If he were cut up into small pieces he would furnish the insurgents with arms and equipments for a whole winter. A canvas shooting-jacket, bristling with cartridges and composed principally of pockets is the imposing basis of the composition, and a pair of toy opera glasses and a huge revolver which sags him down violently to the left, help to complete the picture. It may be ungracious to criticise such a work of art, but it would be interesting to know how Mr. Davis proposes to extract that revolver from under his armpit. And those high shooting-boots! We do hope that he has some easy carpet slippers in his 'man's' charge. The Cuban climate is very warm. However, the redoubtable reporter looks formidable enough, and we make no doubt that there will be a terrific inkshed when he reaches the front."

Who would not be a public figure on "the other side"?

For some little while not much has been heard of the genial cosmopolitan who wrote the ballads of Hans Breitmann. But Mr. Leland, though in his seventy-fourth year, has not been idle. On the contrary, he has ready several volumes: a collection of Tuscan tales on the lines of his Legends of Florence; a collection of new poems to be called "Songs of Sorcery and Ballads of Witchcraft"; a collection of new and translated sketches to be called "Wayside Wanderers"; a new work on the minor arts; a manual to be called "The Simplest Musical Instruments and How to Make Them"; an essay on self-hypnotism, to be called "Have You a Strong Will?"; and last, but not least, a collection of countryside legends concerning Virgil. Mr. Leland's industry would start a young publishing firm.

BUNYAN's allegory has already a range of popularity of which the sturdy tinker who wrote it could, with all his imagination, never have dreamed; but new conquests are in store for it. At the Missionary Breakfast of the Religious Tract Society which was held a few days ago, Mr. J. R. M. Stephens, a missionary on the Congo, described his field of labour as one in which they had no literature, but he hoped ere long to come to the Society with a petition for the publication of the Pilgrim's Progress in the language of the people.

THE first of the four volumes of Huxley's Scientific Memoirs, which has just reached us from Messrs. Macmillan, shows what a vast undertaking this publication is. The work, which Prof. Michael Foster and Prof. Ray Lankester are editing together, has been undertaken at Messrs. Macmillan's own expense, as a contribution by that firm, which had such intimate relations with Prof. Huxley, to the Huxley memorial. The first volume runs to 600 pages, and is a veritable mine of wealth to the biologist. A portrait of Huxley taken in 1857 serves as a frontispiece, and it is interesting to notice how little his face changed during his after life. Save that the hair is darker it is precisely the Huxley of his old age that confronts one in this picture.

THE covers of the little history of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which reaches us from the Times office, are interesting for their border of portraits. Here we see Mr. Lang and Prof. Max Müller side by side, all their differences over for the moment; and Mr. Swinburne resting placidly between Sir Robert Ball and Dean Farrar.

PRISONERS would seem to be either very quick readers or very impatient critics. The following passage to the point is from a long letter to the Chronicle by Mr. J. W. Hobbs, of Liberator fame:

"One Saturday afternoon, in June, 1895, while confined in my cell at Portland, I was reading Thiers' Consulate and Empire, when I heard my next-door neighbour knock at the iron sheeting which formed the partition between the two cells and say, 'Can you recommend me a good devotional book?' Being suddenly taken off my guard, and not thinking of the strict enforcement of the rules against communication between prisoners, I replied, 'Read Farrar's Life of Christ.' Soon after—it must have been about half-past four—my neighbour knocked again and said, 'Can you recommend me another?'"

There is a choice of two deductions to be drawn from this haste.

PROF. JULIEN VINSON has just finished and published (Paris: Maisonneuve) the second portion of his Essai d'une Bibliographie Basque. Some ninety Basque works have been published since 1891; but the chief additions to Prof. Vinson's book are the list of over 300 works in which references to or citations from the Basque occur, and sixty-six pages of similar references to journaux et revues. The work is crowned by the Institute, and is indispensable to every student of the language and literature of the Basques.

"LANOE FALCONER'S" absorbing little story, Mademoiselle Ixe, has just been re-issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin at sixpence. The old Pseudonym Library type has been retained, but the page has been broadened. Possibly Mr. Unwin intends to reprint all the Pseudonym successes.

BETWEEN THE MOUNTAINS AND THE SEA.

BY SIR LEWIS MORRIS.

IN mirk and mist and petulant rain
Thick-swathed, our sordid London lay;
White fogs obscured the Midland plain
Thro' all the drear November day.

But with swift eve, the sinking sun
Smote the Welsh hills, and suddenly—
The spite, the frown of Winter done,—
Again the blue unclouded sky.

And with the morn the impatient light
Streamed through the blinded cells of sleep;
And as the calm hours broadened bright
Brought azure sky and sapphire deep.

Great Heaven, how beautiful a way
My happy fate prepares for me,
Who journey all this perfect day
Between the mountains and the sea!

We leave behind the ancient town,
The castle's flawless circuit tall,
Thin turrets like a mural crown
Lighting broad tower and sombre wall.

Sheer from the far, surrounding sea
Rise the precipitous heights of Lleyn;
The palaced groves of Anglesey
Light the salt stream which glides between.

Moel and the great twin brethren high,
Eryri queen of upper air,
Against the blue autumnal sky
A throng of Titans dread yet fair.

Unveiled from base to summit all,
Bare russet fern and golden wood,
Grey rocks, the skyward climbing wall,
The fall that wakes the solitude.

The close-fenced fields, the wandering sheep,
White on the mountain's giddy brow
And nestling near the quarried steep,
Village and chapel far below.

And see the dark procession come,
Slow on the sunlight highway sped,
Which bears to his eternal home,
With hymns, some village worthy dead.

And every word that you shall hear,
And all the mournful measures sung,
Breathe the old Cymric accents dear,
The deathless, unforgetten tongue.

Turn from the mountains to the sea,
The tranquil blue, where on the skies,
Faint as a phantom-isle might be,
The hallowed heights of Bardsey rise.

The calm sea ripples on the sand,
The stormy deeps are lulled to rest,
A soft breeze, breathing from the land,
Dispels in mist each fairy crest.

Long miles upon the perilous verge
The swift train hurries on its way,
The white gulls swoop; from surge to surge
The dusky cormorants dive and play.

The hills recede, till lo! again
Perched on its rock the tiny town,
High on the lonely seaward plain
Harlech's unshattered ramparts frown.

The rude-built, massive homesteads grey,
Walled fields, low stacks by ropes confined,
Tell of the impending furious day
Which wings with snow the whirling wind.

And then again a rival band
Of giant summits shuts the view,
Cader, Arennig, Aran, stand
Stern sentinels against the blue.

Then thy sweet vale, Dolgelley—where
Is any lovelier?—oak-crowned isle,
Blue river, mounting woodside fair,
The golden valley's tranquil smile;

Not Como nor Lugano hold
Depths of clear azure more divine,
Nor treasure of autumnal gold,
Nor guardian mountains grand as thine.

And then again the land-locked sea,
The little port, the ribbed sea-sand,
The white winged squadrons circling free
Above the channels in the strand.

Fair Mawddach's charm is mine again!
Sweet Dovey dost thou claim to pour
A tide less lovely to the main
Than glides by Barmouth's sand-vexed shore?

Nay, nay, I fear to award the crown
Of natural beauty. Both are fair:
These high hills somewhat gentler grown,
These richer meads, this softer air.

Then once again the marshy plain,
The sandy dunes, the half-hid blue,
The sea-beat town, which woos the main,
The academic halls, which grow

Swift as the Caliph's palace tower,
Upon the verge; the chosen home
Of those who judge the passing hour
Less than the larger days to come.

Then on by labouring gradients slow,
By park and hall, till ere the night
Hides all the hills and settles low
On the loved vale, my straining sight

Takes with the joy of home thy steep,
Fair Grongar, sacred to the muse,
Broad Towy winding to the deep,
Llangunnor with thy reverend yews.

Here, too, mid life's autumnal chill
Are homely joys and sunlit days;
Blest memories haunting vale and hill
Awake the grateful heart to praise.

PURE FABLES.

CONDITIONS.

They thrust a lark into a prison of wires, and blotted out the blue above him; and he shook the spaces of the day with song.

Whereas a sparrow, blown by chance into the seventh heaven, might still do no more than chirp.

FOREWORD.

A reviewer sat in his arbour with a parcel of small poets, trying to find reasons for saying something kind about each of them.

And by and by he lit upon a chaste, vellum and gilt, 16mo affair, on page 5 of which he read: "TO THE CRITICS.—Be indulgent. I write my poems because they come; and they are now given to the world at the earnest solicitation of my friends. For the peck of faults in this, my book, I blush; but haply some poor rhyme of mine may ease the aching heart of—"

"Wife!" roared the reviewer, "bring me my grievous crabtree cudgel!"

VALUE.

A burgess of the city of letters hied him to the mayor, with the complaint that the city musicians were only a very middling lot.

"Perhaps you are right," said the mayor,
"but I think we get a pretty adequate return for the wages we give them."

T. W. H. C.

THE "NEWDIGATE."

THE first record of the prize is in the year
1768, when it was won by a certain Howard of Wadham. Four years later "The Beneficial Effects of Inoculation" was the cheerful subject set to the undergraduate muse.
The first name of importance on the list is that of Heber, who won the prize in 1803 with his "Palestine." It reads formal and academic enough, but his contemporaries were much impressed by it, and crowded the theatre not only at the recitation but at the rehearsal the night before. Sir Walter Scott was in Oxford at the time, and breakfasted with Heber at Brasenose; and it was at his suggestion that the lines were added:

"No hammer fell, no ponderous axes rung:
Like some tall palm the noiseless fabric sprung."

"Christopher North" won the Newdigate in 1806 with a strange production, entitled "A Recommendation of the Study of the Remains of Ancient Grecian and Roman Architecture, &c. Six years later Dean Milman wrote his "Belvidere Apollo," which Dean Stanley considered the best "Newdigate" ever written. Certainly the lines are very musical:

"Beauteous as vision seen in dreamy sleep
By holy maid on Delphi's haunted steep,
Mid the dim twilight of the laurel grove,
Too fair to worship, too divine to love."

In 1827 Robert Stephen Hawker wrote on "Pompeii," and in 1832 the future Lord Selborne wrote a quaint poem on "Staffa," in which Sir Joseph Banks is affectionately referred to as the "Child of Wisdom." F. W. Faber won it in 1836 with his "Knights of St. John," Dean Stanley in the following year with "The Gipsies," and Mr. Ruskin followed in 1839 with "Salsette and Elephante." The last mentioned poem is a sort of missionary psalm:

"Then shall the moan of phrenzied hymn, that sighed
Down the dark vale where Gunga's waters glide,
Then shall the idol chariot's thunder cease
Before the steps of them that publish peace."

In 1842 John Campbell Shairp, afterwards the Professor of Poetry, wrote on "Charles the Twelfth," and next year Matthew Arnold produced his "Cromwell." Some of "Cromwell" is undoubtedly fine, such as the simile:

"Like a lonely tree
On some bare headland tossing mournfully,
That all night long its weary moan doth make
To the vex'd waters of a mountain lake."

But occasionally it lapses into the comic, as when we are told that

"Falkland ey'd the strife that would not cease, Shook back his tangled locks and murmured
'Peace.'"

Three years after the late Sir G. Osborne Morgan followed with a poem on "Settlers in Australia." In the next twelve years A. W. Hunt wrote on "Nineveh," Sir Edwin Arnold on the "Feast of Belshazzar," Philip Stanhope Worsley on "The Temple of Janus," and John Addington Symonds on "The Escorial." In 1863, the astonishing subject of "Coal Mines" was set, and the prize was appropriately enough won by a Welshman. The Professor of Poetry won it the next year with a very good poem on the "Three Hundredth Anniversary of Shakespeare's Birth":

"O rarest Viola, strong with speechless eye,
To watch thine unsunned love too slowly die.
Love shall not die! And ah! how dark the glen!
How lonely thou! my poor, pale Imogen.
That was Ophelia's song. Down, Lear, and rest
Thy storm-blanch'd cheek on thy dead daughter's breast.
The babbling lips grow soft in sleep—lie here,
White hair and gold, one life, one love, one bier."

The present Professor of Moral Philosophy, Mr. J. A. Stuart, wrote on "The Catacombs" in 1868; John Huntley Skrine on "Margaret of Anjou" in 1870; Mr. W. H. Mallock, the year after, on "The Isthmus of Suez" (a fit subject for a future economist); and the present editor of the Times on "Livingstone" in 1875. The last poem concludes with an admonition to—

"Look at yon plain stone,
Read the brief legend love has writ thereon:
And part with firm resolve as his to save,
To ransom Afric, and to free the slave"— which may or may not be still the politics of Printing House Square. Three years later the author of "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" wrote a remarkable poem on "Ravenna," which may fairly be judged the best in the whole chronicle of prize compositions:

"The Prince of Chivalry; the Lord of War;
Gaston de Foix: for some untimely star
Led him against thy city, and he fell,
As falls some forest-lion fighting well.
Taken from life while life and love were new,
He lies beneath God's seamless veil of blue;
Tall lance-like reeds wave sadly o'er his head,
And oleanders bloom to deeper red Where his bright youth flowed crimson on the ground."

In 1881 Mr. Rennell Rodd wrote an excellent poem on "Sir Walter Raleigh." Mr. J. W. Mackail followed with his "Thermopylae," and to him succeeded Mr. D. S. MacColl and Mr. Bowyer Nichols. In 1888 Mr. Arthur Waugh won the prize, and two years later Mr. Laurence Binyon with his "Persephone." Lord Warkworth's "St. Francis of Assisi," in 1892, is perhaps the best of recent poems.

The "Newdigate" is emphatically an undergraduate's poem, and as a rule it bears the fact of its origin on its face. It is generally highly spiced with mannerism, and reflects most faithfully the fashions in verse of the day. To read over a sheaf of old compositions is to get some insight into the history of poetic modes in our own century. In early Victorian days we find neat antithesis and correct sensibility. Later a jarring Byronic note enters; and then in the "seventies and early eighties" we come on traces of the Morris and Rossetti renaissance of mediævalism. And at all times there is a plethora of sonorous words, and frequently ragged endings to stately beginnings. Now and then a fine phrase or a memorable line gives promise of good work in the future.

The most famous Newdigates are those which were never sent in, the long list of fabled extracts which cannot be found in any printed composition. Such are the immortal lines on Nebuchadnezzar:

"Thus spake he, as he champed the unwonted food—
'It may be wholesome, but it is not good.'"

There are few things in mock heroic finer than this Homeric beginning. So, too, the poem on the Prince of Wales's illness:

"Hour after hour th' unwelcome message came,
'He is no better, he is much the same.'"

Or this on the siege of Paris:

"Alas! to-day how many a corpse is made
Which yesterday with happy children played."

In 1895 "Montezuma" was set as a subject, and a proposed version appeared in the Oxford Magazine, which is reprinted in the second volume of selections from that paper. The opening lines—

"Montezuma
Met a puma
Coming through the rye."

THREE BARDS OF THE BUSH.

III.—MR. A. B. PATERSON.

FOR a clearer appreciation of Mr. Paterson's volume, The Man from Snowy River, which for its buoyancy and movement we have kept till the last, it is well to visit the Grafton Galleries. There are pictures in that exhibition of Australian art which serve as a commentary upon these poems. In particular, there is a droving scene in the first room—a horseman or two, a myriad sheep, a dusty road, a parching sun—a glance at which makes actual several of Mr. Paterson's more ovine pieces, as we might call them, such as "A Bushman's Song," "Shearing at Castlereagh," and "The Two Devines." And there are landscapes there too, which give these Bush bards their setting.

It is not as a singer of sheep-shearing that we best like Mr. Paterson, but as celebrant of what De Quincey called the glory of motion. In these days of cycling and motor cars and universal machinery it is cheering to come again upon a poet to whom the horse makes its old appeal. For Mr. Paterson is of the school of Whyte-Melville and that spirited gentleman-poet, Egerton Warburton. The jog-trot of a horse he loves is more to him than the whirlwind pace of a bogey-engine. The poem that gives its title to the book should be sure of mention whenever the best riding poems are enumerated. It tells how

"There was movement at the station, for the word had passed around
That the colt from old Regret had got away,
And had joined the wild bush horses—he was worth a thousand pound,
So all the cracks had gathered to the fray.
All the tried and noted riders from the stations near and far
Had mustered at the homestead over night,
For the bushmen love hard riding where the wild bush horses are,
And the stock-horse snuffs the battle with delight."

A brave beginning. Then the poet gives us a catalogue of the heroes assembled, among whom is an unknown stripling on a small and weedy beast, whose powers are doubted. The experienced reader knows what is coming: this stripling will outstride the lot. And it is so—the man from Snowy River, as the stranger is called, does outstride them:

"When they reached the mountain's summit,
even Clancy took a pull,
It well might make the boldest hold their breath,
The wild hop scrub grew thickly, and the hidden ground was full
Of wombat holes, and any slip was death.
But the man from Snowy River let the pony have his head,
And he swung the stock whip round and gave a cheer,
And he raced him down the mountain like a torrent down its bed,
While the others stood and watched in very fear.
He sent the flint stones flying, but the pony kept his feet,
He cleared the fallen timber in his stride,
And the man from Snowy River never shifted in his seat—
It was grand to see that mountain horseman ride."

Through the stringy barks and saplings, on the rough and broken ground,
Down the hillside at a racing pace he went;
And he never drew the bridle till he landed safe and sound
At the bottom of that terrible descent.

He was right among the horses, as they climbed the further hill,
And the watchers on the mountain standing mute,
Saw him ply the stock whip fiercely, he was right among them still,
As he raced across the clearing in pursuit.
Then they lost him for a moment, where two mountain gullies met
In the ranges, but a final glimpse reveals
On a dim and distant hillside the wild horses racing yet,
With the man from Snowy River at their heels."

And so on. Mr. Paterson, it will be seen, can make Pegasus move too.

In another piece, we see how Pardon, the son of Reprieve, after being tampered with by scoundrels—filled with green barley—yet won the race of the day. The story has a dramatic setting, and at the end the narrator adds :

" But he's old—and his eyes are grown hollow ;
Like me, with my thatch of the snow ;
When he dies then I hope I may follow,
And go where the racehorses go.
I don't want no barping nor singing—
Such things with my style don't agree ;
Where the hoofs or the horses are ringing
There's music sufficient for me."

The hoofs of the horses ring throughout
Mr. Paterson's verses.

An Australian poet whose subject is riding must, of course, challenge comparison with Adam Lindsay Gordon. Mr.
Paterson has not his predecessor's mastery of metre and words, his literary knowledge ;
but for us, we should choose the author of this book. Temperament is of more value than verbal dexterity, and Mr. Paterson's temperament satisfies us. He sees things clearly ; he eschews pessimism ; he has humour ; he is himself, neither second-hand Byron nor second-hand Swinburne ; and he is Australian. One wants Australian poets to be Australian. Mr. Paterson's love o' country comes out in a little reflective piece called " In the Droving Days." The argument shows him to have drifted to an auction sale ; an old horse is put up, and the bidding stops at a pound ; as he looks at it, the poet's thoughts stray to scenes of the past :

" Back to the road, I crossed again
Over the miles of the saltbush plain—
The shining plain that is said to be
The dried-up bed of an inland sea,
Where the air is dry and so clear and bright
Refracts the sun with a wondrous light,
And out in the dim horizon makes
The deep blue gleam of the phantom lakes.

At dawn of day we would feel the breeze
That stirred the boughs of the sleeping trees,
And brought a breath of the fragrance rare
That comes and goes in that scented air ;
For the trees and grass and the shrubs contain
A dry sweet scent on the saltbush plain.
For these that love it and understand,
The saltbush plain is a wonderland."

And so on, through scene after scene, until the poet bids for the horse himself :

" And now he's waudering, fat and sleek,
On the lucerne flats by the Homestead Creek ;
I dare not ride him for fear he'd fall,
But he does a journey to beat them all,
For though he scarcely a trot can raise,
He can take me back to the droving days."

But Mr. Paterson's best poem of the droving days is that by which he is known all over Australia—" Clancy of the Overflow." It is quite a trifle :

" I had written him a letter which I had, for want of better
Knowledge, sent to where I met him down
the Lachlan, years ago,
He was shearing when I knew him, so I sent the letter to him,
Just 'on spec,' addressed as follows:
' Clancy, of the Overflow.'

And the answer came directed in a writing unexpected

(And I think the same was written with a thumb-nail dipped in tar),

'Twas his shearing-mate who wrote it, and verbatim I will quote it :

' Clancy's gone to Queensland droving, and we don't know where he are.'

That is the opening—with an anticipation in it of a phrase which the London streets now know only too well. The poet reads the message in his dingy little office in the city, and it sets him musing wistfully :

" In my wild erratic fancy visions came to me
of Clancy

Gone a-droving, down the Cooper, where the western drovers go ;

As the stock are slowly stringing, Clancy rides behind them singing,

For the drover's life has pleasures that the townsfolk never know.

And the bush bath friends to meet him, and their kindly voices greet him

In the murmur of the breezes and the river on its bars,

And he sees the vision splendid of the sunlit
plains extended,

And at night the wondrous glory of the everlasting stars."

Since The Man from Snowy River was published—in 1895 in Sydney, and in London, by Macmillan & Co., in 1896—Mr.
Paterson—or "The Banjo," as he calls himself—has written much new verse, and may be has a new volume almost ready. It seems to us that from his work a selection could be made which would contain the most characteristic Australian poetry yet written.

In concluding these notes on Australian singers, it may be well to state that Mr.
Paterson's poems are published in Sydney by Messrs. Angus & Robertson, and in London by Messrs. Macmillan ; Mr.
Lawson's poems are published in Sydney
by Messrs. Angus & Robertson, and in London by Messrs. Sampson, Low & Co. ; and Mr. Dyson's poems are published in Sydney only, by Messrs. Angus & Robertson.

STEINLEN'S CATS.*

THE abundance of French draughtsmen is not their least merit. They have such ebullience, these Steinlens and Caran d'Aches, Forains and Willettes. They turn from grave to gay, from lively to severe, so readily and with an enthusiasm comparable only to that of the boy. Temperamentally they differ from their English brethren of the crayon in being all artist, rather than part artist and part citizen,
a condition fostered by Paris and her federating, light-hearted cafés, and obstructed by London and her chill reserve.
Our artists have done with work at sundown when they turn the studio key.
Abundance is no characteristic of theirs—high spirits they may have, but not for expression at the pencil's point. In other words, they are not, like the Frenchmen, all artists, but only artists in part. It is the old difference of North and South.

Look, for example, at this new book of Steinlen's. Steinlen's work is the illustration of books and papers ; the weekly coloured lithograph, usually sombre and terrible—the fruit, at any rate, of intimate knowledge of the seamier side of life—in Gil Blas Illustré ; and occasional posters. Yet such is his variety, his abundance, that he finds time to throw off this collection of studies of cat life, innocent, gay, winsomely charming ;
which is to say, the grimmest realist with the pencil now working in Paris, the city of grim realists, has produced one of the most fascinating books for children of recent days, when everyone is striving to that end. That is what is meant by abundance.

Steinlen's cats differ from others principally in their leanness and their strength of purpose. They almost always are intent upon some objective. With Mme. Ronner's fluffy, dainty Persian kittens repose is the aim of life ; but Steinlen's cats are adventurers, pirates, warriors. One kitten's coquetry with a cigar stump ; another's indignity at the hands of its little mistress, who would dress it as a doll ; a third's struggles with a ball of worsted in which it ends in being worsted too ; a cat's fight with a magpie ;
the chase of a goldfish in a bowl ; various vicissitudes of hungry cats ; an encounter with a frog ; an encounter with a guinea-pig ; a frustrated mouse hunt—these are some of Steinlen's subjects. The august deity of the domestic hearth-rug has, like other people, his " off moments," when dignity is laid aside. Steinlen has chosen these " off moments," and has followed the " zoetrope " method so popular with French draughtsmen, with the result that each story lives.
One paradoxical result of this attempt at realism is that the cats sometimes come to look more like dogs or monkeys. But what of that ? The instantaneous photographs of Prof. Muybridge have shown us that all animals in swift movement have a power of distortion. With this reflection let the reader console himself when Steinlen's cats depart from the accepted shape. For ourselves, we are satisfied.

* Des Chats. Par Steinlen. Collection Rodolphe
Salis. (Paris: Ernest Flammarion.)

THE BOOK MARKET.

OUGHT BOOKS TO BE CHEAPER?

IN the Daily Telegraph of May 11, Mr. Bryce's plea for cheaper books formed the text of an interesting, suggestive, and, on the whole, of a well-informed leading article on the present position of the author, the publisher, and the book buyer. Mr. Bryce's theory is that cheap periodical literature is ruining the book trade, and that the only way in which the publisher can combat the formidable competition of magazines is by cheapening his books. It would seem that the writer in the Daily Telegraph accepts Mr. Bryce's statement that the enormous strides made in all departments of periodical literature have had a disastrous effect on the sale of books, but we are much inclined to doubt the truth of such a judgment. The book-buying public is still a small one, but book-buyers are increasing on every hand. The insignificant minority is daily becoming less insignificant even in point of numbers. Still books are a necessity to the very few. To the general they are always a luxury. In times of depression the purveyor of literature is naturally one of the first to suffer. The writer of this article says with truth: "If any one considers the circle of his friends he will find that there are relatively few who peruse literary works and fewer still who buy them. On the other hand, the great mass of our half-instructed population are quite contented with sixpenny magazines and with the judiciously selected fare which they find in newspapers." But then the great mass of our half-educated population never did buy books. Until the advent of the Tit-Bits class of literature it read practically nothing. Tit-Bits readers demanded something more substantial, and the Strand Magazine supplied the want. As a natural sequence we have now the popular daily paper. The book-buying public, we suppose we must call it the wholly educated public, is never to be counted by its hundreds of thousands. It is not a great mass but a few scattered individuals. Some day some one may educate the great mass up to the buying of books, but the time is not yet. Only occasionally does one of the mass join the minority—of book buyers. But a new recruit is always a valuable addition to a small army.

Considering the smallness of the book-buying public, says the writer of the article, publishing must be but a poor profession.

"In circumstances like these the production of books is a perilous business, and it would be more perilous still if it were not for the great circulating libraries which form so marked a feature of the present epoch. When a book is issued nowadays it is fairly certain beforehand that a substantial number of copies will be taken up by the libraries. It would be much better for the publisher if he could deal with the public direct, but as that is impossible—most people having agreed, for prudential reasons, to get their books on loan—he is only too thankful to avail himself of the supplies required by large and flourishing distributing agencies."

There is something quite wrong here. If the publisher had to depend on these epoch-making circulating libraries unhappy indeed would be his condition—perilous indeed would be his enterprise. We should like the writer to see some of the first orders for new books received from the largest circulating library in the world. We can assure him that fifty-two copies is considered a good order even when the author of the book has something of a reputation. Circulating libraries do not buy books in large numbers; as a rule, they have no need to; naturally they have no wish to. It is only when there is an enormous rush that they are compelled to stock in large quantities. Literary men and publishers seem to some extent agreed that circulating and free libraries are harmful to the book trade. We are by no means so sure that this is so. Since these libraries were started there has been no decrease in the sale of books. In these days of prodigious production of literature it is impossible for any one to buy everything that is issued. The circulating library offers the chance of free, or very cheap, sampling. Many subscribers to circulating libraries are patrons of the booksellers on an extensive scale. They buy after they have read. The circulating library is the sure friend of the author of a strong and powerful book, the deadly foe of weak inanities. It has done more to elevate the general tone of literature than much newspaper criticism.

The writer of the article goes out of his way to say unpleasant things of contemporary fiction.

"Our bookstalls are flooded with works of fiction, mostly written by women—often ungrammatical, largely worthless in character, and wholly devoid of any reasonable interest. They are produced because in nine cases out of ten the author or authoress pays for the production. . . . Novels undoubtedly depress the general level of culture at the present time, because they, like the poor in Tennyson's 'Northern Farmer,' 'in a lump are bad.'"

But he must study the bookstalls and the book lists more closely before he indulges in sweeping statements of this kind. The bookstalls are not flooded with works of fiction, and the commission publishers are seldom represented on them by a single book. A book by an unknown author is a rara avis on a railway bookstall. As to present day fiction being "in the lump bad" we think every impartial observer must have been struck by the really high level attained by the great mass of contemporary novels. Great works are admittedly few and far between, but you have only to glance at the weekly summary in the ACADEMY to see that the general standard of new fiction is far above what we have been inclined to term the "average"—an average which is no longer correct.

We cannot agree with the writer's further statement:

"Each publisher's hand is against his fellow—Barabbas, we remember, was a publisher—and, therefore, by stress of competition, he is tempted to out-do his rival by the magnificence of his offers to those authors who command a ready sale. Having paid a good deal more than he ought for one book, he has to pay less than he ought for another; his successes, such as they are, have to make up for his losses; while, in such an unhealthy state of things, the young writer of promise has a peculiar difficulty in getting even a hearing."

Even supposing that a publisher pays more than he ought for one book—it is a notorious fact that most of the large sums to which the writer refers have come back to the publisher with good interest—how does this affect the young author? Where the risk is so great it is almost a wonder that a new writer obtains anything at all for his first work. If he can find a publisher to take the chance he is indeed fortunate. If his book is a great success he has his reward: he can dictate his own terms in the future. And we are positive that never were MSS. more carefully read, never was there a sharper look-out kept for the "young writer of promise," than at the present time. The competition among publishers makes such a look-out a necessity of existence.

The writer then proceeds to a general discussion of the cheapening of books. He is, as we have already stated, perfectly right in saying that "books have their own clientèle"—a small clientèle. There can be no doubt that books could be produced more cheaply if larger editions were printed. But the question is, would cheap books pay either publisher or author? A novel now issued at six shillings would have to sell more than double the number if published at three-and-sixpence in order to bring in the same profit. The experiment has been tried over and over again, and has invariably proved a failure. The reason is simple enough. You cannot force the growth of the book-buying public. Many authors—we are thinking especially of several well-known novelists—can reckon on a sale of, say, two thousand copies for each new book, and at six shillings this allows a fair margin of profit for all concerned. Produce the same book at three-and-sixpence, advertise it to the same amount, and you will find that the sale has increased by some two hundred and fifty copies, probably less. There is a loss on the transaction. The clientèle of that particular author is limited to two thousand buyers. An interesting experiment might be made by an author of phenomenal popularity. A sale of fifty thousand copies of a six-shilling novel might possibly be turned into a sale of a hundred and fifty thousand, though we doubt if such would be the case. But the issue rests, in this instance, with the author, not with the publisher.

The writer closes by saying that in time the newspaper will oust the popular magazine. Utterances of this kind are rather useless, and in literary matters it is absolutely futile to attempt to prophesy. The great attraction of the magazine lies in the excellent illustrations, and these the newspapers can never equal. Has the New York Journal, with all its "popular" features and its illustrations, killed McClure's or Munsey's Magazines? But we are more than certain that the writer is wrong in declaring "that the magazine has already succeeded in establishing its popularity at the expense of books." Magazines have added hundreds of thousands to the reading public, and book publishers, as a whole, welcome them because they have brought into touch with things literary a new and vast audience. Of their benefit to the author it is needless to write.

J. E. H. W.

THE BOOKSELLERS

ON THE QUESTION OF CHEAPER BOOKS.

"Books ought to be cheaper," were Mr. Bryce's words a fortnight ago. Perhaps he was not altogether serious, for he added: "The first generation of authors may belosers, but let the heroic suffer," and there were authors present! On the other hand, it was generally admitted at the Booksellers' Dinner—the occasion on which Mr. Bryce spoke—that the book-trade suffered seriously from the vast amount of private and organised borrowing of books; and it has been argued since that the Circulating Library is really the reply of the public to the high prices of books, and that the public would buy books much more freely if they cost less. The whole question of the present prices of books and the public attitude to their prices seemed worthy of investigation, especially as it is admitted that vast numbers of educated people rarely buy books at all. We therefore addressed a circular to the leading booksellers, in which we quoted Mr. Bryce's words, and asked for their opinions on the issuing of new 6s. books at 3s. 6d., and less costly books at 2s. 6d. and 1s. We print their replies below.

LONDON (STRAND).

MESSRS. A. & F. DENNY write:

"With reference to your inquiry as to the advisability of making reductions in the published price of books, and publishing cheap editions immediately, we are of opinion that much good would result from the experiment if it should be attempted with really good books of general interest, and the publisher would reap the benefit of very much improved sales, although, no doubt, it would operate against the 'Circulating Library' (at the present time looked upon by publishers as their greatest friend). The public will speedily recognise the difference in price, and instead of worrying about borrowing, will buy the book. We are not by any means in favour of multiplying shilling editions, although much of the poetry, and many of the novels (6s.), published at the present day would not sell even at that price. We are looking forward to the time when the six-shilling novel, like its forerunner, the three-decker, will become a thing of the past, except in the case of well-known and really good authors. Without advocating the French system of 3fr. 50c. books, we should like to see all popular work in biography, history, travel, &c., brought out at a very much lower price than now."

LONDON (E.C.).

MESSRS. JONES & EVANS send us the following interesting reply:

"We do not think that the question of the cheapening of literary wares was ever more justly or more felicitously stated than in the fore-word to the series of 'Pocket Volumes' exquisitely printed at the Chiswick Press, and published by Messrs. George Bell & Son: 'They do not profess to compete with the so-called cheap volumes. They believe that a cheapness which is attained by the use of inferior type and paper, and absence of editorial care, and which results in volumes that no one cares to keep, is a false cheapness. They desire rather to produce books superior in quality, and relatively as cheap.'

Whilst we hope it will always be worth the while of publishers to produce books that, like the King's daughter, are 'fair to see' and 'glorious within,' we also think that the needs of the poor student should not be ignored. Mere lowness of price will not convert non-readers into readers; but it will undoubtedly benefit literature by causing the public to buy instead of borrow, and thus taste the keenest joy of the book-lover—possession. It is well-known that on the Continent more books are bought than is the case with ourselves, the purchasing power of three and a half francs, or its equivalent, being doubtless mainly responsible for that result.

At the same time, the point we want to emphasise is this, that for the ever-growing company of lovers of choice books there must always be production of books comely of form, and as handsomely 'turned out' as the 'Arts and crafts' of printing, binding, and illustration can achieve. Did not a patrician lately confide to a London newspaper that he had tasted of grief in having to accept the gift of a gold cigar-case that was only nine-carat? How much worse the plight of the book-lover on receiving his favourite author in a shape ugly and mean, 'cheap and nasty.'

Lastly, even in the 'Republic of Letters,' there must be a 'living wage'; it cannot be supposed that the literary craftsman will present his readers with the results of years of research for what barely pays cost of production. New and original work in poetry, history, science, and philosophy at a nominal figure, by writers of note, is outside the range of practical publishing. We think that were publishers to follow the plan of the big railways, and cater for first and third classes, the needs of 'all sorts and conditions' would be met."

LONDON (OXFORD-STREET).

MESSRS. TRUSLOVE & HANSON write:

"The question of a general lowering of the prices of books is one to which we cannot assent. If, in speaking of publishing the work of some well-known and popular author at a cheap rate, Mr. Bryce was thinking of one of our popular novelists, we differ from his opinion. Had Tribly or The Christian been published at 3s. 6d. or 2s. 6d. instead of 6s., they would not, in our opinion, have been such a success for author, publisher, or bookseller. Six-shilling novels by good authors sell better to-day than any other class of fiction.

We should, however, welcome a lowering of prices in other branches of literature, such as books of travel, biography, essays, &c. We should then possibly be told less frequently: 'Yes, it is an interesting hook, no doubt; but I cannot afford it, so shall get it from the library.' We do not think that new books of poems published at 1s. would pay anyone."

LONDON (LEICESTER SQUARE).

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON do not favour the lowering of book prices, but they make a suggestion:

"We would not welcome a general lowering of prices of books, and in fact can hardly understand how such a thing could possibly happen, unless bad paper, print, &c., was the result; the books, as now issued, are as tastefully produced for the money at which they are published as one can well wish, and to have all the publishers' good work of the past few years thrown away would be both a hardship upon them, the booksellers, and public, and we are confident would not materially increase sales, for if a book is worth buying it will be bought.

It would be an advantage, perhaps, if all books were issued in paper covers, as in France, as we are often asked for books in a different style to those in stock, the difference of cost to be added to printing, and it would, if the book was treasured by the purchaser, be possible to bind up in leather bindings to suit individual taste without sacrificing the sometimes highly-decorative covers."

BIRMINGHAM.

MR. CHARLES LINNELL, of Messrs. Cornish Bros., is an authority on bookselling in the Midlands, and he writes to us:

"There is no growing demand for cheap literature. On the contrary, our difficulty is to find good library editions of many standard authors. Every hour in the day we are asked, 'Is there no better edition?' Most devoutly do we hope that the book trade may be spared any further cheapening of books. It is our daily experience that many books published at 3s. 6d. would sell far better if produced in a better form and issued at 6s. A general cheapening would be most disastrous—a calamity to author, publisher, and bookseller, and a misfortune to the public; for what reverence would people have for literature bought at one shilling a pound! Mr. Bryce spoke of a general lowering of prices; it is instructive to note that his Holy Roman Empire was first issued at 6s., second edition 9s., third edition 7s. 6d., and this was followed by a library edition at 14s. Fancy, too, a shilling edition of the American Commonwealth!"

MR. C. COMBRIDGE, bookseller of this city, writes:

"Replying to your letter of the 14th inst., with reference to the further cheapening of books, our experience is that 6s. novels by popular authors sell exceedingly well.

Some four or five years ago there was a decided tendency on the part of publishers to reduce 6s. series to 3s. 6d. and 2s. 6d., but during the past two or three years a large majority of works by popular novelists have been issued at 6s.

We do not think that standard copyright works published under 6s. would be advisable, the carriage and general working expenses would be as heavy on a 3s. 6d. publication as a 6s. one, and, bad as bookselling is at the present time, it would be infinitely worse if we had to do twice as much work for the same return, and we do not think it any more desirable from a publisher's point of view than from ours.

We think travels and biographies would command a large sale if published at 6s. instead of the prohibitive prices at which they are now issued.

New books of poems, essays, travels, &c., at 1s. would not pay anyone concerned, and are quite out of the question."

CARDIFF.

MR. JOHN HOGG, bookseller, of Cardiff, writes:

"I certainly think that a general lowering of the prices of books, more especially new novels, would lead to a much larger sale, and would eventually benefit the booksellers. As to authors and publishers I cannot offer an opinion, but they both seem to be quite capable of taking care of themselves."

A NORTH of England bookseller writes :

"Our experience of the further cheapening of books does not agree with the views expressed in the ACADEMY. Of course the scheme could not be said to have been tried until a work by a popular author was first published in a cheap form. We find that where a taste for reading exists, and the reader, on sanitary grounds, eschews books from a public library, the question of price makes little or no difference. There is an example, during the past few years, of a better and larger book being published at three shillings and sixpence, which sold fairly well when, a year or two later, a smaller and inferior book by the same author came out at six shillings, which seemed to be quite as successful. It is a lamentable fact that there are hundreds of thousands of well-educated people who rarely buy books. We do not think the question of price has much to do with it; a cultivation of the taste for reading would do more to improve matters. With reference to the success of new books of poems, travel, &c., at one shilling, we might quote the re-issue of 'Nansen' in monthly parts, which appears to have caught on. The question raised at the Booksellers' Dinner is only trailing a red-herring across the scent; the question to face is purely a business one—how to prevent the further decrease of booksellers in the provinces? It cannot 'be to the interests of literature' that booksellers are gradually declining to stock new books, on account of being expected to sell them at cost price, and giving their attention to non-copyright works, stationery and fancy goods. It was the remark of a well-known dealer, 'that a book-store nowadays is like a cross between a toy-shop and a railway bookstall.'"

OXFORD.

MR. B. H. BLACKWELL, the well-known Oxford bookseller, writes :

"I have some difficulty in answering your questions as to the probable effect of a further cheapening of books upon the trade generally, because my experience does not extend far beyond the limits of the University of Oxford, where book-lovers abound.

It is, of course, quite true that there are 'hundreds of thousands of well-educated people who rarely buy books.' They will beg, borrow and—forget to return them, but only in the last resort spend money on them; and I doubt if a general reduction in the original price of first-rate literature would induce this class of consumers to buy books to such an increased extent as to make the change beneficial either to producers or distributors."

CHELTEMHAM.

MR. JOHN M. BANKS :

"More books would be sold at a cheap price, but I do not think in sufficiently large numbers to pay the author. Expensive books like Nansen's Farthest North, Lord Roberts's Forty-One Years in India, Lord Tennyson's Life, &c., show that the public will buy books at any price if they wish for them. The great hindrance to the sale of books is that it does not pay booksellers to push them, and that other goods take the first place in their efforts."

BOURNEMOUTH.

MR. HORACE G. COMMUN writes :

"In reply to your note re cheaper first issues of books of travel, essays, poems, &c., I do not for an instant believe that the additional number of readers would repay the publishers or authors for their experiment within a century. I am rather of the belief that if a book is worth anything, buyers are willing to pay a fair price for it, and that a cheapening of price will bring about a contempt for literature which I should be very sorry to see, and which would ruin a real bookselling business."

BRISTOL.

MESSRS. WILLIAM GEORGE'S SONS write from Bristol :

"We agree with Mr. Bryce, but the copyright owners are afraid. The cheap paper book for the 'new and popular' in fiction is the only thing to induce buying by stopping the borrowing. If the book be good, a good edition will follow and sell well; if bad, it is dead, and soon waste. You may put poetry and essays on the same footing; but cheap travel is a difficulty. Still, a more reasonable price for a good book in this department would bring as much grist to the copyright mill as the present heavy remainders possibly can."

THE WEEK.

PUBLISHING remains very inactive.

Messrs. Macmillan have begun the publication in four volumes of the late Prof. Huxley's contributions to scientific periodicals and societies. This work, which is entitled The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley, is being edited by Prof. Michael Foster and Prof. E. Ray Lankester, who in their Preface to the volume write as follows:

"When, after the death of the late Prof. Huxley, the question of the form of a memorial to him was being discussed, among the proposals made was one to republish in a collected form the many papers which, during wellnigh a half century of scientific activity, he contributed to scientific societies and scientific periodicals. It was felt that while his scientific treatises in the form of books, as well as his more popular writings, might safely be entrusted to the usual agencies of publication, there was a danger lest his exact scientific writings, scattered among many journals, might be in a part overlooked, or at least not gain that prominence in the eyes of students of biological science in times to come which was their due. And it was suggested that the financial responsibilities, by no means light ones, of publishing in an adequate form these collected scientific memoirs might be met out of the fund subscribed for a memorial. The Messrs. Macmillan, however, who for many years had had close relations as publishers with Prof. Huxley, very generously, as a contribution to the memorial, undertook all the financial responsibilities of the republication, provided that we would be willing to bear such editorial labours as might be necessary. This, of course, we were delighted to do; the reprinting and the reproduction of the illustrations were at once begun, and we are now able to offer the first volume, which will be followed as rapidly as possible by the others. So far as we can judge, the work will be completed in four volumes.

The papers are arranged in chronological order, and the present volume contains fifty memoirs originally published between 1847 and 1860. The list of papers which we propose to republish (and we have done our best to make the list complete) contains about two hundred titles, exclusive of the memoir on The Oceanic

Hydrozoa, published by the Ray Society in 1859, which, from its size and character, we have considered as an independent publication.

Huxley produced so great an effect on the world as an expositor of the ways and needs of science in general, and of the claims of Darwinism in particular, that some, dwelling on this, are apt to overlook the immense value of his direct original contributions to exact science. The present volume and its successors will, we trust, serve to take away all excuse for such a mistaken view of Huxley's place in the history of biological science. They show that quite beyond and apart from the influence exerted by his popular writings, the progress of biology during the present century was largely due to labours of his of which the general public knew nothing, and that he was in some respects the most original and most fertile in discovery of all his fellow-workers in the same branch of science."

THE flow of Guide and Tourist books has begun; and is likely to continue for many weeks.

ART.

MODERN ART AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

THE interest of the assemblage of more or less contemporary work at Knightsbridge, which has set the up-to-date public talking of all sorts of English and foreign names, is really to be found not so much in the merit of individual pictures, though that is naturally considerable, as in the exhibition of the tendencies of contemporary Painting. The organisers of the show have had ample material to draw upon, and they have drawn upon it freely. There has not been simply the effort to gather together a sufficient collection of works newly produced by adherents of this or that school with which they happened to have sympathy. There has been the task to show what excellent as well as what eccentric labours have been bestowed upon canvases Academies have never recognised, and how great, even now-a-days, is the variety of the efforts over which—in England, at least—no official benediction has yet been uttered. Of course, the Exhibition contains a great deal that of late years, at any rate, has not been without something approaching to official recognition in France. But even of the French works shown, some of the most interesting were long permitted to pine in the shade of Academic neglect. There is always a dominant party. The dominant party in Art, at any particular period, is not in the least likely—as revolutionaries continually forget—to be in possession of no valuable virtue, no saving grace. Ingres could not be worthless because Delacroix had merit, and Delacroix could not be altogether vicious because it had become impossible to deny the virtues of Ingres. But if it is safe to assume that the art that has been called to high places at the official board is not without the means to say something very substantial in justification of its honours, it is certain, likewise, that outside the favoured circles there will be representation of qualities it is not prudent to ignore. Right is upon the side of the Opposition as well as upon the side of the Government. And the main teaching of the Exhibition at Knightsbridge is that to the side of what may for a quarter of a century have been the Opposition in Painting, a large measure of right has attached. There is the teaching, likewise, that, at any particular period, and irrespective really of particular styles, it is the right of what we call the Opposition which is most borne in upon the younger practitioners of Art.

To the remark that at Knightsbridge every school is represented that has contributed an important following among the younger painters of to-day, it may possibly be objected that the Pre-Raphaelites are not present. The reply is easy. We need not answer, "Here, indeed, is Mr. Frederick Sandys, with a characteristic portrait." We may say, rather, the Pre-Raphaelite influence was chiefly felt before the period with which the Knightsbridge show is organised to deal. Its force was worn out by the time that Degas and Manet and Mr. Whistler became eminent. To-day it is a fashion of the dilettante, of the student whose tastes are literary and whose literature is lop-sided, of those who come to Modern Art with ideals founded on the performances of the Italian Primitives. Original people, who can think and see, do not for a moment assign to the Pre-Raphaelites that importance which it has long been the custom of the advocates of the movement to claim. Popular participators in its movement may get substantial prices at Christie's, because, among them, there happen to have been one or two men of genius. But the school is barren. Do not attribute to it the charm of Boutet de Monvel, the fascination of Mr. Byam Shaw.

Who are the people, then—not dominant in Academies, but dominant outside Academies—influencing widely and deeply the contemporary production? They are not Segantini and they are not Mathieu Maris: the one of them, a painter of interest, it is easy to over-rate, and the other, an executant of rare delicacy, a dreamer of chastened dreams, of which one values the dainty and pictorial chronicle. They are chiefly, perhaps, Degas and Manet, Whistler and Claude Monet, all of them represented at Knightsbridge, at first hand, by their own characteristic and delightful work, and represented again, at second-hand, by the works of those who have elected to follow them. The Impressionists of the New English Art Club are among the followers of one or other of them. The saner and more distinguished members of the Glasgow school are among the followers of them; and is not even the particular extravagance and eccentricity of method of which that Glasgow school also gives evidence, is it not but an exaggeration of the qualities of the masters—a hearkening, indiscreet, yet in intention faithful, to the precepts of genius?

And if these four masters have been and are to-day so very influential, what is it that they have given us? And again, what is it—precious, certainly, besides—which they have, to some extent, withheld? First, to the first question—we can, of course, but partially and roughly answer it. And then it must be remembered that the gifts of the one man, often differing from, have also often overlapped or coincided with, the gifts of another. I suppose the most prominent and general of the truths their work has brought home to us is the importance of the full acceptance by the painter of almost everything that is in modern life. That a given subject was "unpaintable" used ordinarily to be said. The answer of the realist, of the naturalistic, is simply, "Paint it." Manet would have told you—Degas to-day would tell you—that there is nothing common or unclean. Effectively Manet scarcely tells it you by his "Death of Maximilian"—a wonderfully dramatic dealing with contemporary history—but he tells it you by "Le Bon Bock," which, alas! is not at Knightsbridge. Degas tells it you in many a pastel whose ugliness of theme it has pleased M. de Toulouse Lautrec sometimes to overpass—he tells it you in "The Toilet of the Dancers" and in the ballet scene from "Robert le Diable," only in phrases polite and possible, and which all may accept. Would that there could have been shown too, along with his dancers of quick and sweeping gesture, though ugly of form, one or two of his racing scenes; one or two of his richly coloured windows of bonnet-shops, dressed with the last examples of "modes." But I am getting into detail, and the point was, the willingness of his devotion to all contemporary life. Whistler and Claude Monet, going with him a great way, would accept, I take it, with certain qualifications and reserves, the doctrine he must preach. Claude Monet—whose "Bassin d'Argenteuil," albeit it is, in all probability, a comparatively early picture, represents him so charmingly—is a master of the suavity and yet the splendour of outdoor light, the light of Paris, with its ciel plus spirituel et plus vivace, as Auatole France has it, than that of Italy. It is in the refinements of open-air light, and not in its brutalities, that he is accustomed to revel. Mr. Whistler takes modern life—glorifies modern life—but so daintily withal; at the very ends of his fingers; touches it with refinement and sensitiveness; beholds it with a selecting vision. One might go on to particularise—one might define these men's qualities and the inheritance we receive from them until one reached the length of a treatise, and not the length of a memorandum. I am driven to pass speedily to some brief answer to the second question with which this paragraph began—what is it, precious, also, no doubt, that these men have withheld? Or, since I do not think that they have themselves at all uniformly withheld it, what is it that some of them, at least, withheld in a measure, and that is withheld—often lost sight of altogether—by the younger men who have accepted, perhaps somewhat too exclusively, their influence?

A want of Composition, a poverty and scantiness of Design, are the less agreeable features that work done under the inspiration of these men presents. Look at the Cornish school, for instance, which owes something to these masters. So far as it can be said to have unity, to have any one characteristic, may it not be averred that while attentive to values, it loses sense of form, that in its realism of the enlarged photograph it loses dignity and individuality of vision and the attainment of intricate and ordered line! The masters themselves—the four of whom I have spoken—differ much in the extent to which they lose these things, Manet losing them most, Degas possibly next, Monet and Whistler very little; looking at the "Bassin d'Argenteuil" and at "Valparaiso Nocturne," and at "London Winter," one might almost say, not at all. And yet in the works, or some of the works at least, these men have influenced, disregard of Composition, ignorance, sheer ignorance of Design, is carried far. One may note an extreme instance. One is accustomed nowadays to the encounter with canvases as to which one feels that so little is their unity of being in them, so deficient are they in harmonious and complete structure, that they could without any kind of injury be extended at the top or to the bottom, to the right hand or to the left; but it is not often that their incompleteness is so wilful or so unobservant, so audacious or so little learned, as in the "Ernesta"—and Ernesta's nurse, it should be said, the lower half of her, rather—the "Ernesta" of Cecilia Beaux, who paints charmingly, moreover; whose "Dreamer" is so refined a treatment of so refined a human subject.

In these lines only a little has been indicated, where many words would have been needed to have explained and defined much, and to have carried the thought beyond the barest suggestion of it. But on this particular matter only one word. It shall be addressed to the rising. They have learnt much, many of them—they have often been apt pupils—they have absorbed sometimes all that study and admiration could allow them to absorb of the especial message of one or other of the men who to-day are recognised as the newer masters. Other masters have something to teach them. Leighton and Bouguereau even, whom they hold of small account, have qualities to which they have not attained. Is it Design that should be mastered, and harmonious intricacy of Line, the great masters of the Renaissance are not out of date by any means, nor are English Varley and George Barret, Turner and Richard Wilson.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

DRAMA.

WHILE the author and the chief actor in "Charley's Aunt" have been squabbling in the Law Courts as to the tens of thousands of pounds to which they are respectively entitled as their share in the profits of their joint work, the Royalty sees the advent of another new farce, which, if ingenuity and resource were the criterion of success, ought to rival that now historical production in the affections of the playgoing public. I refer to Messrs. George R. Sims and Leonard Merrick's "My Innocent Boy." In point of construction the peculiarity of this piece is that it attains by perfectly irreproachable means a climax of équivoque and flurry which the French dramatists, with curious unanimity, for five and twenty years or more have coupled with breaches of the marriage vow. The root idea is to present a respectable citizen leading a dual life. He is Mr. Smith at home and Mr. Jones elsewhere. At the crucial moment, the people who know him in one rôle, including his wife and mother-in-law—there is always a mother-in-law in the combination—meet him in the other; whence the desired game of hide-and-seek and hurry-scurry. In a score of versions this story has been told, the latest known to Londoners—"My Innocent Boy" excepted—being "Too Much Johnson." Messrs. Sims and Merrick, who may or may not be indebted to a German original—there is nothing distinctively French in their plot—arrive at this time-honoured climax by a new route, which is well worth travelling over for its own sake.

A MR. VALENTINE SMITH—there is reason in their choice of so common a name as Smith—has been brought up by his father under very straitlaced conditions; so that at thirty-six, when his scrupulous protector decides that he shall take a wife, he is supposed to be without any practical knowledge of the world. Unfortunately, Valentine is not all that he seems. He is actually a widower with a grown-up daughter, whom he maintains at a boarding school, where he passes as one Captain Smith. He had married secretly in his teens, and his wife dying after giving birth to his child, he has never ventured to tell his father the truth, the more so that this stern parent is of a violently choleric and explosive disposition. Naturally, he has also kept his terrible secret from the knowledge of his fiancée. On the eve of the marriage ceremony he takes a friend into his confidence, begging him to break the news to the parties concerned; but an untoward circumstance, sufficiently plausible in itself, prevents this being done, and Valentine is married for the second time with his unavowable past hanging like a millstone round his neck. By this means the dual personality so dear to the farce writer of all nations is established. The process is neat as well as novel, is it not?

THE second act, according to the convention of the genre, brings about the crisis. Under the pretext of having a business engagement in the country, Valentine visits the boarding-school for the purpose of arranging his daughter's nuptials with the local curate, to whom she has become engaged. The boarding-school furnishes a fresh and interesting scene, developing a phase of school-girl character which reminds one of the "Three Little Girls from School are We" of "The Mikado." For this alone the piece would be notable. A charming bevy of school-girls take a dancing lesson from their venerable French music master, and the approaching marriage of one of their number awakens the romance of their fresh young minds, especially as Miss Smith, while engaged to the curate—an amusingly foolish specimen of his class, with an inane simper and a predilection for jam with his tea—is notoriously in love with one of the young masters. Here our hero is Captain Smith, even to his own daughter; and soon, of course, the long arm of coincidence is at work to his detriment. The second Mrs. Smith happens to be a conspicuous lover of the truth. Indeed, she is in the habit of publicly lecturing on it, the result being that in her husband's absence from town on his supposed business she has accepted an invitation from a Mechanics' Institute adjoining the school to deliver an address there on her favourite theme. With her come the luckless Valentine's father and mother-in-law, and, as a local courtesy, the whole party are shown over the school at the very moment when the husband, supposed to be a hundred miles away, is in the thick of his negotiations with the schoolmistress and the curate. He runs up against them without the smallest warning. It is the function of the husband in such a plight to find a ready and plausible excuse for his presence, and Valentine rises to the occasion. But his troubles are then only beginning. To one section of the dramatis personæ he is plain Mr. Smith, newly married; to the other Captain Smith, with a marriageable daughter; and the problem he has to solve is how to escape from this complication with an unblemished character.

INTO the details of the action it is needless to enter. They are emphatically of the order that may better be imagined than described. The part of Valentine Smith is one that would have delighted Mr. Wyndham in the old days before he lapsed into social drama and sentimental comedy. In the hands of Mr. Sidney Drew, a young member of a famous American family of actors, it does not perhaps obtain all the illustration of which it is capable; but Mr. Drew's acting, marked though it be by a certain stolidity, suffices to keep the house in a roar of laughter. In escaping detection, Valentine is obliged to throttle his father almost to death in a dark room, to throw the curate out of the window, and finally, as a supreme expedient, to jump out of the window himself, an incident followed by the usual crash of flower-pots and cucumber frames outside. It is all screamingly funny, and not more deficient in plausibility than the farce-loving public are accustomed to. In the end, needless to say, the knot of the story is satisfactorily untied. The company is not of the best, but in addition to Mr. Drew a pleasurable impression is conveyed by Miss Furtado Clark as the young wife, Mr. H. Farmer as the curate, and others.

THE action of "My Innocent Boy," it will be seen, is much more ingenious than that of "Charley's Aunt," which consisted simply in Mr. Penley's dressing himself up in an old lady's clothes, while the humour evolved from it is at least as legitimate and certainly more plentiful. What it lacks in comparison with its predecessor is character—the stamp of a personality. On the stage, after all, it is character far more than ingenuity of construction or spice of dialogue that tells. Character was the secret of the success of "Our Boys," which, until "Charley's Aunt" put in an appearance, held the record for the longest continuous run which the English; or, indeed, any stage had known. The famous "butterman" endeared himself to the public by his good-hearted vulgarity. Similarly the popularity of "The Private Secretary" was determined by the character of the unsophisticated curate who "didn't like London." Character apart, there was nothing in these plays to single them out from scores of others of pretty much the same calibre which left no impression upon the public mind. It is the misfortune of "My Innocent Boy" that Valentine Smith, although the chief figure in a clever network of intrigue, is not a personality, and that Mr. Sidney Drew has no chance of making him one. Instead of being a notability, like Perkyn Middlewick or the Rev. Robert Spalding, he might, like a convict, be designated by a number. The distinction may appear over subtle, but after leaving the performance of "My Innocent Boy" one is prepossessed with a sense rather of the authors' cleverness than of the essential humanity of the central figure. Nothing endures on the stage but character. Dramatic methods come and go, but character lives always. The absence of character from his plays is one reason why Scribe, with all his prodigious ingenuity, is but the shadow of a name; and the same fate manifestly awaits Sardou—who is not a creator, but merely an accomplished faiseur.

J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COUNTRY OF KIDNAPPED.

SIR,—Mr. Buchan, in his interesting and suggestive article, declares "Stevenson was not an antiquary, and still less was he the painstaking minute geographer. . . . Now and then he made use of a tract of country which he knew like a book, as in the first half of Catriona and parts of St. Ives. But speaking generally, he romanced with his landscapes." In Catriona Mr. Buchan admits that the details in the Appin episode are most correct; "the landscape is irreproachable, and tradition is ready to confirm the author's apparently random guesses." Now, with all deference to Mr. Buchan's judgment, I am inclined to question the statement that Stevenson was no "painstaking minute geographer," or "that he romanced with his landscapes" generally. It is worth recalling what Stevenson has put on record in regard to his method of work. Dealing with his first book, Treasure Island, in the Idler, August, 1894, and deploring the loss of the original map, he says, "I have said the map was the most of the plot. I might almost say it was the whole. A few reminiscences of Poe, Defoe, and Washington Irving, a copy of Johnson's Buccaneers, the name of the Dead Man's Chest from Kingsley's At Last, some recollections of canoeing on the high seas, and the map itself, with its infinite, eloquent suggestion, made up the whole of my materials. It is, perhaps, not often that a map figures so largely in a tale, yet it is always important. The author must know his countryside, whether real or imaginary, like his hand; the distances, the points of the compass, the place of the sun's rising, the behaviour of the moon should all be beyond cavil. . . . With an almanack and the map of the country, and the plan of every house, either actually plotted on paper or already and immediately apprehended in the mind, a man may hope to avoid some of the grossest possible blunders." "With a map and an almanack," continues Stevenson, "a man will avoid such 'croppers' as befell Scott when he allowed the sun to set in the east, as it does in The Antiquary." "It is my contention—my superstition, if you like—that who is faithful to his map, and consults it, and draws from it his inspiration, daily and hourly, gains positive support and not mere negative immunity from accident. The tale has a root there; it grows in that soil; it has a spine of its own behind the words. Better if the country be real, and he has walked every foot of it and knows every milestone. But even with imaginary places he will do well in the beginning to provide a map. As he studies it relations will appear that he had not thought upon; he will discover obvious, though unsuspected, short-cuts and footprints for his messengers; and even when a map is not all the plot, as it was in Treasure Island, it will be found to be a mine of suggestion." I think the foregoing passages will convince most readers that Stevenson, who, on account of lifelong physical weakness, could not visit the scenes of his romances with the set purpose of collecting information on the spot after the fashion of certain novelists, as Mr. Buchan notes, yet took infinite pains over the geography of his romances.—I am, &c., D. STEWART.

Glasgow: May 14.

SIR,—I do not think that the tradition current in Appin agrees with Mr. Buchan's informant, who said Alan Breck was the murderer of Colin Glenure. Nor was Mr. Lang's Badenoch man nearer the mark in laying the blame on a Cameron. Of course, the contradiction to this would come with more force from one of another name; but I enter my protest for what it is worth. I first heard the story from my mother, a Macintyre, born and brought up in Glencoe, and I have heard it told by others always to the same effect. Briefly, Mr. Stevenson is right when he says in the Dedication of Kidnapped that, "If you inquire you may even hear that the descendants of 'the other man' who fired the shot are in the country to this day. But that other man's name, inquire as you please, you shall not hear." I do not feel at liberty to disclose the other man's name; but this much may be said, that an Appin man fired the shot, and that his descendants are said to this day to feel the weight of the curse laid on the family of the murderer.

As to Alan's stature, we have better evidence than even that of Sir Walter Scott's friend. In one of the declarations printed in the contemporary report of the trial, it is remarked upon as wonderful that the "short coat fitted him, as Alan was a large man, and the declarant (James Stewart) a little man." In another declaration Alan is described as "a tall pock-pitted lad, with very black hair, and wore a blue coat and metal buttons, an old red vest and breeches of the same colour."

The hiding of the arms is not an invention of Mr. Stevenson's, as Mr. Buchan supposes. It also is to be found in the evidence. The gun with which it was alleged the deed was done had its lock fastened with one screw and a bit of string, and on the last occasion of which it was admitted the gun had been used, it "misgave thrice at a black cock, and went off at the fourth time without hitting anything." Hardly the sort of weapon a soldier would have chosen when better guns were to be had.—I am, &c.,

D. L. CAMERON.

6, Lonsdale-terrace, Edinburgh:

May 18.

BIBLICAL REVISERS.

SIR,—In the guess that your readers may be interested in a predecessor of Mr. Swan, I have made some quaint extracts from a paraphrase of the Scriptures which was given to an unresponsive world in the year 1768 by one Ebenezer Harwood. The full title of the work is, A Liberal Translation of the New Testament; being an attempt to translate the Sacred Writings with the same Freedom, Spirit, and Elegance with which other English Translations from the Greek Classics have lately been executed. The preface contains this passage:

"The author knew it to be an arduous and invidious attempt . . . to diffuse over the sacred page the elegance of modern English, conscious that the bald and barbarous language of the old vulgar version hath acquired a venerable sacredness from length of time and custom. . . . But notwithstanding this persuasion he flattered himself that . . . men of cultivated and improved minds, especially YOUTH could be allured by the innocent stratagem of a modern style to read a book which is now, alas! too generally neglected and disregarded by the young and gay, as a volume containing little to amuse and delight."

As a specimen of Mr. Harwood's elegant modern English, let us take his story of the Prodigal Son (Luke xv.):

"(11) A gentleman of a splendid family and opulent fortune had two sons. (12) One day the younger approached his father, and begged him in the most importunate and soothing terms to make a partition of his effects betwixt himself and his elder brother. The indulgent father—overcome by his blandishments, immediately divided all his fortunes betwixt them. (13) A few days after, the younger brother converted all the estates that had been thus assigned him into ready money—left his native soil, and settled in a foreign country—where by a course of debauchery, profligacy, and every expensive and fashionable amusement and dissipation, in a very short time, he squandered it all away. (14) As soon as he had dissipated his fortune, and was now reduced to extreme indigence, a terrible famine visited the country in which he resided and raged with such dire and universal devastation that he was in want even of the common necessities of life. (15) Finding himself now destitute of bread, and having nothing to eat to satisfy a raging appetite he went to an opulent citizen, and begged him in the most supplicant terms that he would employ him in any menial drudgery. The gentleman hired him and sent him into his field to feed swine. (16) Here he was so dreadfully tormented with hunger that he envied even the swine the husks which he saw them greedily devour—and would willingly have allayed with these the dire sensations he felt—but none of his fellow servants would permit him. (17) But reflection, which his vices had kept so long in a profound sleep, now awoke. He now began to review the past scenes of his life, and all the plenty and happiness in which he had once lived now rushed into his mind. 'What a vast number of servants,' said he, 'hath my father—who riot in superfluous abundance and affluence—while I am emaciated and dying with hunger. (18) I am determined to go to my dear aged parent, and try to excite his tenderness and compassion for me.—I will kneel before him and accost him in those penitent and pathetic terms: "Best of parents! I acknowledge myself an ungrateful creature to heaven and to you! (19) I have rendered myself, by a long course of many shameful vices, unworthy of the name of your child! Condescend to hire me into your family in the capacity of the meanest slave." (20) Having formed this resolution he travelled towards home, without clothes and without shoes with all the haste that a body pining with hunger and exhausted by fatigue could make. When he was now come within sight of home, his father saw him at a distance, knew him, and was subdued at once with paternal tenderness and pity. He rushed to meet him with swift and impatient steps—folded him in his arms—imprinted a thousand ardent kisses on his lips—the tears straying down his venerable cheeks and the big passions that struggled in his breast choking his utterance. (21) After some time the son said—"Best and kindest of parents! I have been guilty of the blackest ingratitude both to God and to you; I am unworthy even to be called your child." (22) His father without making any reply to these words, called his servants, saying, 'Bring hither a complete suit of the best apparel I have in the house; (23) And do you fetch the fat calf from the stall, and kill it, for we will devote this day to festivity and joy. (24) For this is my son! He—whose death I have so long and bitterly deplored, is yet alive—Him, whom I believed had miserably perished, I have now recovered!' A most splendid entertainment was accordingly prepared—and every heart was dilated with transport on this happy occasion."

It is hard to insinuate oneself into a mind so constituted as Mr. Ebenezer Harwood's. Of his genuine belief in the necessity for his "innocent stratagem" there can be, how ever, no doubt: the moderniser was as sincere as he could be. He was also as thorough. The two words, for example, which constitute the 35th verse of John xi. would seem, in any age, to need no revision. But to Mr. Harwood's mind there was something bold and barbarous in the participle "wept." Hence his elegant amendment: "Jesus burst into a flood of tears."—Yours, &c.

A. T. H.

Shrewsbury.

VANDALISM AT HAMPSTEAD.

SIR,—The threatened attack upon those delightful eighteenth century buildings forming Church-row—a calamity foreshadowed in my communication to your paper of November 27 last—has now unhappily begun. Half-a-dozen poles in front of an old-world mansion and its garden on the immediate right as one enters from busy Heath-street proclaim the commencement of hostilities. Who shall say where, or when, these are likely to stop? Already, indeed, the adjoining house is marked for destruction, as proved by its skeleton walls.

And what are we to get in exchange for this sacrifice of unique exteriors? Flats. No doubt they will be as commodious, desirable, and possibly as self-contained as dozens of other blocks scattered over our salubrious suburbs. But the fact remains that they will be flats, whose frontages must contrast horribly with such venerated elevations as may be left to us, let the architect's desire to preserve the character of Church-row be ever so well-intentioned.

Here, then, we have a bitter example of the triumph of the speculative builder over a lively sentiment of preservation. The result illustrates how futile are remonstrances unallied with the persuasiveness of lucre. Some of us had fondly imagined that, through long acquaintance, the parish had acquired a prescriptive ownership over this choice locality. Such hopes were obviously fallacious. Church-row must be "modernised" with the rest. Would that the recently launched Hampstead Antiquarian and Historical Society were a few years older that it might have come to the rescue ere this. One of its avowed objects being the protection of such spots as this from "needless violation," there can be little doubt a powerful ally has joined forces against the despoiler.

CECIL CLARKE.

Hampstead: May 16.

THE SPELLING OF "SHAKSPERE'S" NAME.

SIR,—In that very valuable little book (which I fancy can be had for the asking), "Rules for Compositors and Readers employed at the Clarendon Press, Oxford," compiled by Mr. Horace Hart, and revised by Dr. J. A. H. Murray and Mr. Henry Bradley, we find the following instruction: "Shakspere is scholarly, as—the New Shakspere Society.—Dr. J. A. H. Murray. (But the Clarendon Press is already committed to the more extended spelling.—H. H.)"

A sort of editorial carte and tierce that reads somewhat curiously!—Yours, &c.,

G. S. LAYARD.

Malvern.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, May 19.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &amp;c.

OUR PRAYER BOOK: SHORT CHAPTERS ON THE HISTORY AND CONTENTS OF THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. By H. C. G. Moule, D.D. Seeley & Co.

THE CROSS AND THE SPIRIT: STUDIES IN THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS. By the Rev. H. C. G. Moule, D.D. Seeley & Co.

THE NEW TRINITY AND THE MOUNT CALLED SUPERSTITION. By Auden Amyand. Watts & Co. 9d.

SUNDAY READINGS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS, FOUNDED ON THE CHURCH CATECHISM. By the Rev. E. Vine Hall, M.A. S.P.C.K.

SERMONS. By the Rev. Frederick W. Robertson. (Preached at Brighton.) Kegan Paul. 1s. 6d.

LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By A. S. Aglen, D.D. Edward Arnold. 4s. 6d.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

CHARLES GRANT: THE FRIEND OF WILLIAM WILBERFORCE AND HENRY THORNTON. By Henry Morris. S.P.C.K.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN. Andrew Melrose.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH DEMOCRATIC IDEAS IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By G. P. Gooch, M.A. Cambridge University Press.

SOPHIE ARNOULD: ACTRESS AND WIT. By Robert B. Douglas. With seven Copperplate Engravings by Adolphe Lalauze. Charles Carrington.

BRENTFORD: LITERARY AND HISTORICAL SKETCHES. By Fred Turner. Elliot Stock.

COLONIAL CHURCH HISTORIES: THE CHURCH IN THE WEST INDIES. By A. Caldecott, B.D. THE AUSTRALIAN CHURCH. By Edward Symons. S.P.C.K.

W. G. WELLS, DRAMATIST AND PAINTER. By Freeman Wells. Longmans, Green & Co.

DAVID BROWN, D.D.: A MEMOIR. By William Garden Blaikie. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

THE TRAGEDIES OF EURIPIDES IN ENGLISH VERSE. By Arthur S. Way, M.A. Vol. III. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

GREEK TRAGEDY IN THE LIGHT OF VASE PAINTINGS. By John H. Huddilston. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

IAN AND EDRIC: A POEM OF OUR OWN DAY. By Don Antonio Mirandola. R. D. Dickinson & Co. 1s.

ENGLBERG, AND OTHER VERSES. By Beatrix L. Tollomache. Second edition. Rivington's.

DAY DREAMS OF A SCHOOLMASTER. By D'Arcy W. Thompson. Isbister & Co. 5s.

THE EPIC OF SOUNDS: AN ELEMENTARY INTERPRETATION OF WAGNER'S NIBELUNGEN RING. By Freda Winworth. Second edition. Simpkin & Co., Ltd.

INTERLUDES: SEVEN LECTURES DELIVERED BETWEEN THE YEARS 1891 AND 1897. By the late Henry Charles Banister. Collected and edited by Stewart Macpherson. George Bell & Sons. 5s.

THE "POCKET FALSTAFF" SHAKESPEARE: ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA, AND THE FIRST PART OF KING HENRY THE FOURTH. Bliss, Sands & Co.

THE GROWTH AND INFLUENCE OF MUSIC IN RELATION TO CIVILISATION. By H. Tipper. Elliot Stock.

ESSAYS, MOCK-ESSAYS, AND CHARACTER SKETCHES. Reprinted from the Journal of Education. William Rice. 6s.

SONNETS ON THE SONNET: AN ANTHOLOGY. Compiled by the Rev. Matthew Russell. Longmans, Green & Co.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

WITH SKI AND SLEDGE, OVER ARCTIC GLACIERS. By Sir Martin Conway. J. M. Dent & Co.

A JOURNAL OF THE FIRST VOYAGE OF VASCO DA GAMA, 1497—1499. Translated and edited, with Notes, an Introduction, and Appendices, by E. G. Ravenstein, F.R.G.S. The Hakluyt Society.

FIVE YEARS IN SIAM. From 1891 to 1896. By H. Warrington Smyth. 2 vols. John Murray. 24s.

BLACK'S GUIDES: MATLOCK, DOVEDALE, AND CENTRAL DERBYSHIRE; BUXTON AND THE PEAK COUNTRY; BRIGHTON AND ENVIRONS; DEVONSHIRE; CORNWALL. A. & C. Black.

WARD, LOCK & Co.'s ILLUSTRATED GUIDES: THE ISLE OF WIGHT; OBAN, FORT WILLIAM, AND THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS; ILFRACOMBE, BARNSTABLE, &c.; TORQUAY, PAIGNTON, DARTMOUTH, &c.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. announce that they will issue North's Plutarch, in 10 vols., in the "Temple Classics." In the same series they will issue this month Ben Jonson's Discoveries, edited by Israel Gollancz, More's Utopia, and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. In June Thackeray's Esmond, edited by Walter Jerrold.

In the "Temple Dramatists" this month will appear Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle, edited by F. W. Moorman, Ph.D., and in June Otway's Venice Preserved.

In the series of "Lyric Poets" Browning will be the next volume.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS writes: "May I point out that Dr. Campbell Oman's Where Three Creeds Meet is 3s. 6d., and not 6s., as it was stated in your issue of May 14?"

It will interest many to learn that Vol. I. of the English Dialect Dictionary, published by Mr. Henry Frowde, is now completed by the issue of Part 5. This part contains the introductory matter for the whole volume. The Preface gives a full and interesting account of the origin and progress of the work from its very beginning. It has taken hundreds of people, in all parts of the United Kingdom, twenty-three years to collect the material for the dictionary.

MR. MARTIN A. BUCKMASTER has prepared a text-book on Elementary Architecture. This work is to have thirty-eight full-page illustrations, and it will be published by the Clarendon Press.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

A HISTORY OF THE ART OF WAR. The Middle Ages, from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Century. By C. W. OMAN, M.A., Fellow of All Souls', Oxford. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 21s.

Mr. Oman is engaged on a History of the Art of War, of which the above, though covering the middle period from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the general use of gunpowder in Western Europe, is the first instalment. The first battle dealt with will be Adrianople (375) and the last Navaretta (1367). There will appear later a volume dealing with the Art of War among the Ancients, and another covering the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries.

The book deals mainly with tactics and strategy, fortifications, and siegecraft, but subsidiary chapters will give some account of the development of arms and armour, and of the various forms of military organisation known to the Middle Ages.

THE EASTERN QUESTION IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By ALBERT SOREL of the French Academy. Translated by F. C. BRAMWELL, M.A., with an Introduction by R. C. L. FLETCHER, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With a Map. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

This book is a study of the political conditions which led up to and governed the first partition of Poland, and the Russo-Turkish War of 1769-1774. It is probably the best existing examination of Eastern European politics in the eighteenth century, and is an early work of one of the ablest of living historians.

THE EARLY PUBLIC LIFE OF WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE. By A. F. ROBBINS. With Portraits. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The earlier years of Mr. Gladstone's political life stand out all the more finely, and leave a more enduring impression because of the absolute truthfulness and conscientiousness with which the record has been perned."—Glasgow Herald.

THE POEMS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE WYNDHAM, M.P.

Demy 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

This edition contains the "Venus," "Lucrece," and Sonnets, and is prefaced with an elaborate introduction of over 140 pp.

"One of the most serious contributions to Shakespearean criticism that has been published for some time. Its publication assures to Mr. Wyndham an honourable place among men of letters."—The Times.

"Readers owe him a large debt of gratitude for showing them how Shakespeare's poems should be approached and studied, and for teaching them how books about him should be written."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Wyndham's notes are admirable, even indispensable."—Westminster Gazette.

"The standard edition of Shakespeare's poems."—World.

"There is not a page that is not interesting, stimulating, the fruit of original thought and honest work."—Outlook.

THREE YEARS IN SAVAGE AFRICA. By LIONEL DECLE With an Introduction by H. M. STANLEY, M.P. With 100

Illustrations and 5 Maps. Demy 8vo, 21s.

"It will take a permanent place among the very best books of travel. It combines solidity and liveliness, and carries the reader gaily through. A fine full book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Abounding in thrilling adventures and hairbreadth escapes."—Daily Telegraph.

WITH THE MOUNTED INFANTRY AND MASHONALAND FIELD FORCE, 1896. By Lieut.-Colonel ALDERSON.

With numerous Illustrations and Plans. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"A clear, vigorous, and soldier-like narrative."—Scotsman.

"One of the most readable bits of military chronicle."—Globe.

"A very useful addition to the library of South African warfare."—Morning Post.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. A New Edition, Edited, with Notes, Appendices, and Maps, by J. B. BURY, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. In 7 vols. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 8s. 6d. each; crown 8vo, 6s. each. Vol. V.

THE GOLFING PILGRIM. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very pleasant reading—will charm all golfers."—Times.

"Without 'The Golfing Pilgrim' the golfer's library will be incomplete."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Full of useful information, with plenty of good stories."—Truth.

"We can recommend few books as better company."—St. James's Gazette.

THE MINISTRY OF DEACONESSES. By Deaconess CECILIA ROBINSON. With an Introduction by the LORD BISHOP of WINCHESTER and an Appendix by Professor ARMITAGE ROBINSON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE LIBRARY OF DEVOTION.

Pott 8vo, 2s.; leather, 3s.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. By JOHN KEBLE. With Introduction and Notes by WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College, Ireland Professor at Oxford.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. Newly Translated, with an Introduction and Notes, by C. BIGG, D.D., late Student of Christ Church.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. A Revised Translation with an Introduction, by C. BIGG, D.D., late Student of Christ Church.

Dr. Bigg has made a practically new translation of this book, which the reader will have, almost for the first time, exactly in the shape in which it left the hands of the author.

NEW NOVELS.

THE STANDARD BEARER. By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "Lochinvar," "The Raiders," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A fascinating love-story."—Glasgow Herald.

"A delightful tale."—Speaker.

"Mr. Crockett at his best."—Literature.

"Of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

THE CROOK OF THE BOUGH. By MENIE MURIEL DOWIE, Author of "A Girl in the Karpathians," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Bright sayings are scattered liberally."—Daily Mail.

"An exceptionally clever and well-written book, subtle and thoughtful."—Daily Telegraph.

"We have not recently read any novel which yields such complete literary pleasure. Miss Dowie knows the Near East and writes of it with sympathy and imagination. .... One of the best stories that the present publishing season has produced."—Westminster Gazette.

A ROMANCE OF SPANISH WARFARE.

SONS OF ADVERSITY. By L. COPE CORNFORD, Author of "Captain Jacobus." Crown 8vo, 6s.

MISS ERIN. By M. E. FRANCIS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A clever and charming story."—Scotsman.

"Told with much force and sympathy."—Westminster Gazette.

"Perfectly delightful in its mingled humour, pathos, and human sympathy."—Daily Mail.

VAUSSORE. By FRANCIS BRUNE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A noble, complete achievement."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE PHILANTHROPIST. By LUCY MAYNARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A delineation of life in a large orphan asylum. The story has a strong love interest."—Academy.

"It contains many graphic sketches of the private life of a charitable institution."—Glasgow Herald.

CROSS TRAILS. By VICTOR WAITE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Every page is entralling."—Academy.

"Mr. Waite's descriptive powers are of a high order."—Daily Chronicle.

"Full of strength and reality."—Athenæum.

"There is real power in this book, as well as an abundance of exciting incident."—Speaker.

BIJLI THE DANCER. By JAMES BLYTHE PATTON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is powerful and fascinating."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A true and entrancing book."—Country Life Illustrated.

"A clever study of life in India."—Yorkshire Post.

A TALE OF WAR WITH SPAIN.

ACROSS THE SALT SEAS. By J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A thoroughly excellent story."—Daily Mail.

"The very essence of the true romantic spirit."—Truth.

"An ingenious and exciting story."—Manchester Guardian.

"Will have a long life as a book of romantic adventure."—Westminster Gazette.

"Once you begin, you read every page."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A fine, exciting, and admirably told story."—St. James's Budget.

BETWEEN SUN AND SAND. By W. C. SCULLY, Author of "The White Hecatomb." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A really interesting and romantic book."—Scotsman.

"The reader will find the interest of absolute novelty."—Graphic.

"Strong, simple, direct."—Daily Chronicle.

"The reader passes at once into the very atmosphere of the African desert; the inexpressible space and stillness swallow him up, and there is no world for him but that immeasurable waste."—Athenæum.

"One of the most entralling tales we have read in recent times."—World.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S CATALOGUE and NEW BOOK GAZETTE sent to any address.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1360.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1898.

PRICE 3d. [Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms. CATALOGUES on application. DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

3D. in the 1s. Discount off most New Books. CATALOGUES post free on application. Orders despatched by return of post. HENRY J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller, 57, Wigmore Street, London, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford. CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING. NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SELL & RAILTON. Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing Illustrated and other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast setting and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation. Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals. Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted. Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 13, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses E. & J. PERRY, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.) WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY OFFICE, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London. TWO-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO PER CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS HAVENSCHOFF Manager.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

THURSDAY NEXT, MAY 28th, at 3 o'clock.—Professor S. H. BUTCHER, LL.D., LL.M., Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh.—FIRST OF TWO LECTURES on "LITERARY CRITICISM IN GREECE." Half-a-Guinea the Course. THURSDAY, JUNE 2nd, at 3 o'clock.—EDWARD E. KLEIN, M.D., F.R.S., Lecturer on Physiology at St. Bartholomew's Hospital.—FIRST OF TWO LECTURES on "MODERN METHODS and their ACHIEVEMENTS in BACTERIOLOGY." Half-a-Guinea. SATURDAY, JUNE 4th, at 3 o'clock.—RICHARD CATON, M.D., F.R.C.P.—FIRST OF TWO LECTURES on "THE TEMPLES and RITUAL of ASKLEPIOS at EPIDAUROS and ATHENS." (With Lantern Illustrations.) Half-a-Guinea.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Fallioz, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE Co., LD., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—FORTH-COMING EXAMINATION.—JUNIOR ASSISTANT in the ART BRANCH of the SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM (18-20) 1st JUNE. The date specified is the latest at which Applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Singing, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an unexceptional English Chaperon. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 30 Guineas a quart.—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street, London E.C.

RELIABLE MAN.—SITUATION WANTED, as CLEANER, CLERK, or PORTER. Well up in Pictures and Books. Capable Photographer. Careful, energetic, and best references. 2s. per week.—Address E. L. LEWINGTON'S, 21, Highgate Hill.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No money. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with Manager.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

AS ASSISTANT LIBRARIAN, LITERARY ASSISTANT, or in any similar capacity.—GRADUATE (25) DESIRES EMPLOYMENT. Wide reading in English and French Literature and elementary German; experience in library management.—Write "RZANER," care of Willings', 162, Piccadilly.

JUST OUT.—At all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls.

THE FELLOW-PASSENGERS: a Mystery and its Solution. A New Detective Story. By RIVINGTON PYKE, Author of "The Man who Disappeared." Long 12mo, 132 pp., cloth, 1s. 6d.; sewed, 1s.

FAME THE FIDDLER: a Theatrical Novel. By S. J. ADAIR FITZ-GERALD. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. "A very human book, and an amusing one as well. It reminds us of 'The Merry'." Some of the characters are so true to life that it is impossible not to recognise them."—Standard.

THE DEVIL in a DOMINO: a Startling Story. By CHAS. L'EPINE. Long 12mo, 128 pp., cloth, 1s. "Written with remarkable literary skill, and is undeniably fascinating."—Truth.

SISTERS by the SEA: Seaside and Country Sketches. By CLEMENT SCOTT. Long 12mo, 150 pp., cloth, 1s. "Bright, breezy, and altogether readable."—Sheffield Telegraph.

THE WHEEL of LIFE. By CLEMENT SCOTT. New Edition, with Portrait by J. Mordecai. Crown 8vo, 120 pp., buckram, gilt lettered, top edge gilt, 2s. "The story Mr. Scott has to tell is full of varied interest, and is presented with warmth and buoyancy."—Illustrated London News.

THE ART of ELOCUTION and PUBLIC SPEAKING. By ROSS FERGUSON. Introduction by GEORGE ALEXANDER. Dedicated, by permission, to Miss ELLEN TERRY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. "A useful little book. We strongly recommend it to the chairmen of public companies."—Australasian Mail.

London: GREENING & CO., 20, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road.

SALE BY AUCTION.

PALL MALL.—Frescoes by Bernardino Luini, alleged to have been removed many years since from the old oratory of San Ambrogio, Milan.

MESSRS. FOSTER respectfully announce for SALE BY AUCTION, at the GALLERY, 54, PALL MALL, on WEDNESDAY, the 8th JUNE, a most remarkable series of FRESCOES, in great part evidently the work of the master. They have been warehoused for many years, and bear no traces of restoration since they were transferred to canvas. They comprise a grand altar-piece, the Last Supper, two wings of many life-sized figures in ecstasy, four large panels, the Ascension of Christ, the Virgin Enthroned, the Agony in the Garden, and the Hall of Calphas; the Ceiling in five panels, the Lamb, Angels, and Winged Beasts.—May be viewed privately by appointment and publicly four days prior to the auction.—54, Pall Mall.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum. COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum. LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum. N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms. Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.) Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G. PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq. VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B. TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY. The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., Royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s. C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

New ready, demy 8vo, cloth extra, price 10s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES and METHODS of MISSIONARY LABOUR. By EDWARD BEAN UNDERHILL, Honorary Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society. "The large knowledge, the sound judgment, the strong practical sense, and the high-toned Christian enthusiasm of our dear friend has never been more conspicuously displayed."—Baptist Magazine.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS. By J. HUNT COOKE. A clear and concise Manual for all Public Speakers.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Furnival Street, E.C.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' LIST.

SEVENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.
THE POETRY of TENNYSON. By HENRY VAN DYKE. Much Enlarged.

The additions consist of a Portrait, Two Chapters, and the Bibliography expanded. The Laureate himself gave valuable aid in correcting various details. Mr. Gladstone warmly welcomed this book when it appeared.

"Mr. Elkin Mathews publishes a new edition, revised and enlarged, of that excellent work, 'The Poetry of Tennyson,' by Henry Van Dyke. The additions are considerable. It is extremely interesting to go over the bibliographical notes to see the contemptuous or, at best, contemptuously patronising tone of the reviewers in the early thirties gradually turning to civility, to a loud chorus of applause." Anti-Jacobin.

"Considered as an aid to the study of the Laureate, this labour of love merits warm commendation. Its grouping of the poems, its bibliography and chronology, its catalogue of Biblical allusion and quotations, are each and all substantial accessories to the knowledge of the author." Dr. RICHARD GAZETT, in the Illustrated London News.

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, 6s.
THE ADVENTURES of a GOLDSMITH. By the AUTHOR of "THE C MAJOR OF LIFE."

"... Dramatic, moving, and exciting. Mr. Bourchier's sketch of Paris during the Consulate is excellent, notably his description of Napoleon's visit to the Opera, and his history is refreshingly correct." Pail Mall Gazette.

"A brisk story of French intrigue and politics at the beginning of this century. Napoleon looms large therein. . . The writer is the author of that clever work, 'The C Major of Life.'—Academy."

Now Ready, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., with Cover and Title-page designed by the Author.

SOME WELSH CHILDREN. By the AUTHOR of "FRATERNITY."

"... The writer has the rare power of drawing children as they really are. As we read, her pages call up our own memories of the past in complete sympathy with these little Welsh girls. The sketch of the little brother is all his charm of promise and all the pathos of his early death is so touching, so really artistic and truthful, that it should have closed the book, and yet we should have been sorry to lose 'My Lord Taff'—that equine impostor. . . There is a great charm about the whole book."—Manchester Guardian.

"By no means a book to neglect is a sheet of character-sketches entitled 'Some Welsh Children.' The poetry of young life is in its pages, and much delicate observation as well as fancy. There is humour too, and those who do not know the Principality ought at least to make the acquaintance of young folks as charmingly natural and unconventional as the Welsh children whose day-dreams are enshrined in these imaginative pages."—Speaker.

Shilling Garland Series, No. IX. Now Ready.

LOVE SONGS and ELEGIES. By MANMORAN GROSE.

Shilling Garland Series, No. VIII. Twelfth Edition, Now Ready.

ADMIRALS ALL. By HENRY NEWBOLT.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

BLACKIE & SON'S NEW BOOKS.

THE VICTORIAN ERA SERIES.

Under the General Editorship of J. HOLLAND ROSE, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. In crown 8vo Volumes, cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUME.

English National Education: a Sketch of the Rise of Public Elementary Schools in England. By H. HOLMAN, M.A., formerly Professor of Education in the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

The Rise of Democracy. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, M.A.

The Anglican Revival. By Canon OVERTON, D.D.

John Bright. By C. A. VINCE, M.A.

Charles Dickens. By GEORGE GISSINO.

The Growth and Administration of the British Colonies. By the Rev. W. P. GRESWELL, M.A.

The Free-Trade Movement and its Results. By G. ARMITAGE-SMITH, M.A.

HIGHER ARITHMETIC and MENSURATION.

For Civil Service, University, Army, and Teachers' Examinations. By EDWARD MURRAY, Mathematical Master at the Civil Service Institute, Dublin. Crown 8vo, cloth, with Answers, 3s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY PHYSICS: Practical and Theoretical.

First Year's Course. By JOHN G. KERR, M.A., Head Master, Allan Glen's School, Glasgow. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY: Practical and Theoretical.

First Year's Course. By T. A. CHEETHAM, F.C.S., Chemistry Master, Allan Glen's School, Glasgow. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, OLD BAILEY.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

THE FIRST CROSSING OF NORTHERN TIBET

NOW READY.

THROUGH UNKNOWN TIBET.

By Captain M. S. WELLBY,
18th Hussars.

With Photogravure Frontispiece Portrait, and over 60 Full-Page and smaller Illustrations from Photographs, and including 12 Drawings by A. D. McCormick. With Maps and Appendices of the Flora, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 21s.

Prior to Captain Wellby and Lieutenant Malcolm, no one had attempted the exploration of Northern Tibet; there lay hundreds of miles untrudden. They accomplished their journey from Leh to Peking with success, after being about four months at an elevation of 16,000 feet above the level of the sea. During the latter part of the time they were in the same route as Dr. Sven Hedin, but in advance of him.

NEW VOLUME OF

"THE BUILDERS OF GREATER BRITAIN."
JOHN and SEBASTIAN CABOT: the Discoverers of North America. By C. RAYMOND BEAZLEY. Edited by H. F. WILSON. Frontispiece Portrait and Map. Cloth, 5s.

THROUGH THE GREAT NORTH-WEST. ACROSS the SUB-ARCTICS of CANADA

3,200 Miles by Canoe and Snowshoe through the Barren Lands. By J. W. TYRRELL, C.E., D.L.S. With List of Plants collected en route, a Vocabulary of Eskimo Words and Phrases, and a Route Map and full Classified Index. With 65 Illustrations from Photographs and from Drawings by Arthur Hemming. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

RALEGH'S EL Dorado.

BRITISH GUIANA; or, Work and

Wanderings among the Creoles and Coolies, the Africans and Indians of the Wild Country. By the Rev. J. CROOKALL, Author of "Books: How to Read and What to Read," "Topics in the Tropics," &c. With 28 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE MASTERS OF MEDICINE" SERIES.

SIR WILLIAM STOKES: his Life and Work (1804-1878). By his Son, WILLIAM STOKES, Surgeon-in-Ordinary to the Queen in Ireland. With 2 Photogravures. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The book before us is excellent... Will be read far beyond the bounds of the profession... This fascinating book."—Daily Chronicle.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PEOPLE OF CLOFTON."

The WHITE-HEADED BOY: a Novel. By GEORGE BARTRAM. Unwin's Green Cloth Library. 6s.

SIXPENNY EDITION.

MADEMOISELLE IXE.

By Lanoe FALCONER. Paper, 6d.
 * This is a reprint of the celebrated story which led off the "Pseudonym Library."

WORKS ON SPAIN.

THE MOORS in SPAIN. By Stanley LANE-POOLE. Sixth Edition.

SPAIN: from Moorish Conquest to Fall of Granada. By H. E. WATTS.

Each with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

London:

T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

The First Large Edition being exhausted of MR. BODLEY'S FRANCE

the SECOND IMPRESSION is Now Ready.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE. By JOHN BERWICK, Author of "The Secret of Saint Florel."

SCOTSMAN.—"The book will be read with great relish."

THE CONCERT-DIRECTOR. By NELLIE K. BLISSETT, Author of "The Wisdom of the Simple."

SCOTSMAN.—"A very fine romance. From first to last it maintains an unusually high level of literary excellence and imaginative power, and it contains several passages of rare dramatic vividness and intensity."

THE FOREST LOVERS: a Romance. By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "Pan and the Young Shepherd," "Earthwork out of Tuscany," &c.

THE GOSPEL of FREEDOM. By ROBERT HERRICK, Author of "The Man who Wins," &c.

Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

STUDIES in CURRENCY, 1898; or, Inquiries into certain Modern Problems connected with the Standard of Value and the Media of Exchange. By the Right Hon. Lord FARRER.

PART II. NOW READY.

BRITAIN'S NAVAL POWER: a Short

History of the Growth of the British Navy. Part II.—FROM TRAFALGAR to the PRESENT TIME. By HAMILTON WILLIAMS, M.A., Instructor in English Literature to Naval Cadets in H.M.S. Britannia. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

PRIMER of PSYCHOLOGY. By EDWARD BRADFORD TITCHENER.

JUNE NUMBER Now Ready of

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

Price 1s., contains—

THE TREASURY OFFICER'S WOOING. By Cecil Lewis. Chapters IV.-VI.

DISCIPLINE in the OLD NAVY. By H. W. WILSON.

AN ETON TUTOR—THEOCRITUS. By J. W. MACKAIL.

A COUSIN of PICKLE. By ANDREW LANG.

AN OLD GERMAN DIVINE. By W. GOWLAND FIELD.

COUNTRY NOTES. By S. G. TALLENTRE. III. The Inn.

A GENTLEMAN of SPAIN. By DAVID HANNA.

THE FRENCH ACADEMY—WILLIAM MORRIS. By STEPHEN GWYNNE.

Also Ready, JUNE NUMBER of

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d., contains—

The Spanish Armada.

Introduction by Captain ALFRED T. MAHAN.

THE FATE of the ARMADA. By W. F. TILTON.

Toledo, the Imperial City of Spain.

By STEPHEN BONSAL. With Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

Pictures for Don Quixote.

By W. D. HOWELLS. With Unpublished Drawings by VIREO.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

JUNE NUMBER of

S T. N I C H O L A S,

Illustrated, price 1s., contains—

A Stamp Collector's Experience.

By L. IRWELL.

My First Gun.

By Major J. B. POWD.

An Unwilling Balloonist.

By I. M. SROBRIDGE.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, LONDON.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                                 | PAGE    |
|---|---------|
| Wagner as Essayist ... ..                 | 567     |
| Sir Charles Gavan Duffy ... ..            | 568     |
| Boy or Girl? ... ..                       | 569     |
| Two New Volumes of Italian Poetry ... ..  | 570     |
| Nimrod's Masterpiece ... ..               | 571     |
| "'Tis Forty Years Since" ... ..           | 572     |
| In the Land of the White Elephant ... ..  | 572     |
| The First Philosophers of Greece ... ..   | 573     |
| BRIEF MENTION ... ..                      | 573     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..             | 575-578 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..                     | 579     |
| MR. GLAISTONE AS READER AND CRITIC ... .. | 582     |
| PURE FABLES ... ..                        | 587     |
| PARIS LETTER ... ..                       | 587     |
| THE BOOK MARKET ... ..                    | 588     |
| DRAMA ... ..                              | 588     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..                     | 589     |
| Announcements ... ..                      | 590     |

REVIEWS.

WAGNER AS ESSAYIST.

Richard Wagner's Prose-Works. Translated by William Ashton Ellis. Vol. VI. (Kegan Paul.)

WAGNER as musician has long since triumphed even over sceptical England, which for years sneered at him as a musical charlatan. On our present operatic stage, like Alexander he reigns, and reigns alone, without (to continue the quotation) a rival near the throne—for Verdi, great though his Otello be, is not of the same Titanic order. But who in England knows Wagner the essayist? Nay, for that matter, how many Englishmen know any of the great musicians who have likewise been writers on music—know them, that is, in their literary capacity? How many know Schumann as a writer? Nay, how many know Berlioz, who had a demoniacal verve in writing akin to his inextinguishable ardour in music? Not surprising is it, therefore, if few know Wagner the littérateur. For Wagner has not the advantages of Berlioz—those advantages which ought to make Berlioz the most popular of musical critics, did we possess any translation of his voluminous critical papers—his clearness, directness, barbed and arrowy point, his admirable virtuosity of style (as Wagner himself would call it). Wagner is regrettably hampered by the German vice of cumbrousness—that vice which seems inherent in the German tongue, and could not well be escaped by a musician seeking to express himself in a medium for which his immense and life-long study of music had left him scant opportunity to qualify himself. Yet he is no mere professorial pedant—he is too full of fierce energy for that; and every now and again he is as direct as heart could wish. But the essential difference between him and Berlioz—that other great musician-writer—lies deeper than any mere difference of style. Berlioz is a purely æsthetic and technical critic of music. Which is to say, he is a Frenchman. Wagner is a philosophic critic of music. Which is to say, he is a German. Now the ideas of any man who rests his ideas upon a philosophic basis must needs overflow beyond his individual craft. A philosophic poet will have ideas and interests beyond poetry, because his philosophy is of universal application; and so in other arts. Therefore, Wagner's essays extend far beyond the limits of mere music; though they usually revolve round music as their centre. Therefore, also, they are concerned with profound principles and conceptions which do not lend themselves to the vivacious and dashing style of a Berlioz; which demand a more remote expression. Only a very skilled littérateur—and not a German—could impart to the expression of them perspicuity and precision.

In compensation, as we have said, Wagner's interests are wide-reaching. He by no means straitens himself to mere technical criticism of music. Nothing he writes is devoid of interest. Such is the forcible originality of the man, that his most occasional manifestoes have strokes of individuality, have the image and superscription of Wagner. The papers collected in this sixth volume are mostly from his own periodical—the Bayreuther Blätter. It was in itself a wonderful thing. For the first time in musical history, a composer had his own organ like any Continental statesman, addressed to and read by his own followers throughout Germany. It was something much more than Schumann's paper—a musical paper addressed to the general musical public. The foundation-stone of the Bayreuther Blätter was the Wagner Verein, the societies established throughout Germany for the cultivation not only of the Wagner music, but of the Wagner principles in music; nay, as Wagner handled these Verein through his paper, of the Wagner principles with regard to the social order. The Browning Society is a most phantasmal image of the thing. That never extended beyond the cultivation of the master's poetry; above all, it was not in communication with the master. Here, in Germany, we perceive the astonishing spectacle of a united league, having ramifications throughout the country, having its own organ, addressed by the master himself through that organ, and devoted to propagating his views on music and society, no less than to propagating his actual compositions in music. Ruskin, with Fors Clavigera, is the nearest example which can make it intelligible to Englishmen.

Often, indeed, when Wagner is in the denunciatory mood, his Germanic cumbrousness drops off him; and he becomes fiercely direct after a fashion which strongly recalls the invective of Mr. Ruskin, so inspiring to those who sympathise with it, so irritating to those who do not. Take a very imperfect sample, chosen haphazard—by search we might find a closer parallel. But it perhaps better enforces the likeness because it is taken at random:

"Our little sheet will seem quite despicable in the eyes of the great papers. Let us hope they will pay no heed to it at all; and if they call it a nook-and-corner tract, in their sense that will be an inappropriate title, since our nooks extend over the whole of Germany. Nevertheless, we might gladly accept the anticipated nickname, and for sake of a good omen it brings to my mind. In Germany it is always the nook, and not the large capital, that has been in truth productive. What should we ever have got had we waited for the reflux from our great market-places, promenades, and Ring-strasses; what but the putrid leavings of a national production that had once flowed thither? A good spirit watched over our great poets and thinkers when it banned them from these larger towns of Germany. There, where servility and crudeness tear the morsel of amusement from each other's mouth, can nothing be brought forth, but merely chewed again. . . . As far as we are concerned, anyone in the capitals who does not seek himself a quiet 'nook'—in which, unheeded and unheeding, to puzzle out the riddle: 'What the German is?'—may be made a Privy Councillor, or what not, and despatched by the Herr Kulturminister to arrange the affairs of other musical centres upon occasion."

This is as direct, as full of denunciatory scorn for the worldly multitude, as anything in Ruskin. There is, moreover, a reason for such resemblance. The influence of Carlyle upon the later Ruskin is known and patent. Now, Wagner had read Carlyle, and more than once quotes him in this very volume.

But there is very much more in Wagner than mere gladiatorship. He is full of deep and illuminative thought. His philosophy is thorough and systematic, though it may commend itself to few. It is the philosophy of Schopenhauer, plus those Hindoo philosophies which are really the basis of Schopenhauer. Nobody with even a superficial knowledge of the Brahministic and Buddhist systems of philosophies can fail to trace their echoes in many a Wagnerian passage. Sometimes it is the Vedantine philosophy, sometimes the Buddhistic, but always it is well marked. Nor does he leave us to conjecture. He makes habitual and eulogistic reference to the Hindoo systems; nay, he shows a pretty close acquaintance with Hindooism in all directions. He derived one very fine and apt image from the distinction between Brahmins and Chandalas, with the legal ordinances pertaining to that distinction. We have no space to quote and explain the many profound philosophic utterances contained in the great musician's essays. But in another direction, where he commands a more peculiar and authoritative interest—in music pure and simple—these papers contain most enlightening deliverances. But here, also, space denies quotation, so much of explanatory context would it involve. Yet one citation we will make, on the method to be pursued by a really inspired dramatic composer in arriving at the motif appropriate to this or that character, in music-drama of the Wagnerian kind. We make it, because obviously it is nothing less than an autobiographic confession of what were the processes and phenomena of inspiration in his own case. For that reason it has a very special and personal interest—to those who can rightly follow and understand it. He recommends his would-be followers not to use a libretto unless they see in it a plot and characters that lively interest them. Then (he says to his supposed follower):

"Let him take a good look at the one character which appeals to him the most this very day; bears it a mask—away with it; wears it the garment of a stage-tailor's dummy—off with it! Let him set it in a twilight spot, where he can only see the gleaming of its eye; if that speak to him, the shape itself will now most likely fall a-moving, which perhaps will even terrify him—but he must put up with that; at last its lips will part, it opens its mouth, and a ghostly voice breathes something quite distinct, intensely seizable, but so unheard-of (such as the 'Guest of Stone, and surely the page Cherubino, once said to Mozart) that—he wakes from out his dream. All has vanished; but in the spiritual ear it still rings on; he has had an 'idea,' a so-called musical motiv; God knows if other men have heard the same, or something similar, before! Does it please X. Y., or displease Z.? What is that to him? It is his motiv, legally delivered to and settled on him by that marvellous shape, in that wonderful fit of absorption."

The "twilight-spot," of course, is the twilight of contemplation; and similarly the whole thing is an intensely personal confession, not to be understood unless by a musician of like dramatic genius; or perhaps a stray poet who has known something akin to it in the combination and birth of the images passing before his eye, with the words which they simultaneously dictate to him. With this we must take our leave of the book, merely referring to the excessively interesting and personal essay on Music Applied to the Drama. We congratulate Mr. Ashton Ellis on his enterprise in undertaking the translation of essays so outside the usual trend of English interest, but of great importance to all who would understand Wagner. The manner of his version, however, is somewhat to seek. Not only is he at times too Germanic—this may be pardoned in the case of a writer so difficult to reduce to idiomatic English as Wagner—but he has one or two of the worst vices of style prevalent in journalistic English, and forces those vices into horrible prominence. The "hanging participle" is peppered over his pages; and (worse still) the "split infinitive" is carried to night-marish lengths. We do not care to quote, because we do not care to emphasise objections to a sterling project, and most desirable project, carried out with thorough-going pains. We needed these Wagnerian prose writings, full of the master's depth and reach. And all who are not interested in Wagner to a merely superficial degree will welcome their translation, and thank the translator—blemishes of detail set aside. Here is the verbal speech of a transcendent artist, whose art was based upon a vast philosophy of life. Be that philosophy right or wrong, it cannot be neglected by those who would understand the aim of his musical speech. Therefore, we welcome what is (in effect) Wagner's musical speech translated by himself into prose. "Egad, the interpreter is the harder to be understood of the two!" That may be said; for there are many who can dimly follow the language of emotion, but are quite incapable of following the language of intellectual statement.

SIR CHARLES GAVAN DUFFY.

My Life in Two Hemispheres. By Sir Charles Gavan Duffy. (London: T. Fisher Unwin.)

IN the course of his long life, Sir Charles Gavan Duffy has written many volumes; indeed, it is as an Irish author that he will be remembered, rather than as an Irish politician; as editor of the famous Nation, biographer of Thomas Davis, historian of Young Ireland, rather than as an Irish agitator or legislator of the first order. Nothing that he has achieved for Ireland is of lasting value, except in so far as much of his literary work must retain an educational influence. He has emphatically been, in no bad sense, a man of words, not of deeds. It is curious, therefore, and almost amusing, to note his description of that Fenian leader, Mr. John O'Leary, who is to-day one of the best-known and most revered men in Ireland:

"He was a Fenian of a class which I had never seen before, and rarely afterwards; moderate in opinion, generally just to opponents, and entirely without passion or enthusiasm except a devoted love of Ireland. He was a great reader of books, and, I fear, a great dreamer of dreams."

Mr. O'Leary's "dream," which landed him in Portland, was the "dream" of Wolfe Tone, the United Irishmen, Lord Edward and Emmet; that "dream" of Irish action, in which alone Ireland has faith, and which is more practical than any pretty and impossible "union of hearts." Mr. O'Leary's one published book, his Recollections of Fenians and Fenianism, with its grim Tacitean terseness of phrase, its unsparing honesty, its passion without "bunkum" and "blarney," is a more expressive and effective work for Nationalist readers than the far more practised and fluent writings of his friend Sir Charles Gavan Duffy. "On our side," said Felice Orsini, speaking of Young Italy, "we have had the genius of words, but poverty in action": it has been far more true of Ireland. The greater part of these two large volumes is concerned with Ireland, from the leadership of O'Connell to the rise of Parnell, and mostly records the experiences and personal efforts of the writer. The remainder is devoted to his Australian life: this is fascinating and fresh, full of vigorous themes and suggestive thoughts, of picturesqueness and humour; but we can here make but one comment: The man, who in Ireland could not put his hand to any work, could not exercise his abilities in any direction, without running the risk, and often gaining the experience, of trial and imprisonment; the man, who in his native land found himself in constant conflict with the representatives of government and law, and whom they regarded as a dangerous and immoral person, a lawless firebrand; this man sets foot in Victoria, and becomes a valued, trusted, and prominent citizen in public life. He becomes Member, Minister, Premier, Speaker, K.C.M.G.; he shows himself a strong, able, and reasonable man of affairs. It is no new thing: he comes of that race which, proscribed at home, has given to British Colonies a host of leading administrators, and to foreign countries a host of marshals, generals, premiers, viceroys, presidents, men in all varieties of commanding position. When Patrick Sarsfield lay dying upon a foreign field, that chief of the "Wild Geese" cried, "Would God this blood were shed for Ireland!" And thousands of Irishmen with political genius and governmental faculty have saddened at the thought, that there was no room for their abilities in Ireland, without disloyalty to the ancient National cause. The two alternatives are "loyalty" to Ireland by "treason" to England, or exile from Ireland altogether. Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, after giving the best years of his life to Irish agitation, with no tangible result, exiled himself, and rose to the highest offices. But he and his countrymen, who are thus found worthy elsewhere, are treated by British Governments as fools or knaves, whose convictions about Ireland are beneath contempt or merit punishment. Truly a paradox. The distinguished writer's life in Ireland extends over a period of splendid patriotism, and tragic disappointment, and sickening apostasy; it embraces the rise and spread of "Young Ireland," the mournful decline of O'Connell, the abject collapse of Irish hopes, with which are associated in infamy the names of Keogh, Sadleir, and O'Flaherty. It is a period which witnessed a marvellous community of feeling between North and South, a great outburst of literary talent, the bringing of "a soul into Eirés"; it is rich with the names and memories of such irreproachable men as Davis, Martin, Smith O'Brien, of men fiery and vehement as Mitchel and Meagher. It saw the monster meetings of Tara and the quarrels of Conciliation Hall; it saw the young leaders of the Nation compelled, with aching hearts, to join issue against the veteran O'Connell, the "Liberator" turned timorous, if not treacherous. It abounded in notable characters and scenes, and through it all is felt the passion of a people, torn this way and that, but always passionate with one desire. The writer relates it all with admirable vividness and skill, with a constant wish, and one mostly realised, to be scrupulously fair to all. Even in the chapter devoted to the refutation of Mitchel's Jail Journal accusations, Sir Charles shows little animosity, which is the more praiseworthy in him, inasmuch as the Jail Journal, that fierce and fascinating book, is an Irish classic, and will be read by thousands upon thousands to the end of time. Then, Sir Charles gives us his reminiscences of famous men—Carlyle and Disraeli, Newman and Manning, Bright and Lowe, Browning and Thackeray, with many more. His book is not only for the "mere" Irishman, but includes plenty of attractions for those readers who may care nothing for the interminable sorrows and absurdities of Inisfail. He tells a good story well, and his volumes are full of them. An occasional drawback is his reference, for fear of repetition, to his earlier works, which deal more minutely with certain aspects and phases of the time; but this was perhaps inevitable.

Sir Charles was born in 1816: the memory of '98 was not twenty years old, and in his native Ulster it was naturally keen and strong. When, upon a certain historic day in the Phoenix Park, he, in conjunction with his young contemporaries, Davis and Dillon, formed their scheme of the Nation journal, it was plainly present to their minds that the principles, if not all the practices, of '98 were legitimate, and might have to be put into practice once more. It was upon that rock that the split with O'Connell occurred. It is a pathetic figure, the wonderful figure of O'Connell. "Mighty, magnificent, mean old man! Silver tongue, smile of witchery, heart of melting ruth! Lying tongue, smile of treachery, heart of unfathomable fraud!" So runs Mitchel's celebrated and cruel description of him: like all Mitchel's portraits, more plausible than subtle, and not quite free from personal feeling. The man whose eloquence of a thousand gifts had so stirred Ireland, that the cry for Catholic Emancipation became irresistible, could not believe that Repeal would not be won by the same means. Before vast multitudes in the open he threatened open war, and thought that the threat would wring Repeal from the British Ministry. It did not, and the Irish masses waited for his call to arms, which never came. Hoping against hope, broken in health, he shrank from his own promises and prophecies; he denounced and ridiculed the Young Irelanders, who were "ready to die" for Ireland. "You and I, boys, we'll live for Ireland." The glamour was dissolved, the charm broken; he turned more and more from action, and betook himself to constant prayer. He dies at last in Genoa, bequeathing his body to Ireland, his heart to Rome; and no "war" has come about from that day to this: there have been but the desperate efforts and futile results of Smith O'Brien and of the Fenians twenty years later. Had O'Connell dared to hold the prohibited meeting of Clontarf, '98 would have been repeated, and with excellent chances of success. His heart failed him, and his genuine sense of the horrors of war, always strong in him, prevailed over both patriotism and statesmanship. But it is touching to remember how those young men at whom he scoffed and with whom he quarrelled bore with his weakness to the last. One solace was always open to such men as Davis and the writer of these volumes: their educational work for Ireland, their literary propaganda by the dissemination of songs and essays, histories and biographies, their labours to create and foster the taste for patriotic knowledge. That is a weapon in which Sir Charles has never ceased to believe, never ceased to wield; and, assuredly, if the principles of '98 must be held in abeyance, this intellectual culture of the people is an infinitely better preparation for the final attainment of their liberties than such appeals to material interests as agrarian and like-minded movements. At a momentous time in the writer's fortunes, after his last trial and acquittal, two prominent Irishmen gave two strangely dissimilar pieces of advice. That most remarkable man, with a fighter's soul in a hunchback's body, James Fintan Lalor, counselled immediate insurrection in Munster. Dillon, the father of a present Irish leader, counselled the removal of the Nation to London, and the making it the organ, "not of Irish nationality alone, but of a philosophic radicalism embracing the whole empire." Here we have two characteristic dangers. Here is the demand for physical force at all costs at any time; and here is the "philosophic radicalism" which subordinates the national claims of Ireland to the supposed "rights of man" anywhere and everywhere. Both are disastrous for Ireland, but the latter is the worse of the two. Nationalism is an higher and more sacred thing than humanitarianism. But even Dillon's proposal was better than the various Irish movements which subordinate the national claim to some utilitarian or sectarian class interest; and do nothing to promote the unity of classes, for which the leaders in '98 so laboured. Sir Charles did what he could—revived the Nation in Dublin, promoted the Ulster League, took his part in "Parliamentary agitation," and a policy of independence upon Ministries, until the great betrayal took place, and the "Brass Band," with Ministerial bribes in their pockets, and broken oaths upon their consciences, drove him to despair of further usefulness in Ireland, and he became one of "the sea-divided Gael": no longer a suspect and criminal person, the supposed advocate of massacre and enemy of religion, but just what he was and is—an orderly, grave, devout, and accomplished man, fit to preside over legislative assemblies and the deliberations of statesmen. And yet there is no difference between the rebel "Duffy of the Nation" and Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, K.C.M.G. Strange English delusion that insists upon making one!

Great things have happened in and for and against Ireland since he left it to begin his brilliant career in another hemisphere; but Ireland has not been able to "recapture that first fine early rapture" of the Young Ireland days.

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very heaven."

In those days, of which he was pars magna, there was a spirit in Ireland, as passionate as that of '98, yet with something of a more spiritual refinement and intellectual purity. Sir Charles may well be proud to have been the friend, colleague, and biographer of the man, to whom the best of modern Irishmen have owed what is best in them—Thomas Davis. To his memory, and to the memory of the movement which he inspired, which he died too young to guide to triumph, Sir Charles Gavan Duffy has once more, in a work of the greatest value and charm, consecrated the best of his high ability.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

BOY OR GIRL?

Schenk's Theory—The Determination of Sex.
By Dr. Leopold Schenk, Director of the Embryological Institute at Vienna. Authorised translation. (The Werner Company.)

PROF. SCHENK'S "secret" is out. What Mudie will do with it, what the public will say to it, now that the curiosity aroused by newspaper hints can be gratified, remains to be seen. Probably it will be dropped like the proverbial hot potato. For Prof. Schenk's "secret" is not to be come at without much preliminary wading through matters physiological, and of a kind that the ordinary prudish person never mentions and can hardly bear to think of. The Malthusian literature of twenty years ago did not approach in frankness or circumstantiality this latest fruit of philosophy, written by an embryologist for embryologists, and, except indirectly, never intended for the public at all.

So much by way of preface, and as a warning to those who regard all particulars relating to the mode of our generation as indelicate. Sensibly minded people, of course, do not do so. To begin with, the historical sketch which precedes the actual subject-matter of Prof. Schenk's book, though simply and plainly written, is given in so brief a fashion, and so often consists of mere references to obscure works of science, that the general public could not be expected to grasp the full significance of all the facts and theories on which the author has based his own researches. Reduced to lowest possible terms, the two main theories in existence as regards the anterior determination of sex are, first, what is known as the "cross-heredity" theory; and, secondly, the law of Thury. The "cross-heredity" theory, which has had many respectable adherents, and which is supported to some extent by statistics, is to the effect that when one of two parents is sexually the superior the offspring is likely to be of the opposite sex. Thus, if the father be sexually superior to the mother, a girl may be expected to result, and vice versa. What "sexually superior" means cannot be exactly determined: it may be a temporary or a permanent condition; it may mean younger and more vigorous, better fed, or subject to stronger sexual excitement. An example of the kind of evidence on which such a theory is based may be found in an episode narrated by Felkin and Wilson, and quoted by Schenk. The Wagandas are a warlike, raiding race, killing the men and old women of their conquered foes, and leading the children, young women, and girls into captivity. On one occasion 486 of the women gave birth to children on their march. Of these 79 were boys and 403 girls. The inquirers, struck by this fact, found everywhere in the Sudan the same excess of girls. They also found that the women were harder worked, worse nourished, and more exhausted than the men.

Thury's law is based upon totally different lines, and relates to the state of ripeness of the ovum at the time of fecundation. For some time after the first development and disengagement of the ovum it is only partially ripe, and at such times will give rise only to females. When it is more completely ripe, males may result. Improbable as this theory sounds to ordinary ears, it has been made the subject of much controversy, and even experiment. Breeders have tried the effect of coupling at various stages of the rutting season, and though

Prof. Schenk, in the course of his essay, quotes one or two cases in which the results were alleged to be confirmatory, and even attempts to reconcile this theory with the one above, the evidence is altogether of a confused and unconvincing kind, and is vitiated by any number of contributory circumstances calculated to affect the results.

Of the two theories thus briefly and imperfectly outlined, Prof. Schenk himself mainly favours the first. He believes that sex is, to a large extent, determined in an opposite direction by the sexually more vigorous parent. But, in addition to this, he takes into account a large array of facts tending to show that diet has an influence not to be disregarded. There is nothing novel in this, nor in the other theories. Geddes and Thomson, in their work on The Evolution of Sex, a far more elaborate treatise than Schenk's, after going into von Berlepsch's experiments with bees, and other facts showing how food can affect the determination of a particular sex, sum up its influence as tending, when poor and scarce, to produce a katabolic organism (the male) and, when nutritious and plentiful, an anabolic organism (the female). It is in relation to this influence that Schenk has made the discovery he claims. It is not so much the actual diet as to a difference in metabolism that he assigns the cause. That is to say, that it is the power of assimilating food, rather than the food itself, which is of importance.

The number of cases quoted by Prof. Schenk is small, and the subject is at present in far too rudimentary a state for any opinion to be pronounced upon it. Doubtless, now that the particulars have been published, a good many intending mothers will put themselves into the hands of medical men for advice as to their diet on Prof. Schenk's lines, and abundant experience may be expected to result. It is only by a disturbance of present statistics on a large scale that trustworthy evidence can be accumulated. Put into a concise form Prof. Schenk's prescription (for boys) is: "Give the mother a highly nitrogenous diet, with fat, and add only so much carbohydrate as is absolutely necessary to prevent its want being felt." In other words, it is, eat plenty of meat and avoid sugar or starchy substances. For the benefit of medical men, much technical information is given as to the best methods of testing for sugar—a highly difficult operation, and requiring to be performed with the greatest skill.

Among a number of facts of interest bearing upon this question is the following, which we quote verbatim:

"According to statistics more boys than girls are born in the years with a poor harvest. Bad harvest years are those which favour a flesh diet, as the food stuffs of the vegetable kingdom do not suffice for the cattle nor for the people either, and more flesh enters into the diet of the women who are fructified. If people in general had the normal aptness for procreation in such famine years the flesh diet might turn the scale in favour of the male sex, it being presupposed that other conditions were fulfilled."

It is these "other conditions" that enter into the whole question and render it difficult even of discussion. Prof. Schenk's book is an interesting contribution to the subject; possibly on account of the practical turn it seeks to take the most interesting. We do not anticipate, however, that it will go unattacked, nor do we consider that it is in a position to be accepted. Many people will probably go so far as to say that it is a subject which ought not to be discussed, that it is an impious attempt to interfere with nature, and so on. We do not hold this view. There is no interference with nature, but merely an attempt to penetrate the methods of nature, to detect the particular conditions under which nature acts in a particular way. If such knowledge can be made serviceable, so much the better. One might remind objectors that chloroform was at first received with a terrific outburst of religious fury, on the ground that the allaying of pain was an interference with the divine infliction of pain. The world has grown older since then, and more broad-minded.

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF ITALIAN POETRY.

Poemetti. By Giovanni Pascoli. (Florence: Roberto Faggi.)

Poesie Scelte. By Antonio Fogazzaro. (Milan: Galli.)

IN spite of the reputation which Giovanni Pascoli enjoys in Italy, it cannot be said that he has as yet found many readers in England, although Mr. G. A. Greene translated a few of his earlier poems in his Italian Lyrists of To-day. And this is much to be regretted, for Pascoli is a true poet; an admirable artist within the rather narrow sphere that he has chosen. He has not, indeed, that touch of sublimity by virtue of which Carducci stands alone among modern Italian poets; he does not attain to the melodiousness and lyrical beauty of the best work of D'Annunzio, nor to the directness and lucidity of Arturo Graf; but his poetry is alike free from Graf's morbid pessimism, and from the questionable matter which is sometimes painfully prominent in the creations of the author of The Triumph of Death. In enamels and cameos, delicately painted and cut with symbols of human life, and in transcripts from nature rendered with close observation and exquisite finish, Pascoli is at his best. In the preface to Myricae, his former volume, he describes his songs as the fluttering of birds, the rustling of cypresses, the distant music of bells; and he adds that they are not unbefitting a cemetery. For beneath this observation and delight in nature's external manifestations of love and loveliness there is much profound sadness; the poet loves to linger in the Campo Santo, to ponder upon death, to hold converse with the beloved dead. The tragedy which overshadowed his early life, and to which he frequently alludes, has tinged all his work; and, in the preface to this new volume, he describes himself as one who has long walked through the steep way of sorrow, and who, although wearied, has gained from the walk a youthful appetite for joy.

Instead of the rich metrical variety of the Myricae, the Poemetti consist of nine longer poems, or groups of poems, written with only one exception in a kind of interrupted terza rima. They open with a series of idealised pictures from the daily life of the Tuscan peasants, full of the sounds and odour of the fields, through which the oxen slowly pass and over which the Angelus rings out from church and convent. In striking contrast there follows a vision of Dante impelling the islands of Caprara and Gorgona to the mouth of the Arno, in the spirit of his famous imprecation against Pisa in the Inferno. Pascoli's style never lacks distinction; his lines are full of music and delicate imagery, whether he writes of the blind man, helpless and alone with his dead dog, awaiting death like a solitary rock surrounded by the waves of an immense sea of darkness:

"Tra un nero immenso fluttuar di mare";

or of the trees striving to utter their dumb aspirations and desires to Heaven with flowers instead of words:

"Con improvvisa melodia di fiori."

His weird picture of the last flight of the swan from the polar darkness into the light of the aurora borealis invites comparison, not altogether unsuccessfully, with Tennyson's "Dying Swan," while his "Eremita" carries us back to Cavalca and the author of the Fioretti. In "Il Vischio," a study of fruit-blossom and mistletoe becomes a psychological problem, suggested rather than expressed; while "Il Libro" is a purely symbolical lyric—it is the ancient book of mystery whose pages an invisible figure is ever turning, seeking but never finding the truth. This latter poem, for its elusive magic and mysterious beauty, is perhaps the gem of the whole volume, which, although very slight in bulk, is of high poetical value throughout.

The name of Antonio Fogazzaro is more familiar to most English readers. It is by his romances that he is deservedly better known, but, nevertheless, the little volume of poems just published, selected from various earlier works, is pleasant and stimulating reading. Fogazzaro is pre-eminently the Italian Lake Poet. The section of his work devoted to his native Valsolda is full of the beauty of the Italian lake district, reflecting with loving fidelity all its moods; its storms and its sunshine; its waters and mountains; the simple joys and sorrows of its humbler inhabitants. At times Fogazzaro reminds us of Wordsworth's attitude towards the English lakes; in "Novissima Verba"—a poem in parts presenting a curious analogy with The Prelude—his adoration of the spirit of his beloved valley is tinged in the glowing colours of human love, and united to an autobiographical account of the growth of his own mind. Perhaps his highest point of lyrical achievement is reached in the "Fascino," an exquisite rendering of the region's haunting presence and fascination; but, more usually, his outlook upon nature is that of an idealist and Christian mystic, as in "A sera," where at sunset bells answer bells sounding the Angelus from village to village, and are echoed by the voices of the valleys, lakes, and cascades, uniting all things spiritually in love and worship.

The "Versioni dalla Musica" exhibit on a small scale something of the dramatic power and vivid characterisation of Fogazzaro's novels. They are a series of minute lyrical comedies and tragedies, suggested by familiar pieces of music; an old beau fooled by a dazzling young coquette; a lover, at the call of honour and religion, tearing himself away from the embraces of a madly passionate mistress; a courtly minuet at a masked ball of the eighteenth century, like an idealised version of some Venetian picture by Pietro Longhi, suggesting what tragedies of love and sorrow may lie hidden behind those faces which, even when unmasked, seem so impassive, so trivial and incapable of passion. There is decidedly strong work also in the religious pieces in the last section of the book. "Notte di Passione" and "Visione" are noble and powerful poems of spiritual experience and mystical yearning. "Samarith di Gaulan" tells, in irregular but forcible verse, how a divine apparition came to a Hebrew woman in the moonlight by the Sea of Galilee, and how, following that white-robed figure, she walked like Peter upon the waves, to die in peace and joy in the glory of the Easter dawn.

Still, delightful and impressive as many of these poems are, it is by his prose romances, Malombra, Daniela Cortis, Piccolo Mondo Antico, that Fogazzaro holds his place among the great writers of modern Italy. They have not the superb style and magnificent prose-poetry of D'Annunzio's "Romances of the Rose" and "Romances of the Lily," but they are always invigorating and healthy in tone. The influence of Gabriele D'Annunzio has almost succeeded in converting Italian fiction into a gorgeous, but decidedly unwholesome, hot-house, into which each new work from Antonio Fogazzaro enters like a welcome breath of fresh air.

NIMROD'S MASTERPIECE.

The Chase, the Road, and the Turf. By Nimrod. A New Edition. (Edward Arnold.)

MR. ARNOLD has been wise to include this evergreen classic in his "Sportsman's Library," for no edition of it has been published, we believe, since that which Mr. Murray issued in 1870. Well may Sir Herbert Maxwell remark in his brief introduction that the three papers which compose this volume, and which originally appeared in the Quarterly Review, "inaugurated a new era in the literature of sport." Never before or since Nimrod's time has there been a sporting writer who joined to an exhaustive acquaintance with his subjects such a vivid and illuminating style. Railway trains have displaced stage coaches, and may themselves yield to flying machines; but when will the coaching experiences of 1835, as pictured by Nimrod, cease to be a delight? He imagines an old gentleman who has gone to bed in 1742, when the proprietors of coaches running from London to Exeter (175 miles) used to promise "a safe and expeditious journey in a fortnight," awaking 100 years later to find himself being hustled into the "Comet," which does the journey in seventeen hours.

"In five minutes under the hour the 'Comet' arrives at Hounslow, to the great delight of our friend, who by this time waxed hungry, not having broken his fast before starting. 'Just fifty-five minutes and thirty-seven seconds,' says he, 'from the time we left London! Wonderful travelling, gentlemen, to be sure, but much too fast to be safe. However, thank heaven, we are arrived at a good-looking house; and now, waiter! I hope you have got breakfast—'

Before the last syllable, however, of the word could be pronounced, the worthy old gentleman's head struck the back of the coach by a jerk, which he could not account for (the fact was, three of the four fresh horses were bolters), and the waiter, the inn, and indeed Hounslow itself (terraque urbesque recedunt) disappeared in the twinkling of an eye. Never did such a succession of doors, windows, and window-shutters pass so quickly in his review before—and he hoped they might never do so again. Recovering, however, a little from his surprise—"My dear sir," said he, "you told me we were to change horses at Hounslow. Surely, they are not so inhuman as to drive these poor animals another stage at this unmerciful pace?" "Change horses, sir!" says the proprietor, "why we changed them whilst you were putting on your spectacles and looking at your watch. Only one minute allowed for it at Hounslow, and it is often done in fifty seconds by those nimble-fingered horse-keepers."

Alarmed by the information that owing to the improvements of "an American of the name of Macadam" (Macadam was really a Scot, though he was for some time in business in New York) "no horse walks a yard in this coach between London and Exeter—all trotting ground now," the old gentleman quits the coach at Bagshot, where he inquires whether there is any slow coach down the road that day. He is recommended to the "Regulator," and secures a seat in the hind dickey. But the "Regulator," "slow coach" as she is, takes only twenty-three minutes for the five miles of the Hartford Bridge Flat, the best five miles for a coach to be found at this time in England. There is rather too much luggage on the roof, and our friend in the dickey, "his arms extended to each extremity of the guard-irons—his teeth set grim as death" has a very bad time of it. Next he inquires for a coach which carries no luggage on the top, takes his seat in the "Quicksilver Mail," falls asleep and wakes up to find himself on a stage which is called the fastest on the journey—it is four miles of ground and twelve minutes is the time!

The narrative goes with as much swing and lift as the coach itself, and is perhaps the best thing in the book. But it is rivalled by the admirable description of a day with Mr. Osbaldeston's hounds in the Quorn country:

"At length a whimper is heard in the cover—like the voice of a dog in a dream: it is Flourisher, and the Squire cheers him to the echo. In an instant a hound challenges—and another—and another. 'Tis enough. 'Tallyho!' cries a countryman in a tree. 'He's gone,' exclaims Lord Alvanley; and, clapping his spurs to his horse, in an instant is in the front rank.

As all good sportsmen would say, 'Ware, hounds!' cries Sir Harry Goodricke. 'Give them time,' exclaims Mr. John Moore. 'That's right,' says Mr. Osbaldeston, 'spoil your own sport as usual.' 'Go along,' roars out Mr. Holyoake, 'there are three couple of hounds on the scent.' 'That's your sort,' says 'Billy Coke,' coming up at the rate of thirty miles an hour on Advance, with a label pinned on his back, 'He Kicks'; 'the rest are all coming, and there's a rare scent to-day, I'm sure.' Bonaparte's Old Guard, in its best days, would not have stopped such men as these, so long as life remained in them."

Nimrod, whose real name was Charles John Apperley, was born in 1777, and educated at Rugby, where he picked up a taste for classical literature which he never lost, and which doubtless accounts for the excellence of his style, as well as for the Latin tags which he is fond of introducing here and there. At Bilton Hall, near Rugby, he lived within reach of four excellent packs, and it is on record that on one occasion he rode fifty-two miles in the morning on two hacks to meet Sir Thomas Mostyn's hounds in what is now the Bicester country. Think of that, ye luxurious lollers in first-class carriages! So much hunting impaired his finances, with the fortunate result—for us—that he had to take to literature. A series of letters on Hunting contributed to the Sporting Magazine raised the status of that publication—which had interpreted the idea of sport so broadly as to publish under the head of "Matrimonial Sporting" all the unsavoury details of crim. con. cases—and made the writer's reputation, and temporarily his fortune. An unfortunate speculation in farming, however, ran away with his money, and he had to take refuge in Calais, far away from his beloved hounds, and support himself by his pen. His reminiscences supplied him with plenty of material, for he claimed to have hunted with seventy-three or seventy-four different packs in his time. His knowledge of the turf was perhaps less peculiar, but wonderfully extensive. Of its rogueries in particular he gives innumerable examples. Trials falsified, touts foiled, horses poisoned, jockeys bought—these things seem to have been going on ever since men first began to test the speed of their horses. On one occasion Old Q., the famous Duke of Queensbury [sic] was told by his jockey that a large sum of money had been offered him to lose. "Take it," said the Duke, "I will bear you harmless." When his horse came to the post his Grace coolly observed, "This is a nice horse to ride; I think I'll ride him myself," when, throwing open his greatcoat, he was found to be in racing attire, and, mounting, won without a struggle. There are stories of Sam Chifney, whose "rush" was so irresistible; of Frank Buckle, who continued to ride in public until past his sixty-fifth year, and on the last day of the season always had a goose for supper; of James Robinson, who won the Derby and Oaks and was married all in the same week; of the Duke of Grafton, who, in the year 1825, won £13,000 from public stakes alone, a prodigious sum in those days; and of many other sportsmen of the past. Altogether, the book is a feast of good things, and is very welcome in its new and handsome dress.

“TIS FORTY YEARS SINCE.”

A Middy's Recollections, 1853-1860. By Rear-Admiral the Hon. Victor Montagu. (A. & C. Black.)

ADMIRAL MONTAGU has been wise in choosing the present moment for bringing out his well-written and very readable reminiscences of life as a midshipman in the fifties. In these days of Royal Sovereigns and Powerfuls, of twenty-knot torpedo boats and destroyers which steam as fast as an ordinary train, it is interesting to read of ships like the Princess Royal, which Admiral Montagu joined in 1853, with her full-steam speed of eight or nine knots only. Moreover, recent events have tended to quicken the Englishman's interest in naval matters, and any book dealing with life on an old-fashioned sail-and-steam line-of-battle ship, if written with knowledge and from actual experience, is sure to be widely read. Admiral Montagu was in both the Baltic and the Black Sea fleets during the Crimean War. He was in Chinese waters and assisted in the destruction of the Chinese war-junks at the battle of Fatshan in the Canton River in 1857; while later in the same year he sailed for Calcutta, and for the next fifteen months saw plenty of fighting on land with the Naval Brigade as Aide-de-camp to General Rowcroft.

But this book will be read by most people rather for its account of a midshipman's impressions of man-of-war life nearly half a century ago than for any mere details of fighting in India or elsewhere, and Admiral Montagu has been careful not to omit the more commonplace details of Service in those days in order to give more space to the excitements of war. When one remembers the elaborate preparation which is now deemed necessary before a cadet can enter the Navy, it is somewhat strange to read of the haphazard way in which, forty-five years ago, a boy found his way into the Service. The qualification consisted in being able to master simple dictation from some English work and arithmetic as far as the rule of three. Six weeks at a school in Portsea kept by a retired naval instructor sufficed to prepare our midshipman successfully for this ordeal, though, as he naïvely confesses, he spelt “judgment” without a “d” in the actual examination. Life on board ship was, of course, uncomfortable to a degree:

“The rations were the same as those allowed to the ship's company—a pound of very bad salt junk (beef) or pork, execrable tea, sugar, and biscuit that was generally full of weevils or well over-run with rats, or (in hot climates) a choice retreat for the detestable cockroach. . . . Sugar or any other sweet matter was their attraction; and at night, when they were on the move, I have seen strings of the creatures an inch and a half long making a route over you in your hammock.”

The ships of the world have not yet found a way of banishing the cockroach, though we feed our middies better nowadays. There seems to have been a certain amount of bullying, though probably a good deal less than would have been permitted in “the good old times”; but some unpleasant customs prevailed. Here is one:

“One of the amusements with which the seniors entertained themselves was slitting the end of your nose open with a pen knife. The idea was that you could not properly be a Royal, bearing the name of your ship (the Princess Royal), without a slight effusion of blood. The end of one's nose was well squeezed, and thus there was little pain.”

Things were not much changed evidently from the days of Captain Marryat's novels as far as what may be called the amenities of life were concerned. Flogging was, of course, in full swing as a punishment during the years (1853-1860) covered by this book. “I have often,” writes Admiral Montagu, “seen three men flogged one after another.” His comment is interesting:

“I do not believe that flogging ever cured a character. I think it hardened nine men out of ten. It may have deterred others, and so had its effect; but the crimes committed were often, to my idea, too trifling for such retribution. Of course in those days prisons—or at any rate the means of sending men to prison—were scarce; and it happened that we were a good deal on war service when prisons were not accessible. But, coûte que coûte, bad characters—men who could not be reclaimed after several attempts—were best kicked out of the Service. They are a plague to their shipmates, and give trouble all round; though it was a curious fact that they were generally the best seamen.”

The italics are ours, but the sentence italicised “gives one to think,” as the phrase runs, and it is hard to decide what course it is best for a commander to pursue with regard to such men. On the one hand, it is hard to have to lose one's “best seamen,” while on the other hand the penalty of imprisonment has its obvious disadvantages in the Navy. There is no doubt that flogging was resorted to much too readily half a century ago in our ships, and no one will desire a return to the practice of those days. But it is a question whether it would be safe to abolish that penalty altogether in the Service, and the opinion of almost all naval men seems to be that it should be retained at least as a last resort.

Admiral Montagu has several good stories to tell in the course of his Recollections. One of them must suffice here as an example of his quality. It is the story of a trooper of the Fourth Light Dragoons who was made prisoner in the Crimean War, and for some reason not specified was taken before the Tsar. Observing the man standing six feet two in his stockings, his Imperial Majesty inquired what regiment he had belonged to. Being told that he was in a light cavalry regiment, he said, “Well, if you are a light cavalry man, what the devil are the heavies?”

IN THE LAND OF THE WHITE ELEPHANT.

Five Years in Siam. By H. Warington Smyth, M.A., LL.B., formerly Director of Mines in Siam. With Maps and Illustrations by the Author. 2 vols. (John Murray.)

THE historic connexion of England and Englishmen with Siam and the Siamese dates from the early days of the East India Company; and from then until now, quite a library of books has been written in English (besides those in other tongues) concerning the land of bamboo and betel-nut, teak and elephants. The latest addition to that library will prove as interesting as any, and more interesting than most, and without cavil, will be priceless to those who would understand the peoples and resources of Siam as they are to-day, and the relations of Siam to European Governments. For Mr. Warington Smyth's two handsome volumes are not merely a record of travel: they are that in an unusually charming manner, but they are more: they are also a précis of a tolerably long and exceedingly varied experience of all things Siamese, even of Siamese geography and Siamese geology. He is none of the “hasty Westerns” of whom he complains, “who would not give themselves the chance of understanding that between the ways of modern Europe and those of old Indo-China a great gulf lies, the voyage over which might well occupy the thought of a lifetime.” Mr. Warington Smyth is evidently very much of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's opinion: “O East is East, and West is West; and never the twain shall meet”; and, at the least, he declares, after his intimate experience of both people and government, that “the longer one lives with an Eastern race, the less confidence can one feel in one's knowledge of what they are and what they think.” It is much in favour of the Siamese, and in contradiction of the detraction and abuse that some in England and France have in recent years thought their due, that an educated, scientific, and tolerably dispassionate observer like Mr. Warington Smyth should have little but the kindest things to say of them, even when he is most critical of their shortcomings when compared with an European standard. Here is a very agreeable bit of description of river life:

“Abreast of these lorchas [Bangkok boats, not unlike North Sea cobsles, along the shallower western shore, on the inside of the bend, the up-country boats lie when they have sold their rice, and their pleasure-loving crews would do a little of the gaiety of the capital before returning home. So, while mother does the shopping, and buys the cargo of salt and cotton stuffs, father takes the children up to town for a ride in the tram or a visit to the nearest monastery, where some merit-making is going on or a cremation taking place; and in their best panungs and little white jackets the youngsters buy fairings, or sit and smoke and chew their betel in front of the lakon. A theatrical performance is sure to be provided for the occasion, and there the elder boys and girls watch untiringly the whole night long the story of the King of Snakes or of the lovely Princess, and the small ones coil themselves up and go to sleep within ten feet of the big drum.

In the morning grey they are off back to their floating house, and get a start behind some tow-boat for a few miles, in company with twenty other craft, on their month's journey of poling and pulling homewards to where the water is clear and runs over the shaded shingle banks, and where the noisy, drunken Farang they met in Bangkok streets is never seen."

There are many such sympathetic renderings of the effects upon him of the simple, gay, and debonair life of these people of the great plain of the Menam, who are not all Siamese by any means, but also Chinese, Annamese, Javanese, Burmese, Singalese, Malay, Tamil, and Bengali. All these—and others—Mr. Warrington Smyth knows something of, and has some kind of liking for; the only people he appears to have a fixed dislike and suspicion of are the French and the people of the European Consulates and commercial houses, from the latter of whom the globe-trotter gathers his information concerning the country, and yet who could scarcely be more out of touch with the life of the people among whom they dwell and do business.

It is impossible in a short notice to do justice to the vast array of information the author sets before us concerning the various states he visited in the course of his five years' duty, and concerning their mines and forests, or sufficiently to praise the delightful manner in which he conveys to the lay apprehension the knowledge of a specialist. In the prosecution of his work he travelled the great rich plain of the Menam, explored the Lao States—the people of which he seems to like best of all—and visited the little provinces of the Malacca peninsula. And throughout he writes well and briskly, with a lack of the professional touch of authorship which is very refreshing, but with the constant kindness and acumen of a well-balanced and observant mind. Here is a pretty passage:

"We had hired two more elephants to lighten the loads of the others, and these two, male and female, were never separated by a dozen yards. They were loaded up together, they bathed at night together, and they fed on the same bamboos. If the tusker was frightened at the strange things handed up to the mahout, his mate swung round, caressing him with her trunk till he was pacified; if she was moved round to the side of the sala he whirled off after her, malgré all the mahout had to say to it."

This is not the place to touch upon French aggression on Siam, nor upon the anxious political relations of Siam in the present day—about both which matters Mr. Warrington Smyth evidently feels very strongly, as he speaks very plainly. But it is our duty to note, at this last, how prettily the numerous little illustrations of the author are rendered, and how admirable are the nine or ten maps. Altogether, an excellent and invaluable work, both for the delectation of the general reader and the use of the student.

THE FIRST PHILOSOPHERS OF GREECE.

The First Philosophers of Greece: an Edition and Translation of the Remaining Fragments of the Pre-Socratic Philosophers, together with a Translation of the more important Accounts of their Opinions contained in the Early Epitomes of their Works. By Arthur Fairbanks. (Kegan Paul.)

In the nature of things, this work can bring to its author neither fame nor riches; yet it has cost infinite labour, and will be of constant service. For by these men, whose very names are for the most part known to us only by the chance that has incorporated them here and there in the writings of their successors, Plato and Aristotle were made possible; and they are interesting also for themselves: for their ingenious dogmatism as to the nature of the material universe—ludicrous as it may seem in the light of modern precision; and for their conjectures in the region of metaphysic—in dealing with the Absolute, the Infinite, Time, Space, and the like monstrosities—wherein they are as intelligible as many who have settled these notions to their own satisfaction since their time. Even the busy idler may amuse an hour with a haphazard turning of these laborious leaves. If one were a professional exegete (he may reflect) and Empedokles happened to be a sacred name, one might make out, perhaps, a case for his plenary inspiration as to the principles of the solar system. Here, for instance, concerning the moon, is a fragment preserved by Plutarch:

"A borrowed light, circular in form, it revolves about the earth as if following the track of a chariot."

How did he know that? Again, you drop upon Anaximandros, in whom, as you at once discern, you have a pre-incarnation of Mr. Herbert Spencer. Given equal ignorance to start from, perhaps the Mr. Spencer of our era would hardly have won so near to fact; and there is more reason to doubt whether his imagination would have been equal to the limning of so pretty a picture. As quoted by Hippolytus, he said:

"The earth is a heavenly body, controlled by no other power, and keeping its position because it is the same distance from all things [this is not a bad shot at the unguessed law of gravitation]; the form of it is curved, cylindrical like a stone column; it has two faces: one of these is the ground beneath our feet, and the other is opposite to it. The stars are a circle of fire [he gets a little wild here], separated from the fire about the earth, and surrounded by air. There are certain breathing-holes, like the holes of a flute, through which we see the stars; so that when the holes are stopped up there are eclipses."

Here is a passage which was recently re-delivered in London to a select audience:

"But if one wins a victory by swiftness of foot, or in the pentathlon . . . , or as a wrestler, or in painful boxing . . . , he would be more glorious in the eyes of the citizens, he would win a front seat at assemblies. . . . If he won by means of horses he would get all these things, although he did not deserve them as I deserve them; for our wisdom is better than the strength of men or of horses. This is, indeed, a very wrong custom, nor is it right to prefer strength to excellent wisdom."

The general arrangement of the matter is perspicuous, and the monograph is not likely soon to be superseded.

BRIEFER MENTION.

Versions from Hafiz: an Essay in Persian Metre. By Walter Leaf. (Grant Richards.)

WHAT none of the translators of Hafiz have hitherto attempted to give is Hafiz' metrical forms. Dr. Walter Leaf steps forward to do this thing. He shall explain his gallant enterprise:

"It seems worth while to make an attempt, however poor, to give English readers some idea of this most intimate and indissoluble bond of spirit and form in Hafiz. And with it all, one must try to convey some faint reminder of the fact that Hafiz is, as few poets have been, a master of words and rhythms. The variety of his rhythms will be seen from the table which I append to this Introduction, but the music of his words in the end defies the translator. Here are the translucent sparkle of the marble, the subtle reflexion and patina of the bronze, which the plaster-cast must needs renounce in despair. Playing on all the modulations of a language naturally most musical, Hafiz has under his fingers all the echoes, the chords and overtones of assonance and rhyme. The imitation of this is but a hopeless task. All that can be attempted is to render in English some distant echo of the lilt of his metres. These may march or trip, they may trill or wail; but whatever they do, they sing. Their tunes are unmistakable, even to ears yet hardly grown familiar with the language. Here lies the temptation to render them into English."

Here are a few examples of Mr. Leaf's renderings. Of the twenty-eight ghazals on which he has tried his skill, none reads so trippingly as the first. This ode is a favourite with both Indian and Persian readers, and in Mr. Leaf's English it is, at least, a pleasant and suggestive lyric:

"Minstrel, awake the sound of glee, joyous and eager, fresh and free;
Fill me a bumper bounteously, joyous and eager, fresh and free.

O for a bower and one beside, delicate, dainty, there to hide;
Kisses at will to seize and be joyous and eager, fresh and free.

Sweet is my dear, a thief of hearts;
bravery, beauty, saucy arts,
Odours and unguents, all for me, joyous and eager, fresh and free.

How shall the fruit of life be thine, if thou refuse the fruitful vine?
Drink of the vine and pledge with me, joyous and eager, fresh and free.

Call me my Saki silver-limbed, bring me my goblet silver-rimmed;
Fain would I fill and drink to thee, joyous and eager, fresh and free.

Wind of the West, if e'er thou roam, pass on the way my fairy's home;
Whisper of Hafiz aurally, joyous and eager, fresh and free."

Poor Hafiz! he was not always joyous and eager, fresh and free. His Saki was not always kind :

“ Lord grant that I wail not of the hard heart of unkindness ;
Hard heart of the fair is but the fair's utter perfection.”

And those of his ideals that were Western, and made for strenuousness, would not be lulled for ever by wine and Súfi doctrine :

“ Ah, how oft, e'en as with Hafiz, hath the red smile of the vine
And the curled ringlet on Love's cheek a repentance unmade !”

Now a deeper groan would escape him :

“ This thing of all the woe of the world, this to wisdom's heart
Most hard, that wisdom's hand to the feast-bowl attaineth not.

See fools exalted high in their pride, high as Heaven's pole ;
Save through his groans, the wise to the blue pole attaineth not.

Hafiz, be strong to bear ; for in love's path what man so e'er Dares not to yield his life, to the Soul's Soul attaineth not.”

Soon the poet's eye would kindle with the light of life, and his cry would be :

“ While yet the hand availeth, sweet lips to kiss delay not ;
Else lip and hand thou bitest too late, when comes the ending.”

And then, when Love had once more failed him, the call for Wine, loud and lyrical, would break from Hafiz' lips :

“ Send the criers round the market, call the roysterers' band to hear,
Crying, ‘ O yes ! All ye good folks through the Loved One's realm, give ear !

‘ Lost, a handmaid ! Strayed a while since !
Lost, the Vine's wild daughter, lost !’
Raise the hue and cry to seize her !
Danger lurks where she is near.

Round her head she wears a foam-crown ;
all her garb glows ruby-hued ;
Thief of wits is she ; detain her, lest ye dare not sleep for fear.

Whoso brings me back the tart maid, take for sweetmeat all my soul !
Through the deepest hell conceal her, go ye down, go hale her here.

She's a wastrel, she's a wanton, shame-abandon'd rosy-red ;
If ye find her, send her forthright, back to—Hafiz, Balladier.”

These specimens of Dr. Leaf's translations will, we are sure, commend his book to all who desire to read Hafiz in English words set to Persian metres.

A Northern Highway of the Tsar. By Aubyn Trevor Battye. With Map, and Illustrated by the Author. (Constable.)

VERY high up the map there is a region subject to the Tsar, of which the Russians themselves know little ; and here dwells a simple-hearted race, whose blameless morals present a poignant contrast to their habitual filthiness of person. Samoyed they are called ; their business is to kill seal, and to preserve their monopoly from external enterprise ; and their uncomfortable hospitality is boundless. Mr. Battye's voyaging was done during a local season that intervenes between autumn and winter, and the difficulties of the way were increased by the rotten and treacherous condition of the roads over which the sledges must be dragged. Here is an incident of the drive :

“ We came to one big ditch in which I thought I saw a pretty fair crossing, though the banks sloped very suddenly down. You can generally get over these places all right if you keep your team straight, put them at it quickly, and lie right back on the sleigh. But one of my [five] deer pulled a little unevenly, and the point of the sleigh catching the ground just as we reached the bottom the whole concern was shot over, and I was half-buried in water, snow, and mud. I had, however, kept tight hold of the driving rein (for only a single rein is used), and instinctively seizing the back of the sleigh was hauled out by the team, and dragged up to the top of the bank. Here I brought my team to a standstill, collected my gun, cartridges, and other effects . . . emptied the water from my boots, wrung out my socks and trousers, and was soon ready to go on again, though [mark this !] I felt very cold and uncomfortable for all the rest of the day.”

The question arises at this point whether it is lawful for any man wantonly to indulge in this extravagance of carnal maceration. That any man should of his own free accord so afflict himself stirs one to a sort of indignant admiration. As the explorer went from place to place, whose impossible names it were useless to write down, generally soaked to the skin and subsisting principally upon bad bread and milk in frozen lumps, he preserved at every crisis his presence of mind, an equable temper, a quick eye for the picturesque, a ready sense of the humour of the chance occasion, and a retentive memory. The material accumulated is presented here in a terse and vigorous shape, and we welcome the book.

Two Hundred Years: The History of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1698-1898. By W. O. B. Allen and Edmund McClure. (S.P.C.K.)

To compress within reasonable limits the records, letter-books, reports and minutes of two hundred years of very varied work was a large undertaking. It has been carried out with such success that the volume in our hands is not merely a lucid chronicle of the work of a private society, but offers also a valuable résumé of the activities of Anglican Christianity at large during a period of which the records elsewhere to be found are scattered and inadequate.

The society was founded towards the close of the seventeenth century by the Rev. Dr. Bray, with Lord Guilford (described by Burnet as “not wanting in sense nor application to business,” and by Swift as “a mighty silly fellow”), Sir Humphrey Mackworth, and Mr. Justice Hooke. Its early records show a nation of which Christianity would seem quite to have lost its hold, while the devotion of those in whom the instinct of religion survived found a vent in a multitude of hysterical extravagancies. The infant society entered into correspondence with earnest and sober persons all over the country, and the extracts from their correspondence at this period present a valuable and unique picture of the condition of the country as a whole. The energies of the S.P.C.K. found a constantly widening scope as the Union Jack flew ever more widely. The colonies, the negroes, the native tribes of India, the blacks of South Africa—to say nothing of Mohammedans, malefactors, Papists, and other benighted persons nearer home—have found themselves the objects of its energetic solicitude. Until the passing of the Education Act of 1870 it was the prime organiser of elementary education throughout this realm. In these days it is best known for its publishing enterprise, yet this is by no means the whole of its scope :

“ Taking the figures of the last ten years, we may say that, on the average, the society's income may roughly be estimated as follows . . . or, in round figures, about £40,000 a year. The expenditure, on the average, for the last ten years may be estimated as follows: Money grants for missionary purposes £29,000; book grants £8,000; office expences, printing, &c., £5,000; or a total expenditure of £42,000 a year.”

Throughout its career the S.P.C.K. has preserved an even course of tolerant evangelicism, freely associating with itself the energies of the orthodox Protestants of Sweden, Denmark, and Germany.

A Mingled Yarn. By Edward Spencer Mott (“Nathaniel Gubbins”). Edward Arnold.

It takes all sorts to make a world, and Mr. Mott, as revealed in this autobiography, is a well-defined and refreshing “sort.” He begins :

“ I was born early on Easter Sunday in Running Rein's year ; which, being interpreted, means that I first saw the light in 1844, on April 7, a week or two before a horse, falsely described as Running Rein, who proved to be a four-year-old colt called Maccabeus (afterwards Zanoni), passed the winning-post first in the race for the Derby.”

And that is the note of Mr. Mott's life and book. Never have the whips and scorns of time diverted Mr. Mott's attention from horses. At sixteen he knew the Racing Calendar by heart. From Sandhurst he stole away to Ascot and Goodwood. “ You young fool,” said his father (who had staked a great deal on Wizard at Goodwood), “ you young fool ; what on earth made you back Flat Iron ?” The reprimand was given in the same breath as more fatherly advice about the youth's studies—advice not thrown away, one is pleased to add, for our author passed out of Sandhurst in good style, and was gazetted to an ensigncy in the 19th First York North Riding Regiment.

Invalided home from India Mr. Mott began to taste varieties of fortune. With engaging frankness born of victory, he tells us how in these days he loafed, betted, acted, wrote plays, starved, and slept on the Embankment. “ And so I drifted into journalism”—that familiar way-mark is reached at last, and we are introduced to the roystering staff of the Pink Un. The book is a treasury of facts and opinions of a certain class. It is a budget of barbarities, in Matthew Arnold's sense ; and, for style, it is written as it might be told by a good raconteur in a first-class railway carriage to large-tweed gentlemen with brandy-flasks. It is amusing ; and it holds more philosophy than appears at first sight.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE HEART OF MIRANDA.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

"And Other Stories, being Mostly Winter Tales"—so runs the sub-title. Why winter tales should appear now, with the laverock in the skies and a thrush on every bough, is a question for the publisher to answer. Fortunately, The Heart of Miranda, the longest story, an allegory of true love, has gaiety, or the book would be sombre indeed. The rest of it is given up to lawless passions, crime, murder, and suicide. After reading "Miranda" we are quite eager for another glimpse of "Gallop Dick." (John Lane. 335 pp. 6s.)

THE GOSPEL OF FREEDOM.

By ROBERT HERRICK.

A modern American story of marriage and divorce. The heroine thinks too much, and suffers for it. Her friend, Molly Parker, is wiser, and lectures her thus: "Oh! you take life, marriage, your career—'broadly,' as you say, like a thorough course in self-development. Perhaps you will carry it through that way. But if I hadn't that something in my heart which would make me go barefoot with a man and have a good time, I would run away. If I were married to a man without that something, I should stick a hat-pin into him, or make his life a little hell, no matter how good he was." Finally, the heroine decides that she will learn how to live. (Macmillan & Co. 287 pp. 6s.)

SHADOWS OF LIFE.

By MRS. MURRAY HICKSON.

The sprightly author of Concerning Teddy is here in a woefully serious mood. The book contains thirteen exercises in pathos, and not very interesting ones at that. "The Romance of Emily Philpott, Housemaid"; "The Waters of Death"; "The End of a Dream"; "An Awakening"—these are some of the titles. Life was sad enough before we opened Mrs. Hickson's volume; it is sadder now. (John Lane. 197 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE BEND OF THE ROAD.

By JAMES MACMANUS.

These tales by the author of 'Twas in Dhroll Donegal are concerned with the good folk of the Bocht of the Bealach. "What! you never heard of the Bocht of the Bealach? Well, that is strange. The Bocht of the Bealach—the quaint, quiet, humdrum, world-forgotten, loved old Bocht of the Bealach. And you never heard of it? Never heard of the Bocht of the Bealach, with all its simple-hearted, mirth-loving, ghost-respecting, sympathetic, credulous folk. Never heard of the Bocht of the —." No, we never did, and we think that eight pages of introduction in this style are too many. But Mr. MacManus's stories look to be humorous. (Downey & Co. 272 pp.)

HAGAR OF HOMERTON.

MRS. HENRY E. DUDENEY.

After Liza of Lambeth why not Hagar of Homerton? That was the question which the author of A Man and a Maid probably asked herself, in casting about for a title, and answered in the affirmative. The story tells how Mrs. Swithybank of the West End, being bored, adopted Hagar Pipon for diversion. How the experiment turned out it is for the reader to discover. The book is quite readable. (C. Arthur Pearson. 333 pp. 6s.)

CASTLEBRAES.

By JAMES PATON.

An essay on the land question in novel form. The hero, the Laird of Castlebraes, tries an agricultural experiment; he cuts up big farms on his estate into little, and makes it possible for his tenants to prosper by tillage. He also makes it possible for one Angell James, a dreadful windbag, to speechify in this strain: "Are the men o' Castlebraes worthy? Wull they rise tae the occasion that the Almighty has sent them? Wull they buckle up their loins, an' gird on their airmour, an' fecht their wey through, wi' courage an' patience?" &c. (Blackwood & Sons. 342 pp. 6s.)

ALL WE LIKE SHEEP.

(ANONYMOUS.)

In the beginning, in italics, an impatient lamb requests from its mother instruction concerning the world. The ewe replies, and "the ewe's narrative, interpreted into human language, contained the essence of the following history." During its recital the lamb fell asleep. The history is of Frances Roy, sculptor: how she wished to be free and lead her own life, and how the world grew censorious. She contributed sketches to a paper called Vril, whose editor "was a well-built man of thirty, with very dark bold eyes, and a handsome mouth and thick neck." Also he was "perfectly au courant with the world." In the end we return to italics and the sheep-fold again, and find the lamb sceptical. (Kelvin Glen & Co. 172 pp. 2s.)

THE SHROUDED FACE.

By OWEN RHOSCOMYL.

A story of Wales in Tudor times, written, as is common with such romances, in the first person singular. After so much Scottish history, a little Welsh is not amiss. Here are chapter headings: "The Night Hag of Castell Vortigern"; "The Veiled Woman of Nevin Var"; "The Escape from Castell Vortigern"; "The Prisoner from Oversea"; "The Witch that Walked in Darkness." (C. Arthur Pearson. 366 pp. 6s.)

AN EPISODE IN ARCADY.

HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

A light-hearted story of facile emotions and superficial natures. Here is a scrap of dialogue:

"Did you ever hear of Clicquot?" he asked.

"Did I ever hear my own name? I would give a five-pound note for one good long pull at Clicquot."

"It would be jolly if we had a bottle here."

"Don't! when a fellow's throat is dusty as a June high-road it's a sin to babble—"

"Of green Chartreuse," finished the squire."

A portrait of the author of this charming persiflage is prefixed to the book. (C. Arthur Pearson. 230 pp. 2s. 6d.)

MERIEL.

By AMÉLIE RIVES.

A "love-story," by the author of The Quick and the Dead. "Hand in hand, heart in heart, these twain walked among its shadows, until the moon opened her silver calyx to the stars about her, like jewelled bees about some fantastic blossom of fairyland." The triumphant lover ends by quoting Isaiah at some length. (Chatto & Windus. 223 pp. 3s. 6d.)

TRUE HEART.

By FREDERIC BRETON.

"Being Passages in the Life of Eberhard Treuherz, Scholar and Craftsman, telling of his Wanderings and Adventures, his Intercourse with People of Consequence to their Age, and how he came Scathless through a time of strife: now for the first time set forth," &c. Treuherz was early sixteenth century, and lived at Basel. (Grant Richards. 419 pp. 6s.)

THE HEPSWORTH MILLIONS.

By CHRISTIAN LYS.

The frontispiece depicts a woman with a candle coming suddenly upon a coffer full of gold and jewels and a skeleton lying beside it. "Her heart," runs the legend, "gave one great leap and then seemed to stand still." The woman was Lady Hepsworth, the skeleton was that of Sir Michael Hepsworth, millionaire, and the story narrating their history is a melodrama between covers, luridly conceived and told. (Warne & Co. 469 pp. 6s.)

MEIR EZOFFOVITCH.

TRANSLATED FROM THE POLISH OF ELIZA ORZESZKO BY DZA YOUNG.

A distressful story of Jewish life in Poland, charged with emotion rising out of the struggles of Jew and Christian in that part of the world. (B. F. Stevens. 339 pp. 6s.)

THE LUCK OF PARCO.

BY JOHN MACLAIR.

Parco is in the Peruvian Andes, and there "every man is soldier, sailor, baker, tailor, potter-boy, plough-boy, and what else goes to make up the complex mechanism of the body social and politic." Here centres this tale of travel, and treasure, and fighting. (Harper & Brothers. 322 pp. 6s.)

BY REEDS AND RUSHES.

BY ESMÈ STUART.

Miss Stuart is well-known as a bright writer of tales for girls and women. Here is yet another. It sets forth the love-story of Will Wyatt, son of Farmer Wyatt, and Polly Tillett, daughter of Farmer Tillett. The two fathers shared a lake together, in the reeds and rushes of which certain important things happen, notably the escape of Will Wyatt, when wanted for firing at his officer. In the end all is well. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 191 pp. 1s.)

THE ACTOR MANAGER.

BY LEONARD MERRICK.

A story of theatrical life, now running as a feuilleton in the Daily Mail. They are sitting together—strangers—in a shabby café near the British Museum, and he sees she is crying and guesses she is lonely. At last he summons up courage to criticise the shape of the café's plum pudding. The struggling dramatist and the young actress become friends. In the course of their story theatrical matters are very thoroughly discussed. (Grant Richards. 292 pp. 6s.)

AN UNKNOWN QUANTITY.

BY VIOLET HOBUHOUSE.

The unknown quantity is Kilmeny Darc, and she gives herself and three men a grievous time, and reconciles them on her death-bed. The story is emotional, and often "religious." (Downey & Co. 373 pp. 6s.)

RIVER MISTS.

BY ETTA COURTNEY.

Eight stories in paper covers. The author's descriptions of nature are like this—"From the young green of the meadows came the twitter of mating partridges mingled with the river's swirl." (Marshall, Russell & Co. 122 pp. 1s.)

REVIEWS.

The Girl at Cobhurst. By Frank R. Stockton.
(Cassell & Co.)

ONE has to be a good deal in love with trivialities and provincial quietude to like Mr. Stockton's new book. But given that tendency, it is richly entertaining. Here he employs more the manner of The Late Mrs. Null than The Great Stone of Sardis: all is conceivable, all might have come under one's own notice. The story resolves into the account of a duel between two strong-minded scheming women—Miss Panney, a rich old maid, and La Fleur, a perfect cook. Their weapons are their wills. Each has planned a match for a young man, the new lord of Cobhurst; and which will win the reader can only guess until the end is in sight. Miss Panney's nominee is Dora Bannister; La Fleur's candidate, Cicely Drane. Anyone at all interested in such contests, and in the least attracted by Mr. Stockton's ingenuity and mock gravity, will enjoy the book.

Here is a fragment of the conversation of Miss Panney, an old lady fit to stand in Mr. Stockton's gallery of female individualists. She is talking with the doctor concerning a patient whom he is expecting:

"She sat for a few minutes with her brows knitted in thought. Suddenly she exclaimed, 'Is it Susan Clopsey you expect? Very well, then, I will make an exception in her favour. She is just coming in at the gate, and I would not interfere with your practice on her for anything. She has got money and a spinal column, and, as long as they both last, she is more to be depended on than Government bonds. If her troubles ever get into her legs, and I have reason to believe they will, you can afford to hire a little maid for your cook. Old Daniel Clopsey, her grandfather, died at ninety-five, and he had the same doctorable rheumatism that he had at fifty. I have something to think over, and I will come in again when she is gone.'

'Depart! O mercenary being!' exclaimed the doctor, 'before you abase my thoughts from sulphate of quinia to filthy lucre.'

'Lucre is never filthy until you lose it,' said the old lady, as she went out on the back piazza, and closed the door behind her.'

Another character, equally Stocktonian in formation, is Miriam, the little sister of the young lord of Cobhurst. Brother and sister had reached their new home over-night, and had begun to explore when Miriam was taken ill. From her sick-bed she sends him this note:

"DEAR RALPH,—I went upstairs and looked at the third floor and a good deal of the garret, without you being with me. I really want to be perfectly fair, and so you must not stop altogether from looking at things until I am able to go with you. I think good things to look at by yourself would be stables and barnyards, and the lower part of barns. Please do not go into hay lofts, nor into the chicken-yard, if there is one. You might keep your eyes on the ground until you get to these places, and then look up. If there are horses and cows, don't tell me anything about them when you see me. Don't tell me anything. I think I shall be well to-morrow, perhaps to-night. MIRIAM."

One of Miriam's first acts is to name a horse Mrs. Browning.

Mr. Stockton's new book is, at best, fooling; that must be understood. But it is fooling of a very agreeable order.

* * * *

The Crook of the Bough. By M<sup>me</sup> Muriel Dowie.
(Methuen & Co.)

ONE closes The Crook of the Bough reluctantly, with the sense of parting from a personality. That is an experience sufficiently rare in the routine of a reviewer. Of course, in a sense, all art must be impersonal; but, of course, too, in a larger sense, all art must be personal in the supreme degree—it must reveal the artist's temperament and his personal vision. For the most part, the fictions that come one's way nowadays are impersonal in the wrong sense. Miss Dowie's fictions are always personal in the right sense; they reveal a temperament and an intensely personal vision. You fancy a woman, delicate, critical, distinguished, with wit, with humour, with sympathy, gazing at the world through whimsical, half-closed eyes, noting the incongruity, the irony, the drollery and the pathos of things, and then translating her impressions, and the emotion of them, into delicate, critical, distinguished phrases. You hear a voice speaking from the page, a chiselled, crisp, melodious voice, instantly recognisable.

The irony of things is the note that dominates The Crook of the Bough. Islay Netherdale was a sensible, serviceable, tailor-made young Englishwoman, self-effacing, with no thought for chiffons, content to serve her brother, George Netherdale, M.P., as amanuensis and general assistant. Then she and George went for a holiday-run to Constantinople. Colonel Hassan Bey, the rising hope of the Young Turkey party, admired Islay because she was sensible and serviceable. He lamented the unserviceable condition of the ladies of his own unhappy land. Half the woes the East is heir to, he derived from the circumstance that half the population are immured, subtracted from the activities of life. Islay, meanwhile, was admiring the little French Countess d'Avril—for her chiffons, if you please; for the charming unserviceable qualities that chiffons symbolise. So, after her return to England, she began to cultivate a pretty taste in chiffons, on her own account. She became less and less serviceable, more and more feminine and delightful. She even achieved open-work stockings. But the result was that when Hassan Bey arrived in Victoria-street, with a view to demanding the serviceable young Englishwoman's hand in marriage, he found a delicious creature of silks and laces, almost as devout a votary of chiffons as Mme. d'Avril herself. He returned to the Near East with a disillusion, instead of a serviceable Western spouse.

The above is the barest hint of the motive of Miss Dowie's new book, a motive singularly ingenious and suggestive. The book itself should be read, for a hundred reasons. No less than Some Whims of Fate, it reveals a temperament and a vision, a sensitive and cultivated imagination expressing itself through a fine medium. It is therefore that very rare experience indeed in the routine of a present-day reviewer—a work of fiction which is also quite unmistakably a work of art.

Kronstadt. By Max Pemberton.
(Cassell & Co.)

Of the younger novelists none has more quickly won a large share of popular regard, or won his share by more legitimate means, than Mr. Max Pemberton. He is an excellent journeyman of fiction; he can be relied upon by editors and syndicates to supply the kind of story with just the requisite amount of snap and go, of incident and pathos, to suit what those persons conceive to be the taste of the modern reader. But Mr. Pemberton is more than a journeyman. He takes himself seriously, and he tries to write well—and certainly he does not write ill—and he may arrive at being an artist in his craft. At present, with all his good and promising qualities, he is scarcely that. In the present story he handicaps himself with electing to deal with a central motive which cannot but be unsympathetic however treated, with whatever grace or charm, poignancy or conviction—the motive of a spy stealing the secrets of defence of a foreign country, while being treated with regard and confidence as a guest and friend of citizens of that country, and that not for any high and patriotic purpose, but only for money. The situation is innately ugly and repellent, and we cannot conceive that any treatment, however skillful, could make it attractive. Mr. Pemberton has tried his utmost, but there is at least one reader whom he has not convinced. First of all, he has invented a fascinating spy—a woman and pretty, and next he has made her desire for money unselfish: she has a little brother at home whom she wishes to keep in comfort and to educate well. We do not find that a good or sufficient reason for playing the spy, nor can we conceive that Mr. Pemberton adds to the force or consistency of his heroine's character by pretending that she did not quite guess the extraordinary value of the secrets which she stole and sold. She is represented as far too clever in other matters not to be fully aware of what she was doing in that. But, given the situation, the story is told with admirable vigour and picturesqueness, with an unrelaxed grip of the motive, and with no hint of weariness. Marian Best is English governess in the family of the Russian general who is governor of the great fortress of Kronstadt. She has a cousin in the English Admiralty who promises from his chiefs an enormous sum if she will supply plans of the citadel and all its works and outworks. She engages to do that, and has sent some of the plans to London when she is detected. She is imprisoned by the Russians, and is finally delivered by her lover, a young Russian officer, who steams away with her in a swift yacht. They are pursued by the Russian authorities as far as London—where the solution of the situation is found. Perhaps the most spirited bit of narration is the escape of the yacht Esmeralda from the war-ship Kremi, that has as good as captured her:

“Many men had come together to the port-bow of the Kremi, and they stood gaping at the stranger and at her crew. The lieutenant who had first cried out, asking ‘What ship?’ gave the order that a gangway should be lowered; he did not doubt that it was the intention of the pursued to surrender without further effort. But those on board the Esmeralda were of one mind and purpose again. The grin broadened upon the face of Reuben; old John lighted his pipe with the deliberation of a man at his own fireside. Silently he waited while the crew of the Kremi flocked to the gangway. . . . Child’s work, the Russian thought, to grapple with the impudent and perky cockle-shell which had defied so vaingloriously the might of his country. . . . When the Esmeralda did not stop at the gangway, but drifted on, he thought for the moment that it was clumsy seamanship; but when, with dramatic suddenness, she began to go full steam ahead, his anger was not to be controlled. ‘Stand by to clear the guns!’ he roared. ‘Are you going to lose her? Great God, she will cheat us yet!’

He foamed and raged like a madman, for the yacht shot into the darkness as a shell from a great gun. The terrible moment of waiting was past. Inch by inch the little ship had drifted, carrying men whose hearts quivered with excitement but whose spirit was unbroken. The terror of waiting was upon them no more. They had been within a boat’s length of the ladder when John cried ‘Let her go!’ Then all the courage of their despair fired them. As a horse champing at his bit, so was the Esmeralda sagging there in the trough of the sea. The rush of steam into her cylinders was the touch of the spur she asked. She bounded forward into the heart of the breakers, and a cloud of spray hid her from the enemy’s sight.”

The whole adventure is told with unflagging zeal, and the leper episode especially with a weird picturesqueness. And we cannot doubt that the book will have a considerable popularity, spite of the drawbacks of the heroine. We wonder, by the way, if Mr. Pemberton knows that the great Kronstadt Citadel, the effect of which he describes so well, was mainly built by the uncle of the late R. L. Stevenson, the senior member of the engineering firm, by contract with the Czar Nicholas.

* * * * *
Sowing the Sand. By Florence Henniker.
(Harper & Brothers.)

MRS. HENNIKER tells in this novel how Charley Crespin, the son of a wealthy manufacturer, entered the Army and made a mess of his career through gambling and a woman. The story is well observed and well told. The impact of easy-going Army society on dull, respectable manufacturing society is noted and rendered with real ability. The home of the Crespins, stately and sooty, standing on the edge of a northern town and the blighted country, with its interior conventionalities, its frightful wall-papers, is not merely made real by description but is made serviceable to the story by the art of that description. The characters, too, are distinct—Mildred, Albert Mellor, who consoled himself in his exclusion from the Army (he is lame) by reading books of tactics, Mrs. Devereux, the unhappy, fascinating, fearless grass-widow—these and other figures live in these pages. Here is a passage from the scene in which after Charley’s exposure and his abortive attempt at suicide his father reproaches Major Jack Savile:

“‘You never meant to do my son any harm, oh! dear no!—and it’s purely his own stupid fault if he’s got a lot of feeling, and takes things more seriously than most of you do. If you had cared to do so, you could have found that out. Then you knew what sort of people we were—old-fashioned, behind the times in every way, and all that. We had certain notions we’d learnt when we were young, about things being right and wrong, though we mayn’t always have been quite up to the mark ourselves. We couldn’t understand that we were really only fools because we didn’t call evil good and good evil. We had an idea, just the same as you have, that we oughtn’t to tell lies, for instance. Well, Charley, Major, has cost me thousands of pounds, gambling and betting. I don’t care about the loss of that money, not a damn—I’ve got plenty. But he lied to me, over and over again, letting me believe he was keeping within his allowance! You needn’t have preached to him, I don’t believe myself in preaching, but he liked you so much!—we all did—my wife and girl and me, we did like you, and you could have done such a lot with Charley!’”

Mrs. Henniker does what so many novelists nowadays do not—she takes pains and attends to detail.

MR. GLADSTONE IN LITTLE.

FROM a little book entitled A Roll of Thoughts from Mr. Gladstone, published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, we extract the following sentences. They occur in Mr. Gladstone’s speeches, pamphlets, and books:

One of the commonest of all vulgar errors is to mistake warmth of heart and feeling, and the directness of impression which is allied with sincerity of character, for violence of opinion.

—If we plant ourselves at an elevation sufficient to command the prospects of the moral world, we then perceive that, as in war, so in peace, the victor often succumbs inwardly to the vanquished.

He who labours for Dante labours to save Italy, Christianity, the world.

Where there is a brave and gallant spirit in a man, it commonly, and in the absence of extraordinary trials, manages to save something of time, of thought, of energy, from the urgent demands of his outer life and his bodily wants. There is the blessed rest of Sunday, a standing and a speaking witness of the truth that man does not live by bread alone.

For his own growth and development, a man should seek to acquire to his full capacity useful knowledge, in order to deal it out again according to the supreme purposes of education.

A man who can entertain a very strong, deep, and permanent attachment, who is capable of making, even once, a great effort of self-constraint and self-denial for the sake of another, and who dies of the wound that attachment had inflicted, does not represent an unrelieved depravity which constitutes the villain.

There can be no more futile, no more mischievous conception, than that faith is to be kept entire by hiding from view the melancholy phenomena of unbelief.

The love of freedom itself is hardly stronger in England than the love of aristocracy.

A successful début, an offer from the Minister, a Secretaryship of State, and even the Premiership itself are the objects which form the vista along which a young visionary loves to look.

It is said, and said truly, that truth beats fiction, that what happens in fact from time to time is of a character so daring, so strange, that if the novelist were to imagine it, and put it upon his pages, the whole world would reject it from its improbability.

It is the wisdom of man universally to watch against his besetting errors, and to strengthen himself in his weaker points.

Depend upon it, a human being, if he is to grow, will find out that one of the best and most certain means of growth is that he should dwell not only in the present, but also in the future, and not only in the present and the future, but also in the past, and that is eminently characteristic of Englishmen.

Be assured that everyone, without exception, has his place and vocation on this earth, and that it rests with himself to find it.

It is by the creative powers that the poet projects his work from himself; stands, as it were, completely detached from it, and becomes in his own personality invisible. Thus did Homer and Shakespeare, perhaps beyond all other men—thus did Goethe . . . thus did Dante when he pleased.

In a room well filled with books no one has felt or can feel solitary. Second to none as friends, to the individual they are first and foremost among the "compages," the bonds and rivets of the race, onwards from that time when they were first written on the tablets of Babylonia and Assyria, the rocks of Asia Minor, and the monuments of Egypt, down to the diamond editions of Mr. Pickering and Mr. Froude.

Another purpose for books is to enlarge the mind, to brace the mind, to enable the people to find pleasure, not only in the relaxation of literature, but in the hard work, in the stiff thought of literature. The hard work of literature conveys to those who pursue it in sincerity and truth not only utility, but also real enjoyment.

Like the sun which furnishes with its light the close courts and alleys of London, while himself unseen by their inhabitants, Homer has supplied with the illumination of his ideas millions of minds that were never brought into direct contact with his works, and even millions more that have hardly been aware of his existence.

Repentance is not innocence; there must be a remedial process and until that process has been faithfully accomplished the anterior state and habit of mind cannot be resumed.

As regards everything which bears upon the higher functions and higher destinies of our nature, the presumptions are sadly against any book which issues from the press in the fatal form of three volumes, crown octavo.

Few are they who either in trade or letters take it for their aim to supply the market not with the worst they can sell, but with the best they can produce.

For works of the mind really great there is no old age, no decrepitude. It is inconceivable that a time should come when Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, shall not ring in the ears of civilised man.

To think of God seldom is better than not to think of Him at all. To love Him faintly is better than to be in utter and unvarying indifference or aversion towards the Giver of all good.

Autobiographies are commonly of real interest; for every man does his best to make his own portrait a likeness.

Among the many noble thoughts of Homer, there is not one more noble or more penetrating than his judgment upon slavery. "On the day," he says, "that makes a bondman of the free, Wide-seeing Zeus takes half the man away." He thus judges, not because the slavery of his time was cruel, for evidently it was not; but because it was slavery.

The colours that will endure through the term of a butterfly's existence would not avail to carry the works of Titian down from generation to generation and century to century.

Poetry, the mirror of the world, cannot deal with its attractions only, but must present some of its repulsions also, and avail herself of the powerful assistance of its contrasts.

MACAULAY ON GLADSTONE.

SIXTY years have passed since Mr. Gladstone published his first book, The State in its Relations with the Church, and gave Macaulay the subject for an Edinburgh Review essay. Now that the marvellous career, then just beginning, has reached its close, it is interesting to turn again for a moment to the well-known essay, "Gladstone on Church and State," and read what Macaulay thought of the "young man of unblemished character" who set himself to prove that the propagation of religious truth is one of the principal ends of Government, as government:

"Mr. Gladstone [writes Macaulay] seems to us to be, in many respects, exceedingly well qualified for philosophical investigation. His mind is of large grasp; nor is he deficient in dialectical skill. But he does not give his intellect fair play. There is no want of light, but a great want of what Bacon would have called dry light. Whatever Mr. Gladstone sees is refracted and distorted by a false medium of passions and prejudices. His style bears a remarkable analogy to his mode of thinking, and, indeed, exercises great influence on his mode of thinking. His rhetoric, though often good of its kind, darkens and perplexes the logic which it should illustrate. Half his acuteness and diligence, with a barren imagination and a scanty vocabulary, would have saved him from almost all his mistakes. He has one gift most dangerous to a speculator, a vast command of a kind of language, grave and majestic, but of vague and uncertain import; of a kind of language which affects us much in the same way in which the lofty diction of the chorus of Clouds affected the simple-hearted Athenian."

Of the book itself Macaulay says:

"It is written throughout with excellent taste and excellent temper; nor does it, so far as we have observed, contain one expression unworthy of a gentleman, a scholar, or a Christian."

Touching upon the reactionary views which Mr. Gladstone supports, Macaulay writes:

"The truth is, that every man is to a great extent the creature of the age. It is to no purpose that he resists the influence which the vast mass, in which he is but an atom, must exercise on him. . . . Mr. Gladstone's book is, in this respect, a very gratifying performance. It is the measure of what a man can do to be left behind by the world. It is the strenuous effort of a very vigorous mind to keep as far in the rear of the general progress as possible."

The last passage reads a little strangely—sixty years after. The closing words of Macaulay's essay express accurately the feelings with which Mr. Gladstone's bitterest opponents have always regarded him.

"We have done; and nothing remains but that we part from Mr. Gladstone with the courtesy of antagonists who bear no malice. We dissent from his opinions, but we admire his talents; we respect his integrity and benevolence; and we hope that he will not suffer political avocations so entirely to engross him as to leave him no leisure for literature and philosophy."

That hope was fulfilled, for between 1838 and 1898 Mr. Gladstone's pen was rarely idle, and the pages of the British Museum catalogue and our own columns this week bear ample witness to his industry. One thing, however, Macaulay did not foresee—the enthusiastic devotion with which Mr. Gladstone inspired large numbers of his fellow-countrymen. "It would not be at all strange," he wrote, "if Mr. Gladstone were one of the most unpopular men in England."

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1898.

No. 1360, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a News-vendor or at a Railway Station . . .          | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 5 3      |
| including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.                | 0 15 3  | 6 7 8        | 0 5 10     |
| including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 8      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN this number will be found a collection of Mr. Gladstone's opinions upon books, exemplifying his continuous interest in certain aspects of current literature throughout his long career.

FROM the collection of Sonnets on the Sonnet which has just been put forth by the Rev. Matthew Russell we take the following "Sonnet to a Rejected Sonnet," which Mr. Gladstone contributed to the Eton Miscellany rather more than seventy years ago:

"Poor child of Sorrow! who didst boldly spring,
Like sapient Pallas, from thy parent's brain,
All armed in mail of proof! and though woudstst faint

Leap further yet, and, on exulting wing,
Rise to the summit of the Priuter's Press!
But cruel hand hath nipp'd thy buds amain,
Hath fix'd on thee the darkling inky stain,
Hath soil'd thy splendour, and defiled thy dress!

Where are thy 'full-orbed moon' and 'sky serene'?

And where thy 'waving foam,' and 'foaming wave'?

All, all are blotted by the murd'rous pen,
And lie unhonour'd in their papery grave!
Weep, gentle sonnets! Sonneteers, deplore!
And vow—and keep the vow—you'll write no more!"

APPROPOS Mr. Gladstone's zeal as a book-buyer, a well-known bookseller tells how he once received an unsigned cheque in payment for the last consignment of volumes sent Hawarden. Such an incident is the very emphasis of promptitude.

THE Hon. Lionel Tollemache has kept records of a number of interesting conversations he was privileged to hold with Mr. Gladstone during recent years. The conversations took place for the most part at Biarritz between 1891 and 1896, and ranged over a variety of intellectual, religious, and political questions, on which Mr. Gladstone's opinions were freely expressed. Mr. Tollemache has now put these conversations together in a small volume, which will be entitled Talks with Mr. Gladstone, and will be published in a few days by Mr. Edward Arnold.

Two biographies of Mr. Gladstone, which present him in his public and private characters, are Mr. Lucy's The Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone in the "Statesmen Series," and Mr. David Williamson's Gladstone, the Man. The latter book is new, the former has just been reissued by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co.

WHEN the character of a man is known, as Mr. Gladstone's was, through a hundred media, why seek to find it in handwriting? Such efforts seem to us unconvincing and superfluous. Mr. J. Holt Schooling, being a graphologist, thinks otherwise; and it may be admitted that if graphology can explain Mr. Gladstone or extend our knowledge of him, Mr. Schooling has gone the right way about such a task in his little booklet, The Handwriting of Mr. Gladstone, which is a reprint of an article in the Strand Magazine. Mr. Schooling has collected examples of Mr. Gladstone's writing from 1822 to 1894, and he reproduces and arranges and compares them with that keenness which stamps the graphologist. The book is issued by Mr. Arrowsmith.

THE following passage is from When a Man's Single:

"'There's enough copy on the board,' said Penny [the foreman printer], 'to fill the paper. Any more specials coming in?'"

He asked this fiercely, as if of opinion that the sub-editor arranged with leading statesmen nightly to flood the composing-room of the Mirror with speeches, and Protheroe [the sub-editor] replied abjectly, as if he had been caught doing it: 'Lord John Manners is speaking to-night at Nottingham.'

The foreman dashed his hand upon the desk. 'Go it, Mister,' he cried; 'anything else? Tell me Gladstone's dead next.'

Sometimes about two o'clock in the morning Penny would get sociable, and the sub-editor was always glad to respond. On those occasions they talked with bated breath of the amount of copy that would come in should anything happen to Mr. Gladstone; and the sub-editor, if he was in a despondent mood, predicted that it would occur at midnight. Thinking of this had made him a Conservative."

ONE obiter dictum of Mr. Barrio's, in his preface to Mrs. Oliphant's A Widow's Tale, is worth isolating: "Kirsteen . . . I take to be the best, far the best, story of its kind that has come out of Scotland for the last score of years."

MR. KIPLING's latest poem—in praise of torpedo-boats—was inspired by a passage in a book on that subject by Lieut. Armstrong, who is, as most people know, the editor of the Globe. The poem appears in the Windsor Magazine. Here is one summarising stanza:

"The strength of twice three thousand horse
That serve the one command:
The hand that heaves the headlong force
The hate that backs the hand:
The doom-bolt in the darkness freed—
The mine that splits the main—
The white-hot wake the 'wildering speed—
The Choosers of the Slain!"

It is not Mr. Kipling at his best, but very forceful.

MEANWHILE, we observe that Mr. John Buchan in his Newdigate Prize Poem on the Pilgrim Fathers, which has just reached us in unassuming grey covers, also writes forcefully of the sea. He has prefixed to the Prize Poem three stirring stanzas addressed to the Adventurous Spirit of the North, of which this is one:

"Seal on the hearts of the strong,
Guerdon, thou, of the brave,
To nerve the arm in the press of the throng,
To cheer the dark of the grave.—
Far from the heather hills,
Far from the misty sea,—
Little it irks where a man may fall
If he falls with his heart on thee."

In The Pilgrim Fathers Mr. Buchan is confined to the heroic metre. It moves deliberately and with dignity, as prize poems should, and, unlike many prize poems, it is truly readable.

WE have received from A. W. the following amusing note:

"Readers of your interesting article on 'The Newdigate' may care to be told of another line in an unsuccessful effort upon 'Gordon in Africa.' The poet had risen to a height of emotion in describing the horrors of Gordon's life in Khartoum, and was suddenly reminded of the religious consolations likely to be present to the great General's mind. Hence the line—a masterpiece—

'The lions were tearing him piecemeal; but he knew it was all for the best!'"

MR. EDWARD BELLAMY's death revives memories of the extraordinary success of his Looking Backward, which was published in this country by Mr. William Reeves in 1889. A representative of the ACADEMY had a talk with Mr. Reeves on the subject:

"How many copies of Looking Backward did you sell?" he asked the Fleet-street bookseller.

"About one hundred and fifty thousand. We were selling as many as five thousand copies a week during the 'boom.'"

"And now?"

"Oh, we still sell a hundred copies a month."

"Now, Mr. Reeves, to whom is the credit due for introducing Looking Backward to English readers; in other words, how came you to discover it?"

"Well, a Mr. Bolas—I think it was a Mr. Bolas—showed us the American edition, and I read it, and liked it, and became the London agent for it."

"Then, at first, you sold only that edition?"

"Yes; at 2s. and 4s. per copy."

"But what of the English shilling edition, which stirred the Nonconformist conscience; how did it originate?"

"Well, a clergyman, who believed in the book, was going to induce another firm to print a cheap English edition——"

"Pirated?"

"Yes, actually! Of course we were indignant; and our reply was to bring out our own shilling edition."

"I see; and—er—was it pi——?"

Mr. Reeves responded with a blush that Sigismund might have envied.

It is an unwritten law of oratory that a quotation, provided it is opportune, may have any parentage, however undistinguished. Yet one hardly looks for excerpts from music-hall songs to point a speech delivered at a meeting of the Canterbury House of Laymen, and be reported gravely in the Guardian. Such, however, is the case. Speaking on the question of divergence in liturgical use, Mr. Athelstan Riley, in moving that a closer adherence to the form of Divine Worship presented in the Book of Common Prayer is desirable, particularly in the celebration of the Holy Communion, quoted two lines from "a popular song" to lend emphasis to his contention. The song was "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay."

THE most emphatic snub yet administered to the interviewer is reported in a Johannesburg paper. A gentleman of the Press called upon the author of The Story of an African Farm for her opinions on the condition of the country. Mrs. Cronwright Schreiner refused to be interviewed, but did not, as Mr. Kipling and others do, leap on a bicycle and retreat; on the contrary, she addressed the young man thus: "I heartily condemn the modern interview. A person is ensnared into a light and superficial colloquy upon a subject which demands deep thought and mature reflection. If a man or a woman has a message to issue it cannot be uttered forcefully in one of these 'interviews.' 'Interviews' are abominations which accentuate the personality at the expense of the principle."

In an interesting letter to the Nation we find a fairly full account of Tennyson's indebtedness to Catullus. Thus the closing section of "Eleänore" is a free translation either of the "Ille mi par esse deo videtur" of Catullus, or of the ode of Sappho from which that poem was itself translated. The allusion in "Edwin Morris,"

"Shall not Love to me,

As in the Latin song I learnt at school,
Sneeze out a full God-bless-you right and left?"

is to the charming love-idyll of "Acme and Septimius,"

"Hoc ut dixit, Amor, sinistra ut ante, Dextra stecruit adprobationem."

The lines in "In Memoriam," lvi.,

"And 'Ave, Ave, Ave,' said
'Adieu, adieu,' for ever more," seem to be a reminiscence of "Atque in perpetuum, frater, ave atque vale," and Prof. Tyrrell has recently maintained (Latin Poetry, p. 115) that in the noble passage of "Tithonus," where the horses of the Sun

"shake the darkness from their loosen'd manes,
And beat the twilight into flakes of fire,"

Tennyson must have had in his mind the passage in the "Attis," where Catullus says of the rising Sun,

"And he smote on the dim dawn's path with the hoofs of his fiery chariot-steeds,"

"pepultique noctis umbras vegetis sonipedibus." The metrical experiment entitled "Hendecasyllabics" is "all composed in a metre of Catullus"; the metre of the "Boädicea" is an echo of the metre of the "Attis"; and a great part of the "Jubilee Ode" is written in the metre of the "Collis O Heliconii."

BESIDES these references there are the examples of Tennyson's well-known admiration, or even adoration, of "sweet Catullus," "tenderest of the Roman poets," in the poem written after his visit to Sirmio, and in "Poets and their Bibliographies." Writing to Mr. Gladstone of the sonnet, "At Midnight," which that critic had compared with Catullus' great elegy, Tennyson replied: "I am glad, too, that you are touched by my little prefatory poem, so far as to honour it by a comparison with those lovely lines, 'Multas per terras [gentes] et multa per æquora vectus,' of which, as you truly say, neither I nor any other 'can surpass the beauty'; nor can any modern elegy, so long as men retain the least hope in the after-life of those whom they loved, equal in pathos the desolation of that everlasting farewell, 'Atque in perpetuum frater ave atque vale.'"

THE airy critics who have been summing up their contemporaries for Mr. Rothenstein's collection of English Portraits, which has just come to a close, conclude with Mr. Cunningham Graham and Mr. Henry James. Mr. Graham is thus touched off:

"Mr. Cunningham Graham, an engaging blend of dandy, dreamer, and buccaneer, is a gentleman of various foibles and accomplishments. Too volatile for any one continent, he has travelled far in every direction, and has written books that are mines of wit and humour and bewildering information. He has dallied with Paraguay, and quite recently the Moors made him their prisoner. Nor is this the sole captivity he has endured. Some years ago he contracted an unfortunate habit of thinking aloud in Trafalgar-square, and the authorities sought to break him of this habit by means of imprisonment with hard labour. The culprit, always a lover of adventure for its own sake, did his time gaily, and when he came out every one—except the compositors of the Press, to whom his handwriting is a source of grave annoyance—felt very much relieved and delighted."

Apropos Mr. Graham's books, when are we to have a reprint of some of his Saturday Review articles? There was one a few weeks ago, called "Bristol Fashion," which Mr. Conrad might have been proud to sign.

MR. HENRY JAMES is treated with more solemnity and more metaphor:

"He is never satisfied, never weary in well-doing; 'now a flash of red, now a flash of blue,' the divine vision of a style that shall be the body and soul of life in literature hangs above him, a pendulous and evasive mirage. Hence arise the peculiarities which encourage the slipshod to be hostile, and which sometimes confound the very lovers of his work. Super-erogations mar the ease of the performance; the bricks are piled so airily that a straw brings them rattling down. These are the penalties of that intrepid eudeavour to leave nothing unexplored, nothing incompletely indicated. These are the dust-stains on the brilliant, muscular hand that will not, cannot drop the tool at sundown. Yet Mr. Henry James is no loser by this feverish solicitude. He has grown to be one of the greatest men we have in letters. If you ask us where, with respect to others, do we place him?—'Oh, you know, we don't put them back to back that way; it's the infancy of art! And he gives us a pleasure so rare!'"

It is possible that to the creator of the great Hans Breitmann belongs the credit of the song "Time for us to go." That stirring and unprincipled chanty, which was sung by Mr. Valentine, as Pew in "Admiral Guinea," is not to be forgotten, was first printed in a contribution entitled "Captain Jonas Fisher," which Mr. Leland wrote for Temple Bar many years ago. There Mr. Henley found it. Pew sings fragments only; this is the complete work:

"TIME FOR US TO GO.

With sails let fall, and sheeted home, and clear of the ground were we,
We passed the bank, stood round the light, and sailed away to sea;
The wind was fair, and the coast was clear, and the brig was noways slow,
For she was built in Baltimore, and 'twas time for us to go.

Time for us to go,

Time for us to go,

For she was built in Baltimore, and 'twas time for us to go.

A quick run to the West we had, and, when we made the Bight,
We kept the offing all day long, and crossed the bar at night.
Six hundred niggers in the hold and seventy we did stow,
And when we'd clapped the hatches on, 'twas time for us to go.

We hadn't been three days at sea before we saw a sail,
So we clapped on every stitch we'd stand, although it blew a gale,
And we walked along full fourteen knots, for the barkie she did know,
As well as ever a soul on board, 'twas time for us to go.

We carried away the royal yards, and the stuns'le boom was gone,
Says the Skipper, 'They may go, or stand; I'm darned if I don't crack on.
So the weather braces we'll round in, and the trys'le set also,
And we'll keep the brig three p'int's away, for it's time for us to go.'

O, yardarm under she did plunge in the trough of the deep seas;
And her masts they thrashed about like whips, as she bowled before the breeze;

And every yard it buckled up like to a bending bow;
But her spars were tough as whalebone, and 'twas time for us to go.

We dropped the cruiser in the night, and our cargo landed we,
And ashore we went, with our pockets full of dollars on the spree.

And when the liquor it is out, and the locker it is low,
Then to sea again in the ebony trade 'twill be time for us to go.

Time for us to go,

Time for us to go.

Then to sea again in the ebony trade 'twill be time for us to go."

Whether Mr. Leland composed this fine effort, or merely reproduced it, we cannot say.

THE Celtic Renaissance again. The case of the Inverness sergeants who are to be supplied with a Gaelic dictionary has already been referred to in the ACADEMY. And now, in the House of Commons, the Lord Advocate has been plied with questions as to Gaelic text-books for schools; and quite recently a School Board in the North dismissed a teacher because of his inability to teach "ta Gaelic." But the most startling evidence of this Celtic Renaissance comes from Oban. A gentleman there has received a letter from a Celt in England suggesting—so it is announced—that with a view to familiarising Gaelic music and Gaelic songs to English ears, half-a-dozen of the best Gaelic singers in Scotland should make a tour throughout the principal Lancashire towns, and possibly go through England, and give a series of Gaelic concerts. The scheme would, it is urged, be a "great success," not only from the Celtic academic standpoint, but also from the Celtic financial point of view. There are doubters, however, who question whether the "English people will turn out to hear Gaelic singers," thereby displaying what the redoubtable Bailie Nicol Jarvie would have termed "glimmerings of reason."

THE Brontë Museum at Haworth will be the richer for the sale of the late Miss Ellen Nussey's effects last week. Fragments of Charlotte Brontë's handwriting on envelopes and elsewhere fetched good prices; and even certain of her letters copied by Miss Nussey brought a few pounds. A piece of Charlotte's hair, and a piece of Anne's, formed one lot, and some weapons used in the defence of Cartwright's mill another. It was, indeed, a great time for the resurrectionists.

AMONG unnecessary books we are constrained to include the edition of The Blessed Damozel, which Messrs. Duckworth & Co. have just issued. The poem is accessible enough in editions of Rossetti; and unless it is assisted by designs of great beauty or an introduction of great charm, we cannot see the advantage of padding it out to fill such a volume as this, wherein Mr. MacDougall's designs have not great beauty, nor Mr. W. M. Rossetti's introduction great charm. Mr. Rossetti begins thus: "The pen or the partiality of a brother is not needed for saying that the poem, if considered simply from the poetical point of view, ranks as highly remarkable among the works of very juvenile writers"; and thus he ends: "It was the brightest jewel in the circlet of his youth; and none that he added in his prime has bedimmed its lustre, or (to use a more colloquial expression) has 'taken the shine out of it.'"

THE railway to be constructed between Connel Ferry, on the Callander and Oban line, and Ballachulish (the contracts for which have now been completed) will open up a portion of northern Argyllshire rich alike in scenic grandeur, in historical interest, and in literary associations. After crossing Loch Etive at Connel Ferry, the line will skirt Achnacree moss, under a cairn in which Ossian is said to be buried, while to the east stand the venerable ruins of the ancient Priory of Ardochattan. The vitrified remains of the Celtic city of Beregonium, believed to date back to the fourth century B.C., are in the route of the railway which, after crossing Loch Creran, traverses the rugged Appin country, a portion of "The Country of Kidnapped." The northern terminus of the new line will be at Ballachulish, in the vicinity of which occurred the Appin murder.

Hitherto the seaboard of the district has been well served with steamers, but inland, except to a few pedestrians, the country has been to a large extent unknown.

WE quoted a little while since the reply of an American writer to Mr. Lang's strictures on the treatment by America of English authors visiting that country. The reply contained an invitation to Mr. Lang to come and see America for himself. In the current Longman's Mr. Lang refers to this matter. "Alas," says he, "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. Like this hospitable author, I make a real distinction between visitors who come to make money by talking, 'and visitors who come for human pleasure.' I could not pretend to regard my 'talk' as an equivalent for dollars, and the American public might take the same view, above all if, as is too probable, they could not hear the talk, the talker being 'roopy,' as Steerforth said about David Copperfield."

WE are glad to see that the S.P.C.K. has taken the hint to obtain from M. Maspero a list of the passages in The Struggle of the Nations which he thinks might be re-translated with advantage. Of these corrections they now give a table, and they will be carried into the text of all future editions. In the note, by M. Maspero, prefixed to them the true reason of the former corruptions is given, and turns out to be—not the desire to make M. Maspero's statements square with orthodoxy, but—a wish to make the pages of the English edition correspond with those of the French. We adhere to our original view, that all the alterations so made are utterly unimportant.

THE late Mr. James Payn's Chinese novel, By Proxy, has just been re-issued in six-penny form by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

WE clip the following from the "Agony," column of last Tuesday's Times:

"NOTICE to the PUBLIC.—Whereas a false statement is being circulated through the Press to the effect that the NEXT PUBLISHED WORK by MARIE CORELLI will bear the TITLE of 'The Sins of Christ,' the said Marie Corelli publicly denies the assertion, and herewith informs her readers and the public generally that this REPORT has NO FOUNDATION IN FACT. Owing to her recent grave illness and subsequent enforced rest, Miss Marie Corelli will publish no work whatsoever this year, but when she is again able to produce a new book it will be (as in all her other works) designed to uphold the Christian faith, which faith she acknowledges and obeys.

(Signed)

MARIE CORELLI.

May 22, 1898."

In its '98 form Phil May's Summer Annual is not equal to some of its predecessors. The artist is neither at his best nor funniest. But this, to the purchaser unacquainted with the previous issues, need be no deterrent. We quote one of Mr. May's legends: "The Mayor of Middle Wallop (who is interested in the decoration of new theatre): 'O's that gentleman you're painting?' Artist: 'That is William Shakespeare.' The Mayor: 'As 'e ever done anything for Middle Wallop?' Artist: 'No, sir, not that I am aware of.' The Mayor: 'Then paint 'im out, and paint ME in.'"

WITH the June number Cassell's Magazine, which has lately grown much in vigour, begins a new volume. Among the special features are a new novel by Mr. Joseph Hocking and a series of criminal episodes told by Mr. E. W. Hornung.

THE poster is to have its organ, named after itself—The Poster. This will be a six-penny monthly magazine, devoted to the pictorial and literary illustration of the posters of the world. The first number, due early in June, promises attractive fare, including reproductions in full colours of posters by Mucha and Yendis, and black and white illustrations by Messrs. John Hassall, Dudley Hardy, Louis F. Rhead, Frank Chesworth, Albert Morrow, Stewart Browne, Lucien Faure, Beggstaff Bros., "Pal," and others. Nor will there be any lack of literary matter. This will include an article on "Caran d'Ache in London."

ADMIRATION for Ian Maclaren has in New York come to this:

"THE

BONNIE BRIER BUSH

SCOTCH WHISKY.

The finest possible quality, very old.

Price 1 dol. 75 cents per bottle."

What will come next? The John Watson Temperance Tracts?

THE next dinner of the New Vagabonds will be held on June 16, when Mr. H. D. Traill will be the guest of the evening. Mr. Anthony Hope will preside.

MR. GLADSTONE AS READER AND CRITIC.

HIS LITERARY OPINIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE helped to make many authors famous. He read everything that came into his hands, and, with piles of volumes about him, he cried out continually for more. Lord Beaconsfield said of himself that he wrote a book when he wanted to read one; and there is attributed to his pen a stock letter he is supposed to have sent to authors who forwarded him their books—a letter in which he equivocally said he “would lose no time in reading them.” As a matter of fact, Lord Beaconsfield rarely acknowledged a volume from a stranger.

Mr. Gladstone frankly liked people to give him books, and he generally took the trouble to tell them so. If it was not a letter, it was a postcard, that the happy author got, generally to the great gain of the publisher.

For Mr. Gladstone's was a name to sell by, especially—let the irony be noted—in the case of fiction. He gave John Inglesant a gay life of sales, if a short one; Middlesex is still indebted to his introduction for new friends; in the author of Robert Elsmere, as fifty years earlier in the author of Ellen Middleton, he discerned “the true preacher in the guise of a novelist, and in the vestments of the female sex”; and he had a hail-fellow-well-met for Mr. Hall Caine's Christian. Many of the literary opinions of Mr. Gladstone ran to the length of magazine articles, or, like his appreciation of Dean Hook's memoir, were offered in lectures. Such pronouncements have their place in volumes. The collection of his briefer literary opinions that follows, though bulky, is, of course, not complete; perhaps from their pigeon-holes many readers may be able to produce for us similar missives, withheld from publication, for various reasons, during the writer's life.

SHELLEY AS “THE MISERABLE ONE.”

In the Quarterly Review, in 1845, Mr. Gladstone contributed a long review of The Life of the Rev. Joseph Blanco White. Mr. Gladstone's most frequent quotations of poetry at this period were from Shelley, and he classes the poet, who wrote of himself as “the miserable one,” among those “opponents of the Christian faith who do not disguise the bitterness of the fruits which they have reaped from the poisoned seed of their false imaginations”:

“Shelley tells us of himself, in those beautiful verses written, in dejection, near Naples:

‘Alas! I have nor hope, nor health,
Nor peace within, nor calm around.’

And he indicates in the ‘Alastor’ that the utmost he hoped to realise was:

‘Not sobs nor groans,
The passionate tumult of a clinging hope,
But pale despair and cold tranquillity.’

Mr. Blanco White was happily distinguished from Shelley in so far that, with his understanding in part, and with his heart less equivocally, he even to the last embraced the idea of a personal or quasi-personal God, whom he could regard with reverence and love, and to whom he could apply, with whatever restriction of the signification of the words, that sublimest sentiment of the Christian soul:

‘In la Sua volontade è nostra pace.’

Yet the only element of positive consolation which, so far as we can discover, cheered his later days, was the notion that there was something ‘ennobling,’ something ‘very dignified in a human being awaiting his dissolution with firmness!’ But neither had he joy on this side of the grave, nor any hope that would bear his own scrutiny on the other. For of the first, he repeatedly tells us that to live was torment, that he dreaded the idea of any improvement in his health, that nothing but the conviction of the criminality of the act kept him from self-destruction. Of the second, again, it is indeed true that his affections still struggled against the devouring scepticism of his understanding; and, as he had formerly tried to persuade himself of the doctrine of the Trinity, so he tries to persuade himself to the last that he will in some way exist after death. ‘God cannot,’ he says, ‘have formed his intellectual creatures to break like bubbles and be no more.’ But others, as far advanced as himself in the destruction of faith, have made efforts as vigorous to keep some hold of some notion of immortality. Thus Shelley has written with great force:

‘Nought we know dies. Shall that alone which knows,
Be as a sword consumed before the sheath
By sightless lightning?’

NOVELS WITH A PURPOSE.

Mr. Gladstone permitted the publication in Merry England of an article on Lady Georgiana Fullerton's Ellen Middleton, which he had written forty-five years before. In the course of a long article, which gave rise to considerable discussion on account of its implied advocacy of the Confessional, Mr. Gladstone said:

“It is a work that, to be appreciated, must be known in its details, in its eloquence and pathos, in the delicacy and fulness of its delineations of passions, in its always powerful and generally true handling of human action and motive. It is a rare treasure to find the mastery of all human gifts of authorship so happily combined with a full and clear apprehension of that undying faith in Catholic integrity by which the human race must ultimately stand or fall. A narrative can scarcely be otherwise than moving in which we see the blossom of rare promise nipped before it reaches maturity. But what avails the raising of barren emotions which lead to no genuine effort? There is, however, a class of works in which they may lead us by some forced or sudden turn to Him who is our home—some heart of high capacity for weal or woe, having conceived a profound sentiment of love, and having so fed the passion as to absorb into it all its strength and substance, then, when it has been shipwrecked, droops and dies along with it. Such is the love of Lucy Ashton for the Master of Ravenswood; such, too, is the love of Corinna for Oswald. What tears up the plant tears up the soil along with it. These are not mere flat recitals of the vanity of the world. They teach us a great lesson of our nature, its capacity for finding the end of life in another, and not in that middle point of self, where sin has placed it, and where sin would irrevocably fix it. This, and nothing less than this, is the aim of the present production.”

“QUEEN MARY.”

It was in acknowledging a copy of “Queen Mary” that Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Tennyson the letter pronouncing Queen Elizabeth “a great theologian”:

“11, Carlton House-terrace:
June 30, 1875.

MY DEAR TENNYSON,—It was most kind in you to send me the book; and I wish I had or could have anything to cap it with that would not seem like a mocking echo. However, I am going to reprint in a volume my recent tracts, and I shall perhaps make bold to send them to you. Perhaps we may appear in the ‘Index’ together. I cannot but be glad that, in turning to historic times, you have struck a note for the nation. For my own personal share, I have found my interest in your work on this occasion enhanced and cumulated by the novelty of form and by having to enjoy a careful historic study. It must have cost you great pains to qualify for such an assemblage of portraits, of whom five or six, at least, are of personages whose names never can be effaced from our annals, nor do I know that Mary, Philip (in England), Gardiner, or Cranmer have ever yet been fully drawn. The two last are still in a considerable degree mysteries to me! Was Cranmer a great weak man? Do great and weak contradict and include one another? He was certainly weak, I think, in the everlasting fluctuation of his opinions; for surely fluctuation of opinion had much to do with the six recantations. Elizabeth, on the other hand, was to my mind one of the great theologians of the period (who were exceedingly few) as well as the greatest among women-rulers. I think you may not dislike the following sentence from Jeremy Collier upon Cranmer at the stake: ‘He seemed to repel the force of flames, and to overlook the torture by strength of thought.’ My judgment is worthless; but I heartily congratulate you on the poem, on the study, and on the grace and ease with which you move in new habiliments.

Ever sincerely yours,
W. E. GLADSTONE.”

A MEMORIAL BIBLE.

During the Caxton celebration in 1877, a memorial Bible, printed at Oxford, bound in London, delivered at the South Kensington Exhibition buildings within twelve consecutive hours, was described by Mr. Gladstone in a speech as “the climax and consummation of the art of printing.” He further said:

“This volume was bound, as you see, and stamped with the arms of the University of Oxford. It is a Bible bound in a manner that commends itself to the reader; I believe in every respect an excellent piece of workmanship, containing more than one thousand pages. Well, you will say, ‘That is very commonplace; why bring it before us?’ I do so in order to tell you that the materials of this book sixteen hours ago did not exist. The book was not bound, it was not folded, it was not printed. Since the clock struck twelve last night at the University Press in Oxford the people there have printed and sent us this book to be distributed here in the midst of your festival. They have sent several copies, one of which will be presented to the Emperor of Brazil, who has just left our table. This shows what can be done, and what has been done, and it shows the state to which this great art is now happily arrived.”

"MAUD."

"No one but a noble-minded man would have done that," said Lord Tennyson in 1878, when Mr. Gladstone, recanting his original opinions about "Maud," wrote the following letter :

"I can now see, and I at once confess, that a feeling which had reference to the growth of the war spirit in the outer world at the date of this article [Quarterly Review, 1855] dislocated my frame of mind and disabled me from dealing even tolerably with the work as a work of imagination. Whether it is to be desired that a poem should require from common men a good deal of effort in order to comprehend it; whether all that is put into the mouth of the soliloquist in 'Maud' is within the lines of poetical verisimilitude; whether this poem has the full moral equilibrium, which is so marked a characteristic of the sister-works, are questions open, perhaps, to discussion. But I have neither done justice in the text to its rich and copious beauties of detail, nor to its great lyrical and metrical power; and, what is worse, I have failed to comprehend rightly the relation between particular passages in the poem and its general scope. This is, I conceive, not to set forth any coherent strain, but to use for poetical ends, all the moods and phases allowable under the laws of the art, in a special form of character, which is impassioned, fluctuating, and ill-grounded. The design, which seems to resemble that of the Ecclesiastes in another sphere, is arduous; but Mr. Tennyson's power of execution is probably nowhere greater. Even as regards the passages devoted to war frenzy, equity should have reminded me of the fine lines in the latter portion of X. 3 (Part I.), and of the emphatic words V. 10 (Part II.):

'I swear to you, lawful and lawless war
Are scarcely ever akin.'
W. E. G., 1878."

ROME'S RECRUITS.

To the compiler of a list of seceders to the Roman Catholic Church, issued first in a periodical, then in pamphlet form :

"Hawarden: Oct. 11, 1878.

DEAR SIR,—I thank you for sending me The Whitehall Review with the various lists of secessions to the Roman Church. I am glad they have been collected, and I am further glad to hear they are to be published in the form of a pamphlet. For good, according to some, or for evil, according to others, they form as a group an event of much interest and significance. It would very greatly add to the value of the coming pamphlet if an approximate statement of dates could be made part of it. To give the year in each case would probably be very difficult; but would it be difficult to give decades? Say from 1820 or 1830. Even to divide yet more largely would still be useful; as thus :

(1) Before 1840; (2) 1840-60; (3) since 1860. It would also be matter of interest to note: (1) The number of peers; (2) of members of titled families; (3) of clergy; (4) of Oxford men; (5) of ladies.

You will, I am sure, excuse this suggestion, and again accept my thanks.—I remain, your very faithful

W. E. GLADSTONE."

CARLYLE'S "HERO-WORSHIP."

In a lecture delivered in 1879 in the village of Hawarden on "The Life of Dr. Hook," Mr. Gladstone said :

"Mr. Carlyle had written a book of extraordinary ability called Lectures on Heroes, and in this he named as a hero, among others, Napoleon. Now he was not prepared to admit that Napoleon was a hero. He was certainly one of the most extraordinary men ever born. There was more power concentrated in that brain than in any brain probably born for centuries. That he was a great man in the sense of being a man of transcendent power, there was no doubt; but his life was tainted with selfishness from beginning to end, and he was not ready to admit that a man whose life was fundamentally tainted with selfishness was a hero. A greater hero than Napoleon was the captain of a ship which was run down in the Channel three or four years ago, and who, when his ship was quivering and the water was gurgling round her, and boats had been lowered to save such persons as could be saved, stood by the bulwarks with a pistol in his hand, and threatened to shoot dead the first man who endeavoured to get into the boat until every woman and child was provided for. His true idea of a hero was this. A hero was a man who must have ends beyond himself, must cast himself as it were out of himself, and must pursue these ends by means which were honourable and lawful, otherwise he might degenerate into a wild enthusiast. He must do this without distortion or disturbance of his nature as a man, because there were cases of men who were heroes in great part, but who were so excessively given to certain ideas and objects of their own that they lost all the proportion of their nature."

MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF.

In an article on Marie Bashkirtseff's Journal, Mr. Gladstone said, in 1889 :

"Any book must be noticeable which opens a new chapter in the experiences of human nature, or which adds a page to a chapter already opened. Such a condition is at once satisfied by this book. It can even be pronounced a book without a parallel. It has to be judged, like the poems of Homer, from internal evidence; and, like the human infant, it comes into the world utterly unclothed. This is not a book which will reward the seeker of mere pleasure. Wonder it will stir, but not confidence; admiration, but not quite a loving admiration. Mdlle. Bashkirtseff perhaps repels as much as she attracts."

MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF—AND AFTER.

The Biography of Sonya Kovalevsky, by Anna Carlotta Leffler, Duchess of Cajanello; translated by A. de Furuholm and A. M. Clive Bayley, and published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, revived in Mr. Gladstone some of the interest he had expressed in the journal of Marie Bashkirtseff. To the publisher he wrote from Hawarden, July 3, 1895 :

"The biography has also reached me, and, at once beginning to peruse it, I have found it a volume of extraordinary interest. It is in itself a large chapter of human psychology. The two works [the volume, it will be remembered, consisted of two memoirs—one by the Duchess, the other by Sonya] also present a great deal of salutary warning."

CURRENT BIOGRAPHY.

To Mr. Thomas Archer, acknowledging a copy of his Gladstone and his Contemporaries in 1883 :

"Hawarden Castle, Chester.

SIR,—I thank you for your obliging gift. I am sensible of the high honour you have done me in giving my name the front place upon a title which embraces a wider and worthier subject, and I do not doubt that I shall find in your pages a valuable contribution to contemporary history.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your very faithful and obedient,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

MR. J. H. SHORTHOUSE.

John Inglesant was one of the books that Mr. Gladstone "sat up all night to read," and when Mr. Shorthouse edited and prefaced George Herbert's Temple, Mr. Gladstone wrote, in 1882, stating that he had been familiar with these poems for a period of sixty years.

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

To the publisher of the Life of Frederick Denison Maurice :

"10, Downing-street, Whitehall:
Good Friday, April 11, 1884.

DEAR MR. MACMILLAN,—I read through the whole of the Life of Maurice which you were so kind as to send me. The picture of him as a Christian soul is one of the most touching, searching, and complete that I have ever seen in print. He is indeed a spiritual splendour, to borrow the phrase of Dante about St. Dominic. His intellectual constitution had long been, and still is, to me a good deal of an enigma. When I remember what is said and thought of him, and by whom, I feel that this must be greatly my own fault. My main object in writing to you, however, is to say a word for Bishop Blomfield, with regard to that untoward occurrence—the dismissal from King's College. The biographer treats the Bishop as virtually one of the expelling majority. And this on the seemingly reasonable ground that, as it appears, the Bishop was the author of or a party to the expelling motion. But he was an impulsive man, too rapid in his mental movements, and a man not ashamed to amend. I think I can bear testimony not only that he was satisfied with my amendment, but that he would have been well pleased if it had been carried; in a word, that if he had ever taken the ground of the Radstock-Ingles majority he had abandoned it. I should be glad if it were thought right, in any reprint, to say a word to this effect, or let it be known at any rate that such an opinion is entertained.—Yours most faithfully,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

CHEAP MACAULAY.

To Messrs. Cassell about their 3d. issue of Macaulay's "Warren Hastings" :

"GENTLEMEN,—I have received with pleasure your attractive reprint of Lord Macaulay's article on 'Warren Hastings.' This reprint at the low price of threepence affords a new and gratifying indication of the place which the enterprise and capital of this country may hope prospectively to occupy in the great book trade of the world.—I remain, Gentlemen, your faithful servant,

W. E. GLADSTONE.

Hawarden, January 7, '86."

BOOKS THAT INFLUENCED HIM.

To the editor of the British Weekly was sent the following "literary confession," in Mr. Gladstone's handwriting, on a postcard :

"It is understood that Mr. Gladstone is accustomed to cite Aristotle, St. Augustine, Dante, and Bishop Butler as the four authors by whom he believes himself to have been most influenced (W. E. G., June 25, 1887)."

THE NEW "LOOKSLEY HALL."

Writing in the Nineteenth Century (Jan. 1887) Mr. Gladstone said:

"The nation will observe with warm satisfaction that, although the new Locksley Hall is, as told by the Calendar, a work of Mr. Tennyson's old age, yet is his poetic eye not dim, nor his natural force abated. The date of Waverley was fixed by its alternative title 'Tis Sixty Years Since'; and now that Tennyson gives us another Locksley Hall 'after sixty years,' the very last criticism that will be hazarded, or if hazarded, will be accepted, on his work will be that it betrays a want of tone or fibre. For my own part I have been not less impressed with the form than with the substance."

MR. LECKY'S HISTORY.

In the Nineteenth Century for June, 1887, Mr. Gladstone had a review of the fifth and sixth volumes of Mr. Lecky's History of England in the Eighteenth Century. The following is a suggestive passage upon what Pitt and the eighteenth century might have been had not the French Revolution interfered with both:

"Mr. Lecky has been bountiful beyond the ordinary practice of historians in presenting us with a summary of what the eighteenth century might have been 'if the fatal influence of the French Revolution and of the war which it produced had not checked, blighted and distorted the natural progress.' We should probably have had from it, he thinks, the abolition of the slave trade, a reform of Parliament, the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and an immense reduction both of debt and taxation. 'The great industrial transition' might have been accomplished with comparatively little suffering, but for the famine price of corn and the absorption of the mind of Parliament; and it was the introduction from France of the revolutionary spirit into Ireland that for the first time made the Irish problem almost insoluble.' So far as regards the use of the potential mood, I cannot but agree closely with the historian.

The list of benefits which were in view might probably, and the list of evils which have had to be encountered might certainly, be enlarged. The mournful contrast is summed up in what there is a temptation to call the cruel destiny of Mr. Pitt. Never perhaps in history was there such a solution of continuity as that which severs his earlier from his later life."

"ROBERT ELSMERE."

In an article on "Robert Elsmere and the Battle of Belief" in the Nineteenth Century in 1888, Mr. Gladstone said:

"It is a novel of nearly twice the length, and much more than twice the matter, of ordinary novels. It dispenses almost entirely, in the construction of what must still be called its plot, with the aid of incident in the ordinary sense. We have, indeed, near the close a solitary individual crushed by a waggon, but this catastrophe has no relation to the plot, and its only purpose is to exhibit a good deathbed in illustration of the great missionary idea of the piece. The nexus of the structure is to be found wholly in the workings of character. The assumption and the surrender of a rectory are the most salient events, and they are simple results of what the actor has thought right. And yet the great, nay, paramount function of character-drawing, the projection upon the canvas of human beings endowed with the true forces of nature and vitality, does not appear to be by any means the master-gift of the authoress. In the mass of matter which she has prodigally expended there might obviously be retrenchment, for there are certain laws of dimension which apply to a novel, and which separate it from an epic. In the extraordinary number of personages brought upon the stage in one portion or another of the book, there are some which are elaborated with greater pains and more detail than their relative importance seems to warrant. Robert Elsmere is hard reading, and requires toil and effort. Yet, if it be difficult to persist, it is impossible to stop. The prisoner on the treadmill must work severely to perform his task; but if he stops he at once receives a blow which brings him to his senses. Here, as there, it is human infirmity which shrinks; but here, as not there, the propelling motive is within. Deliberate judgment and deep interest alike rebuke the fainting reader. . . . The book is eminently an offspring of the time, and will probably make a deep, or at least a very sensible, impression; not, however, among mere novel readers, but among those who share, in whatever sense, the deeper thought of the period."

"GREAT THINKERS AND WORKERS."

To Mr. Robert Cochrane, who presented him with a copy of his Great Thinkers and Workers, a volume of brief biographies, issued by W. & R. Chambers, with the remark that the absence of his name arose from the fact that politics were excluded:

"October 20, 1888.

SIR,—I thank you very much for your volume, which promises to be of great and varied interest; and I thank you also for the trouble you have taken in your letter, but I can assure you that I do not rate highly my own claim to appear in such distinguished company.—Yours, &c.,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick's Correspondence of Daniel O'Connell was noticed in the Nineteenth Century for January, 1889. Mr. Gladstone wrote of it:

"The singularly characteristic correspondence in which he has unconsciously limned himself for posterity. . . . It is a misnomer to call him a demagogue. If I may coin a word for the occasion, he was an ethnagogue."

DR. INGRAM AND THE IRISH UNION.

In the Nineteenth Century for October, 1887, Mr. Gladstone reviewed, in a long article of severity quite unusual with him, the History of the Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland, by Dr. Dunbar Ingram. The review closed and culminated in a passage of formidable censure:

"In his loud and boisterous pretensions, in his want of all Irish feeling, in his blank acquaintance with Irish history at large, in his bold inventions, and in the overmastering prejudices to which it is evident that they can alone be ascribed, in his ostentatious parade of knowledge on a few of the charges against the Union, and his absolute silence, or purely perfunctory notices, on the matters that most profoundly impeach it—in all these things the work of Dr. Ingram is like a buoy upon the sea, which is tumbled and tossed about by every wave, but remains available only to indicate ground which should be avoided by every conscientious and intelligent historian."

A NOVEL OF DIVORCE.

In February, 1889, Mr. Gladstone sent to the Nineteenth Century a note on the American novel, Divorce, by Margaret Lee; afterwards published in this country by Messrs. Macmillan under the title Faithful and Unfaithful:

"I desire to draw attention to a short novel by an American lady, Margaret Lee, which will, as I hope, be published forthwith in England. Its American title is the single word Divorce; but as this is thought not to convey its aim with sufficient distinctness, it is likely, I believe, to be enlarged into Divorce; or, Faithful and Unfaithful."

After drawing attention in a page of print to the conditions of marriage and divorce upon which Margaret Lee's story is based, Mr. Gladstone returned briefly to the book itself, remarking:

"It is with great gallantry, as well as with great ability, that Margaret Lee has ventured to combat in the ranks on what must be taken nowadays as the unpopular side, and has indicated her belief in a certain old-fashioned doctrine that the path of suffering may be not the path of duty only, but likewise the path of glory and of triumph for our race."

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA.

It was the high opinion Mr. Gladstone entertained of Chambers's Encyclopædia that led him in the autumn of 1889 to contribute the article on "Homer" to the new edition.

EGG-COLLECTING.

To Mr. R. Kearton, acknowledging his book on Birds' Nests:

"DEAR SIR,—I have received your book, and have been examining it with the utmost interest. I have little or no knowledge in natural history, but have just sense enough to lament it, and to urge the pursuit upon others, and especially the young, according to their opportunities. All I regret in reading your notices is that you are so conscientiously brief. Let me thank you much for your courtesy. Also let me contribute a widow's mite—what in Scotland they call the Blue Hare turns to pure white in winter, and courses on the snow almost invisible.—Yours faithfully,

W. E. G.
10, St. James's-square;
21th March, 1890."

THE PLATFORM.

Among the "noticeable books" reviewed in the Nineteenth Century in April, 1892, was Mr. Henry Jephson's The Platform: Its Rise and Progress, of which Mr. Gladstone said:

"Mr. Jephson could not, perhaps, have found a better designation for his novel and hardy undertaking, which is nothing less than to exhibit a political history of his country in constant and close association with the gradual development of a power that has had a main share in framing it."

EMANCIPATED WOMEN.

To Madame Adèle Crepez, author of The Emancipation of Women, published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., in their Social Science Series:

"10, Downing-street, Whitehall;
3 Oct., 1892.

MADAM,—I recently found that I had had the honour to receive, possibly from yourself, your tract on Der Frauen Emancipation. The German type is somewhat trying to my failing eyesight, but I could not resist at once reading it, and, having read it, I cannot resist offering you more than a merely formal acknowledgment. And this is not merely because my mind inclines strongly to agree in your foundation-argument, but because, apart from mere concurrence in this or that special remark, it seems to me by far the most comprehensive, luminous, and penetrating work on this question that I have yet met with. My great grief is this—speaking for my own country only—that while the subject is alike vast and profound, it is commonly treated in the slightest and most superficial, as well as sometimes in the most passionate manner. In such a region it is far better, as between opposite risks, to postpone a right measure than to commit rashness to a wrong one. To save us from this danger what we want is thorough treatment, and you have given it the most thorough treatment which I have yet seen applied to it. You have opened up many new thoughts in my own mind, but I cannot follow them out. I only wish the treatise had been open to my countrymen and countrywomen in their own tongue. For this and other subjects I deeply regret the death of J. S. Mill; he had perhaps the most open mind of his generation.—I remain, Madam, with high consideration, your faithful servant,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

FRA PAOLE SARPI.

To the Rev. Dr. Alex. Robertson, of Venice, about his book, Fra Paolo Sarpi:

"Hawarden Castle: Nov. 16, 1894.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,—Accept my best thanks for your very interesting work on Father Paul, which reached me to-day, and which I have at once commenced. I have a very strong sympathy with men of his way of thinking. It pleases me particularly to be reminded of Gibbon's weighty eulogy upon his history. Ever since I read it, I think over forty years ago, I have borne my feeble testimony by declaring that it came nearer to Thucydides than any historical work I have ever read. It pleases me much also to learn that a Sarpi literature has appeared lately at Venice. If you were so good as to send me the titles of any of the works at all worthy of their subject I would order them; and I should further be glad if you would, at any time thereafter, come and see them in a library, with hostel attached, which I am engaged in founding here.—I remain your very faithful,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

HISTORY.

To Messrs. Cassell about their History of England:

"SIR,—I have to thank you for the volume which has just reached me. On a first inspection I find in it much beautiful work; and believing history to be in no small degree the sheet anchor of society, I view with much pleasure your efforts to spread the knowledge of it far and wide throughout the community.—Yours,
W. E. GLADSTONE."

GOSPEL HISTORY IN FICTION.

To the Author of As Others Saw Him: A Retrospect; A.D. 54:

"I have read with great and unexpected interest the volume you were so kind as to send me. It brings into series many of the latest acts of our Saviour's earthly life. Unhappily I have no means of judging from this place (Cap Martin) whether and how far it is sustained by any external authority in such supplemental material as it associates with the Gospels."

MR. HAROLD FREDERIC.

To Mr. Harold Frederic about his In the Valley:

"It has a great historical interest from its apparently faithful exhibition of the relations of the different nationalities and races who were so curiously grouped together in and about the State of New York before the War of American Independence."

PIERS PLOWMAN.

To the publisher of Piers Plowman, by J. J. Jusserand, translated from the French by M. E. R.:

"April 27, '94.

While still an invalid (I am now writing from my bed), I have received the Piers Plowman which you have so kindly sent me. I am reading it with extreme interest, and I beg you to accept my best thanks, and to excuse the form in which they are conveyed."

TWO MEMORABLE NAMES.

Mr. Elkin Mathews recalls that on two occasions did Mr. Gladstone criticise books issued by him. Soon after the appearance of Dr. Henry Van Dyke's work on The Poetry of Tennyson, he wrote expressing his "pleasure at this fresh tribute to Lord Tennyson's genius."

Again, when in 1894 was issued a second edition of the Hon. Stephen Coleridge's The Sanctity of Confession, Mr. Gladstone, in a private letter, expressed the opinion:

"I have read the singularly well-told story. It opens up questions both deep and dark. It cannot be right in religion or anything else, to accept a secret which destroys the life of an innocent fellow-creature."

ON "DODO."

It will be remembered (says the British Weekly) that when Mr. Benson's clever novel Dodo appeared, rumour said that the original of Dodo was Miss Margot Tennant, now Mrs. Asquith. The letter which Mr. Gladstone wrote to Miss Tennant on the subject is one of the most interesting of his which we possess. His view of the matter is an excellent summary of the impossibility of the likeness:

"Before I had made progress in the book, I absolutely acquitted the author of all, even the faintest, idea of a portraiture. 1. It would be too odious. 2. It would be too violent. 3. It would be too absurd. Some mere rag of casual resemblance may have been picked off the public road. Do you happen to remember that one time I used to be identified in caricature through extravagantly high shirt collars? Anyway it was so; and I think the illustration, if hardly ornamental, may indicate my meaning. At the same time I have always held, and hold firmly, that anything out of which we may extract criticism or reproof, just or unjust, can be made to yield us profit, and is less dangerous than praise."

DANTE'S INFLUENCE.

Mr. Hermann Oelsner's essay, "The Influence of Dante on Modern Thought," which gained the Cambridge Le Bas Prize in 1894, and was published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, called forth the following letter:

"Cannes, Feb. 20.

DEAR SIR.—I have now to thank you for your essay on the influence of Dante, with the advantage of knowing its contents. I am agreeably surprised at the amount of information you have brought together, and it has yielded me much pleasure, with, I hope, much profit. The antipathy of Goethe seems to me a point worth probing in detail. So also the curious passage, 'Io non gli spersi,' which I have, too hastily it may be, been accustomed to regard as associated with a defect in Dante. It seems to me most remarkable that the study of Dante should decidedly have gained ground in England during a period in which Italian studies generally have so miserably fallen off.—I remain, dear sir, yours very faithfully,

(Signed) W. E. GLADSTONE."

POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY.

To Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co., regarding their Royal Natural History:

"DEAR SIRS,—You have truly conceived my opinion respecting the immense advantage of teaching 'Natural History' in some at least of its branches. I thank you for the beautiful volumes you have kindly sent me; and I trust I may take their publication as a sign that this subject is increasingly attracting the close attention which it deserves.—I remain, dear Sirs, your faithful and obedient, Jan. 5, 1895. W. E. GLADSTONE."

SEEKING AFTER GOD.

To Messrs. Blackie about their School and Home Library:

"May 28, 1895.

DEAR SIRS,—I thank you for the volumes you have sent me, which appear to be very well adapted for their purpose. I cannot but recognise the utility of the design which you describe. In its execution I am tempted to hope that you may not be compelled absolutely to confine your list to secular subjects, although I see clearly that if you go beyond it great care will be required to avoid everything which can be called polemical and to put forth nothing except what will be sure to command a wide acceptance. Excuse the liberty I have taken.—I remain, dear Sirs, your very faithful servant,
W. E. GLADSTONE."

THE SPEECH OF MAN.

To W. R. Gray, publisher of The Speech of Man and Holy Writ:

"DEAR SIR,—Through you I desire to thank the author of The Speech of Man for his interesting volume, which I am reading with great interest. If speech was only radical human invention how could it have happened that an ancient language like the Greek (still more, as I understand, the Sanscrit) should be so superior in structure to our own, and, though we call it dead, should be the repository to which we repair when we want a new living word for any purpose?—Your faithful and obedient, January 5, 1895. W. E. GLADSTONE."

"THE BALKANS."

To Mr. W. Miller, on his book The Balkans, he wrote under date September, 1896:

"The portion relating to Montenegro redeems us from something like a national disgrace in not having in the English tongue any history of the most heroic people in Europe."

LIFE OF GENERAL GORDON.

Of this Life, written by Mr. Demetrius C. Boulger, and published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, Mr. Gladstone, in 1896, said he had "examined it with interest"; he reserved comment, and paid a tribute to Gordon's "nobleness."

MR. MORLEY'S "COBDEN."

To Mr. Fisher Unwin, the publisher of this memoir of his father-in-law :

"Hawarden : June 23, '96.

MY DEAR SIR,—I thank you very much for your Jubilee edition of the Cobden Life. I think the publication is a great act of gallantry on your part. . . . The biographer is one of the few remaining faithful. Still, I do not think our Statute Book will go back to Protection.—Yours very faithfully,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

CARDINAL MANNING.

To the author of the Life of Cardinal Manning :

"Biarritz : Feb. 6, 1896.

DEAR MR. PURCELL,—The plot has thickened by the publication of Mr. Sydney Smith's article in The Month, an article thoroughgoing in its advocacy, but not (I think) unkindly intended. I regret, however, to find that it drags me at three points into the controversy. They are :

1. The declaration of 1848, pp. 25-8.
2. The conversation respecting those who had succeeded, p. 282.
3. Words of mine respecting Cardinal (then Mr.) Newman from your i. 243.

On the first.

1. My words are given with substantial accuracy; but, I added, or should have added, as it balanced the statement, that not less clear than his conviction of the Church of England's Catholicity, was his sense of the futility of any claim to obedience founded on mere establishment.

2. The reviewer imagines that Manning also spoke of difficulties and perplexities. According to my recollection, not a word.

3. He thinks Manning signified his doubts in 1846 when he spoke of a belief that the 'Church would split.' The deplorable (and I think hardly warrantable) destruction of his letters forbids a scrutiny. But I am confident he did not mean by this that one of the portions would join the Church of Rome.

4. He says that in 1850 Manning questioned the accuracy of my recollection in replying to me. Here again it is said that we have no means of reference to his letter. When I get home I may learn whether mine throw light on the matter. For the present I will only say I have a firm recollection that in 1850 he did not dispute it.

On the second.

1. It is true I reported Manning's having said to me of the Oxford converts that they were marked by 'want of truth.' Unless I am mistaken, Mr. W. Meynell (whom I mention with sincere respect), or a friend of his, could supply evidence corroborative of my statement.

2. I am made to say I 'advisedly withheld this story during the Cardinal's lifetime.' It is true that when you had applied to me for information about Cardinal Manning, I advisedly withheld both this statement and the preceding one. But I said nothing during the Cardinal's lifetime. I meant to withhold them permanently. My reason was this: you had applied to me, in no controversial sense, for information; and I did not think it fair to burden you with either the publication or the suppression of information which was in my view damaging to the cause you had in hand.

3. A question is raised as to the date of the words spoken. I recollect with the utmost clearness the room in which they were used. It was my private room in a house which I only began to inhabit in 1848; so that the occurrence could not have been earlier.

4. The reason I gave for my inquiry was that he had a considerable personal knowledge of Oxford (which I only visited twice between 1832 and 1847), and of these in many cases remarkable men; I had hardly any. It would therefore have been absurd as well as ill-natured in me to charge them with want of truth.

5. Both these incidents have been named by me, at various times since they occurred, to a limited circle of friends.

On the third.

I am sorry the reviewer has widened this controversy, already wide enough, by referring to very strong words used by me (in a private letter) about a statement of Cardinal (then Mr.) Newman's. For though I could not claim to be his friend, I received from him much kindness, and his character attracted affection as his genius commanded admiration. The words were written not when he had shown signs of moving, but in 1841, soon after Tract 90. It was a time of excitement and alarm. But I am sorry to say that, from my recollection of the occasion, I conceive the words to be in substance capable of defence.

It is more agreeable to me to turn to the modest claim advanced by the reviewer on behalf of Cardinal Manning in his closing sentence. I am well aware of the immense difficulties attending all human efforts to pass judgment on a complex and also a great character. But I fully subscribe to the reviewer's demand, and at some points of the large compass of the subject should even be inclined to heighten it.

Beyond this you are aware that I renounce, for what I think strong reasons, all attempts to pass sentence in this case. I also desire to avoid everything after the Anglican life, as I have no wish to be an intruder upon a province necessarily controversial, and where I have no special information. Speaking of the years before 1850, I have been not merely interested by your biography, but even fascinated and entranced. It far surpasses any of the recent biographies known to me: and I estimate as alike remarkable your difficulties and your success. Precise accuracy of judgment in such cases is hardly attainable by man; but in my opinion the love of truth as well as high ability is found throughout. To the Church of England, from which you differ, you have been, while maintaining your own principles, generous as well as just; and I cordially thank you.

I remain, dear Mr. Purcell, sincerely yours.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

BUTLER'S "ANALOGY."

Mr. Gladstone took the greatest interest in every detail of the publication by Mr. Frowde at the Clarendon Press of his edition of Butler's works and his studies subsidiary thereto. In one letter (Nov. 16, 1896) to the publisher, he said :

"An American clergyman writes to me, 'No one who becomes saturated with the spirit of the Analogy can be seriously disturbed by current forms of unbelief.' Profoundly true, me judice. I believe much has been done in Ireland for Butlerian study. I wish it were known at Oxford."

HIS FEARS ABOUT HIS IMPRIMATUR.

To M. Tissot, about his Life of our Lord Jesus Christ :

"Hawarden Castle : December 4, 1896.

DEAR M. TISSOT,—The two communications I have already made I hope have shown that I was not insensible of the great honour you have done me in proposing to dedicate to me the work of whose high character I had already heard much. But I am glad to have another opportunity of writing on the same subject after seeing, as I have now done, the work itself; so that, notwithstanding my defective eyesight, I can at least in a measure appreciate not only the pious and historic simplicity of its aim, but its severe purity, and its rich and signal beauty. This, however, has raised a scruple in my mind which I think it right to mention. It is my candid opinion that in associating my name with your work you will do it less than justice, and perhaps in some quarters even expose it to positive prejudice, an incident which I should cordially lament. Pray consider this, and remember that my full and unreserved assent, which you possess, in no way binds you; and that, if you find the use of my name will be in any manner of degree injurious, you will then forbear from using it. The loss of a real distinction cannot for a moment weigh with me, when compared with the idea of disparagement to a monumental work conceived and executed for the honour of our Lord and Saviour.—Allow me to remain, with great and unfeigned respect, yours most faithfully,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

SIGHT AND FAITH.

To Messrs. J. Clay & Sons, on an edition of the Book of Common Prayer :

"Hawarden : July, 6, 1896.

DEAR SIRS,—I thank you with more than a formal meaning for a beautiful copy of the Prayer Book. My sight, since an operation for cataract, has been practically dependent on the effective projection (so to speak) of the type from the page, especially in defective light: and my intention is to substitute your gift for the Prayer Book (of large and clear type) which I have hitherto had in use.—I remain, yours very faithfully,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

"LIFE OF CHRIST."

To the Rev. J. Duggan :

"Mr. Gladstone, with his respectful compliments, begs to thank the Rev. J. Duggan for his Life of Christ. The series of the earlier chapters appear to him to be of great value."

"STEPS TOWARDS RE-UNION."

To the Rev. J. Duggan on a volume since withdrawn :

"I take the liberty of sending you my cordial thanks for a work which I have begun at once, and which appears to be conceived in so large and just a spirit.

W. E. GLADSTONE."

THE RENANS.

To Lady Mary Loyd, the translator of Memoir and Letters of Ernest and Henriette Renan :

"I have read the whole of it and have found it to be of peculiar and profound interest."

"THE REDS OF THE MIDI."

To Mr. Heinemann, as publisher of this book by Félix Gras :

"August 13, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with great and sustained interest The Reds of the Midi, which you were good enough to present to me. Though a work of fiction, it aims at presenting the historical features, and such works, if faithfully executed, throw more light than many so-called histories on the true roots and causes of the Revolution which are so widely and so gravely misunderstood. As a novel it seems to me to be written with great skill.—Yours very faithfully, and with haste,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

MARRIAGE.

To Miss E. R. Chapman, acknowledging her book, Marriage Questions in Modern Fiction :

"Cannes: March 15, 1897.

DEAR MADAM, — Your work reached me yesterday, and I have been reading it alike with pleasure and profit. I hope it may become the nucleus of a distinct defensive action from your point of view. If you had leisure to acquaint yourself with the view of marriage as it stands in Homer, you would, I think, find it useful and interesting.—I remain, with many thanks, faithfully yours,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

"MADEMOISELLE IXE."

The great vogue of this first number of Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Pseudonym Library," by Lancelot Falconer, received fresh impetus from the knowledge that Mr. Gladstone had read the volume with peculiar pleasure—at one sitting, it was alleged. The facts were derived from a letter written by Mrs. Drew.

DR. JOHNSON.

To Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill on his Johnsonian Miscellanies :

"No presentation can be more acceptable to me than one which conveys a supplemental knowledge of Dr. Johnson."

KINDNESS TO ANIMALS.

To Messrs. George Bell & Sons, as publishers of the Animal Life Readers, designed to inculcate the humane treatment of animals :

"I thank you much for the series of manuals you have sent me. I do not think myself qualified to give an opinion of them from the point of view of natural history; but from that of moral training the case is a little different. I will not say that children are cruel, but, among us at any rate, they have in them something which opportunity or bad example is too apt to develop into cruelty, and works which give them a kindly view of their animal fellow-creatures are likely to be of real value to them as instruments of moral training."

BURNS.

To Mr. Wallace, editor of Dr. Robert Chambers's Life and Works of Robert Burns :

"April 12, 1897.

DEAR SIR,—I accept with very best thanks the copy of the Chambers's Burns which you have been so kind as to offer me. I do not feel wholly able to solve the Burns problem, which Lord Rosebery has handled with so much ability and courage, but I recognise the deep and singular interest that attaches to the questions concerning him.—I remain, dear Sir, yours very faithfully,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

"EN ROUTE."

To Mr. C. Kegan Paul, the translator of Huysmans' novel :

"Hawarden Castle.

DEAR MR. KEGAN PAUL,—It is most kind of you to send me this latest product of your literary labours; and though my mind has been and is much exercised in other directions, I am sensible that the work of M. Huysmans' is no timid or commonplace production. It places the claims of the Route through mysticism higher I think than any other book I have read; and by this fact alone it imposes modesty and reserve upon all critics from outside and from a distance. I will go no further than to say that all pictures of La Trappe are profoundly interesting, while I admit that I find myself stumbling a little here and there, as for instance when I come to the list of sins 'common to all men' in p. 191. I am glad that you do not find that commercial claims upon your time cripple you in this higher activity, and I remain with many thanks, faithfully yours,

W. E. GLADSTONE."

THE NOVELS OF MR. HALL CAINE.

The following are Mr. Gladstone's comments on books written by Mr. Hall Caine and published by Mr. Heinemann :

"The Bondman is a work of which I recognise the freshness, vigour and sustained interest, no less than its integrity of aim."

"I congratulate you upon The Scapegoat as a work of art, and especially on the noble and skilfully drawn character of Isaac."

Of The Manxman : "Though I am no believer in divorce, I have read with great admiration of the power which gives such true life to Manx character."

The Christian : "I cannot but regard with warm respect and admiration the conduct of one holding your position as an admired and accepted novelist, who stakes himself, so to speak, on so bold a protestation of the things which are unseen as against those which are seen and are so terribly effective in chaining us down to the level of our earthly existence. I cordially hope your work may have all the results with a view to which it has obviously been composed."

"INNER LIFE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS."

To the publisher of this book, by Mr. William White :

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for a very interesting work. My first-known door-keepers were Pratt and Williams, paid by fees from the members; one tall, the other short, but both with snow-white (or powdered) hair and florid faces. I am only sorry Mr. White's recollections do not extend over a longer period. Mr. McCarthy (for whom I have the greatest regard) has fallen into a slight error about my maiden speech. It was noticed in debate in a marked manner by Mr. Stanley, who was in charge of the Bill.—I remain, with many thanks, your very faithful

May 15, '97."

W. E. GLADSTONE.

PURE FABLES.

CURIOUS.

In the spring he gave them poesy. And they said, "This man hath indubitable gifts. He rhymes well, thinks delicately, and knows his way to the profound emotions. And yet, and yet, and yet—he is not of the company!"

So that next autumn he hazarded a volume of prose. And they said, "Now here we have a true poet!"

THE OTHER PARTY.

A man called upon the gentle reader and offered him condolences on the ethereal mildness of criticism, the reckless over-production of books, and the hypothetical standards of value set up by authors and publishers.

And the gentle reader answered softly, that he was much obliged, but that these things really didn't concern him, because he read for pleasure only, and never read anything that was not supplied from the libraries.

REASONABLE.

"This is, no doubt, an excellent work," quoth the publisher, "yet I am afraid the public would not buy it."

"I never suggested that they would," replied the author. "Indeed, if one may be candid, the thing was written for Posterity."

"That being the case," observed the publisher, "why not get Posterity to print it?"

INSIGHT.

"Ah, my friend, I keep my best thoughts for myself!"

"So I had imagined."

"You have the gift to understand."

"I don't know about that; but I read your books!"

T. W. H. C.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

Now and again Pierre Loti leaps into view, a consummate artist, a master of style and fiction, so fine, so finished, so ethereal and exquisite, so subtle and suggestive, as to compel us to regard as coarse and obvious writers of only a lesser degree of distinction. But for each rare masterpiece, how many washy water-colours, how many thin, feeble, and monotonous reveries, dissertations, half dramas, little futile sentimentalities and maudering laments! Loti, alas! lacks self-restraint. His art is so artless and unconscious that he cannot tell the difference between pathos and bathos, between passion and hysterics. Nobody has ever touched the depths of sorrow with so sure, so delicate a hand; nobody in his sentimental moods has ever written more idiotic rubbish. In the writing of both he is equally himself, for he is always the dawdling sentimental egoist—accidentally and unconsciously a supreme and magnetic artist. Contrast the pathos, the exquisite charm, of Ramuntcho, with the thin, intolerable twaddle of Matelots (just published). The one is as sincere an expression of Loti's individuality (the most unsatisfactory on God's earth, being in part that of an idiot and a winged super-sensitive writer) as the other. The end of Ramuntcho leaves you incapable of speech, so inadequate is the spoken word after such illimitable suggestions of the lovely written word. Matelots is a thin, maudlin, and dreary assault upon the emotion of pity—quite needlessly evoked. The hero is a young man who continually returns to his mother from foreign ports to cry "Mamma! show me the little tunic, the shoes and cap I wore as a child." He weeps when he sees them, and spends hours dreaming hazily of his quite ordinary childhood. Such a youth needed a tonic or a hiding. His death, the end of a vague and futile career, is told with some of Loti's old charm :

"He suffered little, but he was so feeble, with an increasing, profound, irremediable weakness. He had faintnesses agitated by dreams, exhausting dozes that bathed him in sweat. Death had begun its work in his head, the piteous break-up, the ironical return to the ideas and affections of childhood. Constantly he recalled the things of the beginning of his life, and remembered them with a morbid intensity that became a double sight.

On the contrary, images of women and love ceased to appear. I know not for what reason, perhaps very darkly physical, these images died the first in a memory also ready to die. Forgotten for the present the young girl of Rhodes, who, every evening in the month of June, came down to him to the old deserted port, drawn by the velvet blackness of his eighteen years old glance; forgotten the fair Canadian who, for a while, had made him love an isolated street in a suburb of Quebec; forgotten all! Only of Madeleine did he still think from time to time, because his love for her had been more complex, more amalgamated to that great mystery of the human mind which we call the soul; it happened that he sometimes still saw her pallid face and her young eyes of shadow, or heard again her timid crepuscular confidences, in the little mournful alley, beneath the lindens in bloom, under the fresh leafage upon which the warm rain of the April evenings played."

Now and then — alas! too rarely — the author recalls the old Loti in an erotic suggestion of environment. Writing of the sailor's departure from an Eastern port, he says, with some of his old music and colour :

"It was the very same crepuscular instant of his arrival, the same surprising illumination of red soil and green leafage; the same scents, the same yellow passers-by who, before disappearing into their little houses under the branches, silently turned one last time toward the departing stranger their little enigmatic eyes. In the odorous humidity, beneath the oppressive trees, it was ever the same warm and languid life so foreign to us. And all these things, that John departing gazed upon, seemed conscious of having once more breathed death upon a wanderer from France."

M. Demolins, who lately so eloquently proved to the humiliated French the substantial reasons for Saxon superiority, is now inflicting further humiliation on his race by a fierce and bitter indictment against the classic vine. M. Jules Lemaitre comes to the rescue by the flighty suggestion that M. Demolins is a morose drinker of water. But a man may gladly drink wine at another race's expense and still contend that vine-growing is disastrous to a nation's progress. M. Demolins' arguments have nothing whatever to do with the virtue of temperance. On the contrary, he maintains that the distillers are more useful citizens than the wine-makers, since the making of brandy involves larger interests than that of claret. "The vine has never engendered big races of men," says M. Demolins, "that is men capable of taking the initiative in the great movements of humanity, of placing themselves at the head of economical, political, intellectual evolutions." The vine, M. Lemaitre bitterly sums up, leads only to emigration towards the liberal and sterile professions, administration, bourgeois pretentions; developing in a large measure the equalising, democratic (in the worst sense), discontented and stay-at-home spirit in the French.

"The vine," laments M. Lemaitre, "engenders idleness, vanity, egoism, harshness towards relatives, scepticism, envy, irony, and an infamous taste for functionalism. It is anti-industrial and anti-colonial; it kills initiation and enterprise. To use an expression of Bossuet's, God gave us wine as a valueless present, and one of the causes of the legendary superiority of the Anglo-Saxons is that 'they have none in England.'"

But it is easy to see that M. Lemaitre, himself a native of Touraine, loves the little Touraine wine-grower from whom sprang his beloved Rabelais, Balzac, Paul Louis Courier, and would far rather be a stay-at-home and amiable, ironical egoist with these, than cultivate beer and conquer the world with the knock-me-down Anglo-Saxons.

H. L.

THE BOOK MARKET.

HOW MR. GLADSTONE ORDERED BOOKS.

Every second-hand bookseller who has had dealings with Mr. Gladstone is proud of the fact. None prouder than Mr. Menken, of Bury-street. Asked by a representative of the ACADEMY when he had his first dealing with Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Menken replied: "In 1889. He walked suddenly into my shop to obtain a book I had catalogued."

"And were you very much surprised to see him?"

"Oh, no," said Mr. Menken laughing; "I had seen and heard him before. In particular, I had heard him speak at the Caxton Exhibition. I shall never forget that; one would have thought that he had made the life of Caxton and the art of printing his sole study all his life, so well informed was he and so in earnest. And, by the way, Mr. Gladstone's interest in printing was not a transitory one. Look here, at this catalogue returned by him. 'I offer five guineas for this.' You see? His own words, and the book is a German collection of facsimiles of early printed pictures. The book, you see, was priced six guineas by me. 'I offer you five guineas for this.' Did he get it? O dear, yes."

"Mr. Gladstone always insisted on a 10 per cent. discount, did he not?"

"Always; he was a cash buyer."

"Well, did you often have him in here?"

"No. He became one of my best customers by post. I sent him my catalogues. He returned them marked, as you see these are. Now look at this one. It is one of the best orders I had from Mr. Gladstone. He has written on the cover :

"Please send if subject to 10 % dis. for cash—

1. The marked lots to me, % Hawarden Carrier, Red Lion Inn, Chester.

2. Except No. 395, No. 631: send these to me by parcel addressed % J. Colman, Esq., M.P., Corton, Lowestoft.—Your obt. servant, W. E. Gladstone, Hawarden, July 14, '91, with thanks for your kind words."

"Now look at that!" exclaimed Mr. Menken, radiant with recollection, look at it! What detail, what system. Actually he puts the "M.P." to Mr. Colman's name, lest it should be omitted. And the numbering! And the italics! You see he wanted most of the books at Hawarden, but there were two he could not wait for—he wanted them at once."

"Just so. Now what were the two books that Mr. Gladstone could not wait for?"

"Well, you've asked a question, and the answer will interest you. It really seemed that he was thinking both of this world and the next just then. For the two books were Sir Thomas Browne's Urn Burial and a Guide to Suffolk. You see, he was going to Suffolk to stay with Mr. Colman, and now—he has gone on a longer journey. Well, he was a marvellous man."

The "marked lots" in the above catalogue numbered about sixty, and Mr. Gladstone's purchases were of the most varied character. Probably many of the books were intended for St. Deiniol's Library. Among them were works on Anthropology, Political Economy, Sculpture, Ecclesiastical Vestments, Physiology, &c., and collections of Epitaphs and Proverbs.

The week before a public holiday is rarely productive of books of importance. But the present week has seen the publication of Prof. Schenk's work on the prenatal determination of sex. We review this work in our present issue. Judge O'Connor Morris's new work, Ireland 1798-1898 is to some extent a continuation of the author's Ireland 1494-1868; but here the narrative is continued in much greater detail. Lady Newdegate-Newdigate's The Cheverels of Cheverel Manor, and Mrs. Hinkson's new volume of poems, The Wind in the Trees, lend distinction to the week's output of literature.

DRAMA.

CHARACTERISTICS OF MUSICAL COMEDY.

A CURIOUS convention underlies the current types of "Musical Comedy" associated with the management of Mr. George Edwardes. The action must at once be strictly modern and brilliantly pictorial—two conditions which seem at first sight to exclude each other in an age of top-hats and frock-coats. How to obtain his modernity and his colour both is the problem the librettist is called upon to solve, and it is interesting to recall the devices adopted towards this end. In "A Gaiety Girl," the first piece of this series, a bevy of young ladies entertained a party of uniformed guardsmen, and afterwards the whole party were transported to the Riviera to indulge in the frolics of the Carnival. "The Shop Girl" was a more laboured achievement. But a certain pictorial effect was derived from exhibiting the interior of a silk warehouse with its many-hued samples of goods; and a fancy bazaar held in South Kensington completed the picture. In "The Geisha" the public were transported to Japan, where the adoption of European dress has not yet killed native colour, and "The Circus Girl" permitted the exhibition of the various costumes of the circus performer. With each succeeding piece of this pattern, however, it is obvious that the problem of colour becomes one of increasing difficulty, the scope afforded the costumier under modern conditions being so limited, and I own I was curious to see how Messrs. Seymour Hicks and Harry Nicholls in their new production at the Gaiety would cope with it. The story of "The Runaway Girl" opens in Corsica, a terra incognita, where the peasants can be made as picturesque as a group of Watteau shepherds and shepherdesses, and still without incongruity have thrown into their midst a party of Cook's tourists. This, it will be owned, is ingenious, and from the pictorial point of view it is perfectly successful. The second half of the piece, however, is not so novel. Venice, to which the hero and heroine elope, followed, of course, by all the other characters from Corsica, is very well, but it recalls the Riviera of "A Gaiety Girl," and a carnival at Venice is necessarily not very unlike a carnival at Nice. Still, for the time, the authors of "The Runaway Girl" have turned their difficulty with considerable adroitness, and passed on the colour problem, in a more complex form than ever, to their successors should there be a further demand on the part of the public for examples of musical comedy of the "Gaiety Girl" type.

Will there, in fact, be such a demand? I imagine the success of "The Runaway Girl" leaves no doubt on that point. Until the production of this piece, Mr. George Edwardes, who is credited with keeping his finger on the public pulse, appears to have been in two minds on the subject, seeing that at Daly's Theatre, which he controls as well as the Gaiety, he has arranged that "The Geisha" shall be succeeded by a musical piece of a different pattern, written upon a pseudo-classical or ancient Greek theme. This, of course, is only a reversion to the practice of twenty or thirty years ago, when a brilliant group of burlesque writers, comprising Henry J. Byron, the Broughs, Reece, and Burnand dug their subjects out of the inexhaustible pages of Lemprière. But in what direction can the dramatist, serious-minded or frivolous, turn for novelty? The drama moves in cycles, which may be said to occur at the rate of two or three to the generation, and the pseudo-classical theme has been too long absent from the play-bills not to be welcomed again: if presented in a reasonably attractive form. At the same time I imagine there is still a future for musical comedy of "The Runaway Girl" type which is in every respect an improvement upon the methods of the variety or go-as-you-please entertainment which it superseded some years ago, and which is still kept alive by Mr. Arthur Roberts, whose comic genius finds it a congenial medium. Before leaving the question of the colour convention, I would point out what could hardly have been anticipated theoretically, how well the male costume of the present day, particularly the much reviled chimney-pot hat, lends itself to picturesque treatment. Its resplendent black is a wonderful relief to the eye amid a blaze of reds, yellows, and greens. That a typical Englishman should be flinging himself about in a wild dance in a tweed suit, patent-leather shoes, and a black silk hat under a Corsican sky is, of course, absurd, but the artistic effect is not to be despised. Nor is the typical Bond-street millinery out of place in a rich scheme of Southern colour with a backing of blue Mediterranean! What scene or what community will the librettist of musical comedy next lay under contribution? It is hard to say. The Cockney tourist may still, I presume, be captured by Riff pirates, or turn up at the Court of Persia or Abyssinia, or even in China, which would be an agreeable variant upon the well-worn theme of Japan

MEANWHILE, the genre may be said to take a new lease of life with "The Runaway Girl," not the least sympathetic or interesting of the various "Girls" that Mr. George Edwardes has placed upon the stage. For these qualities she is much indebted, no doubt, to her impersonator, Miss Ellaline Terriss, one of the daintiest of the actresses of this school. The little heroine runs away from school in Corsica and joins a band of wandering minstrels. In her gipsy character she meets and falls in love with a young English aristocrat; whence the series of adventures which culminates in the happy union of the lovers in Venice. Inter alia, the band of minstrels, picturesque ruffians with mandolines and a leit-motif à la Wagner have to be reckoned with, and their mercenary persecution of the hero for robbing them of their charming recruit, constitutes the one dramatic element of the story. But, in truth, story in a piece of this kind counts for much less than the incidentals of song and dance and variety turn with which it is studded. Ingeniously enough, provision has been made for all the more noted members of the Gaiety Company, and the opportunities that the authors have failed to invent for them they will, no doubt, in due time create for themselves. Mr. Fred Kaye, Mr. Bradfield, and Miss Ethel Haydon belong to the tourist section of the cast. Miss Katie Seymour is a lady's maid, and her attendant cavalier, that natural droll, Mr. Edmund Payne, appears as a horsey little Cockney pretending to be a courier; Mr. R. Nainby is a fussy Italian consul, and Mr. Monkhouse and Miss Connie Ediss play at being minstrels. Over the whole, Mr. Ivan Caryll and Mr. Lionel Monckton, working upon the neatly turned lyrics of Mr. Harry Greenbank and others, throw the charm of melody. In this respect the musical comedy stands far higher than the old-fashioned burlesque, for which an ingenious conductor was accustomed to make a hash-up of the popular melodies of the day; it does boast an original score, which often attains a high degree of excellence. Miss Terriss's sentimental ballads are pleasant; Mr. Edmund Payne has an amusing ditty, "Follow the Man from Cook's"; and a stirring martial song, "The Soldiers in the Park," which will soon be on all the barrel-organs, is sung by Miss Ethel Haydon.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the production of "The Runaway Girl," Mr. Arthur Roberts has revived at the Lyric a piece called "The Modern Don Quixote," in which he was first seen some years ago. The title-character, it need hardly be said, has nothing to do with Cervantes' hero. It is a pretext for a string of Mr. Arthur Roberts's impersonations, all as amusing as they are incoherent, and comprising an elaborate parody of Frégoli and the other "quick-change artistes" recently in vogue. The piece, if piece it may be called, exists for Mr. Arthur Roberts, not Mr. Arthur Roberts for the piece. So long as there are what Mr. Gilbert calls irresponsible comedians of the Arthur Roberts type, so long shall we have mad medleys of this sort which belong to no recognised class of dramatic work. It is a very light and very entertaining olla podrida with catchy airs, which a musician might characterise as jingle, and as a comic singer and mimic Mr. Arthur Roberts is unrivalled. As a one-man entertainment it might here and there flag during the three hours that it runs. This danger is provided against by the employment of Mr. W. H. Denny and others, who keep the ball rolling while Mr. Arthur Roberts is off the stage.

J. F. N.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, May 26.

THEOLOGICAL, BIBLICAL, &c.

- THE SACRIFICE OF CHRIST: ITS VITAL REALITY AND EFFICACY. By Henry Wace, D.D.
- THE ARCH OF FAITH: TWELVE LESSONS ON THE CHIEF DOCTRINES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. By Austin Clare. S.P.C.K.
- A CONCISE INSTRUCTION ON CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE AND PRACTICES TOGETHER WITH SKETCHES FOR A YEAR. By the Right Rev. Alan G. S. Gibson, D.D., and the Ven. W. Crisp. S.P.C.K.
- PERSONAL AND FAMILY PRAYERS. Williams & Norgate. 1s.
- STUDIES OF COMPARATIVE RELIGION. By Alfred S. Geden, M.A. Charles H. Kelly.
- THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE: THE PSALMS AND LAMENTATIONS. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Richard G. Moulton, M.A. The New York Macmillan Co.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- IRELAND, 1798-1898. By William O'Connor Morris. A. D. Innes & Co. 10s. 6d.
- JOHN KNOX AND JOHN KNOX'S HOUSE. By Charles John Guthrie, Q.C. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.
- THE EMPIRE AND THE PAPACY, 918-1273. By T. F. Tout, M.A. PERIOD II. Rivingtons. 7s. 6d.
- THE CHEVERELS OF CHEVEREL MANOR. By Lady Newdegate-Newdigate. Longmans, Green & Co. 10s. 6d.

DR. J. L. PHILLIPS, MISSIONARY TO THE CHILDREN OF INDIA: A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH. By his Widow. Completed and edited by W. J. Wintle. The Sunday School Union.

CREATION RECORDS DISCOVERED IN EGYPT. By George St. Clair. David Nutt.

DAILY LIFE DURING THE INDIAN MUTINY: PERSONAL EXPERIENCES OF 1857. By J. W. Sherer. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 3s. 6d.

OUR LIVING GENERALS: TWELVE BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED SOLDIERS. By Arthur Temple. Andrew Melrose. 3s. 6d.

THE LIGHT OF THE WEST. By J. A. Goodchild. Part I.: THE DANITE COLONY. Kegan Paul.

GLADSTONE, THE MAN: A NON-POLITICAL BIOGRAPHY. By David Williamson. James Bowden.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

THE SHORTER POEMS OF JOHN MILTON. Arranged by Andrew J. George, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

PAGAN PAPERS. By Kenneth Grahame. New Edition. John Lane. 3s. 6d.

THE WIND IN THE TREES. By Katharine Tynan Hinkson. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

POEMS. By Charles Rosher. Haas & Co.

MORROW-SONGS: 1880—1898. By Harry Lyman Koopman. H. D. Everett.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

THE HOLY LAND IN GEOGRAPHY AND IN HISTORY. By Townsend MacCoun, A.M. Vol. I.: GEOGRAPHY. Townsend MacCoun (New York).

NEW EDITIONS OF FICTION.

TEMPLE WAVERLEY NOVELS: IVANHOE. By Sir Walter Scott. 2 vols.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE MEANING OF EDUCATION, AND OTHER ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES. By Nicholas Murray Butler. Macmillan & Co. 4s. 6d.

A PRIMER OF PSYCHOLOGY. By Edward Bradford Titchener. Macmillan & Co.

LE VERRE D'EAU: A COMEDY. By Scribe. With Notes by F. F. Rogel, M.A. Macmillan & Co.

L'ANNEAU D'ARGENT. Par Charles de Bernard. Edited by Louis Sers. Macmillan & Co.

MOFFATT'S SCIENCE READER I. Moffatt & Paige. 10d.

A SIMPLIFIED EUCLID, BOOK I. By W. W. Cheriton. Rivingtons.

VICTORIAN ERA SERIES—ENGLISH NATIONAL EDUCATION: A SKETCH OF THE RISE OF PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND. By H. Holman, M.A. Blackie & Son. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CONVERSION OF ARABLE LAND TO PASTURE. By W. J. Malden. Kegan Paul.

SPAIN AND ITS COLONIES. By J. W. Root. Simpkin, Marshall. 1s.

BRITAIN'S NAVAL POWER: A SHORTER HISTORY OF THE GROWTH OF THE BRITISH NAVY. PART II.: FROM TRAFALGAR TO THE PRESENT TIME. By Hamilton Williams, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 4s. 6d.

THE HANDWRITING OF MR. GLADSTONE: FROM BOYHOOD TO OLD AGE. By J. Holt Schooling. J. W. Arrowsmith.

THE ORCHESTRA:—VOL. I.: TECHNIQUE OF THE INSTRUMENTS. By Ebenezer Prout, B.A. Augener & Co.

A HANDBOOK OF BIBLE AND CHURCH MUSIC. By the Rev. J. Aston Whitlock, M.A. S.P.C.K.

THE PRUNING-BOOK: A MONOGRAPH OF THE PRUNING AND TRAINING OF PLANTS AS APPLIED TO AMERICAN CONDITIONS. By L. H. Bailey. The Macmillan Co.

THE GENEALOGICAL MAGAZINE: A JOURNAL OF FAMILY HISTORY, HERALDRY, AND PEDIGREES. Vol. I. Elliot Stock.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN: AN EXPOSURE OF CERTAIN BRITISH INDUSTRIES IN WHICH CHILDREN ARE INQUITOUSLY EMPLOYED. By Frank Hird. James Bowden.

STUDIES IN CURRENCY, 1898; OR, INQUIRIES INTO CERTAIN MODERN PROBLEMS CONNECTED WITH THE STANDARD OF VALUE AND THE MEDIA OF EXCHANGE. By the Right Hon. Lord Farrer.

BIRD NEIGHBOURS: AN INTRODUCTORY ACQUAINTANCE WITH ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY BIRDS COMMONLY FOUND IN THE GARDENS, MEADOWS, AND WOODS ABOUT OUR HOMES. By Neltje Blanchan. With an Introduction by John Burroughs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

BLASTUS, THE KING'S CHAMBERLAIN: A POLITICAL ROMANCE. By W. T. Stead. Grant Richards.

THE MAGIC OF SYMPATHY. By Emily C. Orr. S.P.C.K.

THE SCHOOL SYSTEM OF THE TALMUD. By the Rev. B. Spiers. Elliot Stock.

THE FAITH OF A PHYSICIAN. Watts & Co. 6d.

BOYHOOD: A PLEA FOR EDUCATION. By Ennis Richmond. Longmans, Green & Co. 2s. 6d.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF A LECTURE. By Dr. Andrew Wilson. Jarrold & Sons. 1s.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MESSRS. WARD & LOCK'S novels have deceived our eyes again. This firm, acting apparently on Mr. Bryce's suggestion that books should be cheapened, are publishing at 3s. 6d. novels which in bulk and appearance look to be worth 6s. Hence last week we priced two of their new novels, As a Man Lives, by E. Phillips Oppenheim, and Philippi the Guardsman, by T. R. Threlfall, at the higher instead of at the lower figure.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS are on the eve of publishing another volume of Ballads and Poems by members of the Glasgow Ballad Club. The former volume issued from the same house in 1886 has been long out of print. The club exists to encourage the study of ballads and ballad literature as well as to support the production of original ballads and poems, the volume now in hand being a selection from the contributions of members down to the end of last year.

MR. M. OPPENHEIM is preparing for the Navy Records Society a complete and revised edition of Sir William Monson's Naval Tracts. For this, the text, which, as published in Churchill's Voyages, is very inaccurate, will be carefully collated with the different available MSS., among which are to be mentioned those in the Bodleian Library, now generously lent by the curators to the British Museum for Mr. Oppenheim's use.

MR. BRET HARTE will contribute to Cassell's Magazine for June a complete story, entitled "Salomy Jane's Kiss," and the same issue will contain the first of a new series of stories by Mr. E. W. Hornung.

MR. JOHN BUCHAN, who has made a special study of the subject, will contribute a paper to Chambers's Journal for July on the new volume of the Scottish History Society, "Memorials of John Murray of Broughton," edited by Mr. Fitzroy Bell. The volume is in the hands of members this week.

ALTHOUGH only issued the other day, a second edition has already been called for of Chambers's new large-type English Dictionary, edited by Mr. Thomas Davidson, one of the assistant editors of Chambers's Encyclopaedia. A second edition is also in the press of Guy Boothby's new volume of short stories, Billy Binks—Hero, issued by the same firm.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS announce that they will publish on or about the May 31, in their Green-back series of 3s. 6d. novels, a cheap edition of Mrs. Leith Adams's (Mrs. de Courcy Laffan) popular novel entitled Madelon Lemoine.

WAGNER is much in evidence at present. A volume on entirely new lines, elucidating in detail both the music and the words of his operas, will be issued almost immediately by Messrs. Service & Paton.

* * * Owing to pressure upon our space, we have been obliged to hold over "Correspondence" and other features.

"8000 words a day with ease."

W. R. Bradlaugh.

Once a gold pen has been selected, the writer finds he is spared the recurring annoyance and regret of losing its services when he has become thoroughly used to it. "I have written with it half a dozen or more volumes, a large number of essays, etc., and a thousand of letters."

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Send for descriptive Catalogue, or call: Mable, Todd & Bard, Manufacturers of Gold Nibs and the Swan Fountain Pen, 83, Cheapside, 95, Regent Street, 21, High St., Kensington.

SEELEY & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.

THE YOUNG QUEEN of HEARTS: a Story of the Princess Elizabeth and her Brother Henry, Prince of Wales. By EMMA MARSHALL. Cloth, 3s. 6d.
"The writer is at her best.... A healthy yet fascinating romance." Glasgow Herald.

A STORY OF THE HOME RULE BILL.
THE FIGHT for the CROWN. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Mademoiselle de Mersac," "Matrimony," &c. Second Edition. 6s.
"Fresh, lively, and true to life. We recommend the reader to get his book."—Westminster Gazette.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE SACRIFICE of CHRIST: its Vital Reality and Efficacy. By Rev. H. WACE, D.D. Fcap. 8vo, 1s.

OUR PRAYER BOOK. Short Chapters on the History and Contents of the Book of Common Prayer. By Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, D.D. 16mo, cloth, 1s.

THE CROSS and the SPIRIT: Studies in the Epistle to the Galatians. By Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, D.D. 1s. 6d.

"That remarkable series of monographs."—Daily News.

THE PORTFOLIO MONOGRAPHS. No. 36.

GREEK BRONZES. By A. S. Murray, LL.D., Keeper of the Greek and Roman Antiquities in the British Museum. With 4 Photogravures and 41 other Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
"A really delightful little sketch."—Guardian.
"Scholarly and authoritative. The illustrations are noteworthy for the taste and care that is displayed in their execution."—Morning Post.

MR. PAGE'S BOOKS ON DEVONSHIRE.

AN EXPLORATION of DARTMOOR. By J. LL. W. PAGE. With Map, Etchings, and other Illustrations. Third Edition. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

AN EXPLORATION of EXMOOR. By J. LL. W. PAGE. With Map, Etchings, and other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE RIVERS of DEVON. By J. LL. W. PAGE. With Map, Etchings, and other Illustrations. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

London:

SEELEY & CO., LIMITED, 38, Great Russell Street.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

POPULAR NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

At all Libraries, Booksellers', and Bookstalls.

NOW READY.

THE THIRD EDITION of JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE PEACEMAKERS. By the AUTHOR of "BOOTLE'S BABY," "THE TRUTH-TELLERS," &c.

THE THIRD EDITION of WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S NEW NOVEL.

SCRIBES and PHARISEES. By the AUTHOR of "THE EYE of ISTAR," "WHOSO FINDETH a WIFE," &c.

THE SEASONS of a LIFE. By H. FALCONER ATLEE.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

LITTLE MISS PRIM. By the Author of "THE GIRLS at the GRANGE," "THE HOUSE on the MARSH," &c.

BY L. T. MEADE.

THE SIREN. By the Author of "The WAY of a WOMAN," "A SON of ISHMAEL," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY E. YOLLAND.

MISTRESS BRIDGET. By the Author of "IN DAYS of STRIFE."

GEORGE GRIFFITH'S NEW ROMANCE. In 1 vol., 3s. 6d., with Frontispiece.

THE GOLD-FINDER. By the Author of "THE ROMANCE of GOLDEN STAR."

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 992.—JUNE, 1898.—2s. 6d.

AMONG THE YOUNG LIONS.—JOHN SELBIDD: THE TALE OF A POOR GENTLEMAN, AND THE LITTLE WARS OF LOBN, by Nell Munro. CHAPS. XXV.-XXVIII.—A SOLDIER OF THE FRONTIER: COKE OF COKE'S RIFLES.—A NEW SCHOOL.—AN EXPERIMENT IN COLONISATION, by Robert C. Witt.—THE CASE OF MR. DOUGHTY, by David Haunday.—ADVENTURES OF THE COMTE DE LA MUSTRE DURING THE REIGN OF TERROR: Conclusion, by Bernard Capes.—THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE, by Major W. Broadfoot.—SIR WILLIAM FRASER, K.C.B.—ANDRÉ CHÉNIER, by J. C. Bailey.—THE LOOKER-ON.—THE YELLOW PERIL.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

See "LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE" for JUNE for LADY GRISELDA'S DREAM: a Comedy in Dialogue, by Miss MAY MORRIS (Mrs. Sparling).

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

JUNE. Price SIXPENCE.

THE DUENNA of a GENIUS. CHAP. XVI.-XVIII. (concluded). By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. Francis Blundell), Author of "In a North Country Village," &c.
TRIALS OF THE WIFE of a LITERARY MAN. By K. GERT TRICHART'S SANCTUARY. By A. H. D. COCHRANE.
ALKESTIS. By ARTHUR L. SALMON.
LADY GRISELDA'S DREAM. By MAY MORRIS.
MODERN LANGUAGE TEACHING. By Mrs. LECKY.
A TZAR and a BEAR. By FRED WISHAW.
AT THE SIGN of the SHIP. By ANGELO LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., London, New York, and Bombay.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S 'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy. 6s. net, claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."
"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW. Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORTH WALES COAST. THE ISLE of WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORICCIETH and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.
"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately.

|                          |         |                                 |          |
|--------------------------|---------|---------------------------------|----------|
|                          | 1896.   | WILKIE COLLINS ...              | March 20 |
| BEN JONSON ... ..        | Nov. 14 | JOHN MILTON ... ..              | " 27     |
| JOHN KEATS ... ..        | " 21    | WILLIAM COWPER ...              | April 3  |
| SIR JOHN SUCKLING ...    | " 28    | CHARLES DARWIN ...              | " 10     |
| TOM HOOD ... ..          | Dec. 5  | ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON }         | " 17     |
| THOMAS GRAY ... ..       | " 12    | HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW }    | " 24     |
| ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON } | " 19    | ANDREW MARVELL ...              | May 1    |
| SIR WALTER SCOTT ...     | " 26    | ROBERT BROWNING ...             | " 8      |
|                          | 1897.   | THOMAS CARLYLE ...              | " 15     |
| SAMUEL RICHARDSON.       | Jan. 2  | PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY            | " 22     |
| THOMAS DE QUINCEY        | " 9     | CHARLES DICKENS ...             | " 29     |
| LEIGH HUNT ... ..        | " 16    | JONATHAN SWIFT ...              | June 5   |
| LORD MACAULAY ... ..     | " 23    | WILLIAM MAKEPEACE } THACKERAY } | " 12     |
| ROBERT SOUTHLEY ...      | " 30    | WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..            | " 19     |
| S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..   | Feb. 6  | SIR RICHARD STEELE              | " 26     |
| CHARLES LAMB ... ..      | " 13    | ALEXANDER POPE ...              | July 3   |
| MICHAEL DRAYTON ...      | " 20    | DOUGLAS JERROLD ...             | " 10     |
| WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR }   | " 27    | FRANCIS BACON ... ..            | " 17     |
| SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..      | March 6 |                                 | 1898.    |
| EDMUND WALLER ... ..     | " 13    | HENRIK IBSEN ... ..             | March 26 |

SMITH, ELDER &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE.

On June 10 will be published, crown 8vo, 6s.

HELBECK OF BANNISDALE.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "The History of David Grieve," "Marcella," "Sir George Tressady," &c.

A Volume of Verse by Conan Doyle.

On JUNE 8.—Small crown 8vo, 5s.

SONGS OF ACTION.

By CONAN DOYLE.

NEW VOLUME OF
THE BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION

W. M. THACKERAY'S COMPLETE WORKS.

NOW READY, large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

VOLUME II. CONTAINING

PENDENNIS. With 20 Full-Page Illustrations and 10 Woodcuts.

* * * A volume will be issued each subsequent month, so that the entire Edition will be completed on April 15, 1899.

* * * A Prospectus of the Edition, with Specimen Pages, will be sent post free on application.

On JUNE 8, with Frontispiece.—Demy 8vo, 16s.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

By "ONE WHO HAS KEPT A DIARY."

NEW NOVELS.

Immediately.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE AMBITION of JUDITH By Olive Birrell

Author of "Anthony Langeyde," "Behind the Magic Mirror," &c.

FOURTH EDITION OF "DEBORAH of TOD'S."

Now Ready, FOURTH EDITION.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

DEBORAH of TOD'S. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture

Author of "A Toy Tragedy," "The Little Squirrels," &c.

From Punch.—"The best novel my Baronite has read since the days began to shorten. One is interested from the first by desire to see how one of the most audacious plots in modern fiction can be reasonably worked out."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

CLARENDON PRESS LIST.

Just published, demy 8vo, half-roan, 21s.

THE GOVERNMENT of INDIA: being a Digest

of the Statute Law Relating Thereto, with Historical Introduction and Illustrative Documents by Sir COURTENAY ILBERT, K.C.S.I., Assistant Parliamentary Council to the Treasury, sometime Law Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India

DAILY NEWS.—"Sir Courtenay Ilbert's admirable work will be of enormous use not only to administrators in India, but to competitors for the noblest civil service in the world, and, indeed, to all who make a serious study of the history of the English in India."

Now Ready, pp. xxiv. + 194, crown 8vo, paper boards, price 3s. 6d.; cloth, price 4s. 6d.

REMARKS on the USE and ABUSE of SOME

POLITICAL TERMS. By Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS, Bart., sometime Student of Christ Church, Oxford. A New Edition, with Notes and Introduction, by THOMAS RALEIGH, D.C.L., Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford.

Just published, 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

THE KEY of TRUTH. A Manual of the Publican Church of Armenia. The Armenian Text, Edited and Translated, with Illustrative Documents and Introduction, by FRÉD C. CONYBEARE, M.A., formerly Fellow of University College, Oxford.

SCOTSMAN.—"It cannot be denied that Mr. Conybeare has earned the thanks of men of every shade of theological opinion for the publication of such an interesting document as the 'Key of Truth,' and for the light which he has thrown on an obscure page of Church history."

Now Ready, crown 8vo, cloth, with 35 Full-Page Illustrations, 4s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY ARCHITECTURE, for Schools,

Art Students, and General Readers. By MARTIN A. BUCKMASTER, Art Master at Tonbridge School.

Now Ready, crown 8vo, buckram back, 3s. 6d.

MUSA CLAUDA. Translations into Latin

Elegiac Verse. By S. G. OWEN and J. S. PHILLIMORE, Students of Christ Church.

ESSAYS on SECONDARY EDUCATION. By

VARIOUS CONTRIBUTORS. Edited by CHRISTOPHER COOKSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL TIMES.—"The note of this volume is its practical and candid spirit. The whole book deserves to be read, and it will be found specially interesting to teachers in first grade schools, as well as to parents who send their boys to such schools."

AUBREY.—"BRIEF LIVES." chiefly of Contemporaries, set down by JOHN AUBREY, between the Years 1639 and 1696. Edited from the Author's MSS. by ANDREW CLARK, M.A., LL.D. 2 vols., 8vo, 25s.

SHORT HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE.

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY. Fifth Edition, Revised (with the Section on the Nineteenth Century greatly enlarged). Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

SPECIMENS of OLD FRENCH (IX.-XV. Centuries). With Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. By PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A. Crown 8vo, 16s.

Recently Published.—POPULAR EDITION.

Edited by the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE.

THE WORKS of JOSEPH BUTLER, D.C.L.

Divided into Sections, with Sectional Headings, an Index to each volume, and some Occasional Notes, also Prefatory matter. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

Also separately, Vol. I., Analogy, &c., 5s. 6d.; Vol. II., Sermons, &c., 5s.

STUDIES SUBSIDIARY to the WORKS of

BUTLER. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. (Uniform with above.)

Also Library Edition. The Three Volumes, medium 8vo, cloth, price £1 18s. 6d.

CHURCH TIMES.—"This is a grand edition, worthy alike of our great Christian philosopher and of Mr. Gladstone's reputation."

HENRY FROWDE, London, Edinburgh, and New York.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1361.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1898.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The JUNE CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW REMAINDERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 188, Strand, London W.C.

CATALOGUE of Miscellaneous Second-hand BOOKS, including a considerable number from the Library of the late "Lewis Carroll."—B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 and 51, Broad Street, Oxford.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, Souo Square, London, W.

3D. in the 1s. Discount off most New Books.
CATALOGUES post free on application.
Orders despatched by return of post.
HENRY J. OLASHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller,
57, Wigmore Street, London, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANFORD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SEEL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast olding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

FOR SALE.

BOOK and PICTURE BUSINESS FOR SALE.—LOWE'S NEW STREET SHOP, with all or part of Stock, Goodwill, Fixtures, &c., as a going concern; cheap. Owner retiring.—Apply, by letter only, CURLES LOWE, Baskerville Hall, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY OFFICE, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—FURNAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Singing, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an unexceptional English Chamber. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 30 Guineas a quarter.—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

ENGINEERING AND CHEMISTRY.

CITY and GUILDS of LONDON INSTITUTE.

The COURSES of INSTRUCTION at the Institute's CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE (Exhibition Road) are for Students not under 16 years of age; those at the Institute's TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY, are of an Intermediate Grade for Students not under 14 years of age. The Entrance Examinations to both Colleges are held in September, and the Sessions commence in October. Particulars of the Entrance Examinations, Scholarships, Fees, and Courses of Study may be obtained from the respective Colleges, or from the Head Office of the Institute, Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.

CITY and GUILDS CENTRAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE. (EXHIBITION ROAD, S.W.)

A College for higher Technical Instruction for Students not under 16 preparing to become Civil, Mechanical or Electrical Engineers, Chemical and other Manufacturers, and Teachers. Fees for a full Associateship Course, £25 per Session. Professors—

Civil and Mechanical Engineering W. C. UNWIN, F.R.S., M.Inst.C.E.

Physics and Electrical Engineering { W. E. AYRTON, F.R.S., Past Pres. Inst. E.E.

Chemistry .. .. . { H. E. ARMSTRONG, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

Mechanics and Mathematics .. G. HENRICI, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

CITY and GUILDS TECHNICAL COLLEGE, FINSBURY. (LEONARD STREET, CITY ROAD, E.C.)

Provides Course of Intermediate Instruction for Day Students not under 14 years of age, preparing to enter Engineering and Chemical Industries. Fees, £15 per Session. Professors—

Physics and Electrical Engineering S. P. THOMPSON, D.Sc., F.R.S.

Mechanical Engineering and { W. E. DALRY, M.A., B.Sc.

Mathematics .. .. . { M.I.M.E.

Chemistry .. .. . { R. MELDOLA, F.R.S., F.I.C.

JOHN WATNEY, Hon. Secretary,
City and Guilds of London Institute,
Gresham College, Basinghall Street, E.C.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS OF ART and BELLES

LETTERS.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

PARIS SALON, 1898.

IMPORTANT WORK FOR SALE.

PORTRAIT OF VICTOR BAILLOT,

AGED 105 YEARS,

LAST SURVIVOR OF WATERLOO.

Painted by the French Military Painter,
PAUL GROLLETON.

Mention Honorable, 1882.

Médaille 3e Classe, 1883.

Médaille Bronze Exposition Universelle, 1889.

Médaille 2e Classe, 1894, Hors Concours.

VICTOR BAILLOT fought under Marshal Davout at the Siege of Hamburg; was made Prisoner at Waterloo by the English; died at Corsey, 3rd February, 1898, aged 105 years.

Portrait was painted last year (life size), canvas 8 ft. x 6 ft. The intellect of the old warrior was preserved, and his hair grey, not white. He wears a dark jacket and trousers, with blue gaiters seated on an old yellow cushion, with the yellow bed-curtain as background—a plaster bust of Napoleon I. on the old chest of drawers; and he wears his Leg'on of Honour decorations and Medal of St. Helena.

The Painting has been most favourably noticed by the Art Critics in Paris and London.

Address, J. M. R., care of the Publishers of "THE ACADEMY,"
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W..

Open Free Daily from 10 to 6.

A VISIT OF INSPECTION IS INVITED TO THE PERMANENT EXHIBITION of AUTOTYPE (CARBON) REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS of ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN BRITISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of WORKS by ARTISTS of the PRERAPHAELITE SCHOOL.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of SELECTED WORKS from the PARIS SALONS.

FRAMED AUTOTYPES form acceptable and Artistic Wedding and Birthday Gifts, and are eminently suitable for the adornment of the Hall, Library, Boudoir, Dining-Room, Shooting-Box, &c.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, New Edition of 160 pages.

With upwards of One Hundred Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and Twenty-three Tint Block Illustrations.

For convenience of reference, the Publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' names.

Post free, ONE SHILLING.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET LONDON, W.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No premium. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with Manager.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon Lodge, West Kensington, W.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A New and Original LIFE of Mr. GLADSTONE, containing a comprehensive account of his public and private career and personal character. With numerous authentic illustrations expressly prepared for the Work.

Part 1 ready June 8th, price 6d., of

THE LIFE OF GLADSTONE.

EDITED BY

Sir WEMYSS REID.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

(To be completed in 12 Parts)

This new LIFE of GLADSTONE will supply a comprehensive account of the public and private career and personal character of the great Liberal statesman. The contributors will include Mr. F. W. Hirst, B.A., the Rev. Canon MacColl, Mr. Arthur J. Butler, Mr. Alfred F. Robbins, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, and other writers having special knowledge of the subject. It is not a mere compilation founded upon previous works dealing with Mr. Gladstone's career, but is based upon the personal knowledge of the Editor and the other contributors, and will contain many letters and documents never hitherto published.

NOW READY, price 6s.

GRACE O'MALLEY: PRINCESS AND PIRATE.

Told by RUARI MACDONALD,

Redshank and Rebel.

The same set forth in the Tongue of the English

By ROBERT MACHRAY.

While most of the incidents in this stirring novel are imaginary, many of the characters in it are taken from the actual history of Ireland. The story is put into the mouth of a certain Ruari Macdonald, a "Redshank" of the Scots, who was Grace O'Malley's chief lieutenant. The romance is the work of Mr. Robert Machray, who is well known as a contributor to the leading English and American magazines.

PARTS 1 to 4, price 1s. each, of

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1898,

Are now Ready, whilst PART 5, and also the Complete Volume, price 7s. 6d., will be issued in a few days.

This work contains Reproductions of NOTABLE ACADEMY PICTURES that appear in NO OTHER PUBLICATION.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne.

IMPORTANT.

All who are interested in books, either as readers, authors, purchasers, or vendors, should subscribe to the

PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

ESTABLISHED 1837.

Among the many attractions of its columns the following may be mentioned:—

Literary articles (including leader on some prominent topic of the moment) announcements of forthcoming volumes, notes on current events in connection with the publishing world, reviews (often illustrated) of new books and magazines, correspondence, &c., &c. An exceedingly valuable feature of the paper is the list of

NEW BOOKS OF THE WEEK

(the most complete list issued) giving the full title, size, price, and publisher, with an index of subjects and name of book and author in one alphabet. Also in every number upwards of a thousand

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

are advertised for, thus affording readers an excellent opportunity either of disposing of their own scarce volumes or purchasing others that they may be in need of; and attention is particularly drawn to the fact that annual subscribers have the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in this column. They also receive a gratis copy of the large special Christmas Number—a handsome quarto volume containing over 250 illustrations.

As an advertising medium in connection with books, the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record stands unrivalled.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR can be had by sending Postal Order or Stamp to Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Limited, the Proprietors, St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, London, to whom all money-payments should be made.

|   |          |
|---|----------|
| For One Year, post-free to any part of Great Britain and Ireland ... ..         | 8s. 6d.  |
| „ Six Months ditto ditto ... ..   | 4s. 6d.  |
| „ Three Months ditto ditto ... ..   | 2s. 6d.  |
| To America and the Continent, the Annual Subscription, including postage ... .. | 11s. 0d. |

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1897.

SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF ISSUE OF ANNUAL CATALOGUE.

THE

ENGLISH CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

FOR THE YEAR 1897.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 224, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

It contains a much longer List of Works than last year's Catalogue, including an addition of some 1,400 more Titles, but the price remains the same, viz., 5s. net, cloth limp; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

“The English Catalogue” is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications.”—Daily News.

“Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day.”—Athenaeum.

“We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume.”—Daily Telegraph.

“The English Catalogue of Books” is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome.”—Scotsman.

“To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record.”—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

DAVID NUTT,

270, 271, STRAND, LONDON.

LATEST PUBLICATIONS,

POEMS. By William Ernest

HENLEY. First Collected Edition: Second Issue. Small demy 8vo, printed at the Constable Press on special paper, with Photogravure of the Author's Bust by Rodin, cloth, top gilt, 6s.

FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

“He has the present satisfaction of knowing that all whose opinion is of any moment have come to recognise the value of the gems he has cast into the treasure-house of English poetry.”—Saturday Review.

“No poet has ever so magnificently and so truthfully transferred to his pages the strength and sombre splendour of London and all the glories of her river.....Verse which is scholarly in the best sense, which is eloquent, which is full of passion and inspiration.”—Spectator.

“One finds, on looking through the various sections of this book, not merely fine artistry, but a living character—a strong nature at harmony with itself.”—Critic.

“The brilliancy of Mr. Henley's versatile work in prose, not only as a journalist, but as the chronicler of Byron and the candid critic of Burns, has perhaps made us a little forgetful of the great excellence of his poetry.”

Morning Post.

“This most luminous and incisive of contemporary critics, this most poignant and representative of modern poets, is scarcely less a living classic than Algernon Swinburne or George Meredith.”—Echo.

“The book, small as it is, is large enough to give its author a high place among the poets of the world.”

Daily Telegraph.

“A great deal of Mr. Henley's late work is of the best which the time has given us. It is the voice of a great primitive personality.”—Sun.

The First Large Issue of Mr. Henley's
“Poems” went out of print in a fortnight.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

VIEWS and REVIEWS. Essays

in Appreciation: Literature. Second Edition. Printed at the Constable Press, 12mo, cloth, top gilt, net 5s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “AMOS JUDD.”

GLORIA VICTIS: a Modern

Romance. By J. A. MITCHELL. Crown 8vo, 268 pp., 12mo, cloth, top gilt, 3s. 6d.

“A very readable story, with fitting phases of excitement and romance.”—Scotsman.

“An engrossing little story.”—Academy.

THE CONSTITUTION and AD-

MINISTRAT of the UNITED STATES.

By BENJAMIN F. HARRISON, Ex-President.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; or in paper wrapper, 2s. 6d.

“The only authoritative exposition in small compass of the governing system of the United States of America. The author's position enables him to speak with authority on many points not yet dealt with by constitutional writers, and also to give a vivid and interesting account of the routine of presidential work. “The Constitution of the United States of America.” not otherwise accessible in a handy form, is reprinted as an Appendix.

“As a popular account of how the United States is governed nothing can be better than this careful and sometimes humorous work.”—Glasgow Herald.

EMERSON, and other Essays.

By JOHN JAY CHAPMAN. Crown 8vo, cloth, top gilt, 3s. 6d.

CONTENTS: Emerson—Walt Whitman—A Study of Romeo—Michael Angelo's Sonnets—The Fourth Canto of the “Inferno”—Robert Browning—Robert Louis Stevenson.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                                  | PAGE    |
|--|---------|
| The Hebrews as They Were... ..             | 595     |
| "Mr. Gilfil's Love Story" in Fact... ..    | 596     |
| A Book of Country Verse ... ..             | 597     |
| Mr. Way's Euripides ... ..          | 597     |
| A Bohemian Playwright ... ..               | 598     |
| A Lady in Persia ... ..                    | 599     |
| BRIEFER MENTION ... ..                     | 600     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..              | 601-604 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..                      | 605     |
| PURE FABLES ... ..                         | 608     |
| THE BREITMANN ... ..                       | 608     |
| THE JEW, THE GYPSY, AND THE DREAMER ... .. | 609     |
| SIR HENRY CUNNINGHAM'S NOVELS ... ..       | 610     |
| THE PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION ... ..         | 611     |
| DRAMA ... ..                               | 611     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..                      | 612     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..               | 613     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..                      | 614     |

REVIEWS.

THE HEBREWS AS THEY WERE.

The Early History of the Hebrews. By the Rev. A. H. Sayce. (Rivington.)

THIS is a handy volume of some 500 pages, containing no Hebrew or other Oriental characters, no maps or appendices, and but few and brief references to authorities. We may, therefore, suppose it to be popular rather than scientific in its aim—or rather, that it is dictated, like most of the author's later works, by the wish to make accessible to the general public the conclusions of scientific men. In any such work of popularisation, so much depends on the authority of the populariser that it may be as well, before going to the book itself, to say something about Prof. Sayce's qualifications for writing it.

More than a quarter of a century ago, Mr. Sayce, then a scholar of Queen's College, Oxford, devoted himself to the study of Oriental languages, and, within a few years of taking his degree, published an Assyrian Grammar written from the standpoint of comparative philology. This was followed by an elementary work on the same subject for the use of students, by Principles of Comparative Philology, and by what is probably his most important work, An Introduction to the Science of Language. These books excited favourable notice not only in England, but in the larger erudite world of the Continent, and when Mr. Sayce was made one of the Old Testament revisers and Professor of Comparative Philology in his own University, it was felt that the authorities had for once put the right man in the right place. In 1891 he exchanged his first chair for that of Assyriology, and his term of office has lately been extended for another five years—in order, we believe, to give him further opportunities of travel in the East. But while thus possessed of an academic reputation, Prof. Sayce has always courted the notice of a larger world than that of letters. His Ancient Empires of the East was professedly designed to correct, by the light of modern discovery, the views of those who had till then trusted to Herodotus for the early history of the world; his lectures for the Hibbert Trustees on the Religion of the Ancient Babylonians formed for many their first introduction to a literature the most ancient and, in some respects, the most important yet brought to light; while his memoir on the Hittites earned the rare honour of being translated into French at the expense of the State. Of late years, his separate writings have been almost exclusively devoted to what may be called the archaeology of the Bible, and The Higher Criticism and the Verdict of the Monuments, The Egypt of the Hebrews, and Patriarchal Palestine have followed each other in quick succession. In all these, it has been Prof. Sayce's task to compare Biblical history with that revealed by the cuneiform and hieroglyphic records lately deciphered, and the present volume may be supposed to represent his matured judgment as to the amount of faith that can be placed in the sacred and profane traditions respectively.

It will therefore be seen that hardly any English scholar can be better qualified than Prof. Sayce to treat with knowledge any apparent contradiction between the Old Testament and the profane histories, but it may be noted that he does not claim in doing so to be an impartial critic. He was ordained in the Church of England shortly before the publication of his first book, and in the preface to his Higher Criticism he is careful to remind us that he is writing "with the prepossessions of an Anglican priest." But a glance at the present volume would probably lead an "Anglican priest" of fifty years ago to think that he had accidentally got hold of some "bawbee blasphemy" (to use Meg Dod's phrase) of the age of Voltaire or Tom Paine instead of the serious work of a learned divine. Although "a considerable measure of confidence" may in the author's view be extended to the Old Testament writers, he is very far from asserting that they are infallible. "Doubtless," he says, "they may have made mistakes at times, their judgment may not always have been strictly critical or correct, and want of sufficient materials may now and then have led them into error." Moreover, all their earlier dates are "for historical purposes . . . worthless, and indicate merely that materials for a chronology were entirely wanting." The reason which the Book of Exodus gives for the observance of the Sabbath—to wit, that Jehovah rested on the seventh day from His work of creation—is described as "a reason which will hardly be accepted by the geologist"; Samson is contemptuously passed over as "a hero of popular tradition," and merely a Danite champion whom the compiler of the Book of Judges has turned into a judge of Israel; while it is crudely pointed out that Samuel's prediction of disaster to Saul at the Raid of Michmash remained unfulfilled, and that Aaron could not have died at once on Mount Hor, as the Book of Numbers asserts, and at Mosera, as stated in Deuteronomy. And perhaps even these direct challenges would shock the champion of verbal inspiration less than the half-flippant way in which a rationalist explanation of the "signs and wonders" in Canaan and Egypt is indirectly suggested. It was a voice "which he believed to be divine" which bade Abraham sacrifice Isaac; and the Hebrews at the Red Sea were only "saved, as it were, by miracle"; while the destruction of Sodom is attributed to a thunderstorm setting fire to the naphtha springs; and the falling of the death-lot upon Saul and Jonathan is accounted for by the remark that "the lots were cast under the supervision of the priests." Before Prof. Sayce wrote this he must have indeed convinced himself that the Higher Critics have, to use his own words, "made it impossible to return to the old conception of the Hebrew Scriptures," but the horror with which Pusey or Keble would have read such words from the pen of an Oxford professor can be better fancied than described.

This view of the case apart, there is little in the book which is not both interesting and instructive. Prof. Sayce will have nothing to do with the peculiarly German school of critics who think they can tell by "literary analysis" the exact point of each chapter and verse where, as they assert, one of the authors of the Pentateuch left off and another began. But he does not scruple to admit that the Pentateuch, like most of the other books of the Old Testament, is "a compilation of a variety of older material," and that "it probably received its final shape at the hands of Ezra." Nor were the materials of which it was composed exclusively Jewish or even Semitic. The legends of the Creation, the institution of the Sabbath, and, perhaps, of the Fall of man, are, as we know from Prof. Sayce's other works, derived, in the first instance, from the mythology of the non-Semitic inhabitants of Chaldaea, and now he has added other borrowings to the list. The cherubim of the mercy seat, the two stone tables of the law, the altars and their daily sacrifices, and even the special animals offered to the Deity, were, he thinks, all copied from Babylonian usage, while the rite of circumcision was brought from Egypt into Canaan before the migration of Abraham. Like many other writers, he points out that during the period of the Judges the Hebrews did not distinguish, as the story of Gideon shows, between Jehovah and Baal, and he does not think that the name Jehovah is of Hebrew origin. As for the more historical portions of the Bible, he thinks that the original documents show in places through the glosses of later editors, and he pronounces the story of Chedorloamer's raid to be taken from a cuneiform tablet, and that of Joseph from a hieratic papyrus. The system of etymological forms which would translate Benoui ("the man of On") as "son of my sorrow" he rejects, although he points out that the name of Samuel means "God hears" only in Assyrian, and not in Hebrew. Finally, he considers the Levitical legislation to be based "on customs and ideas which must have been prevalent in Israel long before the birth of Moses," being, in fact, of Babylonian and Canaanitish origin. He thinks it strange that lying and deceit are not among the prohibitions of the Decalogue, and that in this respect the moral code of the Egyptian

Book of the Dead is "more complete." But then, as he somewhat cynically adds, "the lie which does not involve false witness is apt to be condoned among the nations of the East."

This, then, is what Prof. Sayce has to tell us, and he does so very clearly and well. In some passages he reminds us of Stade, and in others of Renan, as when he says that the milch-kine who left their young to draw the ark to Beth-Shemesh "were repaid for the gift they had brought by being sacrificed to the Lord." But in a work of this kind the author may draw his inspiration from what source he pleases, so long as he is willing to warrant the justness of the statements that he borrows. Neither does he draw any general conclusions from his facts, although he goes out of his way once or twice to point out that they are not absolutely inconsistent with the theory of a Divine origin for the Old Testament.

But it is plain that if his view of their history is correct, we must revise altogether our estimate of the position of the Jews with regard to the rest of the human race. Hitherto, however much Christian nations have persecuted the Jews, they have yet regarded them as a people set apart from the rest of mankind, and as the depository of a sacred tradition. Hence we have been led to attach an importance to them and to their history which the works of Prof. Sayce show they do not merit. Their want of military skill has been attributed to the fact that so long as they were a nation the Lord of Hosts always fought for them; their pre-eminence in trade and finance to the mysterious destiny which has compelled them to live dispersed among the Gentiles; their artistic defects to their possession of a literature so original and so unique that all other forms of art must seem feeble by comparison. But in Prof. Sayce's pages this romantic picture of the Chosen People vanishes. In its stead we see a race of slaves cast out first by the Babylonians, then by the Egyptians, retaining a precarious position in the Promised Land only by the grace of their conquerors the Greek-pirate colonists, whom we call Philistines, and rising only for a moment, to independence under a foreign mercenary, during the temporary paralysis of the neighbouring powers. We see, too, that their dispersion was due to the reluctance to sacrifice individual welfare to the common good, which, throughout their history, led them to resent both civil taxation and military service; while their literature and religion turn out to be no Heaven-sent gift, but the shreds and tatters which they have picked up in spite of themselves from their former masters.

If this picture of a race, apparently formed to exist like animal parasites, only in the bodies of more worthy, because more highly organised, states, be ever accepted as the true one, the glory will, indeed, have departed from Israel. And, in these days of the Judenhetze and the Anti-Semitic League, the disillusionment may not be without awkward material consequences.

"MR. GILFIL'S LOVE STORY" IN FACT.

The Cheverels of Cheverel Manor. By Lady Newdigate - Newdegate. (Longmans & Co.)

NEVER before had short story so copious a commentary as this handsome volume, which consists of what is practically the original material from which George Eliot fashioned the scene of Clerical Life that bears the title "Mr. Gilfil's Love Story." In that work, it will be remembered, we are told how the Rev. Maynard Gilfil, chaplain to Sir Christopher Cheverel and Lady Cheverel, fell in love with Caterina Sarti, or Tina, their adopted child; how Tina loved Sir Christopher's nephew, Captain Wybrow; how Wybrow, though engaged to Beatrice Assher, was not unwilling to play a little with Tina's affections; how Wybrow eventually died suddenly on the very day that Tina resolved to stab him to the heart; and finally, how Mr. Gilfil married Tina and enjoyed with her a brief felicity.

To all but close students of George Eliot's writings this story has hitherto seemed a work of pure fiction; but now comes Lady Newdigate-Newdegate to tell us that many of the personages and incidents had a previous existence in fact. Thus Sir Christopher Cheverel turns out to be Sir Roger Newdigate (1719-1806), the founder of the Newdigate Prize for poetry at Oxford. Lady Cheverel was Hester, Sir Roger's second wife. Mr. Gilfil was the Rev. Bernard Gilpin Ebdell, vicar of Chilvers Coton; and Tina was Sally Shilton, Lady Newdigate's adopted daughter, and a very exquisite singer; while Cheverel Manor was Arbury, in Warwickshire, where George Eliot's father, Robert Evans, acted as bailiff to Sir Roger Newdigate at the end of the last century and beginning of this. George Eliot herself—or, as the register says, Mary Ann Evans—was born at the South Farm, within the precincts of Arbury Park. Robert Evans's first wife, Harriet, having been a servant in the Manor House itself during the period covered by "Mr. Gilfil's Love Story," it was probably her reminiscences of the family (which reached the daughter by way of Robert Evans) that served as the foundations of the little classic. This information was fortified by visits to the house paid by George Eliot in company with her father. To the materials thus collected her mind returned in after life, and adding from her own invention Captain Wybrow, Beatrice Assher, the sudden death and the intended murder, the result was the charming story which has delighted so many readers.

The chief interest of the book lies in the extracts from the second Lady Newdigate's—or, as she is called in the title, Lady Cheverel's—letters to Sir Roger. They make no pretensions to be literature: they are, indeed, absurdly trivial; but they have much charm and quaintness. "My Dear, Dear Runaway"—that is the opening of one of them. "You begin your Letter like a dear Goose, & end it in the same stile. . . . I wish you would get me some Sasserella (I don't know whether I spell it right)"— that is the conclusion of the same. From Buxton she writes:

"Bathing goes on (I had like to have said) swimmingly, but that is not true. Lettice was mistaken in thinking I sh'd never be Bold. I can throw myself with a Spring forward upon y<sup>e</sup> Water & go plump to y<sup>e</sup> Bottom as direct as any stone, then shake my ears & try again with y<sup>e</sup> like success . . . but it is a charming Exercise."

Again, on the same subject:

"Baths at noon agrees well, & I swim like a frog that has lost y<sup>e</sup> use of its hind Legs. Don't go & maim a poor frog to see how that is. I assure You it is very tollerable."

The lady has a nice feeling for quiet domestic humour such as lights up family correspondence and makes breakfast a gay meal. She is critic too:

"We have just finish'd y<sup>e</sup> Sorrows of Werther, a novel which was much in Vogue last year [this is 1781]. It is interesting, but I think y<sup>e</sup> sentiments of the Hero often exceptionable. Y<sup>e</sup> Author seems sensible of it & makes a sort of lame apology in the preface."

Of certain visitors to the same hotel, Lady Cheverel writes, "They seem charming vulgar"—a good phrase. On another occasion she glances pleasantly at Sir Roger's duties as a Justice: "You seem to be hanging & transporting at no small rate. I hope you'll leave none but honest People in our Quarter"; on another, she tells him of a rumour that he had been shot dead by a highwayman, and adds, "I charge you to throw out your Purse to any Man that Asks you for it as you come up & don't give him any pretence to shoot you." And here is a pretty description of her baby niece, Georgiana Mundy, who became afterwards Duchess of Newcastle: "The dear little Georgiana is y<sup>e</sup> fatest Little Pig you ever saw, perfectly Healthy & Lively"; while in another place we are told of this child's appetite that "Ye Little Soul sucks with such glee it is quite delightful to watch it." These extracts are sufficient to prove that George Eliot went astray in her conception of Lady Cheverel. Throughout "Mr. Gilfil's Love Story" that good and tender woman appears haughty and unbending; and she is described at the outset as possessing "proud pouting lips" and "an expression of hauteur which is not contradicted by the cold grey eyes." Lady Newdegate offers a reproduction of Romney's portrait from which George Eliot took this impression, and really we cannot see all that in it.

Lady Cheverel is the central figure of this fragrant book; but there are others with not a little attraction. Nelly Mundy, Lady Cheverel's sister, now and then adds a sprightly message to one of her sister's letters, or writes at length to Sir Roger; and she is always agreeable company. "The Dear Soul," she tells her brother-in-law on one occasion, referring to his wife, "has eat a good Supper of Plumb Pye & a glass of wine, & is going in Glee to Swim." There is also Sir Roger himself, a busy old gentleman interested profoundly and continually in the University of Oxford, in politics, in the county, in the rebuilding and arrangement of his house, in all his wife's little doings, in his kith and kin and adopted daughter. Here is a letter that he wrote for an infant relative, Charles Newdigate Parker :

"MY DEAR MAMMA,—Take notice that if after the receipt of the inclosed you shall fail to give me cold water to roll in every morning & the best of milk & a good deal of it, all day long, & a stout nimble nurse to toss me about from morning till evening from the date hereof till the first of January next I am advised to bring my Action against you, so pray Dear Mamma be careful of

YOUR LOVING SON."

A little earlier Sir Roger had welcomed the birth of this child by a missive of which this is a portion :

"The first lesson I shall give you is—Risu cognoscere Matrem—the only return yet in your power to make for the long tedious months she has passed for your good: Next you are to stretch out your little hands, both of them remember, & take Papa by the Chin, kiss him & Mamma till they laugh, for no good can come to him—Cui non risere Parentes. I do not explain this as I conclude your knowledge in all languages is the same."

Sir Roger Newdigate died in 1806; his lady had preceded him six years. Both lie in Harefield Church, where their monuments may be seen. Other memorials of Hester Newdigate, says Lady Newdegate, in conclusion, still exist at Arbury. The fruits of her spinning-wheel are visible in fine white table linen woven into damask cloth the year she died, and bearing the legend: "Spun by Lady N., 1800." And "every spring, in Nature's glorious resurrection tune, for more than a century past there has come up through the grass of Swanland—her special portion of the grounds at Arbury—a large H. N. outlined in golden daffodils, which tradition says were planted by herself."

A BOOK OF COUNTRY VERSE.

The Wind in the Trees. A Book of Country Verse. By Katherine Tynan. (Grant Richards.)

MRS. HINKSON'S rural songs are those of an exile. She seems to celebrate, not the country, but her memories of the country. She does not feel that majesty and that terrible splendour of nature which, especially at its most passionate period (as now), dominate and overawe the poet who actually dwells amid the green. She is wistful, merely; and her wistfulness finds ease in a gentle and delicate lyricism reflecting only the lighter side of nature. She thinks of things separately—not as a tremendous whole. She remembers the almond, and calls it

"Pink stars that some good fairy
Has made for you and me."

She remembers the chestnut,

"A candlestick

And branches branching wide and high Toward the smiling sky."

And the trees—

"Soft flames of green the trees stood up
Out of an emerald cup."

She has the appropriate metaphor for everything. But one wishes that she would be synthetic a little oftener, that she would more frequently strive after a general effect instead of winging like a butterfly from one splash of colour to another, as careless fancy dictates. Some of her broader descriptions are excellently pretty. For example, "An Anthem in Heat," which begins:

"Now praise the Lord, both moon and sun,
And praise Him, all ye nights and days,
And golden harvests every one,
And all ye hidden waterways,
With cattle standing to the knees
Safe from the bitter gadfly's sting;
But praise Him most, O little breeze
That walks abroad at evening.

O praise Him, all ye orchards now,
And all ye gardens deep in green,
Ripe apples on the yellowing bough,
And golden plum and nectarine,
And peaches ruddier than the rose,
And pears against the southern wall;
But most the little wind that blows,
The blessed wind at evenfall."

An even better instance is "Leaves," which discloses Mrs. Hinkson's muse at its most characteristic and its best:

"A low wind tossed the plumage all one way,
Rippled the gold feathers, and green and gray,
A low wind that in moving sang one song
All day and all night long.

Sweet honey in the leafage, and cool dew,
A roof of stars, a tent of gold and blue;
Silence and sound at ones, and dim green light,
To turn the gold day night.

Some trees hung lanterns out, and some had stars,
Silver as Hesper, and rose-red as Mars;
A low wind flung the lanterns low and high,
A low wind like a sigh."

There is much technical skill of music in this little poem. By a happy chance all the verbal trickeries of which Mrs. Hinkson is a mistress succeed, without succeeding too well, too impudently. We use the word "trickeries" advisedly, for Mrs. Hinkson is what one may call, with no derogation, a professional poet. She knows every secret of the trade. She might say with Masson in Charles Demailly that she has her syntax under control, and can throw her phrases into the air, sure that they will fall on their feet. It is astonishing what mere handling will do. The sentiment of "The Pretty Girl Milking Her Cow" is the sentiment of half the drawing-room ballads advertised day by day on the front page of the Telegraph. But Mrs. Hinkson lifts the thing far above drawing-room ballads. As thus:

"The dewdrops were grey on the clover,
The grey mists of night were withdrawn,
The blackbird sang clear from the cover,
The hills wore the rose of the dawn.
But sweeter than blackbirds and thrushes,
Her song, whom the graces endow,
And pinker than dawn her soft blushes,
The pretty girl milking her cow.

She sang, and the milk, sweet and scented,
Spirited white as the breast of my dear.
She sang, and the cow, grown contented,
Gave over her kicking to hear.

As she sang I drew nearer each minute,
A captive in love's rosy chain,
And my heart every second was in it
Grew fuller of joy and of pain,
Till I cried out behind her: My storeen,
Pray guess who is holding you now?
And I felt the heart-beats of my Noreen,
The pretty girl milking her cow."

Even in the least matters, the same skill often saves the situation by its deft avoidance of the commonplace and the banal. Of course, a failure happens now and then. Mrs. Hinkson's savoir faire forsook her when she sang of the pleasant sparrows, rooks, and daws," who "Drank up that wind-like wine,

And hailed the day with loud applause."

Mrs. Hinkson has probably never been to a political banquet.

This poet, in common with most singers of the country, badly misrepresents London. When from the centre of the town her heart turns towards Ireland, she says calmly:

"The sun he shines all day here, so fierce and fine,
With never a wisp of mist at all to dim his shine."

When did the sun last shine all day in London so fierce and fine? And as for the absence of that wisp of mist, let Mrs. Hinkson ride down the Strand on a 'bus any fine spring morning, and she will perceive marvellous effects of mist—visions not to be rivalled in Ireland of "the foggy dew."

But even the aggrieved Londoner will be disposed to render up thanks for this fanciful and dainty volume, so pretty both within and without, so accomplished in its workmanship, and, above all, so readable. Perusers of the Pall Mall Gazette will find in it many "Occ." verses—foretta that have already sweetened with their aroma the bitterness of daily politics, and are now to bloom again.

MR. WAY'S EURIPIDES.

The Tragedies of Euripides, in English Verse.
By Arthur S. Way. Vol. III. (Macmillan & Co.)

THAT Mr. Way should ever have reached this third and concluding volume of his verse translation of the eighteen plays of Euripides moves us to respectful admiration. The task was a colossal one, and only the most dogged perseverance, coupled with a fine enthusiasm for his author, could have enabled him to carry it through. To us, we confess, even to read a verse translation of the complete plays of Euripides is something of a labour. To write it must have been at times heartbreaking. The structure, and indeed the whole spirit, of the two languages is so different, that again and again passages in the plays are met with which cannot by any possibility be rendered satisfactorily from Greek into English verse with any pretence to verbal accuracy. And Mr. Way has increased his own difficulties by aiming, except in the choruses, at a line for line correspondence with the original. The result of this has been that the extreme compression of the Greek dialogue has often landed the translator in something very like doggerel, while the elaborate and involved sentences of the choruses, hardly to be satisfactorily rendered even in prose, produce in English a kind of verse which may be read with indulgence, but scarcely with enjoyment.

With all these difficulties Mr. Way has struggled courageously—in the speeches and the dialogue with considerable success. His choruses are always spirited and bold in their metrical treatment, but he has occasionally been unable to avoid sentences and constructions which only distantly resemble English. Here is an example from the "Bacchanals":

"The God whom his mother—when anguish tore her
Of the travail resistless that deathward bore her
On the wings of the thunder of Zeus down-flying—
Brought forth at her dying
An untimely birth, as her spirit departed
Stricken from life by the flame down-darted:
But in birth-bowers new did Zeus Kronion Receive his scion."

Now it is possible to make out what this means with ten minutes' thought, and even perhaps to parse it, especially with the Greek before one, but we very much doubt whether the "English reader" who knows no Greek—for whom presumably verse translations are intended—will find it either enlightening or enlivening. Here is another passage from the same play:

"Ha! dost thou see not the wild fire enwreathed
Round the holy tomb—
Lo, dost thou mark it not well?—
Which Semelè thunder-blasted bequeathed,
Her memorial of doom
By the lightning from Zeus that fell?"

As a form of metrical gymnastics this is ingenious, but it is hardly more. We do not say that it could be better done. The difficulties of the task which Mr. Way has set himself are so enormous that even a scholar and poet of the first rank could hardly hope to overcome them. But we feel that a task much of which must of necessity be performed in a halting manner were almost better left alone.

But we do not wish to give the impression that Mr. Way's translation, as a whole, or even for the most part, is of this unsatisfactory kind. He has evidently learnt much from Mr. Swinburne in his rhymed renderings of the choruses, and these are at times at once very bold and very successful. Everyone will remember the famous passage in "Atalanta in Calydon," which probably suggested the measure of the following to Mr. Way:

"Hopes, dreams, they were past,
As a tale that is told;
Yet thou comest at last
For mine arms to enfold!
What shall I say to thee?—how shall I grasp it, the rapture of old?
By assurance of word,
Or by hands that embrace,
Or by feet that are stirred,
Or by body that sways,
Hitherward, thitherward, tossed as the dance
intertwineth its maze?"

Mr. Way is not Mr. Swinburne, but he has caught his manner in this not unhappily. And there is often a rush and fire about his measures which carries him triumphantly through difficult passages. Here is one of his happiest efforts:

"Leaf-crowned came the Centaur riders,
With their lances of pine,
To the feast of the Heaven-abiders,
And the bowls of their wine.
'Hail Sea-queen!' so rang their acclaiming—
'A light over Thessaly flaming'— Sang Cheiron, the unborn naming—
'Thy scion shall shine.'
And as Phoebus made clearer the vision,
'He shall pass,' sang the seer,
'Unto Priam's proud land on a mission
Of fire, with the spear
And the shield of the Myrmidons, clashing
In gold; for the Fire-King's crashing
Forges shall clothe him with flashing
Warrior-gear:
Of his mother the gift shall be given,
Of Thetis brought down.'
So did the Dwellers in Heaven
With happiness crown
The espousals of Nereus' daughter,
When a bride unto Peleus they brought her,
Of the seed of the Lords of the Water
Chief in renown."

Mr. Way's blank verse is always respectable, and occasionally quite good. It is when he essays trochaic measures that he most frequently fails. Even Tennyson could not always handle the metre of "Locksley Hall" with complete success, and Mr. Way's passages in that metre often approach dangerously near the absurd. The following, again, from the "Orestes" is unpleasantly suggestive of the Ingoldsby Legends:

"But as Bacchanals dropping the thyrsus to seize
A kidding over the hills that flees,
They rushed on her—grasped—turned back to the slaughter
Of Helen—but vanished was Zeus's daughter!
From the bowers, through the house, gone wholly from sight!
O Zeus, O Earth, O Sun, O Night!"

Again in the "Bacchanals" we find:

"What cry was it?—Whence did it ring?
—'Twas the voice of mine Evian King!"

which smacks of the ludicrous.

But flaws of this kind are almost sure to be found in a work of such dimensions. On the whole, as we have said, Mr. Way has achieved a considerable success in his task. That it was worth while to attempt a metrical translation of Euripides on these ambitious lines we should be sorry to assert. However ably done, it could hardly hope to give any idea of the original to readers unacquainted with Greek, while those who know Greek will not read the plays in a translation. Indeed, from every point of view, a prose version would probably have been more satisfactory. But for those who desire to have Greek dramas rendered into English metre and Greek choruses disguised by English rhyme, we can conscientiously recommend Mr. Way's version as always accurate and painstaking, and occasionally distinctly poetical.

A BOHEMIAN PLAYWRIGHT.

W. G. Wills, Dramatist and Painter. By Freeman Wills. (Longman & Co.)

MR. FREEMAN WILLS, who has just written a memoir of his brother, the late W. G. Wills, naturally expresses a high opinion of his powers, and especially of his achievement as a dramatist. He thinks that the author of "Olivia" and "Charles I." "may fairly be considered the poetic dramatist of the Victorian era." "He restored poetry to the stage at a time when the poetic drama was supposed to be dead." "His dramas were literature to the cultured, while they were human nature to the crowd."

What are the facts? Wills was the Sheridan Knowles of our time—that, and no more. He wrote numerous plays in verse, but the verse was mostly of the pedestrian sort. It contained here and there a pretty fancy and a neat expression; but in the main it was level and monotonous. To read, it is tiresome; and when one considers the extracts Mr. Freeman Wills gives from his brother's unacted "Rienzi" and "King Arthur," one is inclined to be glad that Sir Henry Irving did not see his way to produce the latter, and appears to be in no hurry to produce the former.

It would be wrong, of course, unduly to depreciate the stage work of Wills. "Olivia" and "Charles I." are unquestionably effective pieces, despite the latter's flagrant falsity to history. These have in them elements of pathos, though of a cheap and somewhat obvious kind. There is also some very tolerable rhetoric in "Claudian." But these are the only pieces by Wills, out of three dozen or thereabouts, which can be said to have held the boards or to have any possibilities in the future. And in each of the three cases, there is every reason to believe, the success secured has been largely through the agency of the collaborators and the actors. Wills could write lines which were serviceable in the theatre, but he had little, if any, dramatic or even theatrical instinct. He needed to be severely "edited." He could do work to order, but had little, if any, initiative. One by one his plays have dropped out of the current repertory, with but slight probability of revival. "Hinko," "Medea in Corinth," "Eugene Aram," "Mary Queen of Scots," "Sappho," "Buckingham," "Cora," "Nell Gwynne," "Vanderdecken," "Ninon," "Forced from Home," "Juana," "Jane Eyre," "Gringoire," "A Young Tramp," "The Little Pilgrim," "Clarissa"—what likelihood is there of these pieces being seen again, except, perhaps, through the casual caprice of a "star" player? They are practically dead and buried. Reproduced the other day, "The Man o' Airie," even with Mr. Vezin in his original part, did but bore—it was hopelessly démodé. Sir Henry Irving might be able to galvanise "Eugene Aram," "Vanderdecken," and "Faust" into some sort of life again; but he will hardly make the attempt, we should say. Nor can "Olivia" and "Charles I." and "Claudian" be depended upon to outlive their existing interpreters.

How is it that so many of Wills's plays were "for the occasion" only? How is it that none of them can be said to have the quality of permanence? The answer would seem to lie in the character and methods of the writer. To begin with, it is clear that Wills did not take over kindly to dramatic production. "I am a poor painter," he is reported to have said, "who writes plays for bread." That might appear to be an affectation did we not know it to be sincere. We have Mr. Freeman Wills's authority for the assertion that his brother handled the pen with reluctance, and only the brush with pleasure. He thought the pictorial art was what he was born for, and there can be no doubt that he excelled as a pastellist. It was as a painter and a draughtsman that he felt the strongest impulse.

"When there was a pressure of urgent dramatic work, he has been known more than once to jump out of bed and seize his palette and brushes; and to keep him at work with his pen, he would have to be watched and goaded on."

"He was impatient," says his brother, "of much of the dramatic work he was commissioned to do, and when this was the case he did it badly." One can well believe that he loathed all task-work; but the dramatic and literary defects of his plays may be ascribed most truly to his habits of composition, which were unfavourable to perfect form and finish:

"He wrote on backs of envelopes, or any scrap of paper handy. These, fastened together, would be flung into a wicker-basket, and sorted out and arranged, like a puzzle, when a play was to be completed. Or he would write here and there in sketch-books, beginning at both ends, and then in the middle, and interspersing his notes among studies of limbs or leaves."

During the years of his greatest literary activity he did most of his writing in bed, amid surroundings of the most untidy sort. He liked to have company when he wrote, and was much inspired and assisted by the strains from a musical box!

Wills began as a novelist, and one or two of his stories—say, The Wife's Evidence and The Love that Kills—are not without vigour of a kind. Then he took to pastels and painting in oils; after that, he became a species of house-dramatist or hack playwright, never doing absolutely bad work, but rarely doing absolutely good. He was the victim of his own idiosyncrasies, the most regrettable of which were, apparently, inherited. He derived directly from his father, not only his versatility, but, unfortunately, his habits of abstraction and infirmity of purpose. He would have produced better and more lasting plays, novels, and pictures had he had the strength of will to devote himself earnestly and persistently to one or the other. As it was, he lived from hand to mouth, and was satisfied when his immediate necessities and those of his widowed mother were relieved. He did not covet money for itself. "He was just as happy roughing it in his own bare and untidy rooms as when living as a guest on the fatness of the land." He calculated that he received, altogether, for the thirty-two plays written within twenty years, about £12,000. "As much," says his brother, "has been realised by a single play in modern times." No doubt, but not by a playwright of the calibre of Wills. He was neither a fine dramatic poet nor an ingenious play-maker. Had he been one or the other, he might have amassed a large fortune. As it is, his plays probably brought in at the time just what they were worth to the entrepreneurs who speculated in them. His brother admits that he was honourably dealt with, "for the sums paid him were intrinsically large, and might, but for the sense of justice of those who were left to name their own terms, have been considerably less."

The fact is, Wills was improvident, and was often glad to accept a moderate sum down, rather than wait for royalties to accrue. Had he been a man of ordinary prudence, he could, after a certain period in his career, have commanded his own price. He was, however, a Bohemian in every respect, and a lover of Bohemians—working fitfully and at various things, taking no pains to retain employers, and allowing his money to be borrowed or stolen by his many hangers-on:

"The tobacco-jar on his chimney-piece, in which he artfully concealed his loose change, the hiding-place being known to all the loafers of the studio, is certainly not a myth; and [adds his brother] he has told me confidentially that it was strange, if he left loose sovereigns in his pockets when changing his dress, he never could find them again when he went to look for them. I think he had a glimmering sub-consciousness of how it happened."

After all, Wills lived his own life, in his own way—the only life, probably, that he was fitted to live. He fulfilled his destiny. His intellectual gifts unhappily co-existed with tendencies which weakened and impaired them. Had his mental powers been supplemented by strength of character, he would have been a more successful and a more admirable man; but he would not have been W. G. Wills. His brother's assumption that he was "a nineteenth century Oliver Goldsmith" cannot altogether be accepted. After all, Goldsmith did write The Vicar of Wakefield and She Stoops to Conquer.

A LADY IN PERSIA.

Thro' Persia on a Side-Saddle. By Ella C. Sykes. (A. D. Innes & Co.)

MISS SYKES declares, in a modest little preface, that her book has no pretension to be either historical, scientific, or political; and it is neither one nor another. But it is better as it is, for when Miss Sykes thinks it necessary to be learned—as when she gives a summary of the history of Islam—she manipulates her subject with so ingenuous and so jejune a hand, that all serious effect is discounted. She has, however, qualities which in a traveller are a hundred times more engaging than seriousness; and without being bent on it, she bestows on her readers an enormous amount of useful and agreeable information—information which, as she says, "may claim to be correct, as far as it goes," since her brother, Captain Sykes, who has travelled for some years in Persia on Government service, has revised her manuscript.

It was in her brother's company that Miss Sykes traversed the Land of the Lion and the Sun. In October, 1894, Captain Sykes, just home from his second journey in Persia, was asked by the Foreign Office to return there to found a Consulate for the districts of Kerman and Baluchistan. He went, accompanied by his sister, and, travelling or at rest, they were together in Persia for two years and a quarter. It is a fact of not a little significance in these times of disturbed international politics that she and her brother chose as the quickest and best route for attaining the Persian capital that by way of Constantinople, the Black Sea, and Batoum to Baku on the Caspian, and thence to Enzeli in Persian territory—thus journeying the whole way after leaving the Golden Horn over seas or across lands controlled or possessed by Russia. They travelled by way of Tehran, Kasban, and Yezd to Kerman, which is in the south-east of Persia. There they established a British Consulate, and there they remained till ordered to join the Persia-Baluchistan Boundary Commission. And it must be said that, whether at rest or on the move, whether entertaining curious and semi-barbarous Persian ladies at the Kerman Consulate, or shooting on the hills, or delimiting frontiers, Miss Sykes is as brisk and cheerful a companion as one could possibly choose. She is, indeed, a constant well-spring of shrewd and kindly observation, of sympathy and understanding; and she writes with equal gusto of the peccadilloes of her servants, and of the fearsome appearance and habits of spiders, scorpions, and beetles.

The following may be taken as a specimen of her descriptive writing:

"It was now the end of April, and huge dung beetles were flying about in all directions, occasionally coming into collision with us or our horses. They were, as a rule, busily engaged in rolling along balls of dung three or four times their own size with their back legs. It was interesting to see the speed with which they made off with these treasures, burying them in the sandy soil, and retiring with them for the purpose of laying their eggs in them. Sometimes two would contend for the possession of a ball, one rolling the other over and over as it clung to it, or a couple would chivy an intrusive beetle away from their special possession."

The matter is well observed, with humour and understanding; but we do wish that ladies in the position of Miss Sykes would learn to use the noble English language with as much knowledge and grace as distinguished the compositions of their writing forbears. We dare not say that she actually writes ill, for she carries the reader along even when she does not enthral; but her writing grates upon our feeling for words, and her collocations of adverbs and prepositions—"out on to a great sandy desert," for instance—set the teeth on edge. Yet, we repeat it, her own interest and enjoyment in all she sees and hears are so quick and so keen, that she must needs communicate her interest and enjoyment to the reader. Many valuable books have been written about Persia and its mixed peoples, from those of Morier and Sir Henry Layard to those of Miss Bird and Mr. Curzon; but none is so worthy of a place on the same shelf with these as this book of Miss Sykes, or so necessary for reference in that near future when Persia will be attracting the eyes of Europe as China did the other day.

BRIEFER MENTION.

Boston Neighbours in Town and Out. By Agnes Blake Poor. (Putnam's Sons.)

THESE stories—and particularly the first—give one an impression of the writer as a witty child. There is such a directness about the narrative style, such simplicity in the point of view, and such fresh geniality in the tone, that you read always with a smooth brow and lips that are ready to smile. You listen to the child or not, as you please; you lose nothing of importance if you wander, but if you are attentive you are sure to be more or less amused. Here, for instance, is a passage from "Our Tolstoi Club," a women's society in suburban Boston:

"Well, in the autumn before last, Minnie said we must get up a Tolstoi Club; she said the Russians were the coming race, and Tolstoi was their greatest writer, and the most Christian of moralists (at least she had read so), and that everybody was talking about him, and we should be behindhand if we could not. So we turned one of our clubs, which had nothing particular on hand just then, into one; and, besides Tolstoi, we read other Russian novelists. . . . We did not read them all, for they are very long, and we can never get through anything long; but we hired a very nice lady 'skimmer,' who ran through them, and told us the plots, and all about the authors, and read us bits. I forget a good deal, but I remember she said that Tolstoi was the supreme realist, and that all previous novelists were romancers and idealists, and that he drew life just as it was, and nobody else had ever done anything like it, except, indeed, the other Russians, and these we discussed."

The arrival of the artist, Willie Williams, and his wife in the suburb supplies material for the application of the principles of realism imbibed from the Russians by means of the 'lady skimmer'; and the slight comedy runs its satirical little course very agreeably. One or two of the tales are rather more ambitious. They are proportionately less successful.

Stories from the Classic Literature of Many Nations. Edited by Bertha Palmer. (Macmillan & Co.)

It is a little hard to say on what principle this book has been compiled. If it be intended merely as a collection of interesting tales, most of the Egyptian, Chinese, Babylonian, Arabian, and Hindu versions are out of place, seeing that the narrative consists chiefly of interjections and mystic names. If, again, the compiler had a scientific purpose, it is not perfectly obvious, for anything more fragmentary and haphazard than the selection it would be hard to imagine. Whatever way we take it, a work is open to criticism which chooses only "The Shield of Æneas" and "Baucis and Philemon" to represent the Roman tales, and in the Celtic section omits the story of Deirdre and the Sons of Usnach. But for many of the tales we are thankful. The beautiful Japanese myth of Urashima is the closest parallel to the story of Oisín and his journey to Tirnanoge in Irish folk-lore, and we are pleased to meet again the excellent Hindu fable of "The Old Hare and the Elephants." The extraordinary legend of Perdiccas from Herodotus is not often found in such selections, and is well worth its place. Northern literatures are well represented, and there are two interesting and eccentric tales from the American Indians. The translations are by competent scholars, being, in the main, extracts from fuller versions. It is a book well enough done of its kind, but it is a little difficult to know to what class of readers it will appeal.

John and Sebastian Cabot. By C. Raymond Beazley. (Unwin.)

MR. BEAZLEY handles his subject with the heavy hand of the specialist, and under that treatment most of its charm unhappily vanishes. The facts are all there—and more than the facts perhaps, considering the very considerable doubts that gather round the stories of Sebastian, as of most ancient geographers—and Mr. Beazley sifts them with laborious minuteness, but we cannot honestly say that the result is a very readable book. It might be imagined that the story of the man, John Cabot, who set forth with mariners from Bristol, in 1497 and 1498, for the discovery of the New World would read like a fascinating romance. In Mr. Beazley's hands it certainly does not, and we imagine that he had no intention that it should. Rather he gives us a cold and business-like statement of facts, where facts are to be found, of minute scraps of evidence gathered here, there, and everywhere, and the, often dubious, conclusions which may possibly be drawn from those scraps. The importance of Sebastian Cabot and his claim to a place in a series of "Builders of Greater Britain" lies, of course, in his connexion with the North-East voyage of Willoughby and Chancellor in 1553. Sebastian himself did not take part in that voyage, but as Governor of the Company of Merchant Adventurers he had much to do with its fitting out, and we have minute instructions from his hand as to the conduct of the expedition. It was probably the success of this expedition which opened up the English trade with Russia, and thereby gave the great impetus to English commerce which caused the fame of Sebastian to so far outshine that of his more adventurous father until the son was in danger of monopolising the credit due to both his own and his father's adventures. Mr. Beazley successfully disentangles their fortunes, and assigns to each his share of the credit. But he is certainly dull.

Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey. By Basil Wilberforce, D.D. (Elliot Stock.)

CANON WILBERFORCE, in the present volume, has carefully abstained from committing himself to any dogmatic theories whatever, and although in one discourse ("My Father is Greater than All") he seems to go perilously near the Millenarian heresy that all men shall be saved, he avoids the snare by a dexterous wrench of his oratory at the last moment. For the rest, the teaching of his sermons is eminently practical, and touches upon such everyday matters as the state of the London streets, the supposed equality of the sexes, the national drink bill, and other topics which his audience think—perhaps with reason—of more importance than points of theology. There is here abundant evidence that Canon Wilberforce has inherited no small share of his father's gift of eloquence, with some tendency to hyperbole, as when he calls Joan of Arc "the greatest general who has ever saved a Fatherland from its foes." The use of such words as "credal" and "affectional" is rather jarring.

A Study of the Saviour in the Newer Light. By Alexander Robinson, B.D. (Williams & Norgate.)

THIS book would be notable were it only for the fact that its appearance led to its author's prosecution for heresy, and ultimately to his severance from the Church of Scotland. It is, in fact, a life of the Founder of Christianity with the miraculous part omitted or rationalistically explained away very much in the manner of Renan. Mr. Robinson seems to have been led to his present views largely by an examination of the discrepancies between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics, and he presents them in a clear, temperate, and reverent tone. This apart, we doubt whether there is anything very new or startling in the book, which shows throughout the tendency of the later German schools of Protestant theology towards Unitarianism. Although the author quotes from St. Irenæus, to whose testimony he attaches some weight, it is curious that he, in common with more orthodox writers, entirely omits mention of his extraordinary story that Jesus lived on earth for twenty years after the Resurrection.

The Christian Interpretation of Life, and other Essays. By W. T. Davison, D.D. (Charles H. Kelly.)

DR. DAVISON'S essays are reprinted from the London Quarterly Review. Although not reviews in the strict sense of the word, most of them seem to have been inspired by recent books, such as Dr. Martineau's Seat of Authority in Religion, Dr. Fraser's Gifford Lectures, Mr. Arthur Balfour's Foundation of Belief, Dr. Hatch's Hibbert Lectures, and the like. All of these have been already fully treated in the ACADEMY, and there is, therefore, little to be gained by going over the ground again. Dr. Davison's book can, however, be recommended as a clear, temperate, and persuasive presentation of his own—which is, of course, the Methodist—view of the teaching of such books.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

ADRIENNE.

By "RITA."

It was long ago established that "Rita" cannot be dull. Readers of The Sinner and Peg the Rake know that. And here, in this "Romance of French Life," she is as sprightly as ever. "It was the height of the season at Trouville"—that is the promising opening; and on the next page, Armand de Valtour, seeing a young girl, exclaims, "English. But what an exquisite face!" and straightway the business begins. (Hutchinson & Co. 346 pp. 6s.)

MISS TOD AND THE PROPHETS.

By MRS. HUGH BELL.

A pathetic little story of a poor unemployed governess, who, on reading a prophecy to the effect that the world was coming to an end on a certain near date, bade farewell to her troubles, ceased to consider the necessity of saving, and led for a while a perfectly happy life. How disillusion and sorrow came the reader must learn from the book. (Bentley & Son. 141 pp.)

THE ADMIRAL.

By DOUGLAS SLADEN.

"A Romance of Nelson in the Year of the Nile," by the author of A Japanese Marriage, and the editor of Who's Who. In a lengthy preface Mr. Sladen makes it clear that he has devoted much time and pains to ensure historical accuracy for this work; and "I have," he remarks with all the emphasis of italics, "wherever it was feasible, used, whether in dialogue or description, the actual words of Nelson and his contemporaries." (Hutchinson & Co. 412 pp. 6s.)

THE HOPE OF THE FAMILY.

By ALPHONSE DAUDET.

Daudet's last novel—Soutien de Famille—translated into English, or "adapted," as the title-page says, by Levin Carnac. The story, which is more in the manner of Risler Aîné et Fromont Fils than Tartarin de Tarascon, is a study of a radically weak yet externally strong character. It has also many of the quaint portraits that Daudet loved to draw, and is full of domestic interest. (C. Arthur Pearson. 296 pp. 6s.)

A GUARDIAN OF THE POOR.

By T. BARON RUSSELL.

A well-observed character study. Twenty-four "young men" and twenty-nine "young persons" depend upon Borlase, the Guardian of the Poor. The shop assistant has in these latter days been exploited in the columns of a daily paper; here you have him and his tyrant treated imaginatively in a series of incidents rather loosely strung together. No species of brutality or meanness is wanting. The portrait of the tyrant is as vivid and ugly as the artist knows how to make it. (John Lane. 281 pp. 3s. 6d.)

EZEKIEL'S SIN.

By J. L. PEARCE.

The sin does not seem grievous: to save a belt containing eighty-five golden sovereigns and let the body drift. This is what the Cornish fisher did, yet the guilty consciousness pursues him through 300 pages. But there is the story of Morvenna too, and of the schoolmaster. And the tale is written by a man who has had opportunities of observing, and has observed. (Heinemann. 297 pp. 6s.)

ON THE BRINK OF A CHASM.

By L. T. MEADE.

Mrs. Meade is rapidly becoming one of the most voluminous of novelists. Here she offers "A Record of Plot and Passion," which, by the way, is what most storytellers do. To mention a few chapter headings is sufficient to foreshadow the fare between these covers: "Undone," "A Man's Revenge," "I Have Misjudged Him," "The Kiss," "The Long Trunk," "Diamond Cut Diamond," "The Die Cast," "Black Mischief," "The Wrong Medicine," "Scoundrel! He Said," "A Black Crime," "Circumstantial Evidence," "Ace of Trumps." (Chatto & Windus. 303 pp. 6s.)

JABEZ NUTYARD.

By MRS. EDMONDS.

J. N. was a Workman and a Dreamer, and this is the snappy title of the last chapter of his history: "Jabez Nutyard has an interview with Clare, and goes home happy; but thinks it was all the work of the rooks, and is more fully convinced than ever that he and the other actors in the story are links in a chain." A quiet, old-fashioned story, with Socialistic teaching between the lines. (Jarrold & Sons. 274 pp. 6s.)

FLAUNTING MOLL.

By R. A. J. WALLING.

Fourteen short stories, some of which have appeared in the Speaker. Rustic people and homely pathos appeal to the author. Most of the scenery is West of England, but now and then we cross to St. Malo. The majority of the characters talk Devon or Somerset thus: "'Zich a night, mem,' I zaid. 'Way, didden Mary Ann tell 'e 'er'd zeed me up to Bear Stone 'eel?'" (Harpers. 241 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE MASTER KEY.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

This story tends to show the different views that can be taken by different novelists. Mr. Benjamin Swift wrote a book on the venerable theme of love and called it The Destroyer; Miss Warden does a similar thing and calls it The Master Key. Her motto runs: "Love is the Master Key that opens every ward of the heart of man." A busy, domestic story, by a writer who, since her first appearance with The House on the Marsh, has always been entertaining. (C. Arthur Pearson. 381 pp. 6s.)

THE TRAGEDY OF A NOSE.

By E. GERARD.

Here is a passage: "The agony experienced by a young mother when she learns that her first-born child has been taken from her by death can scarcely be more bitter than the stab of pain I experienced on realising that my nose, my beautiful nose, the pride of my face, and the hitherto idol of my existence, had been taken from me by a ruthless butcher hand." (Digby, Long & Co. 194 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE SEASONS OF LIFE.

By H. FALCONER ATLEE.

The story opens in a French college and wanders thence to London, to Spain, to Mexico; and the style is appropriately garnished with foreign flowers. Here is the kind of thing that goes on in Mexico: "'Por Dios, you are a man,' said the Mexican, raising his sombrero and bowing to Frosty. 'If it is war, here goes!' and drawing a pistol he fired at the Englishman. 'Missed,' responded Frosty, bowing to the other, and firing rapidly he brought the leader to one knee. 'Thank you!' said the Mexican, coolly." (F. V. White. 296 pp. 6s.)

THE EDGE OF HONESTY.

By CHARLES GLEIG.

The story of a wrong choice by a woman, and of an unhappy marriage in consequence. The man of doubtful honesty is carefully drawn, and the more difficult figure of the faithful curate makes a clutch at the reader's sympathy. Quite a serious piece of work, without any pretence to brilliancy. (John Lane. 375 pp. 6s.)

THE GOLD-FINDER.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

In its serial form this yarn was entitled The Gold Magnet; and it is unfortunate that the author has found it necessary to change the name. The central ideal is of a mysterious composite which solves "the problem of the electro-magnetic affinities of the Noble Metals. Wherever any of them are in appreciable quantities—gold, platinum, uranium, iridium, vanadium, gallium, and so on up the scale of rarity and value—that needle will point to them, no matter what non-metallic substances may intervene." Having become possessed of so intelligent a pointer, you are on the high road to adventure and wealth; and with a knack of narrative, an author may make a first-rate magazine serial out of the consequences. (F. V. White. 312 pp.)

DORCAS DENE, DETECTIVE.

BY GEORGE R. SIMS.

His moustache is waxed, his eyes glitter (we allude to the young man in the picture outside), his teeth gleam like the teeth of one who hisses "Traitor!" She wears a picture hat and a tailor-made jacket, and, unabashed, with a steady "gun" she covers the tip of his nose. An obliging gentleman-friend pinions the villain from behind; another pinions him from before. The story is written by Mr. George R. Sims. (F. V. White. 119 pp. 1s.)

THE PERIL OF A LIE.

BY MRS. ALICE M. DALE.

Look on this picture: "The late baronet—Sir Adrian—had been the worst of all the Bannings; none so bad had been known in the family before. . . . Sir Adrian was a bad man—a bad husband, a bad father—and when he died he left the estate more encumbered than he had found it—he left it, in fact, on the verge of ruin." And on this, of his successor: "None could look into his face and not feel how good and kind and wise he was; and weak and helpless people would turn instinctively to him for protection," and so on. So there is no danger of confusing one with the other. The book ends: "'Love and remorse!' sobbed Marcia, with her head on Mrs. Arbutnot's breast; 'and God protect me from even the shadow of a lie again!'" (Routledge. 312 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

The Unknown Sea. By Clemence Housman.
(Duckworth & Co.)

WHILE recognising to the full the pains that Miss Housman has given to this mystical exercise, we cannot consider it satisfactory. It is overdone. Where one looks for a free hand one finds stippling. The juice of life is wanting. An allegory, to justify itself, should, we hold, move with a more springy, more joyous, tread. Miss Housman's initial idea had, we doubt not, vivacity and vigour; but excessive assiduity has crowded these qualities from the completed work.

The story is of the young Christian, a fisher lad dwelling among a Southern people, who have such names as Giles, Rhoda, Lois, and Philip, and speak the language of Mr. Meredith. Bolder than his fellows, he ventures to the dread Isle Sinister, and there meets a sea-woman, Diadyomene, beautiful and soulless. He loves her, but loves his religion more, and will not risk his soul, as she demands, to win this enchantress. Each time he returns to the mainland it is with some gift from Diadyomene in his nets, and the fishers, being a superstitious folk, double the thumb at Christian and, at first, shun him, but later, when he shows resistance, seize and torture him. Ill succeeds to ill, but Christian remains steadfast to his faith. Giles, his adopted father, dies, ruin comes upon the house, Lois, his adopted mother, pines and grieves, his nets draw nothing up. In the end, he sets forth on Christmas Eve, armed with the precious berries of the rowan, to reclaim the lost sea-woman, the only happy and gay figure in this gloomy narrative. Finding her, he dies, and she—she gains a soul and with it knowledge of evil and suffering.

There is more than this, of course; but to tell all would be to copy out the book; and the upshot of all appears to be that mortification of the flesh is a monstrous error. Here is the conclusion of the epilogue:

"Tell us in some figure of words how the soul of Christian entered for reward into the light of God's countenance."

At rest her body lay, and over it sang the winds.

'Tell us in some figure of words how Lois beheld these two hand in hand, and recognised the wonderful ways of God and His mercy in the light of His countenance.'

At rest her body lay, and over it grasses grew.

We need no words to tell us that God did wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Surely, surely; for quietly in the grave the elements resumed their atoms."

Were all Miss Housman's writing as simple and flexible as that, The Unknown Sea would be a joy to read. But far from it—her sentences too often are tortured beyond tolerance. We have elaborate construction for elaborate construction's sake; the most ordinary actions, which readers of any intelligence would take for granted, set forth with endless labour. It is, in short, a variety of style whose life breath is wit: and there is no wit here. Allegories demand an easier, more straightforward manner; they should not be repositories of all the newest words. Yet we would be fair: Miss Housman, now and again, offers passages of strange beauty. Thus, of the approach of Diadyomene:

"Came trampling and singing and clapping, promising welcome to ineffable glories, ravishing the heart in its anguish to conceive of a regnant presence in the midst. Coming, coming, with ready hands and lips. Came a drench, bitter-sweet, enabling speech: like a moan it broke weak, though at its full expense, 'Diadyomene.' Came she."

* * * *

A Year's Exile. By George Bourne.
(John Lane.)

ON the surface, this book seems to lack originality; but examine it more closely, and originality becomes one of its chief characteristics. Dr. Mitchell, the surgeon of a remote countryside, exchanged practices with Dr. Wright, a Londoner, whose wife needed pure air for a time. He became friendly with the friends of Wright, and among these were the Lane Thomsons; Mr. Lane Thomson was a journalist—a clever, calm, not unkind man, apt to neglect a singularly gracious wife and to take for granted her loyalty and constant self-sacrifice. Mitchell began by sympathising with Mrs. Lane Thomson, and soon was in love with her. Then, when Lane Thomson fell ill, he was tempted to poison the sick man, but withstood the hysteric impulse. Through the agency of a maidservant certain rumours were spread about; a painful explanation ensued between the three persons chiefly interested, and (we are to suppose) Mitchell went back to his countryside practice. So stated, the story appears commonplace—especially that well-worn poison situation—but the real theme of the book underlies all these incidents, which merely illustrate and embroider it. Mr. Bourne's purpose has been to show the disintegrating effect of London on the character of a man accustomed to the sanities and naturalness of rural life. He treats this theme with remarkable subtlety. At first Mitchell has strength to protest against the sinister influences. He goes to a concert, and discussing the performance afterwards—

"he turned to Mrs. Thomson, and with an impatient gleam in his eyes went on, 'At home, an old man I know is minding sheep on the hillside by starlight—unless he's freezing to death at this moment. It's cold enough. The thought of him while that girl was singing exquisitely made me fairly ashamed to be there listening. I never heard anything more exquisitely false and dead in my life.'"

But soon he loses faith in his own craft, because, working largely among the poor, his healing seems only to prolong their unrelieved misery, and from this point the decadence develops rapidly. Through an apparently simple, but really complicated intrigue, the climax is approached with skill and precision; almost before he is aware of it, Mitchell finds himself in a position as humiliating as any that an honourable man could conceive. The crucial explanatory interview is very well done indeed, and it finally illumines some of the obscure motives and traits which have led up to it, exposing the characters completely at just the proper moment.

In spite of its unobtrusiveness and quietude, this book is, in fact, an ambitious one, in that the author has tried to disclose much more of the baffling subtlety of life than the usual novelist cares to attempt. His success has not been complete—the opening of the story seems misty, and there is several times a certain maladroitness in the contrivance of incident—but it is sufficient and striking enough to arouse a sincere interest in Mr. Bourne's future. And, in the meantime, here is a solid achievement in characterisation. One notes that the women are more successful than the men. Mrs. Lane Thomson is an authentic creation; her attitude at the end, after all her sympathy with Dr. Mitchell and secret chafing against her husband, is inevitable and convincing. Thomson himself, logical and unimpassioned, can view the affair from Mitchell's standpoint, and wants peace:

"'I'll endeavour to explain,' he says to her a little angrily, 'if you will be reasonable.'

Her face grew hot, and anger flashed in her eyes.

'Thanks; I'm tired of reason. There's no room for it here. He's tried to come between me and you. . . . I don't know—I'm ashamed to think—what he must have taken me for—and I loathe it! I loathe it. I want never to see him again.'"

Although A Year's Exile deals mainly with London, there is a rural interlude in the middle of the book, and Mr. Bourne takes advantage of it to give some descriptions of high summer which are really notable—distinguished by a fine style and a passionate sympathy with nature :

"They were sitting after dinner was over on the lawn again, and watching the almost imperceptible progress of the stately afternoon. The swallows had withdrawn to other valleys where water was more plentiful, and gradually the talk of the three friends died away as though they were overawed by the full majesty of the summer. Everything was perfectly still; the only sound was the humming undertone of the bees, and that was so solemn that it seemed like the silence grown audible. Far off the blue hills slept; soft blue smoke stole up from the village below them, hidden by trees; the trees were motionless; and from the lawn they sat on to the farthest hillside and away beyond—where the sea was sparkling—the golden sunlight lay as if entranced. But it was no trance—that tremendous calm; it was rather the silence of breathless worship—the world's kneeling reverence for the sun at his work. Every vibrating ray in those wide miles of glowing light was bringing life down, and every leaf, every blade of grass on the farthest upland, was as if tense with the passion of existence. . . ."

This is writing. Mr. Bourne should treat of country life next time.

* * * *

The Bishop's Dilemma. By Ella D'Arcy.
(John Lane.)

THIS is a smooth and a placid little book—with none of the emotional and verbal intensities which are to be found here and there in Miss D'Arcy's volume of stories—miscalled Monochromes. It relates the uneventful annals of the Roman Catholic Mission founded at Hattering by that munificent patron of religion, Lady Welford. After the living had fallen vacant, Lady Welford wrote to her Bishop pathetically to inquire when his lordship was going to take pity "on his poor little flock at Welford, so long deprived of the consolations . . ." &c. "When are you coming down to see us?" she continues. "Will the strawberries tempt you? . . . I shall certainly expect you when the figs are ripe. . . . I hope you are taking care of your health, so precious to us all." And the plaintive, resigned, seductive letter concludes, of course, with "Always your sincere friend and affectionate daughter in Christ." After that one learns without surprise that Lady Welford grossly ill-treats her paid companion, the young, delicate, submissive Mary Deane.

The dear Bishop sends her a priest named Fayler, a fragile, genteel shepherd who has found the care of the obstreperous sheep of a Hammersmith "settlement" too exciting for his nervous system. Fayler goes down to Hattering with nebulous hopes and a very definite social ambition. He dines as frequently as he may at "the Park," and extends to Mary Deane a covert but very real sympathy. When Mary Deane sprains her foot in assisting Father Fayler to decorate the altar, the young priest's solicitude for her brings Lady Welford to the conclusion that this union of souls has proceeded far enough—she could never tolerate the slightest consideration shown to Mary Deane—and in her most perfect manner she packs off the poor paid companion on the instant. From that moment Father Fayler languishes and loses tone. Oppressed by the frightful solitude of a Catholic priest set in the midst of a community chiefly antagonistic, he acquires what Mr. G. S. Street has decorously termed "the habit of wine," and in the end the dear Bishop is compelled to remove him to a new and less trying sphere. So it ends. Of that which happened to Mary Deane nothing is disclosed.

When we have said that the book is one to be perused with quiet satisfaction, we have said nearly all that is necessary concerning The Bishop's Dilemma. The writing, the construction, the characterisation, the faint humour—each of these is good, even very good: one cannot but find pleasure in Miss D'Arcy's craftsmanship, and in the austerity of her methods. Yet one could have wished for a little more fire, or, at any rate, a little more piquancy. There is only one episode in the story which rouses our feelings beyond a tepid admiration; and that is the confessional scene between Mary and Father Fayler. The whole of this is done with insight and fine analytical skill:

"Fayler could see the tears running down her cheeks, which were no longer pale, but brilliant with emotion. He was as much moved as she, and even more surprised; for he was too unversed in human nature not to be surprised at discovering how little a quiet and submissive appearance may express the soul within.

Nor, hitherto, had he had any experience in the directing of delicate and complex consciences. His penitents at Hammersmith had been mostly men who had got drunk or done worse, and the women who came to complain of the men's misdemeanours—there is a class of women who invariably confess their husbands' sins instead of their own. With these he knew how to deal. First, he terrified them with threats of God's vengeance and hell's fire; then, when their soul was limp with fear, he kneaded into it Christ's redeeming love; and finally sent them away with a good thumping penance. . . .

With the Lady Welfords of life, too, he was not unskilful. . . . He knew that he had merely to listen to their decorous shortcomings with unwearied attention, to speak to them in soothing, conventional phrases; and, for penance, to give them, at the most, three Paters, three Aves, and three Glorias.

But here was a case for which he had no precedent. . . ."

And, when Mary Deane had confessed all her desires and discontents, and her fear that he must hate her—

"'It is the sin we hate, not the sinner,' said Fayler, repeating mechanically the phrase he had been taught to say. But, in reality, he felt an intense sympathy with the girl. He, too, had been troubled by the temptation that life was not worth living, by longings for something else, for something different, for other scenes and conditions. . . ."

In some curious subtle way, The Bishop's Dilemma is reminiscent (though not as regards theme) of that early work of Huysmans' à Vau l'Eau. We trust this does not mean that Miss D'Arcy is going to write a work which will be reminiscent of à Rebours. But it occurs to us that she might do something grandiosely effective, on a big canvas, with the psychology of a Catholic priest. So far, she has attempted nothing large.

* * * *

The Ape, the Idiot, and Other People. By W. C. Morrow.
(Grant Richards.)

LIKE the Fat Boy in Pickwick, Mr. Morrow is clearly bent upon making our flesh creep. He brings to the task considerable imagination, some skill in telling a story, and a wealth of technical terms borrowed from the Operating Theatre. On the whole, he is the most consistently gruesome writer with whom we are acquainted, and horrors have a morbid fascination for him. In The Ape, the Idiot, &c., we have some fourteen tales collected together, and there is hardly one of them that is not calculated to produce nightmares. "His Unconquerable Enemy" is perhaps one of the most repulsive, but "Over an Absinthe Bottle" is not particularly cheerful. "The Permanent Stiletto" is very mad, and in this Mr. Morrow is able to revel to the full in the argot of the Dissecting Room. This is the kind of thing:

"'What are you going to do?' asked Arnold.

'Save your life, if possible.'

'How? Tell me all about it.'

'Must you know?'

'Yes.'

'Very well then. The point of the stiletto has passed entirely through the aorta, which is the great vessel rising out of the heart and carrying the aerated blood to the arteries. If I should withdraw the weapon the blood would rush from the two holes in the aorta and you would soon be dead. If the weapon had been a knife, the parted tissues would have yielded, and the blood would have been forced out on either side of the blade, and would have caused death. As it is, not a drop of blood has escaped from the aorta into the thoracic cavity. All that is left for us to do, then, is to allow the stiletto to remain permanently in the aorta. Many difficulties at once present themselves, and I do not wonder at Dr. Rowell's look of surprise and incredulity.'

No more do we. However, the stiletto does remain in the aorta, and what happens after that persons with an appetite for horrors will learn for themselves from this book. There remains the larger question whether the merely gruesome is quite a fit subject for art. The repulsive has, no doubt, a considerable fascination for a certain sort of reader, and Mr. Morrow probably counts upon finding a public which will take pleasure in these stories, but we imagine that most people will prefer something more cheerful in the way of "light" reading. Moreover, from the purely artistic standpoint, we think there is a danger in this sort of writing which Mr. Morrow has not always sufficiently recognised, the danger of slipping from the horrible to the ridiculous. The dying man's apostrophe to the shark which waits to devour him in "A Game of Honour" is an illustration of this. But Mr. Morrow has power of a kind, and though sometimes grotesque, is usually readable.

TWO PREFACES BY MR. BARRIE.

Two prefaces by Mr. Barrie in one week is good. We hope he will continue the notion through the summer. The books thus honoured are a new edition of Mr. George W. Cable's The Grandissimes and a collection of Mrs. Oliphant's short stories. Mr. Cable's story first appeared in 1880; and now Mr. Barrie eulogises it in its new edition. We quote about half of Mr. Barrie's Introductory Note:

"To sit in a laundry and read The Grandissimes—that is the quickest way of reaching the strange city of New Orleans. Once upon a time, however, I took the other route, drawn to the adventure by love of Mr. Cable's stories, and before I knew my way about the St. Charles Hotel (not, as Mr. Cable would explain, the St. Charles of Dr. Sevier, but its successor), while the mosquitoes and I were still looking at each other, before beginning, several delightful Creole ladies had called to warn me. Against what? Against believing Mr. Cable. They came singly, none knew of the visits of the others, but they had heard what brought me there; like ghosts they stole in and told their tale, and then like ghosts they stole away. The tale was that Mr. Cable misrepresented them; Creoles are not and never were 'like that,' especially the ladies. I sighed, or would have sighed had I not been so pleased. I said I supposed it must be so; no ladies in the flesh could be quite so delicious as the Creole ladies of Mr. Cable's imagination, which seemed to perplex them. They seemed to be easily perplexed, and one, I half think, wanted to be a man for an hour or two just to see how those ladies would impress her then. But by the time she regained the French quarter she was probably sure that she had convinced me. And she had, they all did, one after the other—that the sweet Creoles who haunt these beautiful pages were not always ghosts, but always ghost-like. They come into the book like timid children fascinated by the hand held out to them, yet ever ready to fly, and even when they seem most real, they are still out of touch; you feel that if you were to go one step nearer they would vanish away. Such is the impression they leave in all Mr. Cable's books, and his painting of them would be as faulty as the masterpiece exhibited by Honoré Grandissime's cousin in Mr. Frowenfeld's window if their descendants were not a little scared by it, they who had for so long peeped from behind veils and over balconies to be at last introduced to that very mixed society, the reading public! What would Aurora of this book have said to it? She is the glory of the book; no one, not even Mr. Cable (who rather disgracefully shirks the question) can tell why Joseph Frowenfeld 'went over' from her to Clotilde (I am sure Joseph did not know) after feeling that to be with her was like 'walking across the vault of heaven with the evening star on his arm' (which is exactly what talking to a Creole lady in the St. Charles Hotel is like); yet had Aurora been of a later age and heard what Mr. Cable was about, she would certainly, without consulting that droll little saint Clotilde, have slipped out of bed some night to invoke the naughty spirits, and when the novelist awoke he would have been horrified to find in one corner of his pillow an acorn, in another a joint of cornstalk, in a third a bunch of feathers. And though he had gone mad with terror she would have held that it served him right. And she would have had more acorns and feathers for the pillows of suspicious visitors to the St. Charles Hotel."

To A Widow's Tale, and Other Stories, Mr. Barrie contributes an Introductory Note of rather more than three pages. He gives a charming account of his first meeting with Mrs. Oliphant a dozen years ago, when she "ordered" him to Windsor. Passing from portraiture to criticism, Mr. Barrie writes:

"I wonder if there is among the younger Scottish novelists of to-day any one so foolish as to believe that he has a right to a stool near this woman, any one who has not experienced a sense of shame (and some rage at his heart) if he found that for the moment his little efforts were being taken more seriously than hers: I should like to lead the simple man by the ear down the long procession of her books. It is too long a procession, though there are so many fine figures in it—men and women and boys (the boy in Sir Tom is surely among the best in fiction) in the earlier stories, nearly all women in the latest; but whether they would have been greater books had she revised one instead of beginning another is probably to be doubted. Not certainly because the best of them could not have been made better. That is obvious to almost any reader: there nearly always comes a point in Mrs. Oliphant's novels where almost any writer of the younger school, without a sixth part of her capacity, could have stepped in with advantage. Often it is at the end of a fine scene, and what he would have had to tell her was that it was the end, for she seldom seemed to know. Even Kirsteen, which I take to be the best, far the best, story of its kind that has come out of Scotland for the last score of years, could have been improved by the comparative duffer. Condensation, a more careful choice of words, we all learn these arts in the schools nowadays—they are natural to the spirit of the age; but Mrs. Oliphant never learned them, they were contrary to her genius (as to that of some other novelists greater than she), and they would probably have trammelled her so much that the books would have lost more than they gained. We must take her as she was, believing that she knew the medium which best suited her talents, though it was not the best medium."

FOR THOSE WHO CANNOT SLEEP.

The Breath of Life, which bears the sub-title, "a series of self-treatments," is by Ursula N. Gesterfeld, and is published by the Gesterfeld Publishing Company of New York. It contains a series of meditations or spiritual assertions on such subjects as "When there is a Sense of Injury," "When there is Fear of Heredity," "When there is Fear of Death," "When there is Fear of Failure in Business," "When there is Difficulty in Letting Go of the Past," "When the Sense of Sight Diminishes with Advancing Age." We find it difficult to select (says Light, a Journal of Psychological, Occult, and Mystical Research), but incline to quote, as a specimen, the useful and beautiful meditation on "When there is the Sense named Insomnia":

I am free from all struggle and strife.
 I am free from anxiety and apprehension.
 I am free from all strain and tension.
 I abide under the shadow of the Almighty.
 I am able to see what I should do. I am able to do what I see should be done.
 I have clear vision because I desire to do only that which is right and just.
 I shall not entangle myself, I shall be shown the way in which I should walk, moment by moment.
 Whatever comes into my mortal experience, for me there is no loss; there can be only gain.
 Because of what I am in being, nothing pertaining to my growth in self-recognition can bring me real harm.
 I see and feel that I am complete and whole, and that I live and move and have this being in God, my Cause.
 I am safe and secure every moment.
 I am cradled in the eternal arms, I rest upon the Infinite bosom.
 I am sinking into that sleep which is peace and rest, refreshment and strengthening.
 It is mine as a child-soul that is nurtured from the divine; and I have no fear of aught that can befall me.
 There is One that neither slumbers nor sleeps, and I am guarded and protected.
 I give myself up to quiet slumber. I sleep with the sleeping world, with the fields and the flowers, with the creatures small and great.
 For we are one Brotherhood, and I hear the voice of our Father in the murmur of the stream, the gentle rustle of the night-wind, the breath of the flowers.
 It says to me, "Rest, my child. All things rest. Take your rest. I am here. I will never leave nor forsake you."
 I let go all effort to do or to be.
 I sink back into these waiting arms.
 I feel them close tenderly about me.
 I am in the "green pastures," beside the "still waters." I am with the Good Shepherd of the sheep.
 I am asleep, for "He giveth His beloved sleep."
 We know from experience that the quiet determination and steady unanxious willing here indicated can cure Insomnia.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1898.

No. 1361, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a News-vendor or at a Railway Station                | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.                | 0 15 3  | 0 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. types-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN her charming book, which is reviewed elsewhere in this paper, The Cheverels of Cheverel Manor, Lady Newdigate-Newdegate, in referring to Sir Roger Newdigate's bequest of £1,000 for the Newdigate Prize for Poetry, states that the two conditions were that the poems should contain no compliments to himself ("If there is it will make me sick"), and that the number of lines should not exceed fifty. "When he was asked: 'Will you not allow another fifty?' 'No, no,' he said, 'I won't tire them in the theatre.' Later on he observed on the same subject: 'One great fault is want of compression. The best of Horace's odes and the finest Psalms are seldom more than about that length.'"

BUT in actual fact the Newdigate prize poem now runs to many more than fifty lines, and Mr. Buchan's Pilgrim Fathers, which lies before us, has upwards of a hundred. Why and when this laxity was permitted we cannot say, but it is noticeable that the first poem to exceed the fifty was R. S. Hawker's Pompeii in 1827. Before that, however, the authors had frequently enlarged their poems for publication. It seems to us a pity that Sir Roger Newdigate's conditions are not adhered to: "want of compression" is still a fault.

NEARLY all the references to the death of Mr. Alfred Cock took note only of his eminence as a Q.C., and ignored altogether the attainments of his rare and well used leisure—his energy and skill as a collector of fine things. A leading spirit for several years past at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, Mr. Cock had familiarised himself with many departments of connoisseurship, and had formed and carefully retained various collections. These, we believe, will now almost immediately be dispersed—Japanese bronzes, lacquers, English printed books, the famous collection associated with the name of Sir Thomas More—these and other things will be scattered under the hammer, perhaps before the end of the present month. It is hoped, however, that the Sir Thomas More collection, though offered in the auction room, will only be parted with en bloc. It is of a unique character, and its possession of itself gives distinction to whatever person may acquire it.

THE Poet Laureate wrote, a few weeks ago, a poem in which a friendly alliance between England and America was foreshadowed. Such was the effect of that utterance that he has been compelled to address the following letter to the New York Herald: "Since the publication of 'A Voice from the West' I have received, and continue to receive, so many and such generous communications from the United States that I am placed in a position of some embarrassment. I should have liked to return to each of my correspondents a separate reply, but their number makes it impossible. Will you, therefore, be good enough to afford me an opportunity of assuring those to whom I may not have written that I am deeply sensible of their kindness, and that I rejoice to find the sentiment of kinship to which I ventured to give utterance is even more widely entertained, and more strongly felt, than I had imagined."

No official poem has been written on the death of Mr. Gladstone, but the free lances have offered fitting tributes, the best of which are particularly good. Mr. Meredith, Sir Lewis Morris, Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Stephen Phillips, Mr. Hall Caine—these are a few who have offered the melodious meed of praise. Mr. Meredith's sonnet in the Chronicle concluded with the following lines:

"A splendid image built of man has flown,
His deeds inspired of God outstep a Past.
Ours the great privilege to have had one
Among us who celestial tasks has done."

Mr. Hall Caine figured the statesman as an old oak, thus:

"His feet laid hold of the marl and earth, his head was in the sky,
He had seen a thousand bulb and burst, he had seen a thousand die,
And none knew when he began to be—of trees that grew on that ground—
Lord of the wood, King of the oaks, Monarch of all around."

Much better we like the Browningsque fragment signed "A. G. B." in the Spectator, which we take the liberty of quoting in full:

"HEREAFTER.

What, you saw Gladstone? men will sometime ask;
Had he that look, as if he, straining, saw
A tiger creeping on an innocent child,
And none to help it; or a serpent crawl Threatening unconscious sleep? You heard him speak?
Did his eye burn? His voice, was it deep,
rich,

Melodious, like some full-toned organ pipe,
Greatest when pealing anthems o'er the dead?
And did it swell when, 'neath the oppressor's scourge,

He saw the helpless, hopeless of mankind
Perish uncared for? till the heart stood still,
And the breath stopped: and, when he made an end,

Still the ear heard: his very silence spoke?
Ah, you were happy! We have not such men
Now. He was born nearer the times of fire;
We, in a colder age that knows, not burns.
We have our warmth, but not the fire of old.

Fire? Yes, it has its dangers; now and then Its child is earthquake. Yet, without that fire,
Where were the heat that keeps alive the
world?"

BUT among all the elegies none, it seems to us, had such felicity as the blank verse contributed by Mr. Stephen Phillips to last Saturday's Chronicle. Here are three beautiful stanzas:

"The saint and poet dwell apart; but thou
Wast holy in the furious press of men,
And choral in the central rush of life.
Yet didst thou love old branches and a hook,
And Roman verses on an English lawn.

Thy voice had all the roaring of the wave,
And hoarse magnificence of rushing stones;
It had the murmur of Ionian bees,
And the persuading sweetness of a shower.
Clarion of God! thy ringing peal is o'er!

Thou gav'st to party strife the epic note,
And to debate the thunder of the Lord;
To meanest issues fire of the Most High.
Hence eyes that ne'er beheld thee now are dim,
And alien men on alien shores lament."

IN Macmillan's Magazine some dozen years ago appeared a chapter from Prof. Boscher's Post-Christian Mythology (Berlin and New York, A.D. 3886) entitled "The Great Gladstone Myth." Subsequently it found its way into Mr. Lang's collection of humorous stories called In the Wrong Paradise. That entertaining book, although it contains the engaging feeling to which Mr. Lang put the title "The End of Phœacia," and much other excellent reading, fell flat, in the way that good ironical books do fall flat—Dr. Garnett's Twilight of the Gods, for example, a work due to a kindred inspiration. Coming to Mr. Lang's mischief again the other day we were as much amused as ever. Among Gladstonian literature Prof. Boscher's chapter takes a worthy place.

OUR little contemporary, the Quartier Latin, has ranged itself into line with other more actual periodicals by issuing with its May number four drawings of Mr. Gladstone, made by Mr. Forrest in St. Swithin's Church, Bournemouth, in March last. Mr. Forrest's completed picture was that which has been reproduced by To-Day.

A VERY caustic observer of literary doves-cots has the place of honour of the June Blackwood. Who he is we know not, but his hand is heavy and his prejudices strong. "Among the Young Lions" is his title, the Young Lions being Mr. H. G. Wells and

Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. Le Gallienne and Mr. Jerome, Mr. Pett Ridge and Mr. W. W. Jacobs, Mr. Conan Doyle, Mr. Morrison, Mr. Benjamin Swift, and others. The list is by no means a complete one, even of the roaring lions; while of lions who dwell in seclusion rather than in public cages there is no word at all. In fact, the critic has made notoriety the touchstone of "leoniuity."

Blackwood's lion hunter carries a heavy weapon, and some of his prey crawl away badly wounded. Mr. Benjamin Swift escapes from the battue a mass of injuries, and Mr. Jerome and Mr. Le Gallienne fare little better. On the other hand, Mr. W. P. Ryan, whose Literary London seems to have been the critic's inspiration, is kindly treated, Mr. Barry Pain is bidden to go on and prosper, Mr. Wells is deemed not wholly superfluous, Mr. Pett Ridge is patted on the back, Mr. Morrison wins a few nice adjectives, Mr. Marriott Watson is praised for Galloping Dick, Mr. Jacobs is gently disbelieved in (but the critic does not seem to have read Many Cargoes), Mr. G. W. Steevens and Mr. Coulson Kernahan are carefully avoided, and two writers for the Pink 'Un extolled.

COMING to generalities, here is a passage intended for perusal by Vagabonds and Omarians:

"There is one development, however, of the advertising mania to which we feel constrained particularly to advert. Certain men of letters, it would seem, band themselves into societies under some striking name—such as the Bohemian Bounders or the Hajji Baba Club—the capital object of whose existence is after-dinner speaking. . . . To dine twice or thrice a year for the purpose of making speeches which are to be reported more or less faithfully and fully, is a form of amusement that has never hitherto commended itself to men or women of sense. To judge from the authorised reports, the banqueters have famous times. The speakers extol one another with amazing fluency and well-affected gusto. . . . We are unable to perceive what good effect such clubs and such gatherings can possibly produce upon anybody. Their practical result is the exaltation of the busybody, and the getting up of addresses in honour of some foreign or domestic curiosity. In truth, the Authors and Authoresses of England are rapidly becoming as great a nuisance collectively as the Mothers of England used to make themselves half a century ago."

AND here is a criticism of younger fiction in general, and its refusal to depict gentlemen and ladies:

"Just as no portrait of a gentleman or a lady has been suffered to appear in Punch since Mr. Du Maurier's death, so there would seem to be a conspiracy on foot among the novelists to dissemble their knowledge of those ranks of life to which we have alluded, and to feign an ignorance as profound as that of Miss Annie S. Swan or Mr. George R. Sims. For we cannot suppose that this ostentatious want of knowledge is real, though the resources of art enable them to carry it off naturally enough. We learn from our Who's Who that many of them had a University education, and that most, besides a house in town, have a box in the country. Is it conceivable that they only associate with one another, and that at the banquets to which we have already alluded?"

THE lion hunter should certainly be replied to. Will not some young lion undertake the office? "Among the Old Boars" should be a useful title.

SEVERAL English and Continental papers, says the Anglo-Russian, have published paragraphs about preparations being made in Russia by the admirers of Count Tolstoy to celebrate his literary jubilee this year. Some papers have even gone into details and explained that the Count himself does not view with favour such demonstrations, as they may increase the difficulties of his position with the Russian Government, already in many respects a very unpleasant one. We are able to state, adds our contemporary, that of Tolstoy's literary jubilee this year there can be no question, for the simple reason that his literary career dates from 1852 and not from 1848. His first story-essay "Dyestwo" (Childhood) was written and published in the now extinct Sovremennik (The Contemporary) in 1852.

IN a further instalment of extracts from letters written by Charles Lamb to Robert Lloyd, printed for the first time in the current Cornhill, we take the following "appreciation," in Elia's best manner, of the Complete Angler:

"I shall expect you to bring me a brimful account of the pleasure which Walton has given you, when you come to town. It must square with your mind. The delightful innocence and healthfulness of the Angler's mind will have blown upon yours like a Zephyr. Don't you already feel your spirit filled with the scenes?—the banks of rivers—the cowslip beds—the pastoral scenes—the real alehouses—and hostesses and milkmaids, as far exceeding Virgil and Pope as the 'Holy Living' is beyond Thomas à Kempis? Are not the eating and drinking joys painted to the life?—do they not inspire you with an animated hunger? Are not you ambitious of being made an Angler? . . . The Complete Angler is the only Treatise written in Dialogues that is worth a halfpenny. Many elegant dialogues have been written (such as Bishop Berkeley's 'Minute Philosopher'), but in all of them the Interlocutors are merely abstract arguments personify'd; not living dramatic characters, as in Walton, where everything is alive, the fishes are absolutely character'd, and birds and animals are as interesting as men and women."

MR. HENLEY's Civil List Pension of £200 is as it should be. His has been the double achievement—to write finely himself, and to urge others to their best. Poet sweet and strong, powerful critic, stimulating editor—Mr. Henley has worked tirelessly against odds. We trust he may long enjoy Mr. Balfour's wise grant.

IN connexion with Mr. Henley's pension our readers may be interested to read the list of persons who, during the last three years 1895-1897, have received grants:

|   |      |
|---|------|
| Huxley, Mrs. Henrietta Anne, widow of Right Hon. Prof. Thomas H. Huxley, scientist . . . . .    | £200 |
| Hunter, William Alexander, jurispudent Arlidge, Dr. John Thomas, hygienist . . .                | 200  |
| Thurston, Lady, widow of the late Sir John Bates Thurston, K.C.M.G., Governor of Fiji . . . . . | 150  |

|  |      |
|--|------|
| Cox, Rev. Sir George William, historian and classic . . . . .  | £120 |
| Hammond, James, mathematician . . . . .  | 120  |
| Heavyside, Oliver, electrician . . . . .   | 120  |
| Glennie, J. S. Stuart, historian . . . . .   | 100  |
| Broome, Lady, widow of Sir F. N. Broome, K.C.M.G., Governor of W. Australia . . . . .  | 100  |
| Dickens, Mrs. Elizabeth, widow of Charles Dickens, junior . . . . .  | 100  |
| Trollope, Mrs. Rose, widow of the late Anthony Trollope . . . . .  | 100  |
| Buckland, Miss Anne Walbank, anthropologist . . . . .  | 80   |
| Barnby, Edith Mary, Lady, widow of Sir Joseph Barnby, musician . . . . .   | 70   |
| Hind, Mrs. Fanny, widow of Dr. John R. Hind, F.R.S., astronomer . . . . .  | 70   |
| Pyne - Bodda, Mme. Louisa, operatic singer . . . . .   | 70   |
| Houghton, Mrs. Margaret Anne, widow of Rev. William Houghton, scientific writer . . . . .  | 50   |
| Varley, Samuel Alfred, electrician, additional . . . . .   | 50   |
| Bryce, Archibald Hamilton, D.C.L. . . . .  | 50   |
| Garrett, Mrs. M., widow of the composer Keane, Aug. Henry, F.R.G.S., ethnologist . . . . .   | 50   |
| Steingass, Dr. Francis, Oriental scholar Wallace, Mrs. Jane, widow of Prof. Wallace . . . . .  | 50   |
| Hatch, Misses Beatrice, Ethel, and Evelyn, daughters of the late Rev. Edwin Hatch, ecclesiastical historian, each . . . . .  | 30   |
| Mason, Miss May Martha, daughter of late George Mason, painter . . . . .   | 30   |
| Wood, Mrs. Mary Caroline Florence, daughter of late George Mason, painter Dobson, Misses Francis Elizabeth, Mary, and Julia, sisters of the late Surgeon-Major George E. Dobson, F.R.S., zoologist, each . . . . . | 25   |
| Morris, Misses Hannah Elizabeth, Helen Frances, and Gertrude, daughters of the late Rev. R. Morris, philologist, each . . . . .  | 25   |

THIS month, we observe, the proprietors of the Windsor Magazine are making unusual efforts to bring that periodical under public notice; while the Strand blossoms into a double number at its ordinary price. Indeed, competition among the "popular" magazines is becoming acute, the reason probably being that the terrible Mr. Harmsworth is busily preparing the "Harmsworth Magazine," which is due in July, at half the price asked for its older rivals.

MEANWHILE, we are sorry to learn of Mr. Cyril Arthur Pearson that, as the result of strain in the fierce competitive war in which he is a fighter, he has so broken down in health as to be practically on the retired list. Mr. Pearson is thirty-two.

MR. GELETT BURGESS, the high-spirited young American gentleman who has never seen a purple cow and never wants to see one, but assures us that anyhow he'd rather see than be one, is coming to London to settle. He might do worse than give us a new series of The Lark, the little eccentric monthly which wandered here from San Francisco a year or so ago. Mr. Burgess in his capacity of irresponsible humorist will be very welcome.

MEANWHILE, Mr. Yone Noguchi, who was discovered by Mr. Burgess, sends us from San Francisco his new organ, The Twilight, which he edits in partnership with Mr. Takahaski. The price, we learn, is ten cents a copy, or "one dollar" a year. Here is a specimen of Mr. Noguchi's muse:

"The twilight, eating all the weariness given by the sun, calms the joyous discord of human shore.
The twilight—an eternal giver of unwithering spring eases the heart of mortal land with dull ecstasy.
The twilight, bidding the world to bathe in restless peace—silent unrest of slow time, kisses the breasts of kings and gipsies with lulling love.
The twilight—an opiate breath from heaven's hidden dell changes the world to a magic home where all the questions repose into content."

All things considered, we do not propose to subscribe.

APROPOS Mr. Leland's version of "Time for us to go," a correspondent draws our attention to a lost sea-song of Mr. Stevenson's. He finds it, he says, in an old Sign of the Ship article, by Mr. Lang, where it is quoted as a cap to the former chant. Mr. Lang thus introduced the genial stanzas: "The next sea-song came to us from the sea in an envelope, with the post-mark 'Taiohae Taiti, 21 Aout, '88.' The handwriting of the address appears to be that of the redoubted Viking who sailed in John Silver's crew, who winged the Black Arrow, and who wandered in the heather with Alan Breck. Aut Robertus Ludovicus aut Diabolus sent the song, I presume; but, whether he really heard it sung at Rotherhithe, or whether he is the builder of the lofty rhyme, is between himself and his conscience."

THIS is the song:

"THE FINE PACIFIC ISLANDS.
(Heard in a public-house at Rotherhithe.)

THE jolly English Yellowboy
Is a 'ansome coin when new,
The Yankee Double-eagle
Is large enough for two.
O, these may do for seaport towns,
For cities these may do;
But the dibbs that takes the Hislands
Are the dollars of Peru:
O, the fine Pacific Hislands,
O, the dollars of Peru!

It's there we buy the cocoanuts
Mast 'eaded in the blue;
It's there we trap the lasses
All awaiting for the crew;
It's there we buy the trader's rum
What bores a seaman through . . .
In the fine Pacific Hislands
With the dollars of Peru:
In the fine Pacific Hislands
With the dollars of Peru!

Now, messmates, when my watch is up
And I am quite broached to,
I'll give a tip to 'Evving
Of the 'ansome thing to do:
Let 'em just refit this sailor-man
And launch him off anew,
To cruise among the Hislands
Of the dollars of Peru:
In the fine Pacific Hislands
With the dollars of Peru!"

We should say that Robertus Ludovicus was unmistakably the author. But what do the controllers of the Edinburgh Stevenson think?

ALL readers of An Inland Voyage will remember that it has a charming dedication from R. L. S., of the Arethusa, to his companion traveller—"My dear Cigarette." The Cigarette, in other words Sir Walter Grindlay Simpson, Bart., has just died. The late Baronet was the son of the famous physician, Sir James Young Simpson. For old time's sake we give Stevenson's dedication in full:

"MY DEAR CIGARETTE,

It was enough that you should have shared so liberally in the rains and portages of our voyage; that you should have had so hard a paddle to recover the derelict Arethusa on the flooded Oise; and that you should thenceforth have piloted a mere wreck of maukind to Origny Sainte-Benoite and a supper so eagerly desired. It was perhaps more than enough, as you once somewhat piteously complained, that I should have set down all the strong language to you, and kept the appropriate reflexions for myself. I could not in decency expose you to share the disgrace of another and more public shipwreck. But now that this voyage of ours is going into a cheap edition, that peril, we shall hope, is at an end, and I may put your name on the burgee.

But I cannot pause till I have lamented the fate of our two ships. That, sir, was not a fortunate day when we projected the possession of a canal barge; it was not a fortunate day when we shared our day-dream with the most hopeful of day-dreamers. For a while, indeed, the world looked smilingly. The barge was procured and christened, and as the Eleven Thousand Virgins of Cologne lay for some months the admired of all admirers, in a pleasant river and under the walls of an ancient town. M. Matras, the accomplished carpenter of Moret, had made her a centre of emulous labour; and you will not have forgotten the amount of sweet champagne consumed in the inn at the bridge end, to give zeal to the workmen and speed to the work. On the financial aspect, I would not willingly dwell. The Eleven Thousand Virgins of Cologne rotted in the stream where she was beautified. She felt not the impulse of the breeze; she was never harnessed to the patient track-horse. And when at length she was sold, by the indignant carpenter of Moret, there were sold along with her the Arethusa and the Cigarette, she of cedar, she, as we knew so keenly on a portage, of solid-hearted English oak. Now these historic vessels fly the tricolor and are known by new and alien names.

R. L. S."

MR. LE GALLIENNE is stated to have accepted the chair of English Literature in the Cosmopolitan University, whatever that is, and to have contracted to write for the University a work on rhetoric. "Prof. Le Gallienne" has an even odder look than "Dr. Barrie."

"OUIDA" has sensible views about minor biography. To a correspondent who recently applied to her for materials for a biography, "Ouida" at length wrote:

"I have not replied to you because I regret to refuse your request, and I cannot comply with it. What impertinence and what folly are these so-called biographies of persons who have done nothing to deserve such a punishment! The life of such a man as Burton or Wellington contains material for history, but that of a man or woman of the world has nothing in it which is not essentially private and personal, and with which the public and the press have nothing to do. . . . My works are there for all to read. With me individually they have nothing to do. Print this if you like."

BUT all authors are not like "Ouida." Here is a specimen paragraph which has been sent to us for publication (the —'s are ours): "Mr. —, the author of —, which has recently been issued by —, is a member of the — family. Mr. —, who lives on the Continent, has in his possession the green silk braces which his grand-uncle broke in his death struggle, and the Erin-Go-Bragh ring which was given him by the sister of —, to whom he was engaged to be married. Mr. — himself has had an interesting career, having fought in the —, and having been at one time governor of an — prison. His book, —, has been described as 'every whit as fascinating as the — or —'s military tales.'"

"THE Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges," to be published by the Cambridge University Press, has been prepared in the conviction that text-books simple in style and arrangement, and written by authors of standing, are called for to meet the needs of both pupil teachers and candidates for Certificates. The general editorship of the series has been entrusted to Mr. W. H. Woodward, of Christ Church, Oxford, now the Principal of University (Day) Training College, Liverpool, and Lecturer on Education in Victoria University. Arrangements have already been made for the publication in this series of the following works: A History of Education from the Beginnings of the Renaissance; An Introduction to Psychology; The Making of Character: the Educational Aspects of Ethics; and An Introduction to the Theory and Practice of the Kindergarten.

AN exhibition of Mr. F. Carruthers Gould's original cartoons will be opened at the Continental Gallery, 157, New Bond-street, on Saturday, June 11. The collection will consist of about 120 original drawings, and it will be a pictorial history of the principal political events at home and abroad during the last five years. The Parliamentary cartoons range from the Home Rule Session of 1893 up to the present time, and will include several studies of Mr. Gladstone in different characteristic phases. It is needless to say that politics in these cartoons are dealt with from the Liberal point of view.

THE title of Mr. Leslie Stephen's new collection of Essays has been changed to Studies of a Biographer. Messrs. Duckworth & Co. announce it for mid June.

ON June 1, 1898, at the Registrar's Office, Henrietta-street, George Bernard Shaw to Miss Payne Townshend.

PURE FABLES.

ON THE SHELF.

"You really have no business here, my friend," said the book of verse to the paper-backed novel.

"Oh—why not?"

"Well, to be frank, you are not literature."

"But I am in my sixty-sixth thousand!"

EQUIPMENTS.

Said the mother to the fairy, "It is my desire that this babe should wax with years into an effective man of letters."

"Wherefore," answered the fairy, "I will give him the three things most necessary to such a man—namely, a nimble brain, a liberal heart, and a thick skin."

THE DREAM.

A starveling poet dreamed in his sleep that it was decreed that he might never put pen to paper again. And he felt rather sorry.

And then he awoke and felt sorrier still.

THIS ALSO——

"When I have climbed unto exaltation," quoth Promise, "I look to make myself passably snug."

"Young man," observed Performance, "victuals have no sweeter savour on the pinnacle than in the valley."

T. W. H. C.

THE BREITMANN.

In an age in which even the children prattle of Omar Khayyam, neglect of Hans Breitmann is remarkable. With most persons knowledge of the great Hans stops at the ballad of his Barty. "Hans Breitmann gife a barty," they know that; and they know that

"Ve all eot troonk ash bigs;
I poot mine mout' to a parrel of beer,
Und emptied it oop mit a schwigs;
Und den I gissed Matilda Yane,
Und she shlog me on de kop,
Und de gompany vighted mit duple-lecks
Dill de coonshtable made oos shtop."

And they know that Matilda Yane was

"De pootiest Fräulein in de house,
She vayed 'pout dwo hoondred pound,
Und efery dime she gife a shoomp,
She make de vindows sound."

But to know this is not to have knowledge of Breitmann himself; for in this ballad, as it happens, Breitmann is no one, a figure entirely in the background, his theories of life unexpressed although partly suggested; whereas in the rest of the book he is tremendous, ever active, ever vocal. Our first glimpse of the true vigorous Hans is in the story of his feats in the gymnasium:

"Hans Breitmann shoined de Turners;
Dey make shimnastig dricks;
He stoot on de middle of de floor,
Und put oop a fiddy-six.
Und den he drows it to de roof,
Und schwig off a treadful trink:
De veight coom toomple back on his headt,
Und py shinks! he didn't vink!

Hans Breitmann shoined de Turners;
De ladies coomed in to see;
Dey poot dem in de blace for de gals,
All in der gal-lerie.
Dey ashk: 'Vhere ish der Breitmann?'
Und dey tremple mit awe and fear
When dey see him sehwingen py de toes,
A triiken' lager beer."

The Breitmann here is of the tribe of Falstaff. One need not call Mr. Leland a Shakespeare to point out there is much that is Falstaffian in his hero.

Later, however, the Breitmann's hedonistic creed comes forth. It is sheer Omarism, even to the brink of wistfulness and that persistent consciousness of the transitoriness of all enjoyable things: sheer Omarism, but better, for it has vigour behind it. Thus:

"O life, mein-dear, at pest or vorst,
Ish boot a vancy ball,
Its cratest shoy a vid gallop,
Vhere madness goferns all.
Und should dey toorn ids gas-light off,
Und nefer leafe a shbark,
Sdill I'd find my vay to Heafen—or
Dy lips, lofe, in de dark.

O crown your het mit roses, lofe!
O keep a liddel sprung!
Oonendless wisdom ish but dis:
To go it while you're yung!
Und Age vas nefer coom to him,
To him Spring plooms afresh,
Who finds a livin' spirit in Der Teufel und der Flesh."

And, again:

"O vot ve vant to quiekest come,
Ish dat vot's soonest gone.
Dis life ish boot a passin' from De efer-gomin-on.
De gloser dat ve looks at id,
De shsmaller it ish grow;
Who goats and spurs mit lofe und wein
He makes it fastest go."

And—

"De more ve trinks, de more ve sees,
Dis vorldt a derwisch pe;
Das Werden's all von whirling droonk,
Said Breitmann, said he."

And finally—

"Hans Breitmann vent to Kansas;
Droo all dis earthly land
A vorkin' out life's mission here
Soobyectify und grand.
Some heoblesh runs de beautiful,
Some vorks philosophie;
Der Breitmann solfe de infinide
Ash von eternal shpreel!"

Reading this, one half wonders that no Breitmann Club exists for the exploitation of such a simple creed. Omar, who said much the same, was eternally dragging mysticism in. The Breitmann made no such mistake. Yet the absence of a Breitmann Club is not inexplicable when we reflect upon the serious demands on the powers of working journalists—the backbone of such institutions—which membership would involve. For Mr. Leland gives in black and white, over and over again, proofs of his hero's powers; whereas with the Persian we must take it on trust. One can be an Omarian in a Pickwickian sense; but the Breitmannian would have to be thorough. "Drink," cries Omar, "drink, drink," in untiring iteration; but there is no evidence that he ever drank himself. His counsel is the end of it. When was he seen "schwingen py de toes a trinken' lager beer"? The Breitmann not only talked, he did things:

"Dey vent into a shpordin' crib,
De rowdies cloostered thick,
Dey ashk him dell dem vot o'glock,
Und dat infernal quick;
Der Breitmann draw'd his 'volver oud,
Ash gool as gool couldt pe:
'Id's shoost a-goin' to shdrike six,'
Said Breitmann, said he."

—that was the Breitmann. Of Omar are no such stories told. At most he invented an almanack.

But the Breitmann's greatest deed was to go to church. The ballad of "Breitmann's Going to Church" is Mr. Leland's high-water mark: a superb exercise in grotesque art. It all came of the obstinacy of the bold von Stossenheim, who had "theories of Gott." Stossenheim held that no man could win paradise but by self-mortification. He took Breitmann on "de angles of de moral oxyyen," and convinced him that for his soul's sake he should attend service. The church being decided upon, one of the soldiers—for it was in war time—offered the information that twenty barrels of whiskey were hidden under the floor of it:

"Der Stossenheim, he grossed himself,
Und knelt beside de fence,
Und gried: 'O Coptain Breitmann, see
Die finger Providence!
Der Breitmann droed his hat afay,
Says he, 'Pe't hit or miss,
I'fe heard of miragles pefore,
Boot none so hunk ash dis.'"

On the road to church the company attacked and slaughtered—massacred rather—a Rebel band; then they passed on and found the church. While some hunted for the whiskey ("Pe referent, men; remember," said Breitmann to the searchers, "dis ish a Gotteshaus") another played the organ; and tears rolled down the Breitmann's face as he thought of his childhood:

"Und louder und mit louder tone
High oop de orgel blowed,
Und plentifully efer yet
Around de whiskey good.
Dey singed ash if mit singen, dey
Might indo Himmel win:
I dink in all dis land soosh shprees
Ash yet hafe nefer peen."

Suddenly came news of an advancing host of rebels. There was a fierce fight, and Breitmann's party won, but not until Stossenheim was killed. He died sighing:

"Wohl auf, my soul o'er de mountains!
Wohl auf—well ofer de sea!
Dere's a frau dat sits in de Odenwald
Und shpins, und dinks of me.
Dere's a shild ash blays in de greenin grass,
Und sings a liddle hymn,
Und learns to shpeak a fader's name
Dat she nefer will shpeak to him."

The ballad, which is not long, yet more diversified than any piece of its length that we know, is a splendid literary achievement. It is also proof of Breitmann's greatness, thoroughness, and completeness.

Some day Mr. Leland must tell of Breitmann's death. Already he has given some faint forecast of it in an account of Hans in sickness. Falstaff, nearing his end, babbled of green fields. Breitmann, flung from his "philosopede" (for Haus was among the early cyclists), and picked up stunned, murmured in his unconsciousness this song :

"Ash sommer pring de roses,
Und roses pring de dew,
So Deutschland gifes de maidens
Who fetch de bier for you.
Komm Maidelein ! rothe Waengelein !
Mit wein-glass in your paw !
Ve'll get troonk among de roses,
Und pe soper on de shtraw !

Ash winter pring de ice-wind,
Vitch plow o'er Burg und hill,
Hard times pring in de landlord,
Und de landlord pring de pill.
Boot sing Maidelein ! rothe Waengelein !
Mit wein-glass in your paw !
Ve'll get troonk among de roses,
Und pe soper on de shtraw !"

The Breitmann's death should be magnificent.

THE JEW, THE GYPSY, AND THE DREAMER.

WHETHER because war is in the air just now, or because the spirit of Dean Swift has been renewed through the latest volume of the National Dictionary of Biography, a miniature Battle of the Books broke out this week upon my library-table. It was an obstinate duel, and the newcomers were, of course, the offenders. At first sight, the combatants seemed unequally matched. Sir Richard Burton's volume boasted more inches than Mr. Zangwill's; and, though the latter excelled in girth, yet he compressed it into so tight a binding that the eye was deceived. But the test by weight set things right. The Gypsy* had widened his margins and fattened his type, the Dreamer† had reduced his paper and constricted his pages till the scales stood practically level. In this way, the lover of fair play—a prominent virtue of the librarian—could only stand aside and watch. It was as well that they should settle their differences before they were committed to the shelf.

Their bone of contention was the Jew. The late Sir Richard Burton, as an ACADEMY reviewer recently set forth, employed the leisure of his Consular duties in Damascus to wander as a native among the natives. He compiled by this means a variety of rapid observations on the customs and habits of the Oriental Jew. He threw in a handful of data from the darker pages of Western history, added some straws of dialectic which book-ridden Rabbis had split, tempered the mixture with the poisoned fruit called gall-nut, and—after postponing the publication on three several occasions—left his executors to pour out as pretty a witch's caldron as ever stank

* "There is no doubt that he [Sir Richard Burton] was affiliated to this strange people [the Gypsies] by nature, if not by descent."—The Jew, the Gypsy, and El Islam, by the late Captain Sir R. F. Burton (Preface, p. xii).

† "For this book is the story of a dream that has not come true."—Dreamers of the Ghetto, by I. Zangwill (Preface, p. vii).

with the "liver of blaspheming Jew." Mr. Zangwill went a little differently to work. He, too, had been to the East, but the Gypsy's perilous gift of rapid induction was represented in the Dreamer's case by an hereditary instinct for the truth. Sir Richard Burton knew what he was looking for; Mr. Zangwill looked for what he knew. The Dreamer also went to Western history, but he cast on its darker places the searchlight of his father's torch. "Time and space," he writes, with punctilious metaphysic, "are only the conditions through which spiritual facts straggle. Hence I have here and there permitted myself liberties with these categories." Sir Richard Burton, it might be urged in parenthesis, allowed himself bolder liberties without a like apology. For time and space may well complain of somewhat cavalierly treatment, when the record of two continents and fourteen centuries is comprised in an eight-page table of indictments (pp. 121 &c.). Spirit is imponderable, no doubt, but the spiritual facts must be sadly pinched between such narrow lines. The Dreamer, in conclusion, added a style which moves in places like valse-music, and has produced as notable a picture of the greater men of his race as his fellow Israelites could desire.

From a literary point of view—and it is with this alone that I am concerned—the contrast of these two books is very striking. The critic, Mr. Asquith told us the other day, must above all things be catholic in his judgment. But how, we might ask, is catholicity to be maintained when the authors themselves are so partial? The Pope, it is said, would like to exalt himself into a Court of Arbitration over Europe; but I defy the most catholic bishop in the temple of art to judge between the Gypsy and the Dreamer by his critical canons only. Let him listen to the disputants, as I heard them myself on my library-table the other day. Their arguments might be printed in parallel columns, so neatly do they contradict one another. "The Jew," says Sir Richard Burton,

"who does not keep the Sabbath (Saturday) according to Rabbinical law, must suffer excision, be stoned to death, or incur the flogging of rebellion. . . . All manner of work is absolutely forbidden to the Jew. . . . He will not receive money on that day, or transact any business, however profitable; it is moreover the fashion to keep a grave face, and to speak as little as possible."

Where is the Gypsy's grave-faced, silent Sabbatarian in the following sketch by the Dreamer?

"How beautiful were those Friday evenings, how snowy the table-cloth, how sweet everything tasted, and how restful the atmosphere! Such delicious peace for father and mother after the labours of the week! . . . Part of the joy of Sabbaths and Festivals was the change of prayer-diet. Even the grace—that long prayer chanted after bodily diet—had refreshing little variations. For, just as the child put on his best clothes for Festivals, so did his prayers seem to clothe themselves in more beautiful words, and to be said out of more beautiful books, and with more beautiful tunes to them. . . . He would have sprinkled the Code with bird-songs, and made the Scroll of the Law warble."

Even in their quotations our authors contrive to disagree. "The civilised world," writes the Gypsy, "would never endure the presence of a creed which says to man, 'Hate thy neighbour, unless he be one of ye.'" But Uriel Acosta, the renegade to that self-same creed, seems to have discovered very different texts in the hour of his disillusion with Spain:

"He turned to the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah," writes Mr. Zangwill, "and, reading it critically, he seemed to see that all these passages of prediction he had taken on trust as prognostications of a Redeemer might prophesy quite other and more intelligible things. And long past midnight he read among the prophets, with flushed cheek and sparkling eye, as one drunk with new wine. . . . He thrilled to the cry of Amos . . . and to the question of Micah. . . . Ay, justice and mercy and humbleness—not paternosters and penances. He was melted to tears, he was exalted to the stars. He turned to the Pentateuch and to the Laws of Moses, to the tender ordinances for the poor, the stranger, the beast. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' 'Thou shalt be unto me a holy people.'"

It is curious, too, from the catholic critic's point of view, of course, that this Acosta, who reverted to the religion of love, "searched his bookshelves eagerly for some chronicle of those days of Torquemada. The native historians had little, but that little filled his imagination with horrid images of that second Exodus—famine, the plague, robbery, slaughter, the violation of virgins. And all on account of the pertinacious ambition of a Portuguese king to rule Spain through an alliance with a Spanish princess—an ambition as pertinaciously foiled by the irony of history." Sir Richard Burton, searching the same bookshelves, grants the "horrid images," but adds:

"We must seek for a solid cause underlying these horrible acts of vengeance; we find ample motive in the fact that the Jew's hand was ever, like Ishmael's, against every man but those belonging to the Synagogue. His fierce passions and fiendish cunning, combined with abnormal powers of intellect, with intense vitality, and with a persistency of purpose which the world has rarely seen, and abetted, moreover, by a keen thirst for blood engendered by defeat and subjection, combined to make him the deadly enemy of all mankind, whilst his unsocial and iniquitous Oral Law contributed to inflame his wild lust for pelf, and to justify the crimes suggested by spite and superstition."

It is a strong-voiced sentence, but is its argument very logical? The "horrid images" of Acosta's vision become "horrible acts of vengeance" in Sir Richard Burton's rendering. The motive beneath them is the crimes of their victims. But when we ask for the record of those crimes, we are referred to the eight-page summary of fourteen centuries of Jewish history. That slender list has to do double service. Half the crimes in its calendar are themselves acts of vengeance, with their motive set back in the Inquisition. Did that Inferno accordingly avenge its own avengers by anticipation? Would the Spanish authorities whom Acosta consulted have told him so little about the "fierce passions and fiendish cunning" of his ancestors? Or is Sir Richard Burton confusing cause with effect, and does the "solid cause" of the Gypsy's discovery melt into the fabric of a dream? The Consul of Damascus, like the Roman of old, was an honourable man, and the worst defect of which the catholic critic suspects him was shared by Acosta himself. The debate on the "unsocial and iniquitous Oral Law" is a suggestive bit of dialogue:

"Thou, a man of culture, carest for these childish things?"

'Childish things? Wherefore then have I left my Portugal?'

'All ceremonies are against Right Reason,' said Uriel in low tones, his face grown deadly white.

'Now I see that thou hast never understood our holy and beautiful religion. Men of culture, forsooth! Is not our Amsterdam congregation full of men of culture—grammarians, poets, exegetes, jurists, but flesh and blood, mark you, not diagrams cut out of Euclid? Whence the cohesion of our race? Ceremony! What preserves and unifies its scattered atoms throughout the world? Ceremony! And what is ceremony? Poetry. 'Tis the tradition handed down from hoary antiquity; 't is the colour of life.'

''Tis a miserable thralldom,' interposed Uriel more feebly.

'Miserable! A happy service. Hast never danced at the Rejoicing of the Law? Who so joyous as our brethren? Where so cheerful a creed? The trouble with thee is that thou hast no childish associations with our glorious religion; thou camest to it in manhood with naught but the cold eye of Reason.' . . . And as the old physician spoke, Uriel began dimly to suspect that he had misconceived human life, taken it too earnestly. . . . And with it a suspicion that he had mistaken Judaism too—missed the poetry and humanity behind the forms."

Did Sir Richard Burton miss them too?

"Those who know the codes of the Talmud," he tells us, "and of the Safed School, which are still, despite certain petty struggles, the life-light of Judaism, will have no trouble in replying. A people whose highest ideas of religious existence are the superstitious sanctification of Sabbath, the washing of hands, the blowing of rams' horns, the saving rite of circumcision, and the thousand external functions compensating for moral delinquencies, with Abraham sitting at the gate of Hell to keep it closed for Jews," and so on through twenty lines of black epithets to the conclusion, "such conditions, it is evident, are not calculated to create or to preserve national life."

But is it all so evident, after all? A revelation was required, we remember, to show Peter Bell the meaning of the yellow primrose. May not the "yellow cap, and the yellow O on the breasts" of the Ghetto Jews also require a poet and an interpreter to reveal some inner meaning which was hidden from the "evidence" of Sir Richard Burton? One man writes a poem to the view; another chooses to picnic there. The scene is the same in both cases; it is the point of view which differs, and in the ceaseless jostle of relativity, Pilate's riddle goes unanswered. The catholic critic is not asked to judge between the Gypsy and the Dreamer. From a merely literary standard, he prefers the sonnet to the sweepings, and truth, in books, is largely a matter of taste.

I. M.

SIR HENRY CUNNINGHAM'S NOVELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

It is a matter for regret that Sir Henry Cunningham's novels should appear at such rare intervals. Five books in thirty years is the record of this author, who began his literary career with the publication of Wheat and Tares, considered by some critics to have been the best novel of the year. It is remarkable, as are all its successors, for brilliant dialogue and excellent studies of character; and, indeed, it is upon these two points, rather than upon the "story," that the interest of this novel rests.

It must at once be acknowledged that Sir Henry has a strong and palpable bias in favour of his womenkind, with whose characters he has far more sympathy than with those of the men. Rachel Leslie, in Wheat and Tares, is the first of that gallery of gracious, charming portraits which ends with Sibylla, perhaps the most charming because the most human of all. Sir Henry is somewhat prone to make his heroines "too bright and good," while his heroes, who are distinctly "of the earth, earthy," and a very ordinary dust, are creatures of a different quality, and move on a lower plane. This singular gulf placed, perhaps unconsciously, by the author between the moral and intellectual natures of his men and women, inevitably leads to suffering on the part of the latter. It is this characteristic which drives one to feel that Rachel Leslie, who, with her restored faith in her lover, is left to face life without him in the flesh, is the happiest of all. She had no disillusionment to fear; she could indulge in the dearest and most satisfactory companionship to a woman—that of a dead and idealised lover! Felicia and Maud in The Chronicles of Dustypore, Camilla in The Cœrulians, and Sibylla in the novel that bears her name, one and all find the course of love, at least up to the critical moment of marriage, most untraditionally smooth, while the "ever afterwards" brings an unhappiness equally untraditional.

One of Sir Henry's most remarkable studies of character is presented to us in Camilla. The truthfulness and charm of this "Portrait of a Girl" keep us enthralled as we follow her through the various phases of her life—the child of fifteen, in Paris, who first attracts Philip Ambrose by her unfeigned admiration for himself; the girl of twenty, who, blinded by her dreams, marries him; and the woman, who, at the moment of her complete awakening, is given her timely release. And Philip, who, with his "fluent explanations," glides downhill with such ineffable grace and good-humour, wins from us, as is so often the case with that type, a pitying tolerance, quite out of proportion to his deserts, so that, with Camilla and his father, we would fain let his death blot out, in merciful fashion, all the falsity and folly of his weak nature, and remember him only in the light in which he saw himself in life. But Camilla and Philip are by no means the only interesting personalities in The Cœrulians. We are introduced to a most select coterie of Anglo-Indians, and, as in one half of The Heriots, we here make a whole circle of friends and acquaintances, whom we should gratefully welcome could we but meet them in real life. In fact, this is the only fault to be found with a delightful book; it makes us envious. Why should Cœrulia alone attract a society of which every member is clever, in his or her own particular way, and where no one ever says a dull thing? When the Rashleighs, Camilla, Lady Miranda and her husband, Mrs. Paragon, Mr. Montem, and Mr. Chichele (the inimitable Chichele!) meet, we could listen to them for hours. Mrs. Paragon inevitably challenges comparison, but she does not suffer thereby; there could only be one Mrs. Hauksbee! And the latter lady best suits her native heath of Simla, where, undoubtedly, the battle is keener than on the slopes of the Nilgherries!

But not only in Cœrulia does Sir Henry Cunningham bring us into contact with desirable acquaintances—in London, Westborough, Dustypore, we are introduced to people, different indeed, but all equally delightful. Moreover, it is comforting to find that even in Simla the sinners are not so hopelessly sinful as some pessimists would have us believe! We have, however, the inevitable exception, and the one disagreeable set in The Heriots saves us from a monotonous course of virtue. Isabella Heriot and her friends are drawn in such a masterly fashion as to vindicate successfully and finally Sir Henry's insight into the characters of "all sorts and conditions," and, also, his power of portraying the same. After reading The Heriots, we can have no doubt that the author has deliberately chosen, for the most part, to make his characters charming or simple, good-hearted or refined, but without faulty, natural, and perfectly human. It is impossible not to feel that the optimist has secured a triumph in these volumes. He has succeeded in creating a succession of characters, of ordinary and extraordinary goodness, yet delightful and interesting. Isabella Heriot is essentially a vulgar-minded woman, of a type not unknown in these days, who worships the idol of social success, and is absolutely unscrupulous in her efforts to gain and keep the paltry position she covets. This novel has a good old-fashioned ending, where vice is punished and virtue rewarded in that eminently complete and satisfactory way of which life affords us so few examples. Mrs. Heriot's wickedness receives its deserts: ill-gotten wealth brings no satisfaction, and her child, Antinous, the one being whom she loves better than herself, dies of diphtheria; while the youthful lovers, Olivia and Jack, marry, and we are even allowed to believe that they lived happily ever afterwards.

Literary coincidences occur every day. Poor Mac, by Iota, cannot fail to recall Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's charming story, Through One Administration, and many readers of Sir George Tressady must have been struck by the close resemblance of its chief situation to that in Sibylla. Mrs. Montcalm—Sibylla—a woman of high political ideals, an enthusiastic partisan, and a young devoted wife, who has not yet learnt to understand her husband, becomes acquainted with Amersham, a "political flirt," and is thrown much into his society at a critical moment of his career. He is supposed to be wavering: his faith is not quite sound, his adherence to his own and Montcalm's party not absolutely secure. The Opposition, aware of their opportunity, are eager to seize it and to win over so dangerous an enemy, so valuable a friend. Mrs. Montcalm, equally on the alert, discovers that it is in her power to influence him strongly. She decides to use this influence "for the good of the cause," and a friendship quickly springs up between them. The situation develops in orthodox fashion. Amersham's devotion to political duty has never been keen, and it absolutely fails under the absorption of his feeling for Sibylla. At last, of course, to the genuine surprise and sorrow of Sibylla, the young politician confesses his love for her. In the later novel, to which we have already referred, the inconvenient lover already possesses a convenient wife, to whom he can gracefully return, but more scope is afforded to Sibylla's diplomacy. She presents Amersham to her dearest friend, Lady Cynthia. This lady, to her credit be it said, at first refuses this reversionary gift, but her pride is not so strong as her long-cherished love for Amersham, and, somewhat to our regret, she accepts.

Sibylla is full of good things, and, from a literary point of view, we might be tempted to choose this volume as showing in a marked degree Sir Henry's excellences of a finished style and natural, witty, and exceedingly clever dialogue, were it not for a grateful remembrance of The Heriots and The Cerulians. It is a remarkable characteristic of the novels under consideration that, with the exception of The Chronicles of Dustypore, they might have all been written this year.

Sibylla, in the following conversation, probably expresses something of Sir Henry Cunningham's view of life, and the extract also gives a fair specimen of his powers in writing dialogue, although he is, perhaps, at his best when the speakers are more numerous.

"The first step towards salvation," said Sibylla, "is to hope for the best—to wish to hope; not to preach the dismal lesson of despair."

"Yes, I know," said her companion; "dismal and degrading, is it not? I feel ashamed when I am with you and catch your delightful hopefulness. But the world, after all, is not a brilliant success. Despite all its clever discoveries, humanity has had a bad time of it, and may be going to have a worse. Some agreeable Frenchman or other described man as the cleverest and worst-behaved of the animals."

"Treason!" cried Sibylla. "Think of him as Hamlet did—as the paragon of the universe, noble in reason, in action an angel, in apprehension like a God."

"That is not the sort of man whom one meets at the House," said Amersham; "our apprehension is not Godlike, nor our behaviour like any angels except the fallen ones. As for reason, it is such a poor affair, that all sensible people have long ago abandoned argument as a method. One sees men struggling against their fate, constantly led astray, falling this way or that. They cannot help it. They are so constructed that they can no more argue straight than a ball with a bias can run straight on the lawn. One has a bias oneself, and cannot roll straight any more than the rest, if one only knew it. Happily one does not."

"Yes," said Sibylla; "I know mine, and allow for it. I am on the side of the angels."

"Then," cried Amersham, "I will be on the side of the angels too—on their side and yours."

"Poor angels!" said the other. "What will they think of the alliance? But you must discard your pessimism—that is an essentially unangelic mood. The use of great men is to make the world better, and the greatest have been those who have loved their species the best."

THE PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON TITLE-PAGES.

IN 1897 the Council of the Publishers' Association appointed a committee to consider the subject of the inconvenience caused by the existing want of precision and uniformity of practice in the wording and arrangement of the bibliographical details given on title-pages of books. The following report was drawn up by the committee, and adopted at the annual general meeting last March:

(1) Date.—(a) That the title-page of every book should bear the date of the year of publication—i.e., of the year in which the impression, or the reissue, of which it forms a part, was first put on the market. (b) That when stock is re-issued in a new form, the title-page should bear the date of the new issue, and each copy should be described as a 'reissue,' either on the title-page or in a bibliographical note. (c) That the date at which a book was last revised should be indicated either on the title-page or in a bibliographical note.

(2) Bibliographical Note.—That the bibliographical note should, when possible, be printed on the back of the title-page, in order that it may not be separated therefrom in binding.

(3) Impression, Edition, Reissue.—That for bibliographical purposes definite meanings should be attached to these words when used on a title-page, and the following are recommended: Impression.—A number of copies printed at any one time. When a book is reprinted without change it should be called a new impression, to distinguish it from an edition as defined below. Edition.—An impression in which the matter has undergone some change, or for which the type has been reset. Reissue.—A republication at a different price, or in a different form, of part of an impression which has already been placed on the market.

(4) Localisation.—When the circulation of an impression of a book is limited by agreement to a particular area, that each copy of that impression should bear a conspicuous notice to that effect.

Addendum.—In cases where a book has been reprinted many times, and revised a less number of times, it is suggested that the intimation to that effect should be as follows—e.g., Fifteenth Impression (Third Edition). This would indicate that the book had been printed fifteen times, and that in the course of those fifteen impressions it had been revised or altered twice."

DRAMA.

"THE BEAUTY STONE" AT THE SAVOY.

THE Mephisto theme has always exercised a fascination for the dramatist, who, however, has rarely treated it with success. Goethe's "Faust" itself is admittedly not a good play, although Sir Henry Irving's diablerie, in an adaptation of it, proved effective enough at the Lyceum. Of modern failures, "The Tempter," by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, is one of the most notable, and with this must now be bracketed "The Beauty Stone." That Mr. Pinero in association with Sir Arthur Sullivan should have failed to make Mephisto interesting is certainly a very remarkable fact; but so it is. Despite the talent expended upon it, both dramatic and musical, the piece falls absolutely flat. I can hardly recall an instance of boredom and fatigue laying hold of a Savoy audience to the same degree as in "The Beauty Stone," the very name of which induces a yawn. The root idea of all these Mephisto pieces is the same—Satan in some grotesque disguise as monk or teacher takes in hand the affairs of a small group of human beings with mischievous intent, but in the end proves a bungler, so that no harm is done. This was the idea of the old mystery plays, in which the devil was constantly flouted and made to look ridiculous. Probably the lack of faith in this kind of devil has something to do with the difficulty experienced by the modern dramatist in treating the subject impressively.

In "The Beauty Stone," where we are taken back to a quaint old Flemish town of the Middle Ages, we see a poor deformed girl praying that the Virgin shall grant her good looks and shapely limbs. It is the devil habited as a monk who comes in response to her appeal, which is surely to begin with a needless touch of satire, and is inconsistent with the spirit of the legend. He brings with him the Beauty Stone, a talisman that insures youth and beauty to its possessor. The transformation of the poor weaver girl into a young lady of dazzling beauty is the dramatic idea that has appealed to the authors, and so far it has an inspiring effect upon the house. Sir Arthur Sullivan himself is obviously lifted up by it. But what is to be done with the heroine once she is transformed? That is the question to which neither authors nor composer have given a satisfactory answer. The town is governed by a sensual-minded prince, for whose delectation a beauty show is held by the burgomaster, and it is the transformed heroine who carries off the prize. Such puerilities are unworthy of Mr. Pinero's pen. There is no breath of drama in this story, which falls as flat as an Aladdin's Lamp episode in a Christmas pantomime.

FROM this point matters steadily proceed from bad to worse. The prince passes his time in amorous dalliance while his friends call upon him to join the forces of a neighbouring potentate who has gone to war. To these appeals, however, he remains deaf, until the heroine, alarmed at the evil results of the Beauty Stone, runs back to her squalid home and flings the accursed thing from her, resuming ipso facto her rags and her deformity. Then the prince, aroused to a sense of duty, betakes himself to the wars. Meanwhile, the Beauty Stone passes from hand to hand. The heroine's father has a brief experience of it, and afterwards the prince's favourite, who hopes thereby to regain her lost influence over her lord. Unfortunately the prince loses his eyesight on the battle-field, and when he returns victorious it is to take to his arms not the radiantly beautiful favourite, but the poor little weaver girl whose beauty lives in his memory.

How essentially undramatic is this scheme a glance suffices to show, and one suspects that the authors and composer found their task, as regards at least two-thirds of it, very uphill work. This is shown more particularly in the character of the devil, who, instead of dominating the action as he ought to do, dwindles away to nothing, figuring merely as a slightly cynical courtier.

CONSIDERING what hands have been employed in the fashioning of this piece, its dulness, its emptiness, its lifelessness are indeed amazing. An evil fate has overhung it in more ways than one, for one or two of the leading singers are newcomers at the Savoy, and are very far from maintaining the musical traditions of the theatre; while that droll comedian, Mr. Walter Passmore, who is cast for the part of the devil, has very little opportunity for working the comic vein. Flatness is, in short, the general characteristic of the performance. Sir Arthur Sullivan's score is the most serious to which he has set his hand since "Ivanhoe," and though, needless to say, it contains many fine passages, the Savoy habitué who expects to carry away from the piece something that he can whistle, will be disappointed. What I can unreservedly praise is the mounting and dresses, which are beautiful in the extreme. The frame, alas! almost kills the picture. The indiscretions of the inspired paragraphist had given us to understand that a wholly new kind of piece was being prepared by Messrs. Pinero and Carr. Unfortunately, "The Beauty Stone" proves to belong to a well recognised type, namely, the genre ennuyeux.

J. F. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COUNTRY OF KIDNAPPED.

SIR,—I have read with great interest the letters which my few hasty notes on the Kidnapped country have produced. The identity of the Appin murderer will, I suppose, ever remain a mystery, unless Mr. D. L. Cameron may at some future time feel himself at liberty to disclose the name of the "other man." Mr. Lang, on a Badenoch man's evidence, believes the culprit to have been a Cameron, but Mr. Cameron, who seems "far ben" in Appin tradition, declares that "an Appin man fired the shot, and that his descendants are said to this day to feel the weight of the curse." I confess it delights me to hear that in these days of enlightenment, falsely so-called, there are still good, honest, primeval curses at work in the North.

A pamphlet has lately come into my hands which seems of interest to all lovers of David Balfour and his friends. It belonged to R. L. S., having been presented to him by the author, Mr. J. R. N. Macphail, who was an old friend and a keen antiquarian. It was originally read as a paper before the Gaelic Society of Inverness, and consists of a running commentary on the printed record of James Stewart's trial. We learn among other things that the real coveter of Glenduror was not Glenure, but Campbell of Balliveolan, and that Red Colin only acted in the matter to oblige his kinsman. More, it seems probable that James of the Glens had really the law on his side in the quarrel, and would have been righted by legal means but for the unfortunate mischance of the murder. In his account of the trial itself Mr. Macphail goes over each name which appears in Catriona, and shows how accurately Stevenson has made use of facts. Of the fifteen jurymen eleven were Campbells, though "two gentlemen of the name, to their credit, refused to serve, on the ground that their minds were biased against the prisoner." It is difficult to decide how the conduct of Argyle and his friends is to be defended. Undoubtedly clan feeling had much to do with it, for the murdered man was kin both to the Campbells and the Mackays. Mr. Macphail inclines to the view which Mr. Omond was the first to suggest, that the conviction of James Stewart was a political necessity. "The Government were terrified lest the murder of Glenure should be seized upon by the Duke of Cumberland, and the rancorous gang under his control, to force them to abandon their policy of conciliation; somebody must hang, and they did not much care whether he were innocent or guilty." There is another defence which from the Campbell point of view is irrefragable. A clansman who had the hanging cast in his teeth, retorted with pride that any fool could get a guilty man hanged, but only Mac-Chaillein-Mor a man who was innocent.

The pamphlet concludes with an account of the actual execution of Sheumas-naglinnais at Ballachulish. It was a wild day of wind, so that the soldiers from Fort

William were delayed in crossing the ferry. The storm was so great that a man could scarcely stand on the hill, and the long dying-speeches of the prisoner were broken by the gusts. One may take leave to regret that the hand which gave us the parting on Gillane Sands and the Flight in the Heather did not also draw the last pitiful scene on the windy hillside.—I am, &c.,

JOHN BUCHAN.

Brasenose College, Oxford: May 24.

MR. GLADSTONE AS CRITIC.

SIR,—The enclosed copy of a letter I received from Mr. Gladstone just twenty years ago may be interesting to some of your readers. It was in reply to some observations upon an article of his in Macmillan's Magazine for October, 1877, on "The Island Group of the Odyssey." I cannot recollect the exact purport of my letter to him, but it dealt mainly with the question of the position of Ithaca relatively to the neighbouring islands, the identification of the site of Dulichium, and Homer's use of the word νήσος as applied to the latter. At all events, Mr. Gladstone's note on the restricted application of νήσος in Homer is interesting and valuable, the fact which he alleges having escaped my notice.—Yours faithfully,

C. S. JERRAM.

Oxford: May 27.

"DEAR SIR,—I am much obliged by your communication. The main point required for the clearing of the text is the site of Dulichion; and I am content, this being secured, with any interpretation which can be well and sufficiently supported.

My belief that Homer knew Ithaca is one which I early adopted, in lieu of an opposite impression, upon a close and long examination of the text. But this would not imply his knowing the whole of Ithaca. It might mean little more than his having visited the capital, as to the site of which there is, I think, no reasonable doubt, and the great harbour which, with its sub- or inner harbour, is very remarkable.

The only scruple I feel about your construction of the word νήσος is as to making it good by any positive evidence from Homer. He never, I think, applies the word, except to an island of moderate size. Crete with him is a γαία, and he never calls Scherie an island.

Wishing you all prosperity and satisfaction in Homeric study,—I remain, yours very faithfully,

(Signed) W. E. GLADSTONE."

"VERSIONS FROM HAFIZ."

SIR,—I read your review of this book with an interest nowise lessened by the fact that I had the book itself by me. I notice you quote the passage from the introduction in which Dr. Leaf draws attention to his table of rhythms. Permit me to say, for the information of such of your readers as may not be acquainted with Oriental prosody, that this same table is most inaccurate. Several of the paradigms are not divided into feet at all, giving the novice an erroneous impression that Persian admits of monstrous feet occupying whole lines and having a length of fourteen or fifteen syllables. But worse remains; at least three of the metres that are divided (those numbered 3, 8, and 24) are divided in the wrong places. These blemishes are all the more noteworthy because the book is otherwise admirable.—Yours faithfully,

JAMES PLATT, JUNIOR.

St. Martin's-lane, W.C.: May 28, 1898.

BURNS AND AMERICA.

SIR,—I notice some remarks in your issue of May 14, anent the National Burns Memorial at Mauchline. I am sorry to say that there is a great deal of truth in some of the statements contained therein.

Of course Rome was not built in a day, and I believe that our Memorial has been as successful for the time it has been before the public—fully three years—as any other memorial to Burns has been; still, the following quotation from my toast of the "Subscribers," at the dinner on the opening day, May 7, which refers to my own exertions in behalf of the scheme, may be interesting to some of your readers: "Directly or indirectly Glasgow has subscribed £1,200; Paisley, £150; London, £50; fifty-five Burns clubs, £320; Ayrshire, £700; Scottish nobility (from the Duke of Hamilton downwards), £90; Knights and Baronets, £330. All the great families engaged in the thread, iron, and chemical industries, together with ironbrokers and stockbrokers, are well represented. The medical faculty have supported and praised the scheme, as also have many lawyers—from the Solicitor-General for Scotland downwards.

Although we have £80 from abroad, we have only one native American with a donation of £1. Although led to believe America would do great things, and pounds have been spent in postage and literature there, the result is as mentioned.

Other memorials are being proposed for certain celebrated individuals who have lived in Scotland, and it may, perhaps, be useful to the promoters, and to others who may think of erecting some other memorial to Burns elsewhere, to know a little of the wiles that have been made by us to extract money from people towards our scheme. Not to speak of over 5,000 calls that one person has made during a period of fully three years, he has written some 5,200 letters, sent out 10,000 circular letters containing 40,000 circulars; the postage alone being over £40. When you add to this the labours of one or two others it will give you a sort of idea of how subscribers have been got for the scheme.

Now, if there is some truth in the dilatoriness of Burnsites at home in subscribing to this scheme, what shall we say about those who have the grand privilege of being natives of the "land of the free"? America talks louder and bigger of Burns than we Scots do ourselves, and Americans by the score—nay, by the hundred—make pilgrimages to the place of his birth, of his death, and Mauchline also.

If Burns is the apostle of any known class or race it is the Americans, and when their millionaires, their editors, their people, through the medium of every paper of any standing in all the States, have been asked to contribute to a charitable and benevolent scheme to commemorate the centenary year of the death of the brightest poetical genius Scotland ever knew (and perhaps further than Scotland, and whose writings have a universality about them that the writings of no other lyric poet have), and at the place where it shone in its noonday splendour—Mauchline—they have contributed £1. If you can do anything to awaken the Americans to a sense of their duty towards our scheme, which still requires £900, we shall be very pleased.—Faithfully yours,

THOMAS KILLIN,

Hon. Treasurer.

168, West George-street,
Glasgow.

A PUBLISHER'S COMPLAINT.

SIR,—The privilege still enjoyed, and somewhat abused, by the four University libraries, is a thorn in the publisher's side, and a fruitful source of contention.

I have lately been approached by the London Agency for these libraries to supply, free of all charge, copies of each of my published books.

It would appear that the Act of 1842 entitles them to such publications (affected by the Act) as they may claim within one year from the date of publication. If the claim is not made, a publisher is not bound to forward any of his publications to the four libraries. If the claim is not made in writing till after the year has elapsed, he is, ipso facto, released from any compulsion to send such works.

The British Museum alone is entitled to works without demand.

The foregoing facts may not be generally known, so I venture to send them to you. A gentleman of Oxford University, whose integrity is not to be disputed, informs me that not long since a London publisher was refused leave to see in the Bodleian a work of his own, delivered by himself to the library. He had to return to London to visit the British Museum.

The Bodleian continues to claim newspapers, trade journals, tailors' fashion-plates, music-hall songs, &c., when their space will not hold them, and though supplied by the public for the use of the public, the public has not free right of entry. My Oxford friend still further informs me that only last summer the head of a college told him that several editions of a popular work were lying uncatalogued in the cellars!

I think a University ought to keep its own productions, those of the city and county, or such as are related to University education, especially when this private corporation does not allow the public to enter.—I am, &c.,

6, Chandos-street.

JOHN LONG.

POETRY AS SHE IS WRIT.

SIR,—As a mere ordinary mortal of average education and intelligence, is it permissible to ask why in these latter days so much, so very much, of our poetry should be so tortuous and involved in its mode of expression? Whether, in fact, it must follow almost as a matter of necessity that nine-tenths of our latter-day poets should clothe their ideas in language so obscure as to be often barely intelligible to the uninitiated? We feel as we read that they have indeed "come to the birth," but oh, what torture in the bringing forth! Their very pangs are as it were borne in upon us as we read (though happily only in a reflected sense), and at the conclusion of the whole matter we are tempted to exclaim, And is this indeed poetry! this an improvement (for so the critics would have us believe) upon the crowned masters of old, with whose works we have been familiar from our youth upwards, and who having a message to deliver to mankind told it in language at once clear and forcible, with no laboured involutions of either thought or phrase to bewilder us.

I am prompted to write thus having just read an "Ode on Napoléon" recently contributed by Mr. Meredith to Cosmopolis. At the close, by way of relaxation, I took up a volume of Keats, my eyes lighting by the merest accident upon his delightful "Ode on a Grecian Urn," and I then asked myself, utterly dissimilar though the subjects be, which was, in very deed and truth, the right mode of poetical expression, and which calculated to convey the deepest, most lasting, and withal pleasurable impression upon mankind at large?—Yours, &c.,

Liverpool: May 21.

J. L. P.

VANDALISM AT HAMPSTEAD.

SIR,—In reference to my previous remarks under this head, admirers of the unique instances of eighteenth century architecture, which form Church Row, will be glad to learn that the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty is still energetic on the side of protection. The influence of this excellent Society should be great. It will be a pity, indeed, if united efforts fail to preserve the remainder of our row in its picturesque and incomparable entirety.

CECIL CLARKE.

Hampstead: May 24.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant. By Bernard Shaw. The reviewers have written long and carefully about Mr. Shaw's plays, and from the mass of their critical matter we select the following judgments.

Mr. William Archer wrote in the Daily Chronicle:

"Two out of the seven plays are works of genius for which even Mr. Shaw's modesty could not possibly find an adequate epithet; while one of the remaining five is an outrage upon art and decency, for which even my indignation cannot find a printable term of contumely. To express my sense of the beauty of 'Candida' and the baseness of 'The Philanderer' I should have to borrow Mr. Swinburne's vocabulary of praise and scorn—which is (perhaps fortunately) as inalienable as his gift of song. An hour ago I was reading 'Candida' for the third time with bursts of uncontrollable laughter not unmingled with tears. The thing is as true a poem as ever was written in prose, and my whole soul went out in admiration and gratitude to the man who had created it. Then I re-read an act of 'The Philanderer,' and I wanted to cut him in the street. Both feelings, no doubt, were exaggerated, hysterical. Perhaps the second, no less than the first, was a compliment to Mr. Shaw—at any rate I am sure he will take it as such. I record these emotions not as a criticism, but simply to show the dynamic quality of the book. Good or bad, it is certainly not indifferent. Its appearance is an event, literary and theatrical, of the first magnitude."

Mr. W. P. James writes in the St. James's Gazette:

"His readers may not all care a great deal for the plays, but they are bound to enjoy the prefaces. The prefaces, indeed—besides being masterpieces of 'Shawiness,' which is a kind of antithesis of shyness—are full of matter. They contain an historical and highly personal excursus, in his very best manner, on the censorship and the censor; and another on the relation of the acted to the written play, and the variations introduced into drama by the personality of the actors, which is full of acute criticism, and gives a brilliant and characteristic exposition of his own career and of the place held in his own and the world's intellectual evolution by the publication of these plays. Mr. Shaw confesses that he is fond of the play, and fancies that intelligent readers of these prefaces of his will observe for themselves that he is himself a bit of an actor."

The Daily News critic accounts for the fact that the plays are not stage favourites.

"The plain truth is, that although these plays exhibit considerable dramatic power, they are not on the whole good plays, and this judgment is just as applicable to the 'pleasant' as to the 'unpleasant' series."

The critic of the Outlook draws attention to Mr. Shaw's omnipresence in the plays:

"In the Pleasant Plays and the Unpleasant—'Arms and the Man' or 'Mrs. Warren's Profession'—it matters not which, there still is Mr. Shaw a-preaching, now in Servian uniform as Bluntschli, now in petticoats as Vivie Warren, and actually in the worst play in either volume, and the most vulgar play ever written by a man of genius, as G. B. S., 'unconventionally but smartly dressed in a velvet jacket and cashmere trousers, his collar dyed wotan blue, blue socks and leather sandals—the arrangement of his tawny hair and of his moustaches and short beard apparently left to Nature,' though 'he has taken good care that Nature shall do him the fullest justice,' &c."

The Pall Mall Gazette's critic seeks to convict Mr. Shaw of lack of feeling:

"'Candida' marks for the present the high-water mark of Mr. Shaw's achievement. It is extremely well written and constructed, and though it cannot be called life in the broad and general sense, it is artfully made to appear a possible phase. It exhibits to perfection the excellences and deficiencies of Mr. Shaw's talent, the extreme narrowness of his outlook, his want of simple human feeling, his power of creating and handling uncommon characters, his mastery of theatrical effect, the atmosphere of reality with which for the moment he contrives to invest what is, after all, unreal."

"'The Philanderer' is professedly the study of a male flirt. . . . The defect of the play seems most clearly to exhibit Mr. Shaw's own main defect—the utter want of any real experience of life, taken, at any rate, on the side of feeling and emotion. Probably Mr. Shaw can put his finger on the prototype of each of the characters he draws, in defence of any objection to their reality; but so precisely can the artist who paints a bad portrait. The answer is that he has not understood, has not sympathised, or, where necessary, suffered with his model. The result of all this cleverness of mere observation from the outside is the result, no doubt, of life on Mr. Shaw, that however much it may move him, it does not move him at all on the side for which the theatre mainly exists, that of the human emotion. It is our systems that politically seem to touch Mr. Shaw, that arouse in him such feeling as he is capable of, but not in any sense the men and women who are the cause of their existence. To deny the existence of much feeling in others is, as a defence, futile; at the best it only comes to this—that the author is himself deficient in it. If, as a citizen, Mr. Shaw has his own outlook, as a man he seems to have none that is definite."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, June 2.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE MAKING OF RELIGION. By Andrew Lang. Longmans & Co. 12s.

THE GOSPEL OF JESUS ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW, AS INTERPRETED TO R. L. HARRISON BY THE LIGHT OF THE GODLY EXPERIENCE OF SRI PARANANDA. Kegan Paul.

A MANUAL OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY, BASED ON SCHEEBEN'S "DOGMATIK." By Joseph Wilhelm, D.D., Ph.D., and Thomas B. Scannell, B.D. Vol. II.: THE FALL, REDEMPTION, GRACE, THE CHURCH AND THE SACRAMENTS, THE LAST THINGS. Kegan Paul.

THE SOUL OF A PEOPLE. By H. Fielding. R. Bentley & Son.

LIVES OF THE SAINTS. Vols. XIII. and XIV. Edited by S. Baring Gould. J. C. Nimmo.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

THE HISTORY OF THE ART OF WAR: THE MIDDLE AGES FROM THE FOURTH TO THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY. By Charles Oman, M.A. Methuen & Co. 21s.

A CONCISE DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES, BASED ON SIR WILLIAM SMITH'S LARGER DICTIONARY, AND INCORPORATING THE RESULTS OF MODERN RESEARCH. Edited by F. Warre Cornish, M.A. John Murray.

THE FRANCISCANS IN ENGLAND, 1600—1850; BEING AN AUTHENTIC ACCOUNT OF THE SECOND ENGLISH PROVINCE OF FRIARS MINOR. By the Rev. Father Thaddeus, O.F.M. Art & Book Co.

TWO NATIVE NARRATIVES OF THE MUTINY IN DELHI. Translated from the Originals by the late Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, C.S.I. Constable & Co. 12s.

MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE: A BIOGRAPHICAL STUDY. By M. E. Lowndes. Cambridge University Press. 6s.

DIARY NOTES OF A VISIT TO WALT WHITMAN AND SOME OF HIS FRIENDS IN 1890. By John Johnston, M.D. The Labour Press, Ltd. (Manchester).

JOURNAL OF EMILY SHORE. New edition. Kegan Paul & Co.

MEMOIRS OF A YOUNG SURGEON. By Frederick Ashurst, M.B. Digby, Long & Co. 1s. 6d.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

YGDORASSIL, AND OTHER POEMS. By John Campbell. John Macqueen.

TO MY MOTHER. By W. S. Leau. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d.

REX REGUM: A PAINTER'S STUDY OF THE LIKENESS OF CHRIST FROM THE TIME OF THE APOSTLES TO THE PRESENT DAY. By Sir Wyke Bayliss, F.S.A. George Bell & Sons.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY WILLIAM MORRIS AT THE DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES TO STUDENTS OF THE BIRMINGHAM SCHOOL OF ART. Longmans & Co.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

THROUGH UNKNOWN THIBET. By Captain M. S. Wellby. T. Fisher Unwin. £1 1s.

TO KLONDYKE AND BACK: A JOURNEY DOWN THE YUKON FROM ITS SOURCE TO ITS MOUTH. By J. H. E. Secretan, C.E. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

CYCLE AND CAMP. By T. H. Holding. Ward, Lock & Co.

EDUCATIONAL.

RES GRÆCÆ: BEING BRIEF AIDS TO THE HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, LITERATURE, AND ANTIQUITIES OF ANCIENT GREECE, WITH MAPS AND PLANS. By Edward P. Celeridge, B.A. George Bell & Sons. 5s.

ELEMENTARY ARCHITECTURE FOR SCHOOLS, ART STUDENTS, AND GENERAL READERS. By Martin A. Buckmaster. Clarendon Press (Oxford). 4s. 6d.

GRAY'S ENGLISH POEMS. Edited by D. C. Tovey, M.A. Cambridge University Press.

BLACKWOOD'S LEAVING CERTIFICATE HANDBOOKS: HIGHER LATIN PROSE, AND HIGHER GREEK UNSEENS. By H. W. Auden, M.A. Blackwood & Sons. 2s. 6d.

INTRODUCTION TO ALGEBRA. By G. Chrystal, M.A. A. & C. Black. 5s.

LETTERS OF CICERO TO ATTICUS. Edited by Alfred Pretor, M.A. Cambridge University Press.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE EASTERN QUESTION IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY: THE PARTITION OF POLAND AND THE TREATY OF KAINARDJI. By Albert Sorel. Methuen & Co. 3s. 6d.

A SYSTEM OF MEDICINE. By Many Writers Edited by Thomas Clifford Allbut. Macmillan & Co. Vol. V. 25s.

CORNELL STUDIES IN CLASSICAL PHILOLOGY. Edited by Benjamin Ide Wheeler and Others. No. VII.: THE ATHENIAN SECRETARIES. By William Scott Ferguson, A.M. Published for the University by the Macmillan Co.

WEATHER LORE: A COLLECTION OF PROVERBS, SAYINGS, AND RULES CONCERNING THE WEATHER. Compiled and Arranged by Richard Inwards, F.R.A.S. Third edition, revised and enlarged. Elliot Stock.

OUTLINES OF SOCIOLOGY. By Lester F. Ward. Macmillan & Co.

UNFORESEEN TENDENCIES OF DEMOCRACY. By Edwin Lawrence Godkin. Archibald Constable & Co. 6s.

THE FINDING OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S CHAIR. By the late James Johnston. Cornish Bros. Birmingham. 3s.

ANGLING DAYS. By Jonathan Dale. New edition. Elliot Stock.

COLLOQUY AND SONG. By B. J. M. Donne. Kegan Paul. 5s.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW BOOKS

NEW WORK BY MR. W. A. PICKERING, C.M.G.

Ready Next Week, in 1 vol., demy 8vo, extra cloth, with 25 Illustrations from Photographs and Sketches by the Author, price 16s.

PIONEERING in FORMOSA: Recollections of Adventures among Mandarins, Wreckers, and Head Hunting Savages. By W. A. PICKERING, C.M.G., late Protector of Chinese in the Straits Settlements. With an Appendix on British Policy and Interests in China and the Far East.

NEW WORK BY J. H. E. SECRETAN.

Now Ready, in 1 vol., large crown 8vo, with 24 Illustrations, price 6s.

TO KLONDYKE and BACK: a Journey down the Yukon from its Source to its Mouth. By J. H. E. SECRETAN, C.E., of Ottawa. With Hints to intending Prospectors.

"Mr. Secretan has produced the most entertaining of the book devoted to a description of the Yukon district."—Globe.

"Mr. Secretan's photographic illustrations help one to realise the nature of the inhospitable region he so amusingly describes."—Daily Mail.

NEW WORK BY DR. PARKER.

Now Ready, at all Booksellers' and Libraries, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

CHRISTIAN PROFILES: in a Pagan Mirror. By Joseph PARKER, D.D., Minister of the City Temple, London.

An enlightened Pagan lady comes to England to acquaint herself with the beliefs, the habits, and the customs of Christians. She has long been asking herself such questions as, Who are the Christians? What do they believe? What life do they lead? How do they conduct themselves towards each other? Having made inquiry and received impressions, she reports to a friend in India.

A THIRD EDITION IS NOW READY.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with Portraits and Facsimiles, extra cloth, price 12s.

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI: a Biographical and Critical Study. By MACKENZIE BELL, Author of "Spring's Immortality, and other Poems," "Charles Whitehead: a Biographical and Critical Monograph," &c.

NEW AND POPULAR NOVELS.

MISS BETTY'S MISTAKE. By Adeline Sergeant, Author of "The Claim of Anthony Lockhart," &c. Second Edition Now Ready. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

"Miss Betty's Mistake" can unhesitatingly be entered upon that list which carries the names of Miss Sergeant's happiest efforts to amuse us by means of wholesome fiction. The story is cleverly arranged and capitally written."—Literary World.

MERESIA. By Winifred Graham, Author of "A Strange Solution," &c. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

"I will not divulge the plot, which is original and mystifies the reader. It is not an easy book to lay down when you have taken it up."—Queen.

"There is much that is clever and original in Miss Winifred Graham's latest book. Meresia is an interesting and a lifelike character, and the two Spaniards, Aladros and Serano, are also well drawn. The book is well worth reading, if only for the picture it gives us of the fascination of hate."—Daily Telegraph.

THE CAPRICE of JULIA. By Lewis Sergeant. Now Ready. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

"Its plot is good, the character of Julia herself is well realised and adequately portrayed, and many of the scenes interest and convince. Other characters beside Julia's are well imagined and carefully wrought, and the situations are well conceived and brought forth with no lack of strength in the creator or of success in the result. 'The Caprice of Julia' is a book to read."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A STORM-RENT SKY. Scenes of Love and Revolution. By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty," "Dr. Jacob," "Brother Gabriel," &c. Second Edition Now Ready. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

"An admirable portrait of Danton, a careful and sympathetic study informed with real knowledge of the period, illuminating instead of obscuring historical facts."—Westminster Gazette.

"A very sympathetic portrait of Danton."—Daily Chronicle.
"A remarkably interesting, able, and, in some respects, persuasive work. A charming story."—World.

HURST & BLACKETT'S

HALF-CROWN SERIES IN RED CLOTH.—NEW ADDITIONS.

THE LIFE of MARIE ANTOINETTE. By CHARLES DUKE YONGE.

THE CRESCENT and the CROSS. By ELIOT WARBURTON.

THE OLD COURT SUBURB. By LEIGH HUNT.

ADELE. By JULIA KAVANAGH.

NATHALIE. By JULIA KAVANAGH.

ST. OLAV'S. By the Author of "JANITA'S CROSS."

ON THE SCENT. By Lady MARGARET MAJENDIE.

GRANDMOTHER'S MONEY. By F. W. ROBINSON.

ADAM GRAEME of MOSSGBAY. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

BARBARA'S HISTORY. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

AGNES By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

THE LAIRD of NORLAW. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

IT was a LOVER and his LASS By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

NO CHURCH. By F. W. ROBINSON.

LORD BRACKENBURY. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

A ROSE in JUNE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

PHEBE, JUNIOR. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

THROUGH the LONG NIGHT. By Mrs. E. LYNN LINTON.

LIFE of the REV. EDWARD IRVING. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

MARGARET and her BRIDESMAIDS. By the Author of "THE VALLEY OF A HUNDRED FIRES."

THE VALLEY of a HUNDRED FIRES. By the Author of "MARGARET AND HER BRIDESMAIDS."

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

On JUNE 10th will be published, crown 8vo, 6s.

HELBECK OF BANNISDALE.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "Marcella," "Sir George Tressady," &c.

On JUNE 8th, with Frontispiece.—Demy 8vo, 16s.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

By "ONE WHO HAS KEPT A DIARY."

A Volume of Verse by Conan Doyle.

On JUNE 8th.—Small crown 8vo, 5s.

SONGS OF ACTION.

By CONAN DOYLE.

FOURTH EDITION OF "DEBORAH OF TOD'S,"

Now Ready, FOURTH EDITION.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

DEBORAH of TOD'S. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture

Author of "A Toy Tragedy," "The Little Squire," &c.

From the TIMES.—"The character-drawing of the whole dramatis personae is indeed excellent. But Deborah stands out from them all, a noble woman.....There have been few novels lately that surpass 'Deborah of Tod's.'"

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.

6s. net, claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."

"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.

"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORTH WALES COAST.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH and PWLLHELLI.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the Leading Hotels throughout the World.

"The most comprehensive and interesting Handbook to our vast city that we have seen."—The World.

"Most emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Sixty Illustrations.

3s. 6d. net.

Twenty Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd. The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

CONTENTS OF JUNE MAGAZINES.

THE JUNE WINDSOR MAGAZINE

COMMENCES A NEW VOLUME, AND SURPASSES EVERY SIXPENNY MAGAZINE EVER PRODUCED.

It contains the following unparalleled attractions:—

"WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH."

LIEUT. JOHANSEN'S NARRATIVE SECURED AT UNPRECEDENTED COST.

The Story of Nansen's Expedition has hitherto been obtainable only at a price almost prohibitive to the masses, and the appearance of a record of THE TRAVEL EXPEDITION OF THE CENTURY in the pages of "THE WINDSOR" marks an entirely new departure in Magazine literature.

The Opening Chapters of a Magoificent New Serial Story—

"PHAROS." By GUY BOOTHBY.

Everyone remembers this author's "DR. NIKOLA" which appeared in "THE WINDSOR," and "PHAROS" is likely to create even a greater sensation

"THE DESTROYERS." By RUDYARD KIPLING.

BRILLIANT STORIES AND ARTICLES BY

C. B. FRY, PERCY ANDRÆ, ERNEST E. WILLIAMS, HARRY FURNISS, ETHEL TURNER, COTTREL HOE

SIXPENNY AS USUAL.

WARD, LOCK &amp; CO., LTD., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

JUNE NUMBER Now Ready of

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

Price 1s., contains—

THE TREASURY OFFICER'S WOOING. By Cecil Lowie. Chapters IV.-VI.
DISCIPLINE in the OLD NAVY. By H. W. WILSON.
AN ETON TUTOR.
THEOCRITUS. By J. W. MACKAIL.
A COUSIN of PICKLE. By ANDREW LANO.
AN OLD GERMAN DIVINE. By W. GOWLAND FIELD.
COUNTRY NOTES. By S. G. TALLENTYRE. III. The Inn.
A GENTLEMAN of SPAIN. By DAVID HANNAX.
THE FRENCH ACADEMY.
WILLIAM MORRIS. By STEPHEN GWYNN.

Also Ready, JUNE NUMBER of

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d., contains—

The Spanish Armada.

Introduction by Captain ALFRED T. MAHAN.

THE FATE of the ARMADA. By W. F. TILTON.

Toledo, the Imperial City of Spain.

By STEPHEN BORSAL. With Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

Pictures for Don Quixote.

By W. D. HOWELLS. With Unpublished Drawings by VIEBOE.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

JUNE NUMBER of

S. T. NICHOLAS,

Illustrated, price 1s.,

CONTAINS—

A Stamp Collector's Experience.

By L. IRWELL.

My First Gun.

By Major J. B. POWD.

An Unwilling Balloonist.

By I. M. STORBRIDGE.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LIMITED, LONDON.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.

JUNE.

CUBA and her STRUGGLE for FREEDOM. By Major-General FITZBOUR LEE (late Consul-General of the U.S. to Havana).
WAGNER'S "RING" and its PHILOSOPHY. By ERNEST NEWMAN.
FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE and RICHARD WAGNER. By BEATRICE MARSHALL.
OUR NAVY against a COALITION. By H. W. WILSON.
LORD ROSEBERRY and his FOLLOWERS—
1. THE PRESENT STATE of the LIBERAL PARTY.
2. THE LEADERLESS LIBERALS and LORD ROSEBERRY.
By W. L. STUART.
3. POLITICS in SCOTLAND. By ACADEMICUS.
ALPHONSE DAUDET. By HANNAH LYNCH.
THE MISGOVERNMENT of ITALY. By OUIDA.
CONTRADICTIONS of MODERN FRANCE. By Baron PIERRE DE COUBERTIN.
THE PARIS SALONS. By H. HEATUOTE STATHAM.
MR. GLADSTONE—
1. By Canon MALCOLM MACCOLL.
2. By Sir WALTER G. F. PHILLIMORE, Bart., D.C.L.
LORD SALISBURY and the FAR EAST.
CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., London.

THE LEISURE HOUR

Contains the following, among many other interesting Papers:—

THE STORY of the ENGLISH SHIRES.—Cambridge. By the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of London. Illustrated by Charles and Edward Whymper.
THE SCHOOLMISTRESS of HAVEN'S END. Chapters I.-IV. By E. ENDERSHAM OVERTON.
A NIGHTMARE STORY.
THE ROYAL ACADEMY and ITS WORK. With Portraits and Autographs.
RICHARD WAGNER. By FREDA WISWORTH. With Portrait and Autograph.
AUSTRALIAN SKETCHES.—Literature. By C. H. JAWIN, M.A.
WATCHES OLD and NEW. With Engravings.
GARIBALDI and the WELSH CAPTAIN.
STRANGE HABITATIONS. By FRED. MILLER. With Illustrations
SCIENCE and DISCOVERY.
OVER-SEA NOTES: Cuba (with a Map).
VARIETIES. FIRESIDE CLUB.
PRIZE COMPETITIONS, &c.
Sixpence Monthly.
Published at 56, Paternoster Row, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCHROFT Manager

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CONDUCT of PUBLIC MEETINGS.

By J. HUNT COOKE. A clear and concise Manual for all Public Speakers.
"We make no apology, even during the holiday season, for drawing attention to this little book."—Spectator.

London: ALEXANDER &amp; SHEPHEARD, Fumival Street, E.C.

EPPS'S COCOAINE

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & CO., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London

Writer's Cramp.

"G. J., aged 33, wrote 7-8 hrs. daily...after about 7 yrs. of this employment the initial symptoms of writer's cramp first declared themselves...I learn the cramp now affects the whole arm and he intends to abandon his present occupation for another of a totally different description."

B'ham Medical Review.

"I may add in my practice as a surgeon, I have found the gold-nib a preventative as well as a corrective of writer's cramp—no slight recommendation, I think."

Herbert Vine, M.B., C.M.

Send for Illustrated Price List or call—

MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
Manufacturers of Gold Nibs and the
Swan Fountain Pen,
93, Cheapside; 95, Regent Street;
21, High Street, Kensington.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1362.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1898.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

CATALOGUE of Miscellaneous Second-hand BOOKS, including a considerable number from the Library of the late "Lewis Carroll."—B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 and 51, Broad Street, Oxford.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

3d. in the 1s. Discount off most New Books.
CATALOGUES post free on application.
Orders despatched by return of post.
HENRY J. GLAISHER, Discount and Remainder Bookseller,
57, Wigmore Street, London, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SEEL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 5, 15, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copies, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Messrs E. & J. PUTZ, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

FOR SALE.

BOOK and PICTURE BUSINESS FOR SALE.
—LOWE'S NEW STREET SHOP, with all or part of Stock, Goodwill, Fixtures, &c., as a going concern; cheap. Owner retiring.—Apply, by letter only, CHARLES LOWE, Baskerville Hall, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made qualified to take charge of a similar business. No premium. Small progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with Manager.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Aron Lodge, West Kensington, W.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

(Incorporated by Royal Charter.)
Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—The Right Hon. Sir M. E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.
THURSDAY, JUNE 16th, at 5 p.m., at the MUSEUM of PRACTICAL GEOLOGY, Jernyn Street, W., the following Communications will be read—
"THE FLORENTINE MERCHANTS and the ENGLISH WOOL TRADE," by Miss E. DIXON.
"AN 'ENGLISH' ACCOUNT of ROHAN'S CONSPIRACY, 1674," by HUBERT HALL.
HUBERT HALL, Director and Hon. Sec.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MR. HUMPHRY WARD will give FOUR LECTURES on "ENGLISH ART in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY" at the PASSMORE EDWARDS SETTLEMENT, on FRIDAYS, JUNE 17th, 24th, JULY 1st, 8th, at 3.30 p.m. Tickets, 10s. 6d. for the Course; Teachers, 5s. 3s. for a Single Lecture, may be obtained from the WARDEN of the SETTLEMENT.

THE WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the post of HEAD MASTER for the CARDIFF INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL for BOYS.
Intending Applicants may obtain particulars of the Appointment from the CLERK to the Governors, who will also supply copies of the Scheme.
Applications, accompanied by not less than four recent Testimonials, and marked on cover "Head Master," must be in the hands of the undersigned not later than Saturday, the 9th July next.
By Order of the Governors,
DAVID SHEPHERD, Clerk.
1, Frederick Street, Cardiff,
June 7th, 1898.

CANTERBURY COLLEGE, CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND.

APPLICATIONS are INVITED for the position of PROFESSOR of ENGLISH LANGUAGE, LITERATURE, and HISTORY at Canterbury College, Christchurch, New Zealand (an Institution affiliated to the University of New Zealand).
Salary £200 per annum, without fees.
Applications for the appointment must be forwarded to the Office of the AGENT-GENERAL for NEW ZEALAND on or before Tuesday, the 12th July.
Full particulars of the duties required of the Professor, and of the conditions attached to the appointment, may be obtained at the Office of the AGENT-GENERAL for NEW ZEALAND, 13, Victoria Street, London, S.W.
A. CRACROFT WILSON, Registrar.
April, 1898.

FRENCH Gentleman, Licencié-ès-Lettres (Paris University), seeks an ENGAGEMENT as TUTOR for the Summer months (from July). Highest references. Salary no object.—Address P. B., 29, Carlton Hill, N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street, London E.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIVR STOCK and GENERAL Insurance Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand,
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSBOFT Manager.

PARIS SALON, 1898.

IMPORTANT WORK FOR SALE.

PORTRAIT OF VICTOR BAILLOT.

AGED 105 YEARS,

LAST SURVIVOR OF WATERLOO.

Painted by the French Military Painter,
PAUL GROLLERON.

Mention Honorable, 1882.

Médaille 3e Classe, 1886.

Médaille Bronze Exposition Universelle, 1889.

Médaille 2e Classe, 1894, Hors Concours.

VICTOR BAILLOT fought under Marshal Davout at the Siege of Hamburg; was made Prisoner at Waterloo by the English; died at Corisy, 3rd February, 1898, aged 105 years.

Portrait was painted last year (life size), canvas 8 ft. x 5½. The intellect of the old warrior was preserved, and his hair grey, not white. He wears a dark jacket and trousers, with blue gaiters, seated on an old yellow cushion, with the yellow hed-curtain as background—a plaster bust of Napoleon I. on the old chest of drawers; and he wears his Legion of Honour decorations and Medal of St. Helena.

The Painting has been most favourably noticed by the Art Critics in Paris and London.

Address, J. M. R., care of the Publishers of "THE ACADEMY,"
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

|   |  |
|---|--|
| TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.  | COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.               |
| LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the house of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum. | UNITED ONE SUBSCRIPTION , and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage. |

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.;
48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
26 BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

WANTED.—English GIRL, to join three others, aged 18, who are studying French, Music, Staging, Painting in FRANCE, in charge of an exceptional English Chaperon. Highest references given and required. Terms for Pension and French Instruction, 30 Guineas a quarter.—CHAPERON, Offices of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

MAGMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

SECOND IMPRESSION OF
MR. BODLEY'S FRANCE

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

M. CHERBULIZ in Revue des Deux Mondes.—"Un ouvrage fort remarquable et fort remarquable.... Cet observateur sagace et bienveillant nous rend un témoignage dont nous ne pouvons être que touchés, et nous serions bien difficiles si nous n'étions pas contents de lui."

THE ROMANES LECTURE, 1898.

TYPES OF SCENERY and their INFLUENCE on LITERATURE. By Sir ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, D.C.L., F.R.S., delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, June 1st, 1898. Medium 8vo, sewed, 2s. net.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

THE FOREST LOVERS: a Romance.

By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "Pan and the Young Shepherd," "Earthwork out of Tuscany," &c.

JAMES LANE ALLEN, Author of "The Choir Invisible," writes of "The Forest Lovers": "This work, for any one of general solid reasons, must be regarded as of very unusual interest. In the matter of style alone, it is an achievement, an extraordinary achievement. Such a piece of English prose, saturated and racy with idiom, compact and warm throughout as living human tissues, well deserves to be set apart for grateful study and express appreciation.... In the matter of interpreting nature there are passages in this book that I have never seen surpassed in prose fiction."

A PHILOSOPHER'S ROMANCE. By JOHN BERWICK, Author of "The Secret of Saint Florel."

Whitehall Review.—"Among the books we can heartily recommend for your personal is 'A Philosopher's Romance,' by John Berwick. It is not many books nowadays of which this may be so truthfully said, for there is not a dull chapter in it."

THE CONCERT-DIRECTOR. By NELLIE K. BLISSETT, Author of "The Wisdom of the Simple."

Globe.—"An able story, well written, with individualities skillfully drawn and contrasted, and a plot that, though quite devoid of mystery, sustains its interest to an unexpected close."

THE GOSPEL of FREEDOM. By ROBERT HERRICK, Author of "The Man who Wins," &amp;c.

Daily Mail.—"Distinctly enjoyable and suggestive of much profitable thought."

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

The LEADING IDEAS of the GOSPELS

By WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., D.C.L. Oxon., LL.D. Dublin, Archbishop of Armagh, and Lord Primate of all Ireland. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Guardian.—"The originality of the general conception, the ingenious and poetical manner in which it is worked out, and the smallness of its size, give this volume special claims on the attention of non-theological readers."

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

PRIMER of PSYCHOLOGY. By EDWARD BRADFORD TITCHENER.

Scotsman.—"A handbook marked by so unusual skill in exposition as to be well worthy of the attention of all who are interested in its subject."

SIEPMANN'S FRENCH SERIES.—New Volume.

L'ANNEAU D'ARGENT. Par Charles DE BERNARD, Edited by LOUIS SERS, B.-ès-L., French Master at Wellington College. Globe 8vo, 2s.

MACMILLAN'S FOREIGN SCHOOL CLASSICS.

New Volume.

LE VERRE D'EAU: a Comedy. By SCRIBE. With an Introduction and Notes by F. F. ROGET, B.A. Pott 8vo, 1s. 6d.

JUNE NUMBER of

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d., contains—

The Spanish Armada.

Introduction by Captain ALFRED T. MAHAN.

THE FATE of the ARMADA. By W. F. TILTON.

Toledo, the Imperial City of Spain.

By STEPHEN BONNAL. With Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

Pictures for Don Quixote.

By W. D. HOWELLS. With Unpublished Drawings by VINGAS.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LIMITED, LONDON.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

Mr. Unwin is pleased to announce that the First Impression of 10,000 Copies of Mr. GEORGE MOORE'S New Novel, EVELYN INNES, is now ready, and can be obtained at all Booksellers, price 6s.

NOW READY.

MEMORIALS of an EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY PAINTER (JAMES NORTHCOTE). By STEPHEN GWYNN. Fully Illustrated with Photogravures, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. (Uniform with "The Courtships of Queen Elizabeth.")

NEW VOLUME OF

"THE BUILDERS OF GREAT BRITAIN."

JOHN and SEBASTIAN CABOT: the Discovery of North America. By C. RAYMOND BEAZLEY. Edited by H. F. WILSON. Frontispiece Portrait, and Map. Cloth, 5s.

"Is of special value as furnishing, in brief, the results of all the previous literature on the subject."—Globe.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE MASTERS OF MEDICINE" SERIES.

SIR WILLIAM STOKES: his Life and Work (1804-1878). By his Son, WILLIAM STOKES, Surgeon-in-Ordinary to the Queen in Ireland. With 2 Photogravures. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The book before us is excellent.... Will be read far beyond the bounds of the profession.... This fascinating book."—Daily Chronicle.

NEW NOVELS.

By LOUIS BECKE and WALTER JEFFERY.

THE MUTINEER: a Romance of Pitcairn Island. By LOUIS BECKE and WALTER JEFFERY, Joint Authors of "A First Fleet Family," &c. "Unwin's Green Cloth Library." 6s.

By THE AUTHOR OF "THE PEOPLE OF CLOPTON."

The WHITE-HEADED BOY: a Novel. By GEORGE BARTRAM. "Unwin's Green Cloth Library." 6s.

By LOUIS BECKE.

By REEF and PALM and his NATIVE WIFE. By LOUIS BECKE, Author of "Wild Life in Southern Seas," &c. New Edition. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE FIRST CROSSING OF NORTHERN TIBET

Through Unknown Tibet
By Captain M. S. WELBY, 18th Hussars.

With Photogravure Frontispiece Portrait, and over 60 Full-Page and smaller Illustrations, Photographs, and including 12 Drawings by A. D. McCormick. With Maps and Appendices of the Flora, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 21s.

The Times says: "Captain Welby has written a modest and an entertaining account of a very remarkable journey." The Daily News says: "It is one of the most striking feats in modern exploration."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "For indomitable perseverance, bull-dog pluck, and resolute endurance it is very hard to beat.... It remains to be said that the maps are well produced, and that the illustrations, most of them from unique photographs, are excellent."

London:

T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "RHODA ROBERTS."

THE JACOBITE, the New Novel by HARRY LINDSAY, Author of "Methodist Idylls," is now ready, crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

BRET HARTE'S New Book, SOME LATER VERSES, is now ready, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

AMELIE RIVES'S NEW NOVEL.

MERIEL: a Love Story. By Amelie RIVES, Author of "Barbara Dering." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A remarkably clever book."—Glasgow Herald. "Rarely, indeed, in English fiction do we come across a novel in this genre marked by the tenderness, the delicacy, and the passion that distinguish Amelie Rives's new work. 'Meriel' has something of the glowing warmth and passionate abandon of Mrs. Browning's love-poems."—Echo.

THE HERITAGE of EVE. By H. H. SPETTIGUE. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"As a novel the idea is splendidly wrought out by the author. The author has a good grip of his subject, and can write in a fine cultured strain."—Pertshire Advertiser.

MRS. L. T. MEADE'S NEW NOVEL.

ON the BRINK of a CHASM. By L. T. MEADE, Author of "The Voice of the Charmer." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Six-Shilling Novels.

A WOMAN TEMPTED HIM. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Second Edition. "The book is in every respect a delightful one."—Daily Telegraph.

WAS SHE JUSTIFIED? By FRANK BARRETT, Author of "Folly Morrison," &c. "The story is a capital one from beginning to end."—World.

MISS BALMAINE'S PAST. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Beyond the Pale," &c. "A very enchanting story... a very delightful novel."—Vanity Fair.

FORTUNE'S GATE. By ALAN ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity." "One of the wholesomest and most delightful excursions into fiction."—Morning Leader.

A WOMAN WORTH WINNING. By G. MANVILLE FENN, Author of "The White Virgin." "The book should not fail to prove enjoyable to everyone who takes it up."—Scotsman.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY, Author of "Rajah the Juggler." "A rattling good story."—Daily Mail.

Three-and-Sixpenny Novels.

A RACE for MILLIONS. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

A MODERN DICK WHITTINGTON. By JAMES PAYN.

A FOUNTAIN SEALED. By WALTER BESANT.

NULMA. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

LOVICE. By Mrs. HUNGERFORD.

EVERY INCH a SOLDIER. By M. J. COLQUHOUN.

BY PROXY. By James Payn. Cheap Edition. Medium 8vo, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

New Two-Shilling Books.

THE WOMAN in the DARK. By F. W. ROBINSON.

HEART of OAK. By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

DULCIE EVERTON. By E. LYNN LINTON.

FOR MR. GLADSTONE'S POLITICAL LIFE, SEE A HISTORY of OUR OWN TIMES, from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 12s.

A HISTORY of OUR OWN TIMES, from the Accession of Queen Victoria to the General Election of 1880. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. Library Edition, 4 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each. Popular Edition, 4 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. each. Jubilee Edition, 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. each.

A SHORT HISTORY of OUR OWN TIMES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. Popular Edition, post 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

London: CHATTO &amp; WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                            | PAGE    |
|--------------------------------------|---------|
| Living Journalism ... ..             | 619     |
| For Minute Historians ... ..         | 619     |
| Appreciation Applied to Music ... .. | 620     |
| Table-Talk of Mr. Gladstone ... ..   | 621     |
| For Masters and Parents ... ..       | 622     |
| Birds in London ... ..               | 623     |
| BRIEFER MENTION ... ..               | 624     |
| THE NEWEST FICTION ... ..            | 625     |
| FICTION—REVIEWS ... ..               | 626     |
| GUIDE BOOK SUPPLEMENT ... ..         | 629-636 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..                | 637     |
| PURE FARLES ... ..                   | 639     |
| NOVELISTS AS POETS ... ..            | 639     |
| EVOLUTION OF THE "IDYLLS" ... ..     | 640     |
| THE ROYAL LITERARY FUND ... ..       | 641     |
| PARIS LETTER ... ..                  | 642     |
| THE BOOK MAREET ... ..               | 642     |
| Popular Books in America ... ..      | 643     |
| ART ... ..                           | 644     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..                | 644     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..         | 645     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..                | 646     |
| Announcements ... ..                 | 646     |

REVIEWS.

LIVING JOURNALISM.

Egypt in 1898. By G. W. Steevens. (Blackwood & Sons.)

BIT by bit Mr. Steevens is enabling the stay-at-home to conquer the world. At the word of his chief—Mr. Harmsworth, of the Daily Mail—he goes, he sees, he describes, and another country is unrolled before the eyes of the armchair traveller, another page of the atlas gifted with life, another people explained. Some months ago it was America, "The Land of the Dollar"; then it was the battle-ground of the Greeks and Turks; then Germany. And now, in the volume before us, a reprint of Daily Mail articles entitled the "Diary of a Sun-Seeker," Mr. Steevens applies his methods to Egypt. Those methods are too well known to need analysis: the biting phrase, the sudden illuminative concrete example, the rapid generalisation, the swift seizure upon types; and so on. The concrete example is, of course, a short cut to an effect, but in journalism the effect is needed as quickly as may be, and therefore short cuts are permissible. Literature demands more particularity. Literature, for example, would not permit Mr. Steevens to call the camel "the Whiteley of the Desert," nor Port Said "the Clapham Junction of the nations." Here is a typical passage bearing directly upon Mr. Steevens's summarising gift:

"The nominal suzerain of Egypt is the Sultan; its real suzerain is Lord Cromer. Its nominal governor is the Khedive; its real governor, for a final touch of comic opera, is Thomas Cook & Son. Cook's representative is the first person you meet in Egypt, and you go on meeting him. He sees you in; he sees you through; he sees you out. You see the back of a native—turban, long blue gown, red girdle, bare brown legs. 'How truly Oriental,' you say. Then he turns round, and you see 'Cook's Porter' emblazoned across his breast. 'You travel Cook, sir,' he grins; 'alright.' And it is alright: Cook carries you, like a nursing father, from one end of Egypt to the other. Cook has personally conducted more than one expedition into the Soudan, and done it as no Transport Department could do. The population of the Nile banks raises produce for Cook, and for him alone. In other countries the lower middle-classes aspire to a place under Government; in Egypt they aspire to a place under Cook. 'Good Cook shob all the time' is the native's giddiest ambition—a permanent engagement with Cook."

A gift of epigram may be a snare to the traveller, but we cannot detect Mr. Steevens in the act of tripping. Although he has so much wit and a sufficiency of patriotism—even insularity—he has also humility. He passes through a country without the bias of preconceived judgments; his eyes and ears are adjusted to take truthful impressions, and it seems to us that they have registered accurately. The medium through which these impressions reach us is a mind highly trained, modern, humorous, and quaintly cynical.

During the short time he spent in Egypt, Mr. Steevens went over all the ground which the traveller is expected to see and a little that he usually misses. He even had such adventures as a night in the desert and another night in a Coptic monastery. He conversed on politics with Lord Cromer and with distinguished natives; he had speech with Mr. Thomas Cook; he examined the great engineering works now in progress; he put questions to scholars and masters in the Egyptian Eton: in short, he served his paper well. Here is Mr. Steevens on Lord Cromer:

"To read Egyptian-French accounts of Lord Cromer, you would picture him a stiff-browed, hard-mouthed, cynical, taciturn martinet. To look at the real man, you would say that he gave half of his time to sleep, and the other half to laughing. Lolling in his carriage through the streets of Cairo, or lighting a fresh cigarette in his office, dressed in a loose-fitting grey tweed and a striped shirt, with ruddy face, short white hair, and short white moustache, with gold-rimmed eye-glasses half hiding eyes half-closed, mellow of voice, and fluent of speech—is this the perfidious Baring, you ask yourself, whom Frenchmen detest and strive to imitate? This the terrible Lord Cromer whom Khedives obey and tremble? His demeanour is genial and courteous. His talk is easy, open, shrewd, humorous. His subordinates admire, respect, even love him. He is the mildest mannered man that ever sacked Prime Minister. Only somehow you still felt the steel stiffening the velvet. He is genial, but he would be a bold man who would take a liberty with him: he talks, only not for publication; he is loved, yet he must always be obeyed. Velvet as long as he can, steel as soon as he must—that is Lord Cromer."

Altogether Mr. Steevens is very well satisfied with English rule in Egypt, but he is persuaded, with certain native statesmen, that more English money might well be invested there. Concerning France—"a nation which remains great in spite of continual efforts to be small"—he writes always shrewdly. Here is a passage:

"There is another reason for not taking France too seriously in Egypt. Frenchmen cannot stand the climate. I do not speak so much physically as spiritually: hardly a Frenchman ever can stand any climate but that of France. Now meet an Englishman of sixty who has not spent five years at home since he was seventeen; he grumbles, of course, but as long as he can do his work he is game to stay a year or two more. For that matter, there is an old gentleman in Lower Egypt who has been in the country for sixty years, and has so far acclimatised himself as to marry three native wives, each with money. But take a Frenchman of forty in a public service and offer him a pension; he is away to France at once. He is able, honest, and patriotic; he knows he is doing good work for himself, for Egypt, and, indirectly, for France; the climate is less severe for a Frenchman than for an Englishman; the mode of life is far more congenial, the salary, relatively to home standards, far more princely. But give him a chance to go back to France, and he throws up work and salary together, and is off to spend his pension in his native café. That is why France, for all her brilliant imaginations and courage and cleverness, has never made a great colony, and never will."

Finally, let us return to Mr. Steevens's more epigrammatic manner. Thus he writes after a day at Luxor:

"But why pretend to talk of the life of the ancient Egyptians? They took no interest in life at all, but set their constant minds only on death. They considered their houses as lodgings, says Herodotus finely, and their tombs as their real homes. If anybody ever lived to die they did. Only two things were important to them—the welfare of their souls, and the solidity of their monuments. They never seem to have built anything but temples to the one end, and tombs to the other. Their popular literature was a work called the Book of the Dead. They were so busy preparing to die that they can hardly have had any time to live. Whenever they met and talked together—if they ever did—I am sure they never laughed, but spoke in low voices about the splendid time they meant to have when they were buried. Ancient Egypt was one great preparatory school for the cemetery—a nation of monumental masons."

Mr. Steevens's book, as a whole, is journalism: the work of a man under orders. But it has passages and phrases that belong to literature, and it is fascinatingly interesting.

FOR MINUTE HISTORIANS.

Murray of Broughton's Memorials. Edited by Robert Fitzroy Bell. (Scottish History Society.)

THE Scottish History Society is to be congratulated on the publication of the Memoirs of Murray of Broughton. These documents are the property of Mr. George Siddons Murray, son of Mr. Murray, of the Edinburgh Theatre, the friend of Scott, and great grandson, by a second marriage, of the unhappy secretary of Prince Charles. The papers were written by the secretary at various dates, in the leisure of an odious undisturbed retirement. His object, doubtless, was to excuse his own conduct to himself, and also to blacken many of his associates. He writes as a fervent Jacobite, and apparently thinks that, by exposing the weaknesses and cowardice of his old allies, he can make out a better case for himself. It is not possible to accept all that he says to the discredit, for example, of James's agents in France, Bahaldie and Semple, because, for years before 1745, a feud had raged between the supporters of a Restoration. Semple and Bahaldie were distrusted both by the Earl Marischal in France, and by Murray in Scotland. They had, however, the ear of the French Court, and of the cryptic and cowardly Jacobites of England. These, again, were divided into the forward party of Colonel Cecil, Carte the historian, and the Ogletherpe ladies on one hand; and the timid party of Beaufort, Orrery, Barriermore, and Sir Watkin Williams Wynne on the other. In Scotland Traquair leaned to Bahaldie, Lochiel to Murray. When the Prince arrived in France, early in 1744, the Murray faction doubted whether he had an invitation from Louis XV. or whether Bahaldie had not first brought him at his own venture, and then kept him incognito. Again, the daring of Charles irritated the Earl Marischal; the English never would put pen to paper, the Jacobite party was broken into a dozen distrustful groups. James, at Rome, could not possibly compose or even understand their squabbles, and the Prince cut the knot by landing in Meidart with seven men.

On all these tracasseries Murray writes at great length. To understand the matter it is necessary to compare, line by line, the correspondence between James, Semple, the Earl Marischal, and Lord John Drummond, published from the Stuart Papers by Mr. Browne, in his History of the Highland Clans. Murray's tale is consistent, on the whole, with what he said under examination in 1746, and with letters of the Prince and other documents, now first published by Mr. Fitzroy Bell. We could wish that Mr. Fitzroy Bell had woven the Semple and other statements from that side into his Introduction. Bahaldie, in Murray's view, was a shifty, lying, fawning Celt—a Macgregor, with a good deal of the bully. This makes it the more strange that he was trusted by the English Jacobites long after 1745. It is highly probable that the death of Cardinal Fleury confused matters helplessly, and that Bahaldie slipped into inconsistencies of statement to Murray, who was sent to France to keep an eye upon him. The fickleness of the French Court, and their scandalous treatment of Prince Charles, added to the embroglio. The net historical result is, that a party so helplessly disorganised and divided as were the Jacobites had no chance except in a desperate venture, which might draw them together by fear, and by shame for broken promises. Charles made the venture—there was nothing else on the cards. As a result, the really honest Jacobites—Lochiel, Perth, Pitsligo, Gask—struck their blow. The Duke of Hamilton was content with a secret gift of money. Nithsdale and Kenmure came in, for a day, and then covered in terror. Macleod, after enthusiastic promises, was won over by Forbes of Culloden, and his men fought, or rather fled, under the Black Cockade. Murray, on the whole, disculpates Macdonald of Sleat, who played a somewhat similar part. The English peers, who had never committed themselves in writing, lay quiet, for which James, with wonderful fairness, excused, or even applauded them!

A most curious point, noted by Mr. Fitzroy Bell, is that James never intended to take the Crown. He communicated this resolve to Louis XV. on the 11th of August, 1745 (p. 509). The Prince protested vigorously against this resolution. Though James was thus for abdicating, and though Charles opposed the step, there arose a King's party (defending James, who did not want to be defended) and a Prince's party, backing Charles in an ambition not his own! Never was such an embroglio. We must reckon all these helpless blunderings rather to the credit of the Prince, who did so much with such wretched materials. Murray is constant in his praise of Charles, for whom he obviously entertained a sincere affection. He justifies his military conduct, clearly pluming himself on his knowledge of war, for he had desired to be an aide-de-camp, not a secretary. But he was, perhaps, the only man in the camp with a head for business, and in money matters he certainly seems to establish his honesty. Of the party, he prefers Lochiel, the chivalrous and devoted Duke of Perth (who alone voted with the Prince to advance from Derby), the honest old Earl Marischal, and the stainless Pitsligo. He chiefly detests Traquair and the English adherents, whom he did his best to ruin. Mr. Fitzroy Bell pleads that Murray, when he turned king's evidence, "did nothing to bring into jeopardy any single individual who had borne arms for Prince Charles. . . . His evidence did little harm to anybody save Lovat," and Traquair, who was imprisoned. But that was by no fault of Murray's. He would have hanged even Sir John Douglas had his evidence been corroborated. He gave away the secret of the buried hoard of French gold. He had been true to Charles, even after the Prince, persuaded of treachery, deserted his party. He accuses even Lochgarry of a design to betray the remnant with Lochiel, after Culloden. This charge smells of Barisdale, by his own confession the blackest of traitors. But Murray was resolute till, outworn and sick, he was captured. Then he promptly saved himself by the treachery which made him equally hated and shunned by Whig and Tory. His apologies are endless. He could have told much more. He can justify himself to the King and the Prince; for others his sword is ready! No man, of course, would give him the chance to rehabilitate himself by crossing swords with him. He has "honour" ever on his lips, and the hell of a tortured conscience in his breast.

To the minute historian these Memoirs, with Mr. Fitzroy Bell's other documents, are full of instruction. Incidental lights (usually lurid) are thrown on many known names. To disentangle the cross threads of intrigue is impossible here; we come back to the futilities of distracted and half-hearted men, which, after all, did not prevent an enterprise of romantic daring. The men of action alone show well, the plotters throw discredit on human nature. The central interest is that of the writhing soul of Murray, still in love with the Cause and the Prince that he has sold, still laying lenients of vanity on the bite of the worm that never dies, and the torment of the fire that never is quenched. The end, it seems, was madness. Miserimus!

APPRECIATION APPLIED TO MUSIC.

The Fringe of an Art. By Vernon Blackburn. (Unicorn Press).

RARE is the union of literary style with musical insight. Rarer still, the union of both with technical knowledge of music. Rarest of all, the union of the three in an Englishman. On the Continent we have seen the phenomenon to some extent in Wagner and Schumann; we have seen it to a consummate extent in the all-accomplished and all-daring Berlioz. But in England—Mr. Blackburn's, therefore, is a very welcome book. His position as musical critic of the Pall Mall vouches for his knowledge; and in that capacity he has distinguished himself by his independence of the bad old conventions of musical press-criticism. This book stamps him emphatically as a littérateur, who is likewise a knower of music. That method of "appreciation," cultured, selective, personal, which has of late years been developed, in its application to literature, with such remarkable results, he brings to the study of musicians. These are a series of appreciations of great composers, brief, choice, to the point, in which we are never allowed to forget that the writer is a student of style, that to his musical judgments goes a knowledge of many things outside music, shedding light upon those judgments from many angles. And herein lies the peculiar value and attraction of the book.

The note is struck at once by the opening essay on "Modernity in Music." Like all the essays, it has an idea—without which any essay is otiose. He describes—he does not define—modernity as the "prophetic reflection of the culminating intelligence of any generation, either actually living or immediately about to be," as "the spring of to-day." And he says that the test of immortality, for any composition, is whether it survives the passing of its modernity. Wagner has expressed the same thing from another standpoint. Wagner has pointed out that every great composition is only fully understandable under the conditions of the time for which it was written; and that the element of genius which compels it to survive after those conditions are past is (from a certain standpoint) a cruelty; that it condemns it to survive as a semi-corpse, which can never again live as it lived for those who heard it in its newness, in its adaptation to the modes of thought and feeling belonging to the day for which it was composed. It is (says Wagner) like that punishment which consisted in tying a living person to a corpse. This is the main thesis of Mr. Blackburn's essay. But there are admirable and admirably put subordinate points. Such is his deliverance upon the innate certitude of the believer in Art:

"The artist, let me say, is aware of beauty as the devout Mussulman is aware that Mohammed is the Prophet of Allah. There is, indeed, a strong analogy between the 'credo' of art and the 'credo' of a definite religious faith. An artist is intolerant, he is exclusive, and his mind is fixed. Just as an infallible source of religion forbids so much as a question upon its promulgations, so the artist, himself an infallible source, allows no doubt upon the doctrines that he has sanctioned by his word of decree. He knows because he believes."

Just so; because art is itself a kind of religion—a religion of the surfaces. "Art is a superficies, life a solid," said Patmore. The domain of art, that is to say, is concerned with phenomena, and with the depths as they reveal themselves through phenomena. Mr. Blackburn's excellent utterance is deficient only in two respects. Firstly, instead of saying that the artist "knows because he believes," he should have said rather that the artist believes because he knows. The process is reversed with him; he sees and believes—like doubting Thomas: a perilous state! Secondly, while the artist is infallible in his recognition of beauty, he is not infallible in his non-recognition of beauty. There his human limitations come in; and too many artists could be cited who have been blind to the excellence of contemporaries, though none who have applauded contemporaries not worth applause. The artist's sight is infallible; not so his defect of sight. Often his scorn is righteous and illuminative; but, alas! it is not necessarily so, it may be mistaken.

We have cited this passage because it is from an essay which admits quotation. Most of Mr. Blackburn's essays are too brief and pregnant to allow it; you must read them whole if you would grasp their merit. His range is catholic; it includes Gounod and Wagner, Mozart and Tchaikowsky. One of the best is that on Berlioz; not the composer Berlioz, but the Berlioz of the Grand Traité on orchestration. It is true that Mr. Blackburn's views on the composer peep through it; but its theme is Berlioz as the great orchestral virtuoso, and writer on orchestral virtuosity. He has a peculiar passion for that most fascinating, ardent, and many-sided musician; he writes of him with a fervid sympathy which is decidedly the right attitude, and makes the whole essay among the finest. Little wonder! Berlioz' personality is so arresting that it becomes as difficult to separate the man from the musician as it is to separate the man from the artist in the case of Benvenuto Cellini. The resemblance, indeed, is most striking between the Frenchman and the Italian, though Berlioz is an infinitely greater composer than Cellini is a sculptor. And so Mr. Blackburn's appreciation is an inextricable tangle of composer, writer, and personality—as it ought to be; and, moreover, is an excellent piece of writing. But perhaps the two finest appreciations in the book (not even excepting the brilliant "Tchaikowsky") are concerned, not with composers, but with virtuosos. For they are unmatched. They are the essays on Calvé and Maurel. The quintessence of the art of Maurel and his great female follower, Calvé, is here quintessentially rendered: with such insight and sympathy in substance, such selection and pregnancy in treatment, such a sense of literary style presiding over all, as makes these two essays little masterpieces. And Mr. Blackburn's catholicity is shown by the fact that he is none the less able to treat with justice a singer of a very different school—a school obviously less sympathetic to him—Mr. Santley. There is not the same enthusiasm. Yet this truly great singer is rendered essential justice; and that although Mr. Blackburn can never have heard him when he was at the zenith of his power and achievement. When the present writer first heard him, some twenty years ago, Santley was already spoken of as a singer whose supremest excellence and triumph belonged to a date somewhat overpast.

Now, after giving to this book its just and high praise, we may perhaps be permitted to express our one quarrel with it, on the purely literary side of style. In regard to style, there are, in effect, two Blackburns. The one (which we may be suffered to think the native Blackburn) is singularly masculine, logical, direct. It is the style of a man virile all over, who has had a training in clearness and logical distinction rare, indeed, among the younger prosateurs of the day. The other is enamoured of a certain model, admirable in its own subtle modulation, gradation, dignity, and poeticism of phrase, but most perilous to follow: because that modulated subtlety so readily becomes unconscious artificiality, unconscious affectation. And it is, moreover, antithetical to Mr. Blackburn's native masculinity and severe, clear logic of statement. When Mr. Blackburn obeys what we take to be his native temper he is excellent. When he follows what we take to be a model (whether derived from one or many sources) he seems to us to become strange, stiff, and, at times, perilously near to preciousness. The poetic method, of imagery and semi-metrical diction, appears to us most divergent from his own virile temper; and when he aims at it we like him least. When he adheres to that style of robust, sane, logical distinction which we have ventured to think his native mood, we admire his style altogether. It does not exclude subtlety, by any means; only the subtlety is attained by other than poetic methods. It is, at any rate, certain that these two tendencies conflict, without amalgamating, in his style (whencesoever they may be derived); and that in one temper he is admirable, in the other not. We would be glad to see him adhere altogether to the more virile and austere method.

TABLE-TALK OF MR. GLADSTONE.

Talks with Mr. Gladstone. By the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache. (Arnold.)

It was "a proud moment" for Mr. Tollemache when Mr. Gladstone, then canvassing the Oxford electors, called on him during his first year of residence at Balliol. Indeed, Mr. Tollemache, though differing from his friend and senior politically and theologically, was always proud of the association. After that first meeting in 1856, other meetings in London followed, and two visits to Hawarden, before 1870. The talks of those times were resumed, after an interval of twenty years, when the old acquaintances met in Biarritz. They called on each other and they talked; they walked together and they talked; they lunched and talked; they dined and they were still talking. Mr. Tollemache was an excellent phonograph, into which Mr. Gladstone spoke. Anybody familiar with his modes of thought and speech will recognise the fidelity of the reproduction. If Mr. Tollemache is at times a little insistent in his intolerance of orthodoxy, all the more sure are we that he lets Mr. Gladstone say his say to the contrary, in his own way and with his own abundance of words. Needless to add, where Mr. Gladstone is the talker, the talk turned mainly on theology.

Some literary opinions, however, may be gathered from the volume to add to those already set forth in the collection of Mr. Gladstone's letters recently printed in our columns. They have their value as the opinions of a very representative reader. They are the good average judgments of a man who read for matter always, never for manner; who did not seek or recognise the note of distinction in style; who wanted facts rather than the philosophy underlying them; and who judged of an author mainly by his influence for or against the propagation of Christianity. His only quarrel, for instance, with Scott was that Scott did not show any righteous indignation against Byron. Perhaps it was the absence of a common creed which made him refuse a place to George Eliot among women poets, and which left him in ignorance of Mr. Meredith, of whom we have only the mention that Mr. Gladstone once began, under his daughter's orders, Diana of the Crossways, and stuck in it. On the contrary, he held Mr. Hutton, of the Spectator, to be "the first of our critics"; and "he spoke of Bethel [sic] and Newman as the two most subtle masters of English prose of our time." Among men of science, Mr. Gladstone denied the claim of "genius" to Huxley, but allowed it to Owen and to Romanes—an attribution, in the last case, explained by Mr. Tollemache as probably due to "the orthodox tendency of Romanes' later years."

Mr. Gladstone was "not well up in Browning." He called Mill "the Saint of Rationalism." Of George Eliot's novels he most admired Silas Marner, but he complained of them that they were "out of tune." He did not read Daniel Deronda. Of Scott's novels his favourites were Kenilworth and the Bride of Lammermoor. Miss Austen he admired, but said, "I am not so enthusiastic about her as some people are." He thought she could "neither dive nor soar"—a remark his friend Rio had made of Macaulay; also that she "was a first-rate actor in a third-rate scene"—as someone had said of Lord Randolph Churchill in his early days. Macaulay's Lays, by the way, Mr. Gladstone most admired—"they will live." Miss Ferrier's Inheritance Mr. Gladstone thought her best book.

One is surprised to find Mr. Gladstone describing Mr. Bright as a "phrase-maker." The abundance of Brougham's wit he proved by mentioning an instance of it which Brougham himself had forgotten—a forgetting which suggests to Mr. Tollemache that he was, in Tennyson's phrase, "like wealthy men, who know not what they give"—a version which shows that Mr. Tollemache does not always verify his Tennyson references. While "admiring many points" in Miss Cholmondeley's Diana Tempest, Mr. Gladstone objected to it "because the authoress throws satire broadcast on the clergy, and other representatives of tradition." As a judge of wit he gave the palm to Aristophanes and Shakespeare among all men—an opinion shared by Dr. Döllinger; and, in talking of Molière, he set down as "third-class plays" both the "Misanthrope" and the "Tartuffe." Of Carlyle, Mr. Gladstone said he found it hard to express an impartial opinion, "for Carlyle did not at all like me." They, too, had talked together at length, and, as Mr. Gladstone thought, amicably and interestingly. "Then, to my amazement," said Mr. Gladstone, "I found, when Froude's life of him came out, this very conversation is mentioned in it, and I am described as utterly contemptible and impermeable to new ideas." That, at any rate, was a bad shot. Want of receptiveness was the very last charge to bring against the politician whose open mind was ever the despair of his colleagues, and who, in these talks with Mr. Tollemache, shows more than anything else his impressionability to the influence of the last new book put into his hands.

FOR MASTERS AND PARENTS.

BY AN EX-HEADMASTER.

Debatable Claims: Essays on Secondary Education. By J. C. Tarver. (Constable.)

AFTER a stilted and somewhat fulsome "Epistle Dedicatory," with the victim of which we sympathise, and whose identity we accordingly forbear to reveal, the author settles down into a calm and rational state of mind and gives us a really excellent book; one, moreover, which comes with peculiar timeliness at the present juncture, when, owing to the ignorant zeal of an active minority and the ignorant indifference of a passive majority, the most vital interests of higher education are in danger of disaster. That legislation which would introduce some sort of order into the chaos now existing between the primary schools and the universities is both desirable and inevitable, few who have any knowledge of or interest in the subject would be found to deny: few, that is, outside the horde of irresponsible tradesmen who run the "collegiate establishments," "academies for young gentlemen," and similar private-adventure abominations which disgrace English education and lower it as a whole in public estimation. But though the intervention of the State ought to come, and must come, there is a risk lest in endeavouring to avoid the Scylla of over-centralisation we are drawn into the Charybdis of confusion. As regards the former peril, the only experience the Government of this country has had of the direction of education has been confined to its most elementary stages. Now it is, or should be, abundantly evident that a system which is suitable enough perhaps for learners who are intellectually and socially of the lowest grade; who must, perforce, be dealt with en masse; and who have to be taught by instructors differing so entirely in type, tone, and traditions from the masters of the higher schools as, from a scholastic point of view, to constitute a separate race, would prove destructive if applied in all its stereotyped woodenness to scholars and institutions of a more advanced character. As regards the latter peril, the total abandonment of the higher schools to local control would involve a ruin still more deplorable and complete; for it would mean that secondary education, while losing such proportion of freedom as is beneficial, would at the same time lose even that modicum of symmetry and co-ordination which it at present possesses. It would be dominated by the faddists, jobbers, parish politicians, and other cranks, gerrymanderers, and ignoramuses, who together compose the predominant element in our provincial councils; to say nothing of the additional presence on these bodies of the parent—that is, indirectly, the fond mother—who, with sometimes, no doubt, commendable intentions, is, as a rule, the most desperate enemy with which school and child alike have to contend.

These alternative dangers Mr. Tarver points out and dwells upon at some length. He is very far from being the first writer on this topic who has done so; but nowhere have we seen the case for higher education, in the best and broadest sense of the term, put with greater force, fairness, and lucidity. He makes point after point, in a way which can hardly fail to bring conviction home to the most perverse, unintelligent, or apathetic. We scarcely dare to begin to quote lest we be lured on till we have reproduced in the pages of the ACADEMY so much of Debatable Claims that it would be unnecessary for our readers to possess themselves of copies of the work. This would be appreciative, but hardly grateful. There is, however, a limit to self-restraint, and we may allow ourselves a few citations by way of samples. In the Introduction we are asked:

"Does the cry for Secondary Education mean that we wish to restore one class of local schools to the position which they once occupied? Or does it mean that in the future, as to a large extent at the present time, it will not be possible for professional men who live in large towns to get their children educated on the professional plane without incurring the expense of a boarding school? In other words, is the tendency of the new Act to be permanently to depress a large number of local schools; or, on the other hand, to elevate them from their present degradation, and place them where they were when the majority of them were founded?"

Again:

"Paid councils of education, responsible to a central authority for the administration of large areas—some half-dozen for the whole kingdom—seem the form of administration most likely to do the work required. . . . Organised elementary education was in some respects a new thing in 1870; what we are now concerned with is the organisation of an old thing, rather than the creation of a new one. . . . At the present time we are allowing our grammar schools to perish by neglect; instead of strengthening them, we create rival institutions."

This last sentence is illustrated by a reference to an unnamed town, which,

"following the prevalent tendency of the country at large, prefers to create a new institution rather than strengthen and extend the work of an old one, for it possesses a well-equipped grammar school, whose endowments can be shown to have existed before the year of grace 1291."

Had the date been 1485 we should have known that the allusion was to the Christ Church Folly, the "Extension College" at Reading. On Literature, by the way, Mr. Tarver is sound:

"In the world of letters, the writer who is at the level of the average ignorance of his day will have a larger number of readers than he who writes for all time. It was better worth a man's while at the end of the last century to be a Samuel Richardson than a Samuel Johnson: it is at least as lucrative now to be a Marie Corelli or a Hall Caine as even to be a George Eliot."

But to return to our pedagogics:

"The endowment of teachers without buildings on the mediæval system is at least economical; the modern system of finding the buildings, paying the pupil, and leaving the teacher to chance, is expensive and absolutely ineffective."

Next he deals with the shibboleth of the scientist:

"What precisely do we mean by the term science? What do we wish to be at when we set apart a million and odd every year for scientific and technical instruction? Are we interested in promoting scientific habits of thought among the majority of our countrymen? Or are we not rather interested in diffusing the knowledge of some of the results which have been achieved by scientific men because we believe that this knowledge is useful for commercial purposes? . . . Alas, my Lady Science, your reputation was not particularly good when you were supposed to be married to the magician, and you have not materially improved it by your more recent flirtation with the bagman!"

And how this epidemic of bagman's science has infected even the ancient seats of learning may be seen in the recent attempt to establish—Heaven save the mark!—a "final honour school of agriculture" at Oxford: a proposal happily defeated, though by a bare majority. We are forcibly reminded here of a crafty device, exerted in a nobler cause, which played with unvarying success upon the dull cupidity of the British parent. Whenever difficulties were objected to a promising boy being placed upon the classical side of a certain school, it was pointed out by the head master that Greek was, to all intents and purposes, a modern language, and would, therefore, be of the greatest practical value for business objects, should the lad in question elect later on to discard scholarship for the Levantine sponge trade, or any other department of Oriental commerce.

Two scraps more and we have finished with quotation: "No subjects, not even Latin and Greek, have a moralising influence upon the pupil if they are taught by men whose ideal, both of learning and of responsibility to their pupils, is limited to enabling them to pass some definite standard in an examination." Thus much for the commercialism of the crammer; next for the inanities of the psychologist: "Much time may be wasted over pedagogic literature—Froebel and the rest. The practical difficulties of teaching are not surmounted by acquaintance with psychological theorists."

A good many other defects, errors, and shortcomings in our educational arrangements are noticed, to which we have previously called attention in these columns. Such are the need for substituting one uniform scheme of school examinations for the multitudinous and heterogeneous tests that now bewilder the parent and embarrass the teacher; the imbecility of the present mode of selection for the public services, in which physical qualifications are, even for the army, virtually disregarded; the quaint preference for wholly inexperienced men shown by governing bodies when electing to headships; and the combined injustice and absurdity of what Mr. Tarver styles the clerical domination, a dying domination, it is true, but which has yet to receive its coup de grâce.

To say that we hold with every statement and every opinion put forward in these essays would be to assert that two of a trade ever entirely agree, which would be flying in the face of proverbial philosophy. We fall foul, for example, of much of the contents of chapter vii. The arguments therein adduced against the training of masters are not very convincing, and, mutatis mutandis, would apply equally well to training for any calling or profession. What would be thought of the view that Bob Sawbones should not be instructed in the most approved methods of amputating a leg, and that Tommy Atkins should not be taught to shoulder arms after a particular fashion, because it "would destroy their inventiveness"? As with his Epistle Adulatory at the outset, so in chapter vi., the author gets a little tedious over his hero-worshipping of a doubtless estimable but obscure person, about whom those who had not the advantage of his personal acquaintance will experience some difficulty in working up an enthusiasm. Still, we were told in the dedication that this was to be a dull book, and we must therefore not complain if Mr. Tarver, finding it hard to be dull, laid himself out with especial effort to vindicate his promise in one solitary chapter. We will only remark in passing that it is curious that the "Ideal Teacher" of writers on Education is invariably a master who is unable to keep order in his class-room. Our conscience is pricked by the reflection that the colleagues whom we have felt constrained gently but firmly to remove, on this manifestly groundless score, were clearly ideal teachers, and we, blinded by our coarse and barbaric notions, never saw it!

A strange slip occurs on p. 5, where Caxton is antedated by a century, and there is a stray misprint here and there: "head master" of St. Paul's School for "high master" (p. 15), "Sherbourne" for "Sherborne" (p. 49), Sir Thomas "Moore" for "More" (p. 55). In the second paragraph of p. 259 for "proprietary" (three times) we should surely read "private."

But we must gird no more. The book is distinctly one to be read, and that not only by those actually engaged in teaching, but even more by persons who are, or who may become, concerned in the government of our schools. Let these last not omit, or take offence at, the final chapter addressed "To the County Councillor." Let such commit to heart the pregnant sentence with which the author closes: a warning "against the prevailing tendency to encourage people to think rather of what they shall get by education than of what they shall be."

BIRDS IN LONDON.

Birds in London. By W. H. Hudson, F.Z.S. (Longmans.)

To apprehend the troubles that afflict Mr. W. H. Hudson it is necessary to understand his personal equation as a writer, for he holds a place distinctly his own. It is not quite that of a learned ornithologist. Here, for instance, he makes no pretension to furnish an exhaustive list of birds that have been seen in London, and accordingly has not rummaged the old newspaper files wherein the facts are duly recorded. That is a task still to be accomplished, although several old and incomplete lists are in existence. Many a strange bird of prey has hovered above the traffic of Fleet-street, many a strange songster has alighted in Hyde Park. Concerning these occurrences he seems to feel but an attenuated interest. Nor is he of the vivid word-painting school of out-door essayists whose ambition is to make animated pictures of bird-life. On the contrary, his aim is to preach kindness to the inferior part of creation, and his creed well may be: "He prayeth best who loveth best all things both great and small." And so the best of this book lies in such passages as that describing "Afternoon Tea" in Hyde Park, when the workman, shouldering his tools, halts to throw the remains of his dinner to the sparrow and cushat, and nursemaids stop their perambulators while the children scatter crumbs, and a bond of kindness unites man and bird. Incidentally he lets you know it to be his own custom in hard weather to buy pennyworths of sprats to feast the gulls who come to him when times are hard.

But, as Mr. Tulliver would have said, "it is a puzzling world" to a man with a notion of this kind, for true gentleness does not exist, except in the breast of a few amiable persons. Nature herself has cruel methods of keeping her tribes in order, and Mr. Hudson is compelled to lift up his burden against other than two-footed marauders. There are greedy pike in Wanstead Lake who inspire him with doubt "if the wild duck, teal, little grebe, and moorhen succeed in rearing many young in this most dangerous water." His fears are somewhat exaggerated, and betray a certain unfamiliarity with wild life, which we have noticed before in his writing. The truth is, that it is an exceptional occurrence for "the fresh water shark" to attack feather. With more reason he bewails the multitude of rats—the most destructive and cunning of quadrupeds. Then there is that egg-stealing villain, the jay, whom he would fain preserve for his pretty tints, and execute for his robberies. Worst of all, there is that product of civilisation, the ownerless, wandering cat. In an army, as he calculates, of nigh a hundred thousand, it prowls by night in park and square and garden, destroying and devouring. He devotes a whole chapter to the discussion of this great "cat question," but without arriving at any very practical result. A policeman cannot catch a stray cat as easily as if it were a dog, and modern ingenuity has not yet devised a cat-proof wire fence. So much is he impressed by the importance of the matter that he adjures the County Council to come to the rescue.

The history of bird-life in London abounds in what is curious and interesting. At one time white spoonbills and herons used to build together in the Bishop's grounds at Fulham. The spoonbill has almost forsaken England now, but the heronries at Richmond Park and Wanstead still remain to delight metropolitan lovers of nature. In old books so frequent are the references to the kites that used to be seen all over the town, but were particularly numerous about Covent Garden, that it is difficult to realise how rare the bird has become. Another familiar of street and park was the magpie—Waterton, a naturalist of the present century, records that he saw twenty-three all together in Kensington Gardens. Over the whole country this bird is decreasing in numbers. A "Son of the Marshes" has told us it is so rare in Surrey that he comes to the London parks to see it. Mr. Hudson believes, however, that the three or four visible there are only estrays from confinement, and unfortunately they seem to be all hens, so that no breeding has yet taken place. Sadly does he lament the disappearance of the old London rookeries—that at Gray's Inn being the only one left. The rook is so very numerous in the country, however, that it has become a plague to the agricultural fraternity. We can assure him also that the daw's retreat from town is not due to diminution—his is as yet far from being near the fate of the chough, most picturesque and most unfortunate of the family. The carrion crow, wild as he is, delights in our parks, or would delight if his thievish and cannibal propensities did not make of him "a wolf's-head" among birds. Mr. Hudson's regret that "the stately raven" has practically vanished even from the outskirts of the town will be widely shared.

On the other hand, there are many compensations. Some birds unknown to an earlier generation of Londoners may be observed in the very heart of the city. That interesting bird the dabchick every spring comes to make its floating nest in St. James's Pond, flies away in autumn, and annually renews its visit. Wood-pigeons have established many colonies in London; an illustration represents one sitting on the head of Shakespeare's bust in Leicester-square, and this shy woodlander in Regent's Park and Hyde Park has grown as tame as a Museum pigeon. Equally curious is the self-made tameness of the wild duck, which has taken to nest in the crowns of the oak pollards in Hyde Park, and whose young may be seen now running on the grass or swimming in the water. As companion it has the long-legged moorhen, which always has been a creature very friendly to man. Of the smaller birds Mr. Hudson writes too dolefully. Far more care is taken of them now than used to be the case, and in the most severe weather they have a wide choice of balconies and gardens where food and water are placed for them. They may not breed so plentifully in the public gardens, but they certainly do so as freely as ever in private grounds and gardens. No doubt, however, in order to attain the object and enforce the moral of the book—the need of further protection—it was necessary to make the account as black as possible.

BRIEFER MENTION.

What is Socialism? By "Scotsburn."
(Isbister & Co.)

If any of our readers turn to this book in the hope of finding a coherent answer to the question propounded in its title, they will be disappointed. "Scotsburn" has compiled, with much diligence, a long series of extracts from the abundant but ephemeral literature of Socialism. These he strings together, sometimes printing several pages of them in succession without so much as a note of introduction, and from the medley thus produced he creates a grotesque figure which he labels "Socialism." To this absurdity he adds, from time to time, the Kaiser William (p. 68), the Russian Emperor (p. 71), Ex-President Cleveland waving the Monroe doctrine (p. 96), and even President Kruger, and then shrieks out that these and the monster Socialism are the "beginning of the end of the British Empire." It is quite impossible to take either the author or his book seriously. He writes as one in a nightmare, takes all his own assumptions for granted, begs every question put to them, and becomes positively frantic whenever he thinks of the dreadful wickedness of those who attack his cherished prejudices. Nor, while the matter of the book is thus so bad, can anything more favourable be said of its manner. An example or two may suffice. He describes (p. 2) the subjects embraced and the interests attacked by "Socialism," and proceeds:

"It is not too much to say, that the generally accepted ideas and opinions, various and remote as they may be from each other in their forms, concerning all and each of these, and probably of innumerable other questions dear in some form or other to the heart of everyone of us, Socialism antagonises and struggles to subvert."

How delightful! And what can he mean? A little further on he finds it impossible to unravel a somewhat similar tangle himself, without perpetrating the most delightful mixed metaphors. At p. 4, he describes a difficulty which rises "like a stone wall" before the Socialist, but on p. 5 it has become "a rock of unpleasantly formidable dimensions," and subsequently, on the same page, "a maw of insatiable craving" into which the Socialist has to fling his principles! Whole columns could be filled with equally amusing extracts, leading one to surmise that, in spite of his pen-name, "Scotsburn" really hails from the sister isle. But to what end should we devote time and space to this object? Nobody interested in the Socialist controversy will doubt that there is room for serious criticism of Socialist doctrines. In every European country Socialism knocks at the door of civilisation and asks uncomfortable questions—such as, whether unfettered individual competition is a principle to which the regulation of industry may safely be entrusted? and, whether the conflict of private interests will ever produce a well-ordered commonwealth? We may not like these questions to be put, but it is no answer to them to retort, as "Scotsburn" does, that some Socialists are Atheists, or that most of them are rogues, fools, or poor and ignorant persons. Nor does he dispose of the Socialist solutions to these problems by expostulating that the dearest prejudices of his heart would be destroyed if that "incessant private war, which," as Sir Henry Maine says, "leads each man to strive to place himself on another's shoulders and remain there," were removed. The book is futile. It possesses neither index nor bibliography, and leaves one wondering what could have induced any publisher to issue it.

Life in an Old English Town. By Mary Dormes Harris. "Social England Series."
(Sonnenschein.)

For the purposes of simplifying her task the author has taken Coventry, which in many ways is typical, and has described its life, government, and religion in medieval times. Her work has been done with much care and thoroughness, although we could wish for a hint of vivacity here and there. The archives of the town seem to have been most conscientiously examined, and all sources are acknowledged in footnotes, as they should be. To most persons the chapters dealing with "Daily Life in the Town" are likely to be of the greatest interest, but we have found the book readable throughout. In her account of Lady Godiva's ride, the author tells us that Peeping Tom is an accretion dating from as recent a period as the eighteenth century, not till seven hundred years after the ride. This is disappointing. Of another character, whom we merely glimpse, we should like to know more: John French, alchemist, who in 1477 intended "to practise a true and profitable conclusion in the cunning of transmutacion of meteals to" the "profyt and pleasur of" the king's grace, and was therefore, by the king's order, never to be

"letted, troubled, or vext of his seid labor and practise, to th' entent that he at his good liberte may shewe vnto vs and such as be by vs therfor appointed the cler effect of his said conclusions."

The entry, however, setting forth thus much concerning John French is the last word of him. For the benefit of the ingenious Mr. Emmens, of New York, it would be interesting to know what became of the Coventry alchemist. One little point before we leave this book. The author (we know not whether to call her Mrs. or Miss) in her preface thanks the editor of the series for "useful suggestions." Surely such indebtedness should be understood.

Flower Favourites. By Lizzie Deas. (George Allen.)

MISS DEAS has ransacked old and new authors for fact and fancy concerning flowers, and the result is a pleasant bundle of erudition. This, of the origin of clematis, is the kind of thing:

"The Cossacks were at war with the Tartars, and on one occasion, finding the latter too strong for them, turned and ran away. At this the Cossack leader, ashamed and indignant, struck his forehead with the handle of his pike, whereupon instantly there arose a wild tempest which hurled the cowardly Cossacks high into the air, pounded them to thousands of fragments, and mingled their dust with that of the Tartars. From the dust sprung the clematis integrifolia. But so troubled were the souls of the Cossacks knowing their bones to be mingled with the earth of the hated foreigners, that they prayed God to disseminate them in their beloved Ukraine, where the young girls would pluck and weave into garlands the flowers of the Tziganka [the name for the clematis in Little Russia]. God heard and granted the prayer, and it is a popular belief in Little Russia that if only every man would hang a Tziganka from his waist-belt, all the dead Cossacks would again come to life."

This legend, though somewhat steep, will serve. Among the other plants whose history Miss Deas has unravelled are the rose, the lily, the poppy, the tulip, the narcissus, the marigold, chicory, daffodil, and leek.

Bird Neighbours. By Neltje Blanchan. (S. Low & Co.)

THIS is a noble volume, with as many illustrations in colours as there are weeks in the year, and an introduction by Mr. John Burroughs, and everything handsome about it. And its sub-title is: "An Introductory Acquaintance with One Hundred and Fifty Birds Commonly Found in the Gardens, Meadows, and Woods about our Homes." "Now," we said, "we shall be able to take a country walk to some purpose; we shall at last know a starling from a thrush, and a wren from a cassowary, and what the bird is that sings in the apple-tree." But when we looked down the index it was full of bobolinks and phœbes, chickadees and cat-birds, juncos and blue-birds, thrashers and flickers, wax-wings and tanagers; and to a steady, stay-at-home Englishman what is the use of that? But when we visit New England we shall be wonderfully up in its feather lore. For the benefit of inquirers in this country who share our ignorance concerning birds and our curiosity, a similar work might be issued with profit. There are, of course, popular guides to ornithology in some numbers, but we know of none so well arranged and presented as this. An enterprising publisher might look to it.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

HELBECK OF BANNISDALE.

BY MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

Mrs. Ward's new novel has a charming heroine who is realised with great skill—Laura Fountain—and around her this sad, sincere story moves. The scene is laid in Westmoreland in the Catholic home of Bannisdale, where the Helbecks have lived for twenty generations. The master belongs to the third order of St. Francis, has given himself and his goods to his church, is a confirmed bachelor, and an ascetic. Enters Laura Fountain, young, charming, intelligent and a Pagan —. The book ends in tragedy. (Smith, Elder & Co. 464 pp. 6s.)

EVELYN INNES.

BY GEORGE MOORE.

Evelyn Innes is dedicated to "Arthur Symons and W. B. Yeats, two contemporary writers with whom I am in sympathy." It is a "musical" novel, and traces the career of the heroine from the time she clambered on her father's knee to her ten days' retreat in a convent at Wimbledon. Between whiles—that is in the 480 pages of the book—Evelyn becomes a great prima donna, and has other experiences. For the writer is Mr. George Moore. We are promised a sequel, to be called Sister Teresa. (T. Fisher Unwin. 480 pp. 6s.)

JOHN BURNET OF BARNES. BY JOHN BUCHAN.

Mr. Buchan, though still at Oxford, has written short stories, long romances, and has won the Newdigate. This is his second romance. The story opens in June, 1678; the hero, a boy, is fishing the Tweed. The narrative is of adventure, of true love, of a rival; and the style is crisp and studied. The chapter headings show the author's manner. They are such as these: "How I Rode to the South," "Of the Man with One Eye and the Encounter in the Green Cleuch," "How Three Men Held a Town in Terror." (John Lane. 444 pp. 6s.)

ADVENTURES OF THE COMTE

DE LA MUETTE. BY BERNARD CAPES.

Hardly have we finished and admired The Lake of Wine, than Mr. Capes is ready with another book. The period of this story is the Reign of Terror, it is told in the first person, and is a lively and romantic piece, with some impressive scenes of the Terror. The Younger Generation are either Meredithians or Stevensonians. Read the passage that follows, and you will know under which Captain Mr. Capes fights: "Oh, but this was the devil of an embarrassment! I had sat out sermons that stabbed me below the belt at every lunge." (W. Blackwood & Sons. 301 pp. 6s.)

THE WOOINGS OF JEZEBEL

PETTYFER. BY HALDANE MCFALL.

The West Indian negro has too long suffered neglect. Here is an attempt to depict him to the life; his virtues and vices, his superstitions and amusements, his fun and his grief. The result is a mixture of fiction and ethnology. Jezebel Pettyfer plays only a secondary part: the central figure of the book is Masheen Dyle (so-called because he once stole a sewing machine), thief and humorist, cynic and Lothario. (Grant Richards. 403 pp. 6s.)

AUNT JUDITH'S

ISLAND.

BY F. C. CONSTABLE.

"A Comedy of Kith and Kin," by the author of The Curse of Intellect. Aunt Judith is a strong-minded millionairess who is bent upon the reconciliation of all members of her family—they range from peers to butlers—and the salvation of a company of Armenians from the persecutions of the Porte. As a refuge for herself, her kin, and the Armenians, she buys an island in the Mediterranean, establishes a monarchy thereon, and defies the Powers by astute diplomacy. (Grant Richards. 360 pp. 6s.)

SUN BEETLES.

BY THOMAS PINKERTON.

A social satire by one who fights under the flag of Mr. Meredith. The class examined and laid bare is the newly rich and the parasites who are pleased to be their guests. The leading character is a methodical millionaire, a kind of Willoughby Patterne grown older; and the story shows him the butt of certain amusing schemers in a Thames-side town. As in all Mr. Pinkerton's books, there are some engaging canine characters. (John Lane. 250 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE WHEEL OF GOD. BY GEORGE EGERTON.

The first long novel by the author of Keynotes and Discords. The book is a detailed psychological study, the subject being a sensitive, emotional girl among unsympathetic people. The author's analytical power has full play. (Grant Richards. 322 pp. 6s.)

MARJORY MAXWELL.

BY IDA JACKSON.

This appears to be Miss Jackson's second. It is a tender little tale. "Can you give yourself to me?" asks "the Rev. Thomas." "I can—I will," unhesitatingly rejoined Marjory, a rosy tint suffusing her face, and a wondrously beautiful smile rippling upon her lips, as she put both her hands into her lover's, and allowed him to raise them to his lips, and kiss them again and again. To what other extravagant demonstration of his happiness the minister of Staneridge might have been carried was a second later stopped short by the recollection of his public surroundings." (Edinburgh: Small. 272 pp. 5s.)

THE MUTINEER.

BY LOUIS BECKE AND WALTER JEFFERY.

These authors have already collaborated in A First Fleet Family. This is a stirring romance of Pitcairn Island, and it all happened before Pitcairn was "discovered." (Fisher Unwin. 298 pp. 6s.)

IN THE SWIM. BY RICHARD HENRY SAVAOG.

Yet another novel by the spirited and inexhaustible author of My Official Wife. "A story," he calls it, "of currents and undercurrents in gayest New York." The narrative bustles breathlessly forward. Here is a sentence: "'I'll give you carte blanche as my guest, Vreeland,' laughed Potter, 'You can take anybody you want on my yacht—save only that bright-eyed devil Dickie.'" Another: "'He asks you to cable him your decision!'" said the Queen of the Street. 'I have simply telegraphed, "Impossible! I decline,"' answered Vreeland, and then, in the silence, the shade of Judas Iscariot laughed far down in hell." (Routledge. 361 pp. 2s. 6d.)

STEPHEN BRENT.

BY PHILIP LAFARGUE.

A new novel in two volumes—truly a return to the past! The author—who wrote The New Judgment of Paris—is addicted to light conversation. In one chapter the Novel is under discussion, when someone expresses the heresy: "Never go to Academies for fresh observations of life; it isn't their business." An amusing book, rich in modern types. (Constable. 238 pp. and 284 pp. 12s.)

THE INEVITABLE.

BY DOWNING TALBOT.

The trivial life, long drawn out. "She stopped herself suddenly, for she had discovered herself indulging in a very wicked desire. Firstly, how wrong it was to wish to go to God's house for the sake of seeing a young gentleman." Someone else says: "At seventeen my admirers were many. At eighteen Mr. Fortescue had won me; and at nineteen I was married. . . . We had not been married more than six months before he openly told me that I was but one of his many playthings." (Digby & Long. 412 pp. 6s.)

PHEBE TILSON.

BY F. P. HUMPHREY.

Phebe was a spinster of Massachusetts rising forty; she had never been really young; and when her betrothal to the fascinating Emery was announced, Mrs. Pratt "felt it in her very bones that that weddin' wa'n't never to be." When Emery at the last moment cried off, and the wedding party found itself short of the groom, "Phoebe said in a voice steady and clear: 'You can all go. There's nothing to wait for. Good day.'" So there was grit in the maiden who never had been young. She promises well. (Ward, Lock. 307 pp. 3s. 6d.)

CLEMENT CARLILE'S DREAM.

BY BELTON OTTERBURN.

There seems to have been some confusion of a spook with a powder barrel. When it was dramatically cleared up, Lucy put her head out of the window and "yelled like fury." But the men smoked the "choicest cigars"; and when one of them told another about his dream, the hearer looked "thunder-struck with astonishment." To be rightly enjoyed, the book should be read in the spirit in which it was written. (Digby & Long. 326 pp. 6s.)

GRACE O'MALLEY.

BY ROBERT MACHRAY.

This spirited lady was a chieftainess of the O'Malleys, notorious pirates. She frequently rebelled against the government of Elizabeth, but found time to become the mother of the first Viscount Mayo. The present story is put into the mouth of a certain Ruari Macdonald, her chief lieutenant, and winds up with a double wedding, the Pirate Queen being one of the brides. (Cassells. 338 pp.)

LEDDY MARGET. By L. B. WALFORD.

She was "a girl of eighty." The phrase, apart, sounds grotesque; but the portrait of the buoyant little old woman, with the tastes and the recreations, the faith and the simplicity, of a child, is sweet. The slight tale breathes the spirit that Mrs. Walford's admirers value. (Longmans. 233 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

The Indiscretions of Lady Asenath. By Basil Thomson. (A. D. Innes & Co.)

ONE man of genius and two or three writers of unquestionable talent have dealt with the life of the natives of the South Sea Islands, but none has set it forth to better purpose, with greater intimacy or sympathy, than Mr. Basil Thomson in his Indiscretions of Lady Asenath. There can hardly be a doubt that if the quick imagination and absorptive intelligence of R. L. S. had known the Samoans longer, and had closer communion with them, we should have had from him a better book than any he produced about the people he loved so well; but, that failing, we have in The Indiscretions of Lady Asenath the best, the most satisfying, and the most suggestive book that has yet been done on the Melanesians. Mr. Basil Thomson's book is not a novel, nor a collection of short stories, nor, spite of its taking title, is there much indiscretion expounded, however hinted at. It is rather to be described as a set of sketches shrewdly and craftily bitten in. For the purpose of exposition that method is, probably, better than the imaginative way of fiction; and exposition is evidently Mr. Thomson's purpose—exposition of ordinary details of life, of manners and customs, and of extraordinary matters of belief and superstition.

Lady Asenath is a Fijian princess; and her indiscretions are little other than the expression of the revolt of her shrewd, gay, and intelligent mind, from the overlay (the aberglaube, as Matthew Arnold was wont solemnly to describe that kind of thing), the veneer, which European civilisation and religion strive to impose upon the nature of the South Sea Islander. Let us say at once that Lady Asenath, whether creation or portrait, is a most engaging woman. Here is the agreeable account of her birth and upbringing, which (as will be noted) contains subtly injected into the narrative a good deal of the lore of Fijian custom:

"Her mother, when her time drew near, slipped quietly away to a little shed built secretly in the bush. . . . There were great rejoicings when the infant Asenath was carried home. Oiled and powdered thick with turmeric, she fell to upon her first meal, a mouthful of eandle-nut juice, which made her very sick. Then, for three days, she was consigned to the wet nurse, and on the fourth her mother sat with her to receive the presents from her loyal people. She cost her country dear, for the yam harvest was not yet, and there must be feasts for each of her accomplishments: the feast of the tenth day; of the 'turning,' when she could turn over on a mat; of the 'crawling,' when she first progressed by wriggling. As she grew, she was made to suffer for her rank, for she was 'forbidden the sunshine.' Her playfellows might go fishing in the shallows, or wallow in the warm mud of the salt-pans, but she must chafe in the gloom of a darkened house, bleaching her brown skin; also, being of noble birth, she might not wear any clothing until the initiatory feast was made, and it chanced that a period of great scarcity deferred this ceremony long beyond the fitting age, so that for nearly two years, though grown to womanhood, she dared not venture out of doors until the night had veiled her. Then some Peeping Tom might have caught a glimpse of a bronze statue fleeing to the cover of the mangrove to vent her pent-up girlhood in lonely gambols. It is in this strange childhood that I like to find excuses for the Lady Asenath's sympathy with youth, her love of midnight frolic, and her perennial girliness."

Her freedom from restraint is also partly to be accounted for by the fact that her years were still tender when she lost her father. He died fighting; and Lady Asenath would tell of his fate without emotion: "He was clubbed when the sun was setting, and the chiefs of Sambeto ate him." Of her grandfather Navula, the Moon, it is told how he paid a great and elaborate compliment to the English missionary who received him into the Christian fold; with the simplest desire to be princely in his hospitality he invited the missionary to a feast of human flesh, delicately baked and browned!

Where all is so admirably done—done with so much knowledge and at the same time with so much reticence, done with so much humour and so much sympathy—and when all is conveyed in a style of such agreeable suppleness and compass, it is invidious to single out chapters or passages for especial praise. We recall the story of the man who would not be imprisoned, the account of the sacred circle of stones and the secret rites, and, on the humorous side, the amazing football and cricket matches; but there cling closest to our memory the excellent description of the balolo-fishing and the whole of the last chapter of all, "The Passing of Asenath," which is nothing less than a masterpiece of writing and of exposition of the Fijian beliefs concerning death and the future life—the native beliefs, that is, before Christianity wrecked them. And, as Lady Asenath represents for us the gay, unmoral, idolatrous Fijian, so does Bishop Wesele (and, in a smaller measure, Chaplain Michael) represent most tenderly and touchingly the native mind struggling through its centuries-old overlay of superstition towards the better and freer conditions of the Christian code.

The book, let it be said in conclusion, is a perfect storehouse of delightful character and lore, sufficient to furnish forth a cart-load of South Sea romances,

Spanish John. By William McLennan. (Harper & Brothers.)

THIS story has all the materials for fine romance. It is concerned with a romantic cause and its most dramatic moment. The hero goes to the Scots college in Rome; he takes his share in Continental wars, and returns at last to his own land only to find the Prince an exile, his clan broken, and his mission fruitless. The author, we understand, is a Scoto-Canadian, and he has read his Jacobite history with care. The crowds of priests, Irish adventurers, soldiers of fortune, swindling Highland lairds, and needy caterans who formed the rearguard of the hopeless rebellion, are portrayed with accuracy and diligence. Here is all the stuff of the dramatic; but what profits it all if the spirit be wanting?

And wanting the spirit assuredly is. We have read the book with a sympathetic mind, and found it lifeless. There is one good character, Father O'Rourke, but he is spoiled by the dulness of his company. One scene—that of the holding of the Black Pass—approaches vigour, but it tails off into the commonplace. The story is a tangle, a collection of blind alleys and paths which promise interest but end in bog. There is no lack of care in construction, but it is the care which prompts an author to make industrious use of material which he has amassed, and not the patient labouring of the artist. There is nothing of the breeze and swing of good narrative, no subtlety in the characters, no feeling for the passion and mystery and despair of this great tragedy. It is simply a piece of second-rate history, none the less historical in its manner because its matter is fictitious.

And the pity is great when we reflect on the chance that has been missed. The people who walk on stilts through these pages are the very chosen folk of romance. Lovat, bent with age and ill-living, who carried the subtlest brain in the land behind his mask-like face, the "gentle Lochiel," the Secretary Murray, the blindly faithful and disreputable clansmen, and the inevitable traitors of the Allan Knock class—here is the matter for great drama. The novel of the 'Forty-five remains to be written, for Scott and Stevenson have only played with the fringes of the thing, and the common historical botcher has not got beyond a hasty glance. But the man who would write it must have an eye for the subtle and strange in character, and the nerve to achieve the dramatic. He must feel the whole moving irony of this vain endeavour, and he must put into his words the very grey and black of the hard country where the struggle was ended.

A Woman in Grey. By Mrs. C. N. Williamson. (Routledge.)

A Woman in Grey is a multiplication ad infinitum of murders, oubliettes, secret panels, trap-doors, poisons, and a thousand and one other uncanny things. And there is a special terror in the shape of a tiger, who disposes of his victims—don't ask us how many—in an ordinary English country house. If you like this kind of story, read A Woman in Grey.

GUIDE BOOK SUPPLEMENT
TO
THE ACADEMY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1898.

MURRAY'S HANDBOOKS.

Mr. MURRAY begs to call attention to the "Index and Directory" with which the newer Editions of his Handbooks are supplied. These contain all information as to Hotels, Conveyances, &c, and are constantly kept up to date, so that purchasers of his Guide Books are always supplied with the very latest information.

ENGLISH HANDBOOKS.

"The general quality of Murray, the scientific character of the information, the accuracy and interest of the historical particulars, to say nothing of the lowness of the price, place his Guides far ahead of any competitors."—Saturday Review.

HANDBOOK for ENGLAND and WALES. Arranged Alphabetically, with List of Railway Stations, Hotels, and all Places and Objects worth seeing. 1 vol. Maps. 12s.

HANDBOOK for SCOTLAND. Thoroughly Revised, with Special detailed information for Pedestrians, and entirely new Maps. Printed on specially thin and light paper. 9s. [Now ready.]

HANDBOOK for IRELAND. New and thoroughly Revised Edition. With entirely new Set of Maps and Plans. Printed on specially light and thin paper. 9s. [In a few days.]

EASTERN COUNTIES: Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridge. 12s.

KENT. 7s. 6d.

SUSSEX. 6s.

SURREY. 6s.

HANTS. 6s.

ISLE of WIGHT. 2s. 6d.

HERTS, BEDS, and HUNTS. 7s. 6d.

OXFORDSHIRE. Oxford with its Colleges. 6s.

WILTS, DORSET, and SOMERSET. 12s.

WORCESTER and HEREFORD. 5s.

GLOUCESTER. 6s.

DEVON. 7s. 6d.

CORNWALL. 6s.

NORTH WALES. 6s.

SOUTH WALES. 6s.

NORTHAMPTON and RUTLAND. 7s. 6d.

DERBY, NOTTS, LEICESTER, and STAFFORD. 9s.

SHROPSHIRE and CHESHIRE. 6s.

LANCASHIRE. 6s.

YORKSHIRE. 12s.

LINCOLNSHIRE. 7s. 6d.

DURHAM and NORTHUMBERLAND. 10s.

THE LAKE DISTRICT of WESTMORELAND and CUMBERLAND. 6s.

EUROPEAN HANDBOOKS FOR SUMMER TRAVEL.

FRANCE, Part I.: Normandy, Brittany, The Seine and Loire, Bordeaux, the Pyrenees, &c. Thirty-six Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

FRANCE, Part II.: Central France, Auvergne, The Cevennes, Burgundy, The Rhone and Saone, Provence, Marseilles, Alsace-Lorraine, Champagne, &c. Twenty-three Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

HOLLAND and BELGIUM. Eighteen Maps and Plans. 6s.

DENMARK and ICELAND, Schleswig, Holstein, Copenhagen, Jutland, and Iceland. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

SWEDEN, Stockholm, Upsala, Gothenburg, The Shores of the Baltic, &c. Maps and Plans. 6s.

NORWAY, Christiania, Bergen, Trondhjem, The Fjelds and Fjords. With special Information for Fishermen and Cyclists. By T. MICHELL, C.B., H.B.M. Consul-General for Norway. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

RUSSIA, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Finland, Crimea, Caucasus, &c. Edited by T. MICHELL, C.B., H.B.M. Consul-General for Norway. Maps and Plans. 18s.

THE RHINE and NORTH GERMANY, The Black Forest, The Hartz, Saxon Switzerland, The Giant Mountains, Elsass, and Lothringen. Eighty-two Maps and Plans. 10s.

SOUTH GERMANY, AUSTRIA, Tyrol, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, Salsburg, Styria, Hungary, and the Danube, from Ulm to the Black Sea. Two Parts. Thirty-four Maps and Plans. Part I., 7s. 6d.; Part II., 6s.

SWITZERLAND, Alps of Savoy and Piedmont, Italian Lakes, and Part of Dauphiné. Maps. Two Parts.

Part I.—The Bernese Oberland, Geneva, Lucerne, Engadine, &c. 6s.

Part II.—The Alps of Savoy and Piedmont, Italian Lakes, and Part of Dauphiné. 6s.

NORTH ITALY and VENICE, Turin, Milan, The Italian Lakes, Verona, Padua, Venice, Genoa, &c. Edited by H. W. PULLEN, M.A. With Thirty-four Maps and Plans. 10s.

CENTRAL ITALY and FLORENCE, Tuscany, Umbria, The Marches, &c. Edited by H. W. PULLEN, M.A. With Twenty-four Maps and Plans. 6s.

MURRAY'S CYCLISTS' ROAD-BOOKS.

CYCLISTS' ROAD-BOOK, from London, through Chichester, Portsmouth, Southampton to the New Forest, and back by Romsey, Winchester, Dorking, Leatherhead, and Epsom. Illustrated by a Road Atlas at the end of the Book. Fcap. 8vo, 2s.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.
6s. net, claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."
"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

|   |                      |
|---|----------------------|
| BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.                               | THE CHANNEL ISLANDS. |
| THE NORTH WALES COAST.                                    | THE ISLE of WIGHT.   |
| BRECON and its BEACONS.                                   | THE WYE VALLEY.      |
| ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.                              | THE SEVERN VALLEY.   |
| BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.              |                      |
| BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.         |                      |
| LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.         |                      |
| ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH and ABERDOVEY.         |                      |
| BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORICCIETH and PWLLHELL.      |                      |
| MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and OHELTHENHAM. |                      |
| LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.              |                      |

NOTICE.

On JULY 1st will be Issued an ENLARGED EDITION, 5s.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS,

(By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.)

With Descriptions of the Tate Gallery, Passmore Edwards Settlement, Blackwall Tunnel, &c., and an additional Index of 4,500 References to Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

IMPORTANT.

All who are interested in books, either as readers, authors, purchasers, or vendors, should subscribe to the

PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

ESTABLISHED 1837.

Among the many attractions of its columns the following may be mentioned:—

Literary articles (including leader on some prominent topic of the moment), announcements of forthcoming volumes, notes on current events in connection with the publishing world, reviews (often illustrated) of new books and magazines, correspondence, &c., &c. An exceedingly valuable feature of the paper is the list of

NEW BOOKS OF THE WEEK

(the most complete list issued) giving the full title, size, price, and publisher, with an index of subjects and name of book and author in one alphabet. Also in every number upwards of a thousand

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

are advertised for, thus affording readers an excellent opportunity either of disposing of their own scarce volumes or purchasing others that they may be in need of; and attention is particularly drawn to the fact that annual subscribers have the privilege of a four-line advertisement free each week in this column. They also receive a gratis copy of the large special Christmas Number—a handsome quarto volume containing over 250 illustrations.

As an advertising medium in connection with books, the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record stands unrivalled.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR can be had by sending Postal Order or Stamps to Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Limited, the Proprietors, St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, London, to whom all money-payments should be made.

|  |          |
|--|----------|
| For One Year, post-free to any part of Great Britain and Ireland...      | 8s. 6d.  |
| " Six Months ditto ditto ditto ...                                       | 4s. 6d.  |
| " Three Months ditto ditto ditto ...                                     | 2s. 6d.  |
| To America and the Continent, the Annual Subscription, including postage | 11s. 6d. |

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

J. M. DENT & CO.

WITH SKI and SLEDGE over ARCTIC GLACIERS. By Sir WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, M.A., F.S.A., F.R.G.S. With Illustrations from Photographs by E. J. Garwood. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

MEDIAEVAL TOWN SERIES.—First Volume.

THE STORY OF PERUGIA.

By MARGARET SYMONDS and LINA DUFF-GORDON.

With Illustrations by Miss Helen James, and a Plan. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Perugia" is a very charming book, which gives a better idea of mediæval Italy and the mediæval man than many more pretentious volumes."

SCENES in the THIRTY DAYS' WAR between GREECE and TURKEY. By HENRY W. NEVINSON, War Correspondent to the Daily Chronicle. With Illustrations from Photographs and Maps. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
TRUTH.—"Incomparably the most brilliant and sympathetic account of the many I have read."

IN PURSUIT of the TROUT. By George A. B. DEWAR. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Square fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE CRICKETER'S BIRTHDAY BOOK. By PERCY CROSS STANDING. Fcap. 8vo, paper cover, 1s. 6d. net.

First large Cheap Edition exhausted, Second large Edition in preparation.
Crown 8vo, with Portrait of Author, 2s. net; also in demy 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. net.

QUO VADIS: a Narrative of Rome in the Time of Nero. By HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ. Translated from the Polish by JEREMIAH CURTIN. Of this book upwards of 700,000 copies have so far been sold in England and America.
TIMES.—"An exceptionally good novel....The scheme of the book is ambitious....The atmosphere is lurid, the scenes of extraordinary splendour....The whole novel is full of scenes little less exciting."

A SPRING SONG. By T. Nash (1600). With Illustrations by L. Leslie Brooke, printed in Colours by Edmund Evans. Paper cover, 1s. 6d. net; leather bindings at various prices.
SCOTSMAN.—"Charming drawings in colour, sweet and fresh as the poem itself."

THE CONTINONG: a Guide to France and to French (as she is spoken). By ANAR DE LA GRENOUILLERE, F.O.N.S. Third Edition. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net.
SCOTSMAN.—"An excellent little guide. The lively way in which it is written, and the practical quality of its advice, give it a place and value of its own."
Copies of the General Catalogue and of any Prospectus will be forwarded post free on application.

J. M. DENT & CO., 29 and 30, Bedford Street, W.C.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.

THE FIRST PHILOSOPHERS of GREECE. By Dr. ARTHUR FAIRBANKS. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Dr. Fairbanks has done his work well, and his book should prove useful for students of Greek philosophy."—The Times.

THE CID BALLADS, and other Poems and Translations from Spanish and German. By the late JAMES YOUNG GIBSON. Edited by MARGARET DUNLOP GIBSON. With Memoir by AGNES SMITH LEWIS. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 12s.

"They are far superior to Lockhart's."—Athenæum.
"One of the most important contributions made of recent years to our knowledge of this great branch of study."—Scotsman.
"The perusal of the ballads will show how completely Mr. Gibson has seized the heroic spirit and rendered the quaint expression of the originals."—Morning Post.

SIDELIGHTS of NATURE in QUILL and CRAYON: a Book of Descriptive and Picturesque Papers on Rural Life. By E. T. EDWARDS. Richly illustrated with 23 Illustrations by G. C. Harte, F.L.S., R.B.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Between them, author and artist give us a book that is daintily beautiful in form and spirit, and that gives us pleasure on every page."—Scotsman.

THE AGRICULTURAL SERIES.—New Volume.

THE CONVERSION of ARABLE LAND to PASTURE. By W. J. MALDEN. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL of EMILY SHORE. With Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This book is one of the most remarkable of its kind that have been published."
Saturday Review.

WHY WORSHIP? By the Rev. S. Pearson, M.A. Author of "Scholars of Christ," &c. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

COLLOQUY and SONG; or, Sport in Leash of the Muses. By B. J. M. DONNE. Crown 8vo, 5s.

A Volume of Verse.

TO MY MOTHER, and other Home Verses. By WILLIAM SCARNELL LEAN. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON; PATERNOSTER HOUSE, CHARING CROSS ROAD, W.C.

Guide Book Supplement.

SATURDAY: JUNE 11, 1898.

TOURIST LITERATURE.

MR. MURRAY'S HAND BOOKS.

A Handbook for Travellers in Scotland. Edited by Scott Moncrieff Penney. Seventh Edition (1898).

A Handbook for Travellers in Surrey (Including Aldershot). Fifth Edition (1898).

A Handbook of Travel-Talk. Eighteenth Edition.

MR. MURRAY'S Hand-Books to the Continent and to parts of the United Kingdom form a remarkable body of literature which has grown from small beginnings under the successive care of father and son. Mr. Murray lately communicated to a representative of the Pall Mall Gazette the interesting story of his father's first attempts to provide English tourists with Guide Books. The first volume he issued comprised North Germany, Holland, and Belgium. Previous to this venture only one Guide Book worthy of the name existed: this was Mrs. Starke's guide to Italy and Sicily, and even this owed much to Mr. Murray's assistance. The opening for good Guide Books seemed clear, and Mr. Murray began to make the compilation of these manuals his life work. He filled enormous note books with every scrap of information he could find. He devoted his holidays to travel, taking notes as he went of art treasures, roads, inns, everything. "When my father began his journeys," said Mr. Murray to his interviewer,

"not only had not a single railway been begun, but the highways of Germany were mere wheel-tracks in the deep sand amid ruts and boulders, and the journeys were made in a 'stuhlwagen,' a pliable basket on wheels, which bent in conformity with the ruts and stones over which it passed. He was among the first to descend the Danube from Pesh to Orsova, and did so in a timber barge which swept over reefs and whirlpools, where then no steamer could pass. In 1831 Mr. Murray explored the Dolomites, and the first description, other than a scientific one, ever given of them, appeared in his South Germany. This was followed by Switzerland and France, and in these the author had the assistance of his friend and fellow-traveller, William Brockedon, the artist. As the demand grew, the task passed beyond the powers of one man, and Mr. Murray secured able colleagues. Richard Ford undertook Spain, and his book has become a classic. Sir Francis Palgrave took North Italy; Sir George Bowen, Greece; Sir Lambert Playfair, Algiers and the Mediterranean; and Mr. George Dennis, the author of Cities of Etruria, edited Sicily. Since those days, the travelling public has much changed. The mass of those who travel over Europe now went only to Margate then. We concern ourselves less with countries close at hand, such as Holland or Belgium. Either they are well-known ground, or a sixpenny guide, such as the Great Eastern Company issues, answers all purposes; but for round about the Mediterranean, for Egypt, for Spain, for countries more distant still, our books have a great sale, and it is to perfecting those, and making a special feature of the artistic and historical side, that we devote our chief efforts, and we cater now for much the same public as we did in the beginning, only it has gone further afield."

Mr. Murray's foreign Guide Books now number nearly thirty. For Northern Europe there are seven works: France (in two volumes), Holland and Belgium, The Rhine and North Germany, Denmark and Iceland, Sweden, Norway, and Russia. In Central Europe we have the guides to North Germany and Switzerland. Southern Europe is divided into nine areas. Two volumes go to the Mediterranean Islands and Algeria and Tunis. Seven are allotted to the East, which section includes Mr. Murray's Guide Books to Egypt, The Holy Land, India, and Japan.

The home Guide Books also number about thirty. The two which lie before us, dealing with Scotland and Surrey, may be taken as representing the quality and character of Mr. Murray's entire body of Guide Books. Each of these volumes has been newly revised. Revision must be perpetually applied to Guide Books if in these days of railway expansion and growing wealth they are to be kept trustworthy: and revision has been reduced to a science by Mr. Murray. Railways, roads, inns, bye-laws, postal arrangements, and a hundred other variable institutions are watched, and changes are registered for the new edition. The present issue of the Handbook to Scotland takes account of the extension of the Dingwall and Skye line beyond Strome Ferry to Kyle of Loch Alsh, of the new Highland line from Aviemore to Inverness by Carr Bridge, and of the Cruden line, which gives access to beautiful shore scenery on the east coast of Aberdeenshire. There are also new large scale maps of the district round Dumfries, Galloway, and the west coast of Sutherland and Ross-shire. It is surely a proud boast that the editor makes when he says that he has now personally visited several times almost every place he describes, and has traversed all but a very few of the routes he lays down for travellers.

The mere method of attacking and arranging a work such as the Handbook to Scotland excites curiosity. Finished, the book lies lightly in one's hand, with its five hundred or so orderly pages, and its dozens of maps and plans, which are inserted and folded so neatly that although they number more than thirty, their presence is hardly suspected when the book is closed. The thought and organisation that go to the making and perfecting of such a book are hardly to be guessed at. But it is worth while to examine. Mr. Penney furnishes a general Introduction, divided into six sections. Here he gives general information as to ways of reaching Scotland, hints for travellers of various types, a word on Scottish antiquities, architecture, geology, Gaelic and Highland words and names of places, and a table of the heights of the most interesting of the Scottish mountains. The body of the work is in nine geographical sections selected for their convenience. They take the traveller gradually from Berwick to Cape Wrath, and beyond to the Orkneys and Shetlands. The editor's first word is in defence of the Lowlands, which he rightly contends are still far too much sacrificed to the more sublime charms of the Highlands. The Lowland country, he insists, excels the Highlands in the number and picturesque-ness of its ancient castles and buildings:

"The traveller, imbued with the recollection of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, The Abbot, &c., may repair to Melrose or Kelso, either directly from England or making the excursion from Edinburgh. He will there find himself in the most beautiful part of the valley of the Tweed, under the shadow of that picturesque and eerie knot of hills, The Eildons. He may spend hours among the exquisite ruins of Melrose, Kelso, and Jedburgh. He will go as a pilgrim to the Shrines of Dryburgh (where rest the remains of Sir Walter and his family), and to Abbotsford, not forgetting the Peel Tower of Smalholm, where Sir Walter spent his childhood. The view from Kelso Bridge over the Tweed and Teviot, and the park of Floors, may tempt the traveller to tarry and explore the valleys of Tweed, Teviot, Yarrow, Ettrick, and many others."

But Lowland or Highland, Mr. Penney has bestowed minute attention on every town, village, or mountain side he names. Dipping here and there into the long array of double columns we find scholarly, compact information, and usually a something more that is suggestive and inspiring. The treatment of Killiecrankie, had we space to quote it, would be a case in point. The site of the battle is carefully corrected in the minds of those who imagine that it began in the famous Pass itself. It began to the north of the railway station. What tourist will not be grateful for the quotation from Macaulay:

"It was past ten o'clock. Dundee gave the word. The Highlanders dropped their plaids. The few who were so luxurious as to wear rude socks of untanned hide spurned them away. It was long remembered in Lochaber that Lochiel took off what possibly was the only pair of shoes in his clan, and charged barefoot at the head of his men. . . . In two minutes the battle was lost and won . . . and the mingled torrent of red coats and tartans went raving down the valley to the gorge of Killiecrankie."

Or for the blood-warming verses of Aytoun:

"Like a tempest down the ridges
Swept a hurricane of steel,
Rose the slogan of Macdonald—
Flashed the broadsword of Lochiel!

Horse and man went down like driftwood
When the floods are black at Tule,
And their carcasses are whirling,
In the Garry's deepest pool."

As a specimen of the historical and literary notes we may quote the account of Dunvegan Castle. The editor's remark that few travellers will care to push through twenty-two miles of barren country to reach this stronghold is an interesting commentary on Dr. Johnson's adventurous journey thither from his loved Fleet-street when even the southerly parts of Scotland were but tediously accessible.

"One mile farther on is Dunvegan Castle (Macloed of Macloed), which has for centuries been the residence of the chief of the clan, a picturesque building, partly old, partly modern, on a rock surrounded on three sides by the sea, backed by well-grown plantations. Formerly it was accessible only from the sea by a boat and a subterranean staircase, now by a modern bridge crossing the chasm. It forms two sides of a small square. It is said to be the oldest inhabited castle in Scotland, and contains some antique family relics—a square Irish cup of wood, beautifully carved and mounted in silver, which belonged to John Macguire, Chief of Fermanagh, and his wife, Catherine O'Neill, bearing the date 1493; the fairy hanner, supposed to be associated with the destiny of the family; the claymore of Rory More (Sir Roderick Macleod), and his horn, carved and ornamented with silver, holding perhaps two quarts, which, filled with claret, the heir of Macleod, as a proof of manhood, was expected to empty at a draught (see notes to Scott's 'Lord of the Isles'). Here Johnson and Boswell were hospitably entertained to their heart's content for many days (1773). Here Sir Walter Scott was a welcome guest, and composed 'MacCrimmon's Lament.' The country around is comparatively barren; but the neighbourhood of the castle is adorned with plantations. Behind the castle is a waterfall."

A word must be added about the maps in this volume. They are altogether special and admirable, and in many of them the principle of indicating elevations in mountainous districts by graduated brown tints has been introduced. This device could be a success only by the exercise of the nicest care both in the distribution of the seven or eight tints of brown used, and in their printing. Each tint represents a rise in elevation of 656 feet (200 metres).

The arrangement of the Handbook of Surrey does not differ in material points from that of Scotland, but we regret the absence of the editor's name from the title-page. In previous editions Surrey was linked to Hampshire and the Isle of Wight in one volume. But now the most trimly picturesque county of England is dealt with alone in 450 pages. A good feature is the interpolation in the regular topographical matter of historical notes on places of exceptional interest, such as Croydon, Kingston, Richmond, Guildford, &c. Similarly, where antiquarian remains are numerous, as at Guildford, the heading "Objects of Interest" is usefully introduced. But what strikes us especially in this book is the loving minuteness and encyclopædic character of its contents. The Index has a value in itself, apart from the book; it is an admirable basis of study and a mine of suggestion. It gives a separate list of over fifty churches in which brasses of interest are to be found. It gives another list of twelve places where there are remarkable yew trees. It refers the reader to the grand Surrey views, to county collections of pictures, and to the best examples of stained glass in the churches. Indeed, one might be puzzled to guess the kind of book to which the Index is the key, so little are its items exclusively topographical, so abundant and appetising are the names of authors, artists, politicians, and poets.

The subject matter of the book is split into sixteen "Routes" or districts, and these are treated successively with uniform devices of type and arrangement. We will quote a typical passage with a literary interest:

"The tourist's first visit may well be paid to Moor Park (Sir Wm. Rose, Bart.), the retreat of Sir William Temple, when, after the death of his son in 1686, he withdrew from public life. It lies about one-and-a-half miles E. of Farnham Station, on the way to Waverley Abbey; in fact, the pleasantest way to reach Waverley is through it. The spot was in Temple's time very secluded, and the neighbourhood very thinly peopled.

Temple had no visitors, except a few friends who were willing to travel 20 or 30 miles in order to see him; and now and then a foreigner, whom curiosity brought to have a look at the author of the 'Triple Alliance.'" —Macaulay.

The house has been greatly altered; and the gardens, which Sir William laid out 'with the angular regularity he had admired in the flower-beds of Haarlem and the Hague,' with terraces, a canal, and formal walks 'buttoned' on either side with flower-pots, have been altogether remodelled. Part of the canal still remains, and a hedge of Wych elms, bordering it, is perhaps of Temple's time. Possibly, too, the brick walls dividing the gardens are those on which the ex-ambassador, like old Knowell in the play, delighted 'to count his apricots a-ripening,' although the well-known apricots noticed by Sir William Temple in his Essay on Gardening belong to Moor Park in Herts, and not to this Moor Park. It was, at all events, on this ground that William III. taught Swift to cultivate asparagus in the Dutch way; that is, with a short and not a wide stroke, avoiding injury to the young heads of the plants. 'King William,' said Swift, 'always used to eat the stalks as well as the heads.' Temple died here in January, 1699; and near the east end of the house is the sun-dial under which, according to his own request, his heart was buried in a silver box: 'in the garden where he used to contemplate and admire the works of nature with his beloved sister, the Lady Giffard.'"

The account proceeds to include a quotation from Macaulay on Swift's life at Moor Park, where he wrote his Battle of the Books and his Tale of a Tub.

Literary allusions and facts abound in this book. We are duly reminded that at the little hamlet of Bishopsgate, two miles west of Egham, Shelley lived in the summer of 1815, and there composed Alastor, walking under the grand shades of Windsor Park. Nor are the newer literary associations of Hindhead and Haslemere neglected. Sometimes a local poet is quoted with justification. Bessie Parkes' lines on Ockley will please the tourist:

"Ockley is a model village
Planted mainly amidst tillage;
The tillage on that wholesale scale
Which doth in England much prevail;
No garden farms of dainty trim,
But all things with an ampler rim
Of hedge and grass—a double charm
In every fertile English farm.
A sweet concession to the need
Of Nature with her roadside mead,
A fair appeal to human sight,
And simple beauty's lawful right.
Ockley has a church, a spire,
A many-generationed squire,
Straight roads which cut it left and right,
A noble green by Nature dight,
Old houses quaint and weather-streak'd,
And troops of children rosy-checked."

The maps in this Surrey volume are good. The one of the whole county at the end of the book is a gem of clearness and completeness, and the maps of the Aldershot district deserve mention.

Mr. Murray's Handbook of Travel Talk is one of a number of companion volumes to the "Handbooks." It is a collection of questions, phrases, and vocabularies in English, French, German, and Italian. It is justly pointed out that such a book can be useful only to those who have some previous knowledge of foreign languages. The traveller who possesses this knowledge will find the book helpful and very comprehensive. By its aid he can voice every need in Paris, Berlin, or Rome. "Give me the boot-jack; I must take them off": this cry of the heart can be uttered in four languages with the aid of this book. So can "Will you give me a castle and a knight?" and "Has the washerwoman brought back my linen?" and "I want to leave my bicycle in a safe place"; and "You must divide that among you; I cannot give tips to everybody." The arrangement of the book, which is a "dumpy twelve," is good, and although the book contains over six hundred pages, it is light in the pocket.

THE ALPS.

The Alpine Guide: The Western Alps. By the late John Ball, F.R.S. A New Edition Reconstructed and Revised on Behalf of the Alpine Club by W. A. B. Coolidge. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

In this work the science and the enthusiasm of Alpine climbing find their most modern and orderly expression. The volume before us is the first of three in which the late Mr. Ball's work will be newly given to the world, as much as possible in its original form, but with abundant alterations necessitated by the lapse of time. The new work is intended as a memorial to Mr. Ball, whose work as a climber and as President of the Alpine Club need not be more than named here. As is often the case in such undertakings, the Alpine Club finds the re-issue of the work a far more costly matter than first calculations led its committee to suppose it would be. It cannot yet be said that the issue of the next two volumes is financially possible. But we believe they will be floated. It would be a calamity if they were not. The erudition and thoroughness shown in the compilation of this volume are beyond praise. The book contains the knowledge not only of its first author and its present editor, but of a large number of Alpine enthusiasts and practical climbers, from whom Mr. Coolidge has received notes. It is encyclopædic of the Western Alps alike in its text and its maps. Our space will be better occupied by a single representative passage from the work than by any attempt to cope with an infinity of details. The ascent of Mont Blanc still strikes the imagination, but exaggerated views of its difficulties have been succeeded by a tendency to underestimate those difficulties. On this subject we quote the following sound remarks:

"The ascent of the highest mountain in the Alps long passed for an exploit of the first order, deserving of special record, and admitting on the part of those who achieved it of a style of high-flown description which gave a formidable idea of the difficulty of the performance. Such descriptions represented, for the most part in perfect good faith, the impression made upon the minds of travellers by phenomena new and imposing from the grand scale on which they operate, very much heightened by ignorance of their laws, which left the imagination subject to an ill-defined sense of wonder and terror. The same descriptions might, however, have served for the ascent of many other of the glacier-clad peaks of the Alps, and according as experience has made men familiar with the means and precautions required, and more accurate knowledge has enabled them to understand the obstacles to be overcome, and the danger to be avoided, it is found that the ascent of Mont Blanc by the ordinary route is an expedition involving no peculiar difficulties, nor, when made in favourable weather, any appreciable risk. The shrewdness of the natives of the valley of Chamonix has led them to invest the ascent with as much importance as they can contrive to give it, and while they were able to obtain for a number of men ten times the remuneration which would be considered sufficient for the same amount of labour and exposure at other seasons of the year, they were not likely to diminish the allowance of powder that is burned to celebrate each successful ascent that is made from their valley with Chamonix guides. Of late years the number of ascents has very largely increased, and the evil now to be guarded against is not so much undue appreciation of the difficulties, as an underestimate leading men to neglect needful precautions, and to dispense with the requisite amount of previous training. To guard against immediate danger, the guides are usually quite worthy of reliance, and if the object be simply to reach the summit, and come down again without bodily hurt, most Englishmen of active habits, who agree to pay the proper number of francs to the guides and innkeepers at Chamonix, may count on achieving their object, provided the weather be favourable, or they have the patience to wait until it becomes so. But men who desire not merely to accomplish what is considered by some as a feat, but to enjoy, in the true sense of the word, an expedition which brings them face to face with so many phases of the beautiful and sublime in Nature, must recollect that for that object some general and some special preparation is necessary. The amount of training of the muscles which will support without undue fatigue almost continued physical exertion, with but short intervals of rest, and little or no sleep, during twenty-four hours or more, is not generally obtained without several days or weeks of previous practice. . . . At the least a traveller should begin by devoting several days to the exploration of the higher glaciers, however thoroughly trained he may otherwise be. It should not be forgotten that some persons are liable to suffer severely from the combined effects of rarefied air and unusual exertion at a great height. Apart from the difference of constitution in individuals, which can be ascertained only by trial, there is no doubt that habit has a great influence in making men insensible to this distressing affection. Those who have accustomed themselves to breathe the air at heights of 11,000 or 12,000 feet rarely, if ever, feel inconvenience when they mount some 3,000 or 4,000 feet above that limit, unless for reasons having nothing to do with the rarefaction of the air."

We may add that Mr. Coolidge has turned out his book in a workmanlike way. Its list of books relating to the Western Alps is representative, without pretending to be complete; and the Index to the whole volume is very full.

MESSRS. BLACK'S GUIDE BOOKS.

Black's Guides to Scotland, Cornwall, Devonshire, Surrey, Brighton, Bournemouth, Matlock, Buxton. (A. & C. Black).

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK publish more than fifty guide books, of which not a few have run into numerous editions. Their Guide to Scotland appears this year in a thoroughly revised thirtieth edition. A glance through these excellent handbooks is sufficient to show that the principles on which they have been compiled are more leisurely and literary than others; the editor is willing to pause and digress, and he knows the superiority of one clear, deep impression over many trivial ones. Indeed, in his preface to the Guide to Cornwall, Mr. Moncrieff ratifies formally the impression which one gathers naturally from these pages of flowing print unvexed by typographical variations and tabulations:

"Our principle is that a guide-book for use by passing tourists may contain too many facts as well as too few—the latter fault, of course, the more unpardonable: our aim has been to avoid either extreme."

The editor, Mr. S. R. Hope Moncrieff, has clearly aimed at producing books easily readable by the eye and the mind. Facts have not been crowded in. There has been an avoidance of the small chopping of information. Much has been left to the tourist's whims and resource. This is not to say that the Guide Books issued by this firm are not practical. They are.

The books are produced at half-a-crown and at a shilling, according to size, and their quiet sage-green covers have a neat unassertive appearance that agrees well with the spirit in which the contents have been selected and arranged. On the whole it may be said that to the ordinary quiet tourist, who wishes to inhale and understand the spirit of a district while he stays in it, and secure a lasting impression—and to do this easily and pleasantly—Messrs. Black's Guide Books are to be recommended.

To take examples. Visitors to the Cornish Coast in August and September will see the pilchard nets being repaired and spread out on the cliffs near Land's End and the Lizard, and they will find St. Ives or Sennen Cove agog with expectation of the shoals in October. To enter into this one manifestation of local life at all thoroughly is to collect impressions and memories which will sweeten city rooms long years after. Knowing this, the editor of Black's Guide to Cornwall devotes a quite considerable space to the pilchard fishery, nor need we scruple to quote part of the passage in question:—

"The pilchards are expected off the coast in October, when their appearance gives rise to general excitement at a place like St. Ives. Often have been described the patient watching of the huers on the cliffs, who with a huge trumpet at length announce their joyful discovery, and by the waving of bushes telegraph the movements of the shoal marked by the colour of the sea and its hovering escort of gulls; the rush of men, women, and children to the shore with shouts of heva! heva! which is Cornish for the classic Eureka; the marshalling of the seine boats; the shooting of the huge nets; the enclosure of the luckless victims by myriads: then the hurried orgy of capturing, pickling and storing, stimulated by its promise of prosperity to the whole place.

These exciting scenes have been to some extent superseded by what is really the old method of drift-net fishing, where the boats, by night, go out farther to sea to meet their prey, and the incidents are not so dramatic if the results prove more satisfactory. The drift fishing is accused by some old people of frightening away the pilchards from less fortunately placed stations, perhaps on the same principle as Tenterden Steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands. It is certain that they no longer favour parts of the coast where once their yearly coming brought no small gain. The manner of curing also has changed, the old way of drysalting having given place to pickling in tanks of brine, which, it appears, cannot be profitably done except on a large scale; then often an enormous catch goes to waste for want of proper means to deal with it, and the windfall of the sea is turned into manure for the land. The new way of pickling does not seem to recommend itself to Italian tastes, for the Cornishmen are losing hold on their best markets. Perhaps they have their own fault to blame; we have heard of a case where a cellarful of bad fish, condemned by the officer of health as a nuisance, was shipped off as fit food for the benighted foreigners who keep their Popish fasts to fill British stomachs. At all events, from one cause or another, the pilchard fishery, like the Cornish mines, is not what it once was. The gigantic haul of 1833, if we are not mistaken, turned people's heads, so that all along the coast they went in for this adventure with much the same speculative spirit shown in mining; now, too many rotting boats and nets tell a tale of disappointment. But if pilchard fishery continues profitable anywhere it is at St. Ives. Mevagissey, as we already mentioned, deals largely in that small variety known as the Cornish sardine. The real sardine, it appears, shows a disposition to fight shy of the French and Portuguese coasts; and any ill wind that kept him permanently absent there, would blow nothing but good to Cornwall, whose old toast of 'fish, tin, and copper' is not at present a very rousing one."

Similarly the literary memoranda are fuller, as a rule, in Messrs. Black's Guides than elsewhere. Under "Bideford," in the Guide to Devonshire, it is interesting to read:

"Westward Ho! was in part written in what is now the Royal Hotel adjoining the station, the owner of which possessed a collection of rare works consulted both by Kingsley and the late Mr. Froude. This is one of the most interesting houses in Bideford, incorporating portions of the original structure, which belonged to a tobacco merchant of the seventeenth century. More than one of the rooms have fine ceilings ornamented with fruit, foliage, &c., in relief, the Italian workmanship of which is well worth inspection. Visitors who can afford to pay for such accommodation may occupy the lordly chamber in which the novelist wrote. The old oak staircase leads up from a covered courtyard in continental style; and the billiard room opens on to the platform of the station, so that here the seventeenth and the nineteenth centuries are closely joined."

And, again, visitors to Hampshire, who should be provided with the Guide to Bournemouth and the New Forest, will be grateful for the descriptions of this unique tract of country.

"The New Forest is no longer looked on principally as a home for deer, which have been much thinned down. An Act of the middle of this century even contemplated the extermination of an animal so destructive to young trees: but a few still survive, chiefly in the western thickets, and their number is said to be now increasing rather than otherwise. Foxes are also in sufficient abundance to give good sport; then there are otters in the streams; and here and there may be unearthed a rare specimen of the badger. Squirrels are plentiful, in spite of the 'squoyling' at which Forest boys are so skilful. The usual ground and winged game of English lowlands is fairly well represented, except in the case of hares. In the lower part of the stream there is some angling, but hardly within the Forest bounds. Shooting and fishing over Government property is a matter of licence, which costs £20 per annum, and is to be had from the Forest Office at Lyndhurst. The 'licensees' are under certain restrictions, such as that of shooting only three days a week, and many jokes are cut on the small bags they bring home, but at least their pastime brings more of real sport than the butchering business of richer covers. Near Lyndhurst are the kennels of the fox and the stag hounds, which meet all over the district. The hunting season here is an unusually long one, lasting into May, as there are so few fields to be taken into consideration. The Forest 'rides well,' though the scarceness of jumps may make it despised by heroes of the 'shires.' Its main danger is from the bogs, often of considerable extent, to be recognised by their too bright green, or by the white cotton grass that often marks these treacherous spots."

Wherever lasting impressions are likely to be received there the editor of Messrs. Black's Guide Books is willing to pause and dilate. That is the characteristic of this series. Hence we have eight pages allotted to Chatsworth in the Guide to Buxton and the Peak Country, and nearly as many to Haddon Hall in the Guide to Matlock. Hence, also, the editor does not assume that the tourist wants "routes." He rather gives information on separate areas, each of which centres in a good town. Messrs. Black's Guide Books are not, as a rule, illustrated, but the supply of maps is adequate.

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES.

PARIS, Florence, the Cities of Belgium, Venice, Rome, Munich, the Cities of North Italy, Dresden, the Cities of Northern France—these are Mr. Allen's hunting grounds. The first three books are even now in use: you may see them in the Louvre, in the Uffizi Gallery, in the Cathedral at Ghent; the fourth—on Venice—is just ready; Rome is in active preparation; and the others are to follow.

Mr. Grant Allen does not vie with Mr. Murray, nor does he vie with Mr. Ruskin; he is less practical than the one, less a specialist than the other. Nor is he as literary and leisurely as Mr. Augustus Hare. Mr. Grant Allen's one aim is to make sight-seeing intelligent: hence the "historical" method. To use his own words:

"The object and plan of these Historical Handbooks is somewhat different from that of any other guides at present before the public. They do not compete or clash with such existing works; they are rather intended to supplement than supplant them. My purpose is not to direct the stranger through the streets and squares of an unknown town towards the buildings or sights which he may desire to visit; still less is it my design to give him practical information about hotels, cab fares, omnibuses, tramways, and other every-day material conveniences. For such details, the traveller must still have recourse to the trusty pages of his Baedeker, his Joanne, or his Murray. I desire rather to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travel as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits. In one word, it is my object to give the reader in a very compendious form the result of all those inquiries which have naturally suggested themselves to my own mind during thirty-five years of foreign travel, the solution of which has cost myself a good deal of research, thought, and labour, beyond the facts which I could find in the ordinary handbooks."

As an example of Mr. Allen's method, we may note that in the volume before us—the Cities of Belgium, published, as are all the series, by Mr. Grant Richards—Mr. Allen, instead of expanding over the Field of Waterloo, devotes some space to instructions as to what the traveller may see in the time saved by not going there; while the Wiertz Gallery, which is the be-all and end-all of many persons' visits to Brussels, is dismissed in one reference to this "too famous Musée." On the other hand, eight pages are given to the Van Eycks' "Adoration of the Lamb" in Ghent Cathedral, and the traveller is advised to buy a photograph the evening before and study it carefully.

Thus, it may be observed that Mr. Allen is an individualist. "Believe in me," he says in effect, "follow me implicitly, and I will show you the best and nothing else." To those who cannot exert such fidelity Mr. Allen's Historical Guides are worthless. To others they must be a boon and a blessing.

A Dictionary of Bathing Places. Edited by B. Bradshaw. New edition (1898). (Kegan Paul.)

This is a dictionary of bathing places and climatic health resorts throughout the world. It is a summary of natural cures of every kind: water-cures, air-cures, thermal springs, sulphur springs, mineral springs, saline springs, and—hydropathic establishments, where the real cure is gaiety. It is a book that amazes and saddens. It is an almost endless catalogue of invalids' hopes, it is a valetudinarian's bible. A useful work, undoubtedly.

SOME SHILLING GUIDE BOOKS.

Pictorial and Descriptive Guides to:

London.

Brighton.

Isle of Wight.

Ilfracombe, Barnstaple, &c.

Torquay, Paignton, Dartmouth, &c.

Bideford.

North Wales.

Oban, Fort William, and the Western Highlands.

(Ward, Lock & Co.)

Handbooks to:

The North Wales Coast.

Aberystwyth, Barmouth, Dolgelly, and Cardigan Bay.

The Channel Islands.

The Isle of Wight.

Bournemouth.

Brighton.

(Darlington & Co.)

The nine Guide Books which we have received from Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. belong to a series of more than sixty volumes dealing with places and districts in the United Kingdom. These volumes are uniformly bound in scarlet limp cloth, and are printed in a clean, fine type on thin paper. They slip easily into the pocket, and are not too good to be exposed to rain and sun. To the tourist who is content with shilling information presented in a shilling literary style, these books are admirably suited. We quote a specimen passage. He is writing of Ilfracombe:

"There is one other matter which delicacy has prevented our mentioning earlier—namely, the great unwritten law that Ilfracombe is sacred as the haunt of the 'Pilgrim of Love.' In spring some strange instinct bids a boy put away his hoop and wind his top. Why? Because other boys do likewise? Perhaps. But the question has been asked, Who is the first boy to produce the first new-season's top? It is the simultaneous action of civilised youth all over England, and one which can be relied upon to manifest itself spontaneously with as much certainty as the movement of the Gulf Stream, or opposition in Parliament to the party in power. Similarly there is some occult force at work, remaining yet to be classified, which is as steadfast and unerring in its aim as that which animates the breast of the Hebrew, and draws him in spirit to Palestine. Will anybody ever discover the reason why Ilfracombe creates for itself such a subtle, magnetic charm in the minds of the newly married? When Ilfracombe emerged from the chrysalis of a fishing village into the butterfly existence of a fashionable holiday resort, it assumed without dispute, and still maintains, the title and status of The Mecca of Honey-mooners."

Such flights are, happily, rare enough to be amusing.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.'s Guide Books are carefully planned, liberally illustrated, and sufficiently indexed. A general Introduction tells the reader what manner of land he is about to enter: then comes the body of the work in topographical sections, or "excursions." In each Introduction the questions of hotels and boarding-houses are met by lists of these establishments and their tariffs. The prevailing scenery and weather are noted, the best methods to see the country are indicated, and in other ways the reader is allowed to taste his trip before he studies its details.

In all these Guide Books the special kinds of holiday-making are considered; there is never a difficulty in discovering what may be had of fishing, or boating, or cycling, or golf, or sermons on Sunday. Even the man who will not ferswear books is not forgotten; he is told where he can find a library, and "Literary Notes" are made a feature. A note to the Guide to Ilfracombe, Barnstaple, &c., mentions a paralytic flower-seller at Combartin who displays on his card the appeal, "I'm in The Mighty Atom." Miss Corelli has described Combartin and its church in her novel, and Combartin is fairly grateful. It is a good idea to name the novels in which a given locality forms the background of the stories. We are reminded that Mr. Norris's novel, A Despicable Affair, reeks of Torquay; that the Isle of Wight gives colour to The Silence of Dean Mailand, and that Westward Ho! and Bideford should be inseparable in the traveller's mind. When better literary associations are not to be found, there is always the "local poet" to be patronised:

"Ascending with the gentlest slope
From the blue Solent's tide,
I knew not of a fairer place
Than this, our lovely Ryde."

Historical "tit-bits" crop up pleasantly enough. One is glad to be reminded, in the Guide to Ilfracombe, of William of Orange's traditional speech from his ship to the people of Brixham. The historians declare his words to have been, "The liberties of England and the Protestant religion I will maintain." Tradition says—and we prefer this account—that the invading Prince spoke as follows: "Mine goot people, mine goot people, I mean you goot; I am come here for your goot, for all your goots." Well might Brixham reply:

"And please your Majesty, King William,
You're welcome to Brixham quay,
To eat buckhorn, and drink behea
Along with me.
And please your Majesty, King William."

In the Guide to Brighton we are given some interesting particulars about the building of the Brighton Pavilion for Prince George of Wales:

"The successive purchases of land alone cost nearly £70,000. What was spent on the edifice itself, and in furnishing, no one knows. So carelessly and lavishly was the money laid out that the workmen, it is said, frequently drew sixteen days' wages a week! At a time when bread averaged from 11d. to 1s. per loaf, the Prince was sending agents to all parts of the world to select articles of furniture, regardless of cost, which, when sent home, were frequently relegated to the lumber-room unused. No wonder that, later, Byron wrote in the fourteenth canto of Don Juan—

'Shut up—no, not the King, but the Pavilion,
Or else 'twill cost us all another million!'

Cobbett said 'a good idea of the Palace might be formed by placing the pointed half of a large turnip in the middle of a beard, with four smaller ones at the corners.' Even loyal Sir Walter Scott, writing in 1826 to a friend who resided at Brighton, besought him to 'set fire to the Chinese stables, and if it embrace the whole of the Pavilion it will rid me of a great eyesore.'"

Again, it is not necessary to be a visitor to Torquay in order to find interest in the description of the town's rise as a health resort:

"Even as late as the beginning of the present century Torquay was merely a straggling group of fishermen's cottages—the quay of the adjoining village of Torre; but though it was small it had a wooden pier at which vessels often called, and in Torbay great fleets of war-ships found safe shelter during the Napoleonic wars while waiting for orders. . . . So Napoleon may be regarded as the unconscious founder of Torquay as a health resort; and when, in 1815, he approached the future town, standing on the deck of his prison ship, H.M.S. Bellerophon, his melancholy eyes gladdened as he saw the scene of beauty open up before him through the morning haze of an August day. 'Enfin voilà un beau pays!' he exclaimed, and later, when he had enjoyed a closer view of the beauties of the shores of Torbay, the blue sea, and the succession of green tree-crowned hills, he added, 'It is like Porto Ferrajo in Elba.'"

The Guide to London, issued by Messrs. Ward & Lock, is a well arranged and, for the price, a voluminous handbook; but there is small need to closely examine a guide which can boast a sale of over sixty thousand copies. It is odd how the Londoner may pick up points which are new to him, or have been forgotten by him, in a Guide Book such as this. Thus opening the volume at page 75, we are reminded that the inscription on the Shaftesbury Fountain at Piccadilly Circus was written by Mr. Gladstone.

It remains to emphasise the orderly arrangement and clearness of Messrs. Ward & Lock's Guide Books. The attractions of each place are not only described, but are summarised in small type under regular headings, such as Amusements, Climate, Clubs, Hotels, Newspapers, Places of Worship, Post and Telegraphs, &c. The photographic process-blocks are numerous and excellent, and the maps, of which there are usually more than one in each volume, are satisfactory.

Messrs. Darlington's Shilling Guide Books have net quite the appearance of the London firm's manuals, nor are they so well illustrated. Indeed, the author of the Handbook to the Channel Islands would have been well advised not to have mingled reproductions of his own pencil sketches with the photographic illustrations. A good volume in this series is Brighton and the South Coast. This includes Worthing, Littlehampton, Eastbourne, and Hastings. The accounts of these places are good as far as they go, and the coloured map of the coast line of Sussex is excellent. The writer has the optimism of his order. It is of Bournemouth that he writes:

"The merry laugh of children building sand forts or paddling in the fringe of blue comes delightfully athwart the rhythmic music of the sea. The sea itself is dotted with dancing maidens or dark heads of swimmers. Steamers are watched as they go and return with scores of happy voyagers and sailing-boats that scud before the breeze. Who, save misanthropes, could be anything but serenely glad amid such sights and sounds?"

But would he not say the same of Cromer?—or Llandudno? He would.

A MODEL GUIDE BOOK.

The Story of Perugia. By Margaret Symonds and Lina Duff Gordon. Illustrated by M. Helen James. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

We have already noticed this beautifully written and daintily illustrated guide to Perugia. It breathes the spirit of long residence, and of loving study on the spot. The authors are familiar with the language, they have studied the historians, and have had the ungrudging assistance of the inhabitants. Above all, our authors have brought seeing eyes to this decayed but still beautiful city, and having gradually conceived a passion for its history and its people, they have, out of the fulness of that passion, written a beautiful book. We shall quote a fairly lengthy passage in support of our view that we have here a "model Guide Book"—by which we mean a book in which matter-of-fact details and moving characteristics are fused by study and adorned by style:

"The city is built, as we have shown in our first chapter, on one of the low hills formed after thousands of years by the silting up of the refuse brought down by the Tiber, and not, as one naturally at first imagines, on a spur of the actual Apennines, which are divided from her by the river. Much of the power of the town in the past may be traced to her extraordinary topographical position. Perugia stands 1,705 feet above the level of the sea, and 1,200 above that of the Tiber. She stands perfectly alone at the extreme edge of a long spine of hill, and she commands the Tiber and the two great roads to Rome. But looked at from a merely picturesque point of view, few towns can boast of a more powerful charm. Perugia, if one ignores her history, is not so much a town as an eccentric freak of nature. All the winds and airs of heaven play and rush around her walls in summer and in winter. The sun beats down upon her roofs; one seems to see mere stars at night, above her ramparts, than one sees in any other town one knows of. All Umbria is spread like a great pageant at her feet, and the pageant is never one hour like the other. Even in a downpour, even in a tempest, the great view fascinates. In spring the land is green with corn and oak trees, and pink with the pink of sainfoin flowers. In winter it seems smaller, nearer; brown and gold, and very grand at sundown. On clear days one can easily trace a whole circle of Umbrian cities from the Umbrian capital. To the east Assisi, Spello, Feligno, Montefalco and Trevi. The hill above Bettona hides the town of Spoleto, but its ilex woods and its convent of Monte Luco are distinct enough. To the south Todi and Deruta stand out clear upon their hillsides; and to the east the home of Perugine, Città della Pieve, rises half hidden in its oakwoods. Early in the mornings you will see the mists lift slowly from the Tiber; at night the moon will glisten on its waters, drawing your fancy down to Rome. Strange lights shine upon the clouds behind the ridge which covers Trasimene, and to the north the brown hills rise and swell, fold upon fold, to meet the Apennines. In autumn and in winter the basin of the old Umbrian lake will often fill for days with mists; but the Umbrian towns and hamlets rise like birds above them, and one may live in one of these in splendid sunshine, whilst looking down upon a sea of fog which darkens all the people of the plain. The inhabitants of Perugia swear by the healthy nature of their air, and indeed, were it not for the winds, the most fragile constitution would probably flourish in the high hill city. But it must be confessed that there come days when man and horse quiver like dead leaves before the tempest, and when the very houses seem to rock. Indeed, it would be almost impossible to exaggerate the arctic power of a Perugian whirlwind. Yet the average temperature is mild, and myrtles grow to the size of considerable trees in the villa gardens round the town. To fully understand the city of Perugia, the marvellous fashion of its building, and the way in which its houses have become a part of the landscape and seem to creep about and cling to the unsteady crumbling soil, one should pass out into the country through one of its gates, and, rambling round the roads and lanes which wind beneath its walls, look ever up and back again towards the town. In this way only is it possible to understand what man can do with nature, and how, with the centuries, nature can gather to herself man's handiwork and make of it a portion for herself. Birds and beasts have built in this same fashion, but rarely except in Umbria have men."

The book from which this extract is taken purports to be the first of a series on "Medieval Towns." We can only hope that the same authors and artist will be found working together again.

A GUIDE TO NORWAY.

The Handy Guide to Norway. By Thomas B. Wilson. Fourth Edition (1898), Revised and Enlarged. (Edward Stanford.)

In this fourth edition of his handbook to Norway, Mr. Wilson has made considerable additions and alterations to at least three chapters. The third chapter, on the Hardanger Fjord, has been improved and brought up to date. The opening of the Gudbrandsdal railway has so shortened the journey from Kristiania to the Romsdal and Jotundheim that some pleasing alterations were possible here, and similarly the lovely valley of the Sætersdal has just been improved, or spoiled, by a railway. The probability that this strangely secluded corner of Norway is now likely to be overrun by tourists gives an added piquancy to Mr. Wilson's description of its inhabitants.

"The Sætersdøler still differ a good deal from the other Norwegians, and have many curious words in their landsmaal, or dialect. They have still curious customs and superstitions, and it will hardly be credited, though there seems no doubt of it, that even in the year 1858 a figure of the god Thor was discovered to have been worshipped by an old woman, who revealed the fact to the priest on her death-bed. Unfortunately, the priest and neighbours burned the image in horror."

In all its essentials of matter and arrangement the Guide Book remains as before. The book is written for travellers who require general yet sufficient information. All details likely to be merely burdensome are omitted. Particularly good is Mr. Wilson's Introduction, with its eleven sections of clear and careful information on articles de voyage, expenses, coinage, modes of travel, hotels, diligence routes, &c. The expense of travel in Norway is still very low, but it has risen from 20 to 30 per cent. in the last twelve years: yet in country parts the tourist's expenses need not exceed eleven shillings a day. We find Mr. Wilson's description of places full and good, particularly those of Bergen and Kristiania; and the value of the volume is much increased by the historical chapters, and the chapters on fishing, cycling, photography, and glacier climbing. The vocabularies are also sufficient. The present edition is not a month old, and it can, therefore, be recommended to tourists this year.

A NOOK IN THE ARDENNES.

In the Volcanic Eifel: A Holiday Ramble. By Katharine S. and Gilbert S. Macquoid. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THIS is a pleasant account of rambles and residence in a little-known continental nook. "Few persons," say the authors,

"seem to know where the Eifel is. . . . It lies between the valley of the river Rohr on the west and the Moselle Valley on the east; or, broadly speaking, between the Luxemburg Ardennes and the Rhine from Remagen to Coblenz, and the Moselle from Coblenz to Treves. Northwards it includes the Ahr Valley, the Brohlthal, and other places; on the south it extends to Treves. This southern part, which reaches as far north as Gerolstein, is called the Volcanic or Vorder Eifel; and it was in this beautiful region that we spent most of our time. . . . The most essentially volcanic parts of the country are to be found between Birresborn, near Gerolstein, and the Lacher See. The country exhibits wonderful crater products, between Daun and Hillesheim there is constant interest for a geologist; in the country about and around Kelberg and Adenau, in the Hohe Eifel, are to be found strangely shaped masses of basaltic rock; trachyte and phonolite are also found there. A wonderful lava stream has flowed from the crater of the Falkenlei, near Bertrich, and has forced its way down into the Uestthal. . . . Deep, beautiful woods are everywhere, like lakes of waving greenery, and, in them, forest trees are almost as frequent as the tall sombre pines. Wild flowers and ferns, some of a rare kind, are plentiful, especially near Gerolstein and Manderscheid; their brilliant luxuriance is in strong contrast with the weird volcanoes and masses of deposit protruding in fantastic form from the broken side of a crater, and with the ruined castles which often crown the once fiery hills."

In this district the authors spent enough time to gather a number of the legends which cling to these old castles, and a considerable part of their book is filled with these. The book is not intentionally a Guide Book; it is a book of gossip about a small and beautiful district. But some ordinary Guide Book particulars are given in an "Index to Travellers" prefixed to the book.

OTHER GUIDE BOOKS.

Cassell's Complete Pocket-Guide to Europe. Revised and Enlarged (1898). Edited by Edmund C. Stedman. (Cassell & Co.)

THIS is a handy compendium of all Guide Books to the United Kingdom and the Continent. "It resulted," says the editor, "from observation of the trials undergone by those equipped with larger and more cumbersome hand-books." The scope of the book is enormous; the book itself is small, a veritable pocket-book. Its merits and defects, therefore, are alike to be sought in the rigorous compression of so much matter within five hundred small pages. This compression has, at all events, not been done at the expense of clearness of type. The maps, too, though very small, are clear and interesting. Strenuous, if superficial, "globe-trotters" will like this book, and the tourist who carries the larger and specialised handbooks will still find this pocket survey of Europe useful.

Highways and Byways in Devon and Cornwall. By Arthur H. Norway. (Macmillan & Co.)

WE have already reviewed these excellent gossiping pages on the West Country. We need only say that as a Guide Book, as a book for a rainy day in a hotel drawing-room, and, finally, as a souvenir of a pleasant holiday, this book will be prized by those who secure it. Mr. Pennell's and Mr. Hugh Thomson's illustrations are a delight.

Little's London Pleasure Guide. (Simpkin Marshall.)

In this Guide descriptions are given of hotels, theatres, parks, museums, libraries, sports, and other resorts—each place or building receiving a page to itself. The preponderance of hotel information is very marked, but as the tariff of every important London hotel is given the usefulness of the book is considerable.

The Official Guide to the London and North-Western Railway. (Cassell & Co.)

The Official Guide to the Midland Railway. (Cassell & Co.)

THE tourist who intends to use these railways on his holidays will find these budgets of information and maps useful enough, and as much up to date as the official time-tables of the Companies.

The Coast Trips of Great Britain. (George Newnes, Ltd.)

Few people realise how simple and inexpensive a matter it is to take a sea voyage from London of one or two days' duration. This manual supplies information on the various lines of steamships and their fares, and a study of it may result in some novel and delightful trips.

Ely Cathedral Handbook. Edited and Revised by Charles William Stubbs, D.D. (Ely: G. H. Tyndall.)

THE name of the learned Dean is sufficient guarantee of the interest and value of this work. Dr. Stubbs makes mistakes with the difficulty that most men bring to leading a life of rectitude. Thus few students of cathedrals are so fortunate as those that visit Ely.

Isle of Man via Barrow-in-Furness and Lake-land. (Bemrose & Sons.)

A TINY twopenny guide to the island where Mr. Hall Caine makes his home and finds his stories. A blank page for memoranda faces every page of text, so that its owner may be tourist and author too. A model of typography.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS'S LIST OF NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS

GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES.

PARIS—FLORENCE—CITIES OF BELGIUM.

To these will shortly be added VENICE.

Grant Allen's Guide Books are bound in green cloth, with rounded corners to slip into the pocket.

Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. each. net.

By GEORGE EGERTON, Author of "Keynotes," &c.

THE WHEEL OF GOD.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

By HALDANE MACFALL.

THE WOOINGS OF JEZEBEL PETTYFER:

Being the Personal History of Jehu Sennacherib Dyle, commonly called Masheen Dyle, together with an account of certain things that chanced in the House of the Sorcerer.

With cover drawing by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

By F. C. CONSTABLE, Author of "The Curse of Intellect."

AUNT JUDITH'S ISLAND:

A Comedy of Kith and Kin.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

By FREDERIC BRETON, Author of "The Black Mass."

TRUE HEART:

Being Passages in the Life of Eberhard Trenherz, Scholar and Craftsmen, telling of his Wanderings and Adventures, his Intercourse with People of Consequence to their Age, and how he came scathless through a Time of Strife.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

By LEONARD MERRICK, Author of "One Man's View."

THE ACTOR-MANAGER.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

PLAYS, PLEASANT AND UNPLEASANT.

(I.) UNPLEASANT. (II.) PLEASANT. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author. 2 vols. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 5s. each.

The Outlook.—"There is now a dramatist of the greatest possibilities in these islands. Mr. Shaw's volumes remain with us, and are, when all has been said, at least the expressions of an amazing and powerful temperament."

By LOUISA SHORE.

HANNIBAL.

With Portrait in Photogravure of the Author.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON writes: "I have read and re-read 'Hannibal' with admiration. As a historical romance, carefully studied from the original histories, it is a noble conception of a great hero. . . . The merit of this piece is to have seized the historical conditions with such reality and such truth, and to have kept so sustained a flight at a high level of heroic dignity."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

By KATHARINE TYNAN (Mrs. HINKSON).

THE WIND IN THE TREES.

A Book of Country Verse.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW SERIES OF GUIDE BOOKS.

Handy size, red cloth, round corners, superbly illustrated, ONE SHILLING each.

Printed in clear type on good paper, and furnished with excellent Maps and Plans.

These Popular Handbooks contain full particulars as to

ROUTES and FARES.
LIST of HOTELS, with TARIFFS, &c.
PLANS of TOURS.

THE LEGENDS, HISTORY, and LITERATURE of the DISTRICT.
NOTICES of the PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HINTS for CYCLISTS.
APPENDICES for ANGLERS, GOLFERS, &c., &c.

"No matter of interest or importance to the traveller is overlooked."

"The most inveterate of sightseers is scarcely likely to find any of these Guide Books wanting in clearness."—Daily Telegraph.

"An excellent series of Guides, the cheapest probably in existence, considering the fulness of their information."—Bookman.

"Each is profusely illustrated with maps and photographs, and how they can be sold at the price we scarcely understand."—Academy.

Complete List and Particulars will be sent post free on application.

THE SERIES AT PRESENT INCLUDES:—

BATH, Wells, Glastonbury.
BELFAST and County Down.
BELGIUM and HOLLAND.
BIDEFORD, Barnstaple, &c.
BIRMINGHAM and Neighbourhood.
BOURNEMOUTH, the New Forest and Winchester.
BRIDLINGTON, &c.
BRIGHTON.
BUXTON, &c.
CHANNEL ISLANDS.
CONNEMARA HIGHLANDS.
CORK and the South-West of Ireland.
CORNWALL, Western.
DARTMOOR.
DUBLIN and County Wicklow.
EDINBURGH.
ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT.
FALMOUTH and South Cornwall.
GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.
GLASGOW.
GREENORE, Carlingford Bay, and the Mourne Mountains.
HARROGATE, Ripon, York, &c.
HASTINGS, St. Leonards, &c.
HEXHAM, Carlisle, and the Western Borderland.
HIGHLANDS and ISLANDS of Scotland.
ILFRACOMBE and North Devon.
ILKLEY, Bolton Abbey, &c.

ISLE of MAN.
ISLE of WIGHT.
KILLARNEY and its Lakes.
LEAMINGTON, Warwick, Kenilworth, Coventry, &c.
LIMERICK, County Clare, and Lower Shannon.
LIVERPOOL.
LONDON.
LONDONDERRY and the Donegal Highlands.
LYNTON, Lynmouth, &c.
MATLOCK.
NORTH WALES, including Aberystwith.
NORTHERN LAKE DISTRICT of Ireland.
OBAN and the West of Scotland.
OXFORD.
PARIS.
PENZANCE, Land's End, and the Scilly Isles.
PLYMOUTH and South-West Devon.
RIVIERA, The.
SCARBOROUGH, &c.
SHERWOOD FOREST, Nottingham, and "The Dukeries."
STRATFORD-ON-AVON.
SWITZERLAND.
TEIGNMOUTH, &c.
TORQUAY and Neighbourhood.
WATERFORD and Wexford.
WHITBY and Neighbourhood.
WINDSOR and its Castle.
WYE VALLEY.

Others are in preparation.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1898.

No. 1362, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a News-vendor at a Railway Station . . . . .                 | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.                        | 0 15 3  | 6 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

A PREDICTION has been put forward this week that the novels of the immediate future will be short—ranging in length from 30,000 to 40,000 words. This, we think, is doubtful. Human nature does not change, and human nature likes plenty for its money. Our own opinion is that novels will grow longer, even if they grow cheaper too. Mrs. Humphry Ward's Helbeck of Bannisdale, just published, is about 150,000 words, which constitutes a bulk of reading worth sitting down to. Between books of such dimensions and the popular magazines, which have completely routed the shilling shockers and cheap novels from the bookstalls, we fancy that there will soon be nothing.

PEOPLE who read much in trains should note the experience of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. Writing to the British Weekly concerning the rumour of his breakdown in health, he says: "I never was in better general health than I am at this moment, but my eyesight has gone wrong, and I find myself able to do scarcely any reading. This necessitates my participating much less actively in the management of my business. I should like to be permitted to warn your readers against working their eyes to any considerable extent while travelling in the train. For many years past I have been in the habit of reading and writing for some hours in the train almost daily, and my present trouble is undoubtedly traceable to this cause." We sympathise with Mr. Pearson in his affliction, and trust he may speedily recover; but at the same time we cannot help remembering with a smile that the bookstalls are at this moment groaning beneath Mr. Pearson's publications, designed by him for railway reading.

DR. J. BEATTIE CROZIER, who is also under the oppression of some ocular trouble, has had for the present to set aside his work, the History of Intellectual Development, in favour of a simpler task. This is the completion of a book to be entitled My Inner Life, being a Chapter in Personal Evolution, and it may be expected in the autumn. We trust that his recovery of ordinary sight may be speedy.

THE late Mr. Adam W. Black, the publisher, who, by the way, learned his business with Messrs. Smith & Elder, was the moving spirit in the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which he and his brothers undertook, in opposition to their father's judgment. How well justified was his enterprise all know who use that valuable repository of fact, a number greatly augmented of late by the enterprise of the Times. Mr. Black, who died at the age of sixty-two, retired from business some seven years ago. Few men could have been more respected than he.

A LETTER, which we think it better not to quote in full, reaches us: "Dear Sir," it begins, "I observe in your issue of June 4 a list of persons who have received Civil List pensions. Can you or your contributor tell me how to go to work to get one, how to put one's self into communication with the powers that grant these pensions?" The writer then proceeds to give an account of her qualifications, and that she has worked hard as a journalist there can be no doubt. As to answering her question we are in the dark. But it is probable that a personal application is a positive disqualification. Our correspondent must find some one to plead her cause.

"PAPERKNIFE," writing in the Cape Times, adds another to the portraits of Mr. Kipling. Thus: "A small man, dressed to match his old pipe—and rather fond of cutting jokes at his own expense on both scores—with prominent spectacles and prominent chin, dark moustache, keen dark eyes, keen expression, quick movements, and astonishingly quick rejoinders in talking: the distinctive note of him was keenness altogether, but sympathetic keenness. Somehow one began with an idea that he would be a rather cocksure and self-confident person. He is, of course, quite young; far younger than he looks—it was those long early years of hard unrecognised newspaper work in India that 'knocked the youth out of him'; he is ridiculously young to be so famous and to have earned his fame by so much entirely solid work, political, or rather national, as well as literary. Nevertheless, as one enthusiast expressed it, 'he puts the least side out of any celebrity I ever met.'"

IN the same article we find that Mr. Kipling and Mr. Wallace—the private soldier who wrote the invitation to Mr. Kipling in Barrack-room style—grew to be upon excellent terms together. Mr. Wallace asked advice concerning his future. Mr. Kipling advised him to continue writing "soldier things" and to continue being a soldier, and Mr. Wallace intends to do so. Mr. Kipling also copied for his pupil a stanza of the "Song of the Banjo"; and, says "Paperknife," "it is safe to guess that Mr. Wallace's last shirt will be pawned before that scrap of paper."

IN the Quartier Latin we find this joyous little song, signed Ada Smith:

"IN LONDON TOWN.

Yonder in the heather there's a bed for sleeping,
 Drink for one athirst, ripe blackberries to eat;
 Yonder in the sun the merry hares go leaping,
 And the pool is clear for travel-wearied feet!
 Sorely throb my feet, a-tramping London high-ways
 (Ah, the springy moss upon a northern moor!)
 Through the endless streets, the gloomy squares and byways,
 Homeless in the City, poor among the poor!
 London streets are gold—ah, give me leaves aglinting
 Midst grey dykes and hedges in the autumn sun!
 London water's wine, poured out for all unstinting—
 God! for the little brooks that tumble as they run!
 O my heart is fain to hear the soft wind blowing,
 Souging through the fir-tops up on northern fells!
 O my eye's an-ache to see the brown burns flowing
 Through the peaty soil and tinkling heather-bells!"
 The singer here brings Wordsworth's
 "Reverie of Poor Susan" "to date."

MR. LANG'S new book, The Making of Religion, is dedicated to Principal Donaldson, of the University of St. Andrews, in the following terms:

"I hope you will permit me to lay at the feet of the University of St. Andrews, in acknowledgment of her life-long kindnesses to her old pupil, these chapters on the early History of Religion. They may be taken as representing the Gifford Lectures delivered by me, though, in fact, they contain very little that was spoken from Lord Gifford's chair. I wish they were more worthy of an Alma Mater which fostered in the past the leaders of forlorn hopes that were destined to triumph; and the friends of lost causes who fought bravely against fate—Patrick Hamilton, Cargill, and Argyll, Beaton and Montrose, and Dundee."
 The faint echo of Matthew Arnold's Oxford preface to Essays in Criticism has a pleasant ring.

PROF. SAINTSBURY'S suggestion of a lecture-ship in the University of Edinburgh on Scottish language and literature, apart from, and in addition to, his own chair of English Literature, has found favour in the eyes of those who deprecate what they consider the "neglect of Scottish" by the Universities north of the Tweed. But it is quite possible, despite the favourable reception given to the suggestion, that the lecture-ship may never be founded. For there are two difficulties, at least, to be surmounted. First, there is the procuring of the necessary funds. And that is a very real difficulty. No doubt money was got to found a chair of Gaelic in Edinburgh University, but the founding of that chair was an act of folly not likely to be paralleled in the near future. The chair of Celtic Language and Literature has an endowment of £514, and during last session the lectures were attended by one student! The Gaelic chair, indeed, may be regarded as of the nature of an "awful warning" against academic fads.

A SECOND, and scarcely less real, difficulty is that of determining what is the "Scottish language." For although there is in Scotland a mass of dialects, these differ widely from each other. There is not now, and it is doubtful whether there ever was, a standard of Scottish. It is impossible to point to any well of Scottish undefiled. Nay, more, the movement for the formation of a Scottish Dialect Society is regarded by some Scotsmen as tantamount to a dialectal decay even, and the superseding entirely of Scottish by English. It has been compared to embalming the dead. "The Scots tongue is moribund," despairingly exclaims a writer on the subject in a Scottish periodical. As the only means of preserving it from absolute death and burial, he suggests—whether the suggestion is meant in all seriousness or is an illustration of Scotch "wit" is difficult to say—that the "Scots language" should be statutorily taught in all the schools north of the Tweed; that there should be "Scots" chairs in all the Scottish Universities; and that every second year the Queen's Speech should be written and delivered from the Throne in Doric! But he is silently silent, perhaps—as to whether the Doric is to be that spoken on the banks of the Tweed or the Dee, the Forth, the Clyde, or the Tay.

How many of our readers will recognize this dedication and the volume whence it comes?—

To

S. L. O.,

AN AMERICAN GENTLEMAN,

IN ACCORDANCE WITH WHOSE CLASSIC TASTE

THE FOLLOWING NARRATIVE HAS BEEN DESIGNED,

IT IS NOW, IN RETURN FOR NUMEROUS DELIGHTFUL HOURS,

AND WITH THE KINDEST WISHES,

Dedicated

BY HIS AFFECTIONATE FRIEND,
THE AUTHOR.

S. L. O. was the youthful Lloyd Osbourne, destined subsequently to become "The Author's" collaborator. The book, of course, was Treasure Island, of which Messrs. Cassell have just published a sixpenny edition.

FROM Mr. Morley's speech at the opening of the public library at Arbroath: "I have always thought that an admirable definition of the purposes of libraries and of books by an admirable man of letters years ago, when he said their object was to bring more sunshine into the lives of our fellow-countrymen, more good will, more good humour, and more of the habit of being pleased with one another. Yet I should like to make a little addition to it—namely, 'The object is to bring sunshine into our hearts and to drive moonshine out of our heads.'"

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a scrap of verse which appeared in an evening paper some eight or nine years ago, called forth by the announcement that among a bundle of books recently purchased by Mr. Gladstone from a second-hand dealer was a copy of Walker's Rhyming Dictionary. The commentator wrote thus:

"Ah, my Lord Tennyson, walk very warily,
Swinburne, thou rioter, look well ahead,
Dobson, my butterfly, never so airily
Though thou may'st sing now, thy triumph is dead.
Morris, of Hades, thy minutes are numbered,
Morris, of Paradise, dashed is thy cup,
Bridges, rare Bridges, too long hast thou slumbered,
Bouncing Buchanan, thou'dst better dry up.
Lang, thou allusive one, cease ballade-mongering,
Watson, retire to pre-Allen repose,
Sims, for thy staves though the million be hungering,
Still were it wiser to buckle to prose.
All other bards, of whatever ability,
Take my advice and retire while you can;
For to stay means defeat by the weird versatility
Shown by the Grand Old Poetical Man."

MR. GLADSTONE, however, cannot be said directly to have succeeded with poetry. Indirectly, however, his poetical pastimes yielded, the most admirable result, for they produced Mr. Graves's Hawarden Horace.

THE serial Life of Mr. Gladstone, which Messrs. Cassell have begun to issue, under the editorship of Sir Wemyss Reid, makes a good start. The contributors will be the editor, Canon MacColl, Mr. A. J. Butler, Mr. F. W. Hirst, Mr. A. F. Robbins, and Mr. G. W. E. Russell. A fine reproduction of Millais' 1888 Christ Church portrait forms the frontispiece.

A SPECIMEN of English as she is spelled in Naples is forwarded to us by a correspondent. The following sentences are extracted from a circular issued by a commercial paper: "We propose to you to make the publicity to products of your House, being sure that if you take exact informations on the quality and importance of our newspaper, you will not hesitate to accept with the utmost favour our proposal. As for prices we promise to do you the greatest facilitations, out tariffs, especially it you give us orders to publish the advice in permanence. Waiting for a kind answer we are."

FROM the Cleveland Leader:

"BOSTON LADY: If you will split that pile of wood I will give you a sandwich.

TRAMP: Madam, I never split things—not even infinitives.

BOSTON LADY: Oh, you lovely man! Come in and have tea with me."

IN some respects one of the most interesting of the curious old "Closes" in the historic Lawnmarket of Edinburgh is "Lady Stair's Close," so named on account of the principal residence in it having been that of Elizabeth, Dowager Countess of Stair, the leader of Edinburgh society in the early part of last century. Her house, which is interesting alike because of its historical and of its literary associations, was acquired some time ago by Lord Rosebery, and has now been restored by his Lordship. It is, perhaps, best known as the scene of Sir Walter Scott's short story "My Aunt Margaret's Mirror," which he wrote for The Keepsake of 1828. The story itself is based upon the matrimonial adventure which tradition has ascribed to Lady Stair, who, it is said, was so ill-treated by her first husband, Viscount Penrose, that she had on one occasion to leap, half-dressed, from a window in order to escape his brutality. Subsequently, a fortune-teller showed her, in a "magic mirror," her absent husband about to marry another woman, and the prevention of the ceremony by her brother—events which were afterwards found to have occurred at the time the scene was exhibited in the "magic mirror." So, at least, runs the tradition which formed the groundwork of Scott's tale. Lady Penrose, on her husband's death, vowed not to marry again, but Lord Stair contrived to make her break her vow. Gaining admission to her house, he exhibited himself at a window en déshabille, with the result that the fear of injury to her reputation won from her an unwilling consent to marry him. Unfortunately for her, Lord Stair also proved a bit of a savage, knocking her down on one occasion when in his cups. She died in 1759.

THE restoration by Lord Rosebery has, as might have been expected, been carried out with marked good taste, and the house is likely to be one of the "sights" of the Scottish capital, as it is also one of its old fast disappearing landmarks. The old fireplaces, several of them very fine, have been carefully preserved. The decorations of the large hall include portraits of Sir Walter Scott, John Knox, Buchanan, and others. But now that the restoration has been finished, the question which was asked when it was begun is revived: "What will he do with it?"

A NEW issue of Miss Frances Burney's Evelina, just published by George Newnes, Ltd., has the merit of being unedited. It comes with the embellishments of its author only; and with one of these we are pleased to renew acquaintance. Who does not smile to read the dedicatory verses addressed by Frances to her father, Dr. Burney:

"Oh, Author of my being! far more dear
To me than light, than nourishment, or rest,
Hygeia's blessings, Rapture's burning tear,
Or the life-blood that mantles in my breast

"Oh! of my life at once the source and joy!
If e'er thy eyes these feeble lines survey,
Let not their folly their intent destroy;
Accept the tribute—but forget the lay."

A modern father might accept the tribute, but he could not—he never could—forget the lay.

MR. THOMAS HARDY'S next volume is likely to consist of short stories gathered from various periodicals. He is, however, working steadily at a new novel. Mr. Hardy, fortunately, is no more to be hurried than nature herself.

MR. NEW'S quaint and vivid drawings for the Complete Angler made Mr. Lane's edition of that classic valuable and memorable. We are glad to learn that Mr. Lane is to follow Walton with Gilbert White, and that Mr. New is now at work on illustrations for the Natural History of Selborne. The introduction will be by Mr. Grant Allen.

MR. JEROME'S new book of essays will bear the title The Second Thoughts of an Idle Fellow, thus linking it with his first work in meditative humour. "On the Art of Making Up One's Mind," "On the Motherliness of Man," "On the Time Wasted in Looking Before One Leaps," and "On the Care and Management of Women": these are some of the subjects.

THE editor of the New York Critic has cast into the form of a letter the numerous requests that come to him for information on literary matters. This is the result, the fairness of which he vouches for:

"I have been appointed by the Ladies' Learned Literary Club of Wormwood Hollow to write an essay upon the life and works of George Eliot. Will you please" (they sometimes say please) "tell me whether George Eliot is, or was, a man or a woman? Judging by the name I suppose that she is, or was, a man, but from her portraits she seems to be, or to have been, more of a woman. But from her works, we have one in our Club library, I should judge that she is, or was, a man, for her writings have not the feminine charm of Mrs. Southworth, Mary Agnes Fleming, or E. P. Roe. Is George Eliot considered a greater writer than either of those mentioned; and, if so, will you give me the reasons why she, or he, should be so considered? Is George Eliot a real or assumed name? If the latter, he may be, or have been, a woman. Please make me out a list of her, or his, works, together with the date of their publication. Any biographical items that you can supply me with I would be glad to get, and would like them at once, as I have to deliver my essay at our next monthly meeting. P.S.—Who was George Lewes? Was he any relation to George Eliot?"

GREAT is the influence of the humorist. Mr. Lucy has recently told the readers of the Daily News that owing to Mr. Reed's persistent representation in Punch of Mr. T. G. Bowles as a mariner with only one arm and sometimes with crutches, that gentleman has received two communications asking him to become president of a Cripples' Home. Soon we shall hear that Sir William Harcourt, from continually figuring as an elephant, has received the gift of a handsome howdah.

THE Commissioners for Public Libraries in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, do their work thoroughly. In their report for 1897-98 we find a table of the occupations of the various readers—3,031 in all—who have used their libraries during the year. Clerks and book-keepers head the list. Then come domestic servants, then dressmakers and assistants, and then scholars. (What are scholars?) The number of scholars is 106. On the other hand, only one gas-valve man wandered in; only one military cap maker, only one pawnbroker, only one consul, only one soldier, only one shipbroker, only one undertaker, one brewer, one registrar, one manicurist, one publisher, and one bandage maker. The number of chefs was two; of dentists, two; of butchers, eleven ("I want to know a butcher paints," said Browning: it would have charmed him that eleven butchers read); of journalists, eleven; of umbrella-makers, two; of tobacconists, four; and of vergers, three.

IN the preface of the new half-a-crown edition of By Reef and Palm, Mr. Louis Becke gives this autobiographic paragraph:

"I do not pretend to any literary skill. Sent out into the world at thirteen years of age to look after myself, I had no chance, even had I possessed the brains, to acquire a decent education, let alone the cultivation of any literary 'style'; and, until the editor of the Sydney Bulletin asked me, four years ago, to write him a South Sea story, I had never attempted anything in the literary or journalistic line beyond taking, when very 'hard up,' a billet as proof-reader for a North Queensland newspaper, the editor of which promptly threatened to dismiss me for 'incompetence and general ignorance.' The late Earl of Pembroke believed (with my good friend, the editor of the Bulletin) that my tales were worth publishing. His lordship's kindly interest and his ever warm encouragement led to this, my first literary venture in book form, and I can never forget the debt of gratitude I owe to his memory."

APPARENTLY to everyone who waits cometh the honour of D.C.L. The latest writer to be thus distinguished is the author of The Seats of the Mighty, who has been made D.C.L. of Trinity University, Canada. But for the sake of avoiding confusion, we trust that the novelist will not choose to be called Dr. Parker.

A CHARMING little reprint of Holbein's Dance of Death, with Mr. Dobson's introduction, has just been sent to us by Messrs. Bell & Sons. The tiny book is a true memento mori. It may be carried almost in the waistcoat-pocket.

MR. JEREMIAH CURTIN, the American gentleman who had the wit to see "boodle" in the novels of Henry Sienkiewicz, is said to have made £5,000 by his translation of Quo Vadis.

PURE FABLES.

OUT OF DATE.

ON a May morning a youth lay under a hedge and wept, and railed at Fate.

And by and by an ancient man came that way, and said to him, "You appear to be in sore trouble, friend!"

"Alas," replied the youth, "my case is indeed sad: I am a neglected genius!"

"Dear, dear!" observed the ancient man. "Then surely you must be the last of them!"

USEFUL.

THE small birds decided to give a concert. And the linnet went round and invited the stork.

"Thanks," said the stork; "but my voice is neither here nor there."

"Come—and bring your family!" cried the linnet. "So many of us have volunteered to warble that we are bound to be badly put to it for an audience."

WANTED.

A man waited upon the secretary of the Department of Letters and asked for employment.

"What are you?" inquired the secretary.

"Well, I have had extensive experience in the larding of reputations," quoth the man.

"Ah!" sighed the secretary, "we are already very much over-staffed in that direction. What we need just now is a competent person to comb fools."

T. W. H. C.

NOVELISTS AS POETS.

SOME little surprise seems to have been expressed that Mr. Conan Doyle should announce the publication of a volume of verses from his pen. The surprise is itself surprising. Mr. Doyle had already shown that he could write a vigorous song, and, though that did not prove that he possessed the poetic faculty, it might have reminded a good many that, throughout the course of English literary effort, nothing has been more common—or, in some cases, more notable—than the writing of verses by the spinners of stories.

Who was the first of purely English romancists? Sir Philip Sidney, you will say, remembering The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia. Well, were there not some quaint and effective lyrics scattered through the pages of the Arcadia? Is it not there that we find "My true love hath my heart, and I have his," which the late Mr. Palgrave condensed, characteristically, for his Golden Treasury? Robert Greene has made his way, of late years, into the anthologies; and he has done so solely by virtue of the poems introduced by him into his prose fictions. It is in his Menaphon that we come upon the now much-appreciated "Weep not, my wanton, smile upon my knee," and in his "Never too late" that we encounter the "conceited ditty" with the melodious refrain:

"N'oserez vous, mon bel, mon bel, N'oserez vous, mon bel ami?"

Everybody knows the "madrigal" by Thomas Lodge—

"Love in my bosom like a bee Doth suck his sweet";

but everybody does not know that it is part and parcel of his prose tale Rosalynde.

Coming further down the stream of time, we dip into Mrs. de la Rivière Manley's New Atlantis, and make note therein of a song by Arethusa on Endymion—"Fly from his charming graces, fly"—which have in them "something so near the Saphick strain, as I have heard good judges say." Henry Fielding wrote verses, not only for his dramatic pieces, but for his novels—as witness the song in Joseph Andrews—

"Say, Chloe, where must the swain stray
Who is by thy beauties undone?"

The priggish Richardson, too, was among the bards, inasmuch as he penned songs for Pamela—

"Go, happy pages, gently steal,
And underneath her pillow lie," for instance. You will find, likewise, in Peregrine Pickle, some lines which the said Peregrine (inspired by his creator, Mr. Smollett) had written in a lady's praise.

Nobody nowadays reads The Life of John Bunce, Esq., by Thomas Amory; but if anyone turned to that curious piece of invention he would discover there more than one copy of verses, notably "A Song called The Solitude," esteemed for its "morality." Mrs. Anne Radcliffe is famous as the author of The Romance of the Forest, and so on; but she also published a volume of rhythms and rhymes—a fact which ought to astonish no one who has read either the said Romance or The Mysteries of Udolpho, seeing that in the former, particularly, there are some very fluent ditties, of unimpeachable accuracy—informing us, for example, that

"Life's a varied, bright illusion—Joy and sorrow, light and shade," and so forth.

"The dews that bend the blushing flower
Enrich the scent—renew the glow;
So Love's sweet tears exalt his power,
So Bliss more brightly shines by woe!"— such was the excellent Mrs. Radcliffe's "note" in poetry.

The good old song of "Gaffer Gray," which we owe to Thomas Holcroft, is enshrined in that writer's novel called Hugh Trevor. In Gerald Griffin's Collegians is Anne Chute's ditty:

"A place in thy memory, dearest,
Is all that I claim."

In like manner,

"'Tis not for love of gold I go,
'Tis not for love of fame," warbles Mary Grace in Banim's Peep o' Day. Marryat wrote verses for his novels, as we see in the songs by Jemmy Ducks and Nancy Corbett in The Dog Fiend. Very characteristic and well worth remembering are Jemmy's homely stanzas. No wonder his boon companions were wont to say, "Jemmy, strike up." Sara Coleridge published a book of verse for children; but the best of her poetic outcome is embedded in her romance, Phantasmion, where one alights unawares upon some really graceful numbers. There are verses—not very good ones—in Jane Eyre; there are still more in the forgotten Mrs. Johnstone's forlorn Clan Albyn. Quite a pretty muse, too, had the late G. P. R. James, if we may judge from the songs which appear in Agin-court, Arabella Stuart, Darnley, The Smuggler, and such-like masterpieces.

"Deep in each bosom's secret cell
The hermit-sorrows lie."

So wrote G. P. R. J. in one of his stanzas; and something very like it is to be observed in one of the pious pieces of the Rev. John Keble.

Some of the most popular of English songs first peeped out of the pages of a novel—Dickens's "Ivy Green," for instance. It is in Charles O'Malley that we find "The Irish Dragoon," "The Widow Malone," and "Mary Draper"; just as it was in Harry Lorrequer that Lever gave to the world his adaptation from the German—"The Pope He Leads a Happy Life." There are verses in Hannay's Singleton Fontenoy and in Shirley Brooks's Sooner or Later; there are verses, too, in the prose work of a greater than either—in Henrietta Temple, to wit, where Captain Armine mourns melodiously over his lady-love's engagement to "another." Harrison Ainsworth wrote the familiar strains of "My Old Complaint" for his Flitch of Bacon. At least one song adorns the late W. G. Wills's tale, The Love that Kills; and the late James Payn, by including a couple of lyrics in A Grape from a Thorn, recalled the fact that he had been a professional rhymist in his youth.

Had Mr. Doyle needed any justification for penning verses, he might have pointed at once to the example of some living members of his craft—to the songs included by Mr. Hardy in his Three Strangers, by Mr. William Black in his Sunrise and Daughter of Ieth, by Mr. Francillon in his Zelda's Fortune, by Mr. Mallock in his New Republic, by Mrs. Steele in her Gardenhurst, and so forth.

In making these brief and rapid notes, one dwells upon the writers who have been novelists first and verse-writers afterwards. That those who produced both poems and novels should introduce verse into the latter is no more than was to be expected. And they make a goodly company. Look at the lyrics which abound in the prose fictions of Scott and T. L. Peacock, Bulwer, Charles Kingsley, and Mortimer Collins. Goldsmith inserted in his Vicar the two stanzas by which he is best known. Hogg has verse in his Katie Cheyne; so has Hook in his Jack Brag; so has Hood in his Tylney Hall; so has D. M. Moir in his Mansie Wauch; so has Moore in his Epicurean. Some of the very best of Peacock's rhymes are in his novels. Thackeray's "Ho, pretty page with the dimpled chin" is in his Rebecca and Rowena. In Handy Andy are two of the most popular of Lover's lyrics—"What will you do, love?" and "Widow Machree." The list is almost unending. Look at Whyte Melville's songs in Tilbury Nago, Holmby House, and Black, but Comely—they are the pick of his basket. Both Mrs. Norton and George Eliot occasionally broke into verse in the midst of their prose imaginings. One recalls Jean Ingelow's songs in Mopsa the Fairy, and Mr. George Macdonald's in Phantastes, Adela Cathcart, and the like. Last, but assuredly not least, there is Mr. George Meredith, great alike in verse and prose: bethink you of Ameryl's ditties in The Shaving of Shagpat and the hunting song in Parva. There are, one sees, plenty of precedents for Mr. Conan Doyle.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE IDYLLS OF THE KING.

If it is true that in order to understand a great poem we must first of all understand its origin, then the evolution of the Idylls is a subject of the highest importance.

Under this head, as it appears to me, the recent Memoir of Lord Tennyson has proved disappointing; beyond the poet's prose story of King Arthur, and the fact that Tennyson (and here we are reminded of Milton) was wavering "between casting the Arthurian legends into the form of an epic, or into that of a musical masque," we learn comparatively little about the upbuilding of the late Laureate's most important work. On the other hand, many notable particulars brought forward by independent research, such, for example, as the significant trial volumes of 1857 and 1859, are left not only without instructive comment, but almost without recognition.

In the face of such a disappointment we are compelled to fall back upon other sources of information; and since it is questionable whether much, or, indeed, any new light will hereafter be thrown upon the development of the Idylls, we shall do well once and for all to place upon record and briefly examine whatever existing contributions to the subject may seem to have a real and permanent value; and I may point out that we are not concerned with the sources of the Idylls, but merely with the history of their composition.

Up to the present five writers appear to give evidence of original research in their endeavour to trace the growth of our great modern poem, and their efforts may conveniently be noticed in a chronological order.

In 1893 Mr. Knowles published his Aspects of Tennyson. To these we are indebted for a copy of The Dolorous Stroke, and for many interesting glimpses of the poet's original plans, and of the way in which he wrought at his magnificent theme.

Next, in 1895, appeared the most important of these investigations, for in that year there was published in America The Growth of the Idylls of the King, by Dr. Richard Jones. But an account of this volume will fall in with my remarks upon a publication of 1896, which gave to the work of Dr. Jones an additional interest: I refer to the second volume of Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century, by Dr. Robertson Nicoll and Mr. Th. J. Wise, which includes a section entitled The Building of the Idylls. At this point I may mention that my own Handbook to Tennyson, which was published about the same time as the treatise of Dr. Jones, covers in its eleventh chapter a good deal of the same ground, with much less fulness of detail.

In their preface to Literary Anecdotes, the editors

"beg to draw particular attention to the section entitled The Building of the Idylls, . . . an interesting but little-known subject . . . in the course of which will be found full and careful descriptions of Enid and Nimuë (1857), The True and the False (1859), The Last Tournament (1871), and other Tennysonian 'trial books,' particulars of which have never before been adequately recorded"; and they continue, "it may safely be claimed that The Building of the Idylls is a contribution to modern bibliography of the highest importance."

But in his 150 well-written pages, Prof. Jones had forestalled the editors, who were not aware of his book, nor of mine. And now, by briefly examining the claim they put forward, we shall be able to estimate as briefly the work of earlier labourers in the same field.

It may be noticed first, that of the three early proofs or trial copies specified in the preface to Literary Anecdotes, The Last Tournament is comparatively of little importance, but the other two are profoundly interesting, and most essential to a study of the Arthurian poems. And, as a fact, Prof. Jones has taken the trouble carefully and completely to collate not only these earlier trial copies, but also the various published versions of the Idylls. "It is a serious undertaking to collate," say the editors, "but," they add, "the collation is both interesting and fruitful."

Of the items of information furnished by Literary Anecdotes, the most important is the account of the Morte D'Arthur volume of 1842, preserved in the library of Mr. Buxton Forman. There are a few other less important particulars that are not cited by Prof. Jones, and some of these have appeared elsewhere. The editors, however, deserve credit for their notice of The Last Tournament booklet, The Idylls of the Hearth—already commented upon in my Handbook—and, lastly, for their description of The True and the False as possessed by Mr. William Harris Arnold, of New York. On the other hand, their more recent volume omits much that is included in the work of Dr. Jones; nor do they describe so clearly as he does the relation between the early proofs at South Kensington and those in the British Museum. They are also more pronounced in their opinions than the American author, as when they write of Tennyson's Idylls, "the book remains a monument of vacillation and misdirected ingenuity." In much the same terms they would condemn the great work of Goethe, for it closely resembles that of Tennyson both in regard to the manner of building and the number of years it took to build.

Again, of the division of Enid into two books, whereby Tennyson increased the number of his Idylls from eleven to twelve, they write, "A glance at this programme discovers ingenuity galore. . . . Something had to be done; and, literally, the judgment of Solomon was displayed in the doing of that something." Such language as this seems effusive when confronted by the fact that Milton made twelve books out of ten.

But this comparison between The Growth of the Idylls and The Building of the Idylls will most fitly draw to its conclusion with the remark that although Prof. Jones might reasonably dispute the claim of the editors to be pioneers and exhaustive in this department of literature, they, nevertheless, do themselves an injustice when they describe their contribution as "mere gossip." On the other hand, the sober and thorough treatise of Prof. Jones is deserving of the highest praise.

Two quotations out of many may now serve for a comparison between my own inquiries and those of The Growth of the Idylls and The Building of the Idylls, especially as all such quotations gain a new and absorbing interest if they show how certain data are moulded by different hands to the same conclusions; and they will further explain some of the importance attaching to earlier readings:

"Another omission in the completed Idylls of the King is the '57 line:

'And troubled in his heart about the Queen.'

The omission of this line in the completed Idylls is exceedingly significant in connexion with the question as to the growth of the plan of the poem in the poet's mind. This line makes Arthur suspect Guinevere long before the final disclosures and the consequent disruption of the Order of the Table Round. In the poem as we now have it, the King is not 'troubled in heart' about the Queen at all, but merely in regard to 'some corruption crept among the knights.'—Growth of the Idylls, p. 105.

"That Malory put this question to himself appears from his remark, 'For, as the French book saith, the King had a deeming'; and that Tennyson was not unaware of the difficulty is seen in the following readings. In Enid and Nimuë the important line runs thus:

'And troubled in his heart about the Queen.'

This, in The True and the False: Four Idylls of the King, is corrected to

'Vext at a rumour rife about the Queen'; and this line kept its place till 1874. As to the reading adopted in that year—

'Vext at a rumour issued from herself,

Of some corruption crept among his knights'—we need only say that conjecture as to what it means, taking all circumstances into consideration, is entirely baffled."—Handbook to Tennyson, 1st edit., p. 351.

"The second paragraph of Nimuë opens thus in the private print of 1857:

'And troubled in his heart about the Queen.'

(One line of ten quoted.) This, in the volume of 1859, was rendered thus:

'Vext at a rumour rife about the Queen.'

(One line of eleven.) In the final text the rumour is not about the Queen, but is

'A rumour issued from herself,

Of some corruption crept among the knights."—Building of the Idylls, p. 233.

As a second example I select the following:

"However clearly the poet may have had in his mind from the outset the plan of the whole as a single poem, the title grew from Enid and Nimuë: the True and the False to The True and the False: Four Idylls of the King, and at last to Idylls of the King."—Growth of the Idylls, p. 50.

"To turn now to the title-pages. In the distinction The True and the False we have the first reliable indication of moral purpose, but, again, not as yet of any allegorical intention. That some importance may be attached to this title seems clear from the fact that in the 1859 copy it twice takes precedence over Idylls of the King."—Handbook to Tennyson, 1st edit., p. 325.

"This was called Enid and Nimuë: the True and the False, a title indicating clearly enough how the poet's mind was tending to over-inform these legendary poems with ulterior purpose."—Building of the Idylls, p. 224.

To complete the subject of this article, I will now append one or two extracts from the letters of the late Prof. F. T. Palgrave. In one of these he thus refers to the important Enid and Nimuë volume:

"My copy is in the British Museum. It was not 'privately printed,' but withdrawn from intended publication after six copies had been printed, but not finally revised. I have always thought this a happy circumstance, as I think, undoubtedly, the two Idylls would not have commanded attention nearly so much as the four, for which the suppression gave A. T. time to prepare. Elaine, I feel pretty sure, was the last written."

On p. 257 of the Building of the Idylls we meet with the following:

"How many copies of Enid and Nimuë were printed, and of these how many were allowed to survive the issue of the published Idylls of the King—who shall say?"

A partial answer to this inquiry of the editors, together with some particulars that are akin to it, may be read in another of Mr. Palgrave's letters; and the following extract will conclude this brief summary of the literature that deals with the development of the Idylls of the King:

"I have not seen the copy of the Enid and Nimuë in the South Kensington Museum, which was doubtless sent by A. T. to J. Forster, always his faithful friend. Nor do I remember anything except that he gave me the copy in the British Museum, and that, as I then understood, only six copies had been struck off when he determined to withdraw the intended publication. The differences between the two Enids are probably due to the fact that Tennyson, as he constantly did, had the poems set up in type at once, in order to correct them with greater ease and advantage, and that the one he gave me had a text finally, or nearly finally, corrected. It has, however, a few MS. alterations."

MORTON LUCE.

THE ROYAL LITERARY FUND.

SIR WALTER BESANT PROTESTS.

IN the June issue of The Author Sir Walter Besant makes the following pertinent remarks on the Royal Literary Fund and the chairman's speech at the annual dinner:

"The Royal Literary Fund has had its annual dinner. The Duke of Devonshire spoke of the followers of literature as he understands them—namely, so many helpless paupers dependent chiefly on the doles of the Fund, and on those of the publishers, whom His Grace most graciously described as the patrons of the author. Now, I want to protest against the whole business—the speech of the Duke, which was based on pure ignorance, and the conduct of the Fund. It is a most useful institution; it relieves a good many people; they are authors, it is true, but they are not, as a rule, authors of the slightest distinction. A good writer, in these days, as easily gets a good living as a good doctor. He cannot, of course, make a colossal fortune like a man in business; but he is not a pauper, nor a dependent, and, except in very rare cases, he does not apply to the Royal Literary Fund for help. I want that point recognised in public. At present, year after year, men of letters are publicly spoken of as if they were all dependent for their livelihood upon the doles and alms of the Royal Literary Fund. Now, I repeat, and it cannot be repeated too strongly, that the great mass of the working men and women of letters have no more need of the grants made by the Fund than the great mass of barristers stand in need of their corresponding association. They do not live from hand to mouth. If they are seized with sudden illness there is money in the bank. I do not claim for them that many of them can make fortunes—even a moderate fortune; and I think that most of them die in harness. I do claim for the average writer who is generally more or less of a journalist—writes for the magazines; perhaps edits something; is perhaps a novelist or a specialist, or an educational writer—that he lives well and like a gentleman, that he also lives cleanly and soberly, that he has no more need of asking the charity of the Literary Fund than he has of going into the workhouse. Who are the people to whom the Fund is useful? There are—always with certain sad exceptions—people who have the slightest possible reason for calling themselves authors. They are necessitous; in many cases without any fault of their own. By all means let them be relieved; but do not take their cases as examples of the starving condition of the literary profession. Now, I speak from my own knowledge, because I sat on the council of the Fund for three or four years.”

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE publication of the correspondence between John Stuart Mill and Gustave d'Eichthal offers us an interesting record. The correspondence began when both men were barely twenty-four, and the maturity of mind revealed on each side is remarkable. The subject of their most serious consideration is Saint-Simonism. To-day the matter is old enough, and most of us have forgotten all about the movement, but such a mutual revelation of character in two young men about seventy years ago leaves an extraordinary impression upon the reader. Precocity, lucidity, and an impassioned desire to grasp truth in both hands—these are the characteristics of the two notable correspondents. Beside their noble pre-occupations, how shallow and trivial the aim of the average young “literary” man, who regards the puerile and fatuous revelation of his own temperament as the main object of his creation, and the reading of the more or less studied drivel he condescends to pour forth for coin and the delectation of his fellows as the exclusive raison d'être of the rest of humanity!

It is interesting to find that M. d'Eichthal shared Mill's well-known views about women. “Woman was designed for a perfect association with man,” he enthusiastically writes, “not the present semi-servitude.” He insists that she should take her share in government: man discussing, woman deciding. Mill writes: “It is impossible not to love the French, and at the same time we are forced to regard them as children; while with us even the children are complete men of fifty.” The English, he avers, are either Voltairians or bigots, and hopes salvation for them lies between the neo-Catholicism of Oxford and German rationalism, then just beginning to be studied.

This week MM. Calmann Lévy have published Mme. Darmesteter's French version of her exquisite Renan. Mme. Darmesteter's French prose is as distinguished as her English style, and to say this is to say that the book is as charming in one language as in the other. It might be feared that another contribution to the literature of Renan would be lost in the mass: that, so many French writers having written about him, there remained nothing more to be said. But the freshness of this book lies in the poet's interpretation of this most slippery and subtle genius of the century. The Renan she depicts is so superlatively sympathetic and delightful that to many he will come with all the surprise and charm of an original creation. Some there are who will read with pleasure and approval Mme. Darmesteter's Renan who would not touch Renan's own work with a pair of tongs—which will prove for them a much-needed lesson in charity and tolerance.

The Villa sans Maître, by Eugène Rouart, can hardly be described as a novel, though it bears this misleading description on the title-page. The feeble, unsatisfactory, consumptive hero records his life and sentiments in measured and delicate prose. The effect has the fantastic and irritating interest of a dream: a mingling of broken intensity, of perplexing indefiniteness; details that make the chain of events obliterated, nothing concluded, nothing explained, the continual obsession of reverie. The characters drift in and out of the quaint pages blurred and startlingly like figures in our dreams, their individuality hanging only on an incongruous word, an inexplicable look or gesture, a singular inquietude of soul and temperament. It is emphatically an artist's book. The style is rhythmic, vague, of a delicate melancholy and a distinguished restraint. Passion itself inspires resignation rather than rapture. When the lovers fall, the hero plaintively writes: “We were not indignant with one another, we accepted this increase—a little heavy perhaps—of intimacy as a complementary thing we had not even striven to resist.” Nothing in the nature of pornography. Sensuality is glanced at as a shuddering mystery, an elusive morbid phase, full of sombre terrors and retribution. But marriage seems no better. The nerveless, unhappy creature misses his way in both paths. He murders, in a fit of fury, the only human character in the book, his generous friend Gabriel, and flies to the East. The last pages are poetical, soft, and “tristeful.”

Another Italian to the front. Verily, Italian novelists are becoming more fashionable here than the poor neglected French. It is a jump from Scandinavia to the South, but French taste has taken the leap—after Tolstoi, Ibsen; after Sudermann, Annunzio. Then came Fogazzaro, lionised and interviewed, and now we have Rovetta with his Illustré Matteo, translated extremely well by Jean le Pelletier. The illustrious Matthew is decidedly a creation, even in these dull days, when humanity seems exhausted to the despairing novelist. The scenes are fresh enough, the characterisation of real interest and vitality, and the dialogue is sprightly enough to carry the reader along, but it is not such a book as will dethrone the admired Annunzio.

The world of letters, which produces and fosters so much intolerable egotism and vanity, has never received more convincing proof of the noxiousness of literary vanity, and the imbecile depths of personal drivel into which egotism may drive the cleverest writer, than in the recent publication of Alexander Dumas' theatrical notes. The nature they reveal is so completely antipathetic that the kindest reader may be defied to get to the end of the book. My patience succumbed after a hundred pages.

H. L.

THE BOOK MARKET.

BOOKSELLING WITHOUT BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKSELLERS, and their friends the publishers, have of late been so fully occupied in discussing the endless intricacies of the discount question, and the thousand and one remedies for the present depression, that they have failed to realise, in any adequate manner, the tremendous consequences of the success which has attended the cheap Times reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica. To make clear the significance of what may fairly be called the literary phenomenon of the day we must first note carefully the terms upon which the Encyclopædia is offered. The appeal is made by the proprietors of the Times directly to the public, not to the public through the booksellers. In the advertisement of the offer it is not even stated that the Encyclopædia may be obtained through the booksellers, though, as we shall show later, this is to some extent the case. The order form appended to the advertisement is not to be addressed to the local bookseller, but sent direct to the publisher of the Times. Payment is to be on the instalment plan, or we might even call it the hire-system. "One guinea in cash to be followed after the delivery of the volumes by thirteen monthly payments of one guinea each, is all that is necessary to secure a set of the Encyclopædia Britannica—the twenty-five volumes of the latest, the ninth, edition, complete and unabridged, and in every respect the same work for which the publisher's price has been £37. No further payments are required [sic] until the complete set has been delivered. Moreover, a preliminary payment of one guinea secures a set in whichever style of binding may be selected, the payments simply being extended over a longer period." The prices are: cloth binding, fourteen guineas in monthly payments; half-morocco, eighteen guineas in monthly payments; full morocco, twenty-five guineas in monthly payments. On the order form, which must be signed by each purchaser, it is distinctly stated that until the payments are complete the volumes are the property of those issuing the advertisement, and may not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

It is no secret that this issue has met with a remarkable reception. Applications have poured in upon the publisher of the Times, and orders have been received, we believe, for considerably over five thousand sets. We do not wish to discuss, in any way, the value or price of this reprint. What interests us at present is the fact that, without the aid or intervention of the booksellers, thousands of copies of an expensive work have been disposed of, and a literary enterprise of first-class magnitude, for which the demand had greatly declined, has been revived in a most brilliant fashion. It is true that the publisher of the Times is willing to receive an order from a bookseller, but what are the trade terms? A commission of five shillings on fourteen guineas! The first payment from a bookseller is, we understand, sixteen shillings; after that he must send his guinea monthly like any other purchaser. We believe that comparatively few orders have been received through the trade, and, under the circumstances, this is hardly to be wondered at.

Now what does this system of direct dealing mean to the publisher? Sets of works have often enough been offered to the public at special subscription terms, but up to the present arrangements have been made whereby the bookseller securing the order obtains the books at a considerably reduced rate. The trade terms for such sets are usually ten per cent. off the net subscription price, and sometimes as much as fifteen per cent. is given. And more than this, the publisher does his utmost to reach the public through the retailer. In his advertisements emphasis is laid upon the fact that the books may be obtained through the local bookseller, and would-be purchasers are constantly referred to the booksellers in their district.

Let us suppose now, for an instant, that this offer of the Encyclopædia Britannica had been made on the usual terms at fourteen pounds per set for net cash. The publisher, even though he relied on the bookseller to push the new issue, would be compelled to spend a considerable sum in advertising—say, five hundred pounds. Now suppose that he obtain five thousand orders for this fourteen-pound edition, all of them from the booksellers, and that he has no bad debts. He would then receive £63,000—i.e., 5,000 sets at £14 less 10 per cent. trade allowance. On the other hand, suppose that five thousand orders come direct from the public, and that, again, there are no bad debts. He would then receive £70,000. In this second case he would, in order to make exactly the same profit as if he were dealing in the ordinary way through the trade, be able to spend no less than £7,500 in advertising.

This is, of course, an altogether exaggerated instance, but the figures will show how an enormous sum may be saved by not allowing special terms to the booksellers, and by dealing solely and directly with the public. Those who are responsible for this new issue of the Encyclopædia Britannica have advertised to an extent undreamed of in the traditions of publishing. But they have saved the retailer's profit—saved the per cent., that is, on several thousands of pounds.

In point of orders the new experiment has been an unqualified success. The question is, how will this plan of payment by instalment succeed? It is by no means a new system of bookselling, but it is new to the book-buyers of this country. In the United States and on the Continent it has been worked for years, and on the whole it has been more than successful. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that in America all large sets of books are sold on this plan of delivering the complete set and waiting for payment. We could name several successful American publishers who have worked up enormous businesses on the instalment system by circularising the public, but whose accounts with booksellers proper are insignificant. The same applies to a number of French firms. No doubt they experience from time to time considerable difficulty in collecting the payments, no doubt there are occasional bad debts, but on the whole the system has been found a profitable one. The "instalment publisher" requires considerable faith in the general honesty of the human race, but hitherto his faith has been amply justified.

The curious thing is, that this country has had to wait so long for such a publisher. It will not have to wait long for his imitators. What does the trade say to this new system of bookselling without booksellers?

W.

POPULAR BOOKS IN AMERICA.

ONCE more our contemporary The Bookman, of America, has been at the pains to discover what the citizens of the United States are reading. In the complete poll Mr. Anthony Hope's Simon Dale comes first—Mr. Hopkinson Smith's Caleb West being just beaten on the post. Mr. Stanley Weyman's Shrewsbury is third. We quote a few of the lists. San Francisco (Cal.) remains faithful to Quo Vadis.

NEW YORK, DOWNTOWN.

1. Simon Dale. By Hope.
2. Caleb West. By Smith.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
5. Paris. By Zola.
6. Hugh Wynne. By Mitchell.

NEW YORK, UPTOWN.

1. Caleb West. By Smith.
2. Simon Dale. By Hope.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. Paris. By Zola.
5. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
6. Hugh Wynne. By Mitchell.

BOSTON, MASS.

1. Marching with Gomez. By Flint.
2. Bird Neighbours. By Blanchan.
3. At the Sign of the Silver Crescent. By Prince.
4. Caleb West. By Smith.
5. Coming People. By Dole.
6. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.

BOSTON, MASS.

1. Marching with Gomez. By Flint.
2. Simon Dale. By Hope.
3. Caleb West. By Smith.
4. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
5. Paris. By Zola.
6. At the Sign of the Silver Crescent. By Prince.

CHICAGO, ILL.

1. Spain in the 19th Century. By Latimer.
2. Caleb West. By Smith.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. The Girl at Cobhurst. By Stockton.
5. The Choir Invisible. By Allen.
6. Simon Dale. By Hope.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

1. Simon Dale. By Hope.
2. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
3. Lion of Janina. By Jokai.
4. With Fire and Sword. By Sienkiewicz.
5. For Love of Country. By Brady.
6. Paris. By Zola.

MONTREAL, CANADA.

1. The Standard Bearer. By Crockett.
2. Deeds that Won the Empire. By Fitchett.
3. Paris. By Zola.
4. The Choir Invisible. By Allen.
5. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
6. Simon Dale. By Hope.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

1. The Celebrity. By Churchill.
2. Hugh Wynne. By Mitchell.
3. For Love of Country. By Brady.
4. Paris. By Zola.
5. School for Saints. By Hobbes.
6. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

1. Hugh Wynne. By Mitchell.
2. Simon Dale. By Hope.
3. The Gadfly. By Voynich.
4. Paris. By Zola.
5. The Celebrity. By Churchill.
6. Pride of Jennico. By Castle.

PITTSBURG, PA.

1. Following the Equator. By Twain.
2. Simon Dale. By Hope.
3. A Desert Drama. By Doyle.
4. The Gadfly. By Voynich.
5. For Love of Country. By Brady.
6. The Federal Judge. By Lush.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

1. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
2. With Fire and Sword. By Sienkiewicz.
3. Caleb West. By Smith.
4. Paris. By Zola.
5. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
6. Simon Dale. By Hope.

TORONTO, CANADA.

1. The Girl at Cobhurst. By Stockton.
2. Shrewsbury. By Weyman.
3. Pride of Jennico. By Castle.
4. David Lyall's Love Story. By the author of The Land o' the Leal.
5. The Story of Ab. By Waterloo.
6. Deeds that Won the Empire. By Fitchett.

ART.

FRENCH ART AT THE GUILDHALL.

THE show of French Art, which makes the great Exhibition at the Guildhall, is comprehensive and representative, although it is not actually systematic. To make it all that it has aimed to be, would have required not more of goodwill, not more, perhaps, of enterprise, but more of research and of positive knowledge, on the part of its organisers; and even had it been perfect in its representation of painted work—had the work of Clouet, Claude, and the two Poussins, say, and something of the work of Gérard, Ingres, and Flandrin been included with the panels and the canvases of Watteau, Lancret, Boucher, Delaroche, Théodore Rousseau, Gérôme, Diaz, and Degas, and many more—it would have been open to us to remind those who looked upon it that not the whole of French pictorial art had found expression in oil-painting—that, speaking of the Eighteenth Century alone, the pastels of Quentin de La Tour, who knew no other medium, are worthy to be placed beside the crayon work of Watteau. Or, one might add, that Gravelot's drawings, and the designs of Eisen and the younger Moreau—the gouaches, too, of Lavreince, the lax effusions of Baudouin—would all be wanted, were it sought to exhibit in completeness not alone the most trumpeted performances, but the most exquisite achievements, of the Art of France.

That has not been attempted, and what we are face to face with is not the kind of collection that the Burlington Club might have given us, minutely studious, carefully final, teaching to those who are already taught, but, rather, a quite astonishing assemblage of the capital examples of big men; the great painters of the fête galante, Watteau and Lancret, the chief of them, almost at their best; Boucher, captivating and accomplished; Greuze, excusable; Delaroche, blameless; Rousseau, potent; Diaz, a very reveller in pure yet luscious colour; Corot, arresting effects that come and go before the eye as one speaks; Troyon, endowed with a freedom and opulence hardly Cuypp's or Paul Potter's; Daubigny, performing for the Lowlands of France the service Mr. Whistler has performed for our London river—showing what beauty of tone and of form lurks unsuspected in scenes to which an obvious romance has been denied.

One or two thoughts—questions none the less interesting, perhaps, because one does not profess to straightway answer them—occur to one on one's rounds. Looking at that which, after all, displays so much of the art of a whole school, one asks whether the differences in the art of that school, taking the beginning and the end of that which we see at the Guildhall, from Le Nain to Henner and Claude Monet—whether these differences are not more marked than any differences to be discerned between the work of two countries at one and the same epoch? Briefly, in a rough way, had not Hogarth and Chardin, at least a little more in common than Pater and Pissarro—the delightful Little Master, happy in his record of feminine prettiness, and of those artifices of the toilette by which it is maintained or counterfeited, and the vivid, dexterous, and audacious recorder of the movement of the Boulevard? It may seem so sometimes, and if it does seem so, that shows the delusiveness of dividing the products of Art too sharply into the products of schools, while in reality it may be that they are instead the products of periods. And again, another little lesson—the lesson of the immense and legitimate variety of artistic effort, a variety never seized, never done justice to, never understood, never acquiesced in, by the painter himself when he turns critic and is brought to confusion by the presence of so much excellence he had never allowed for, because it is foreign to his own particular aim and to his narrow traditions, which are those of limited practitioners, instead of tolerant and well-equipped judges. The critic painter, going to the Guildhall, will fall foul of Bouguereau if he admires Troyon, and will, if he admires the potency of Rousseau and of Courbet, discern no charm in Pater's ordered grace.

Lessons are always unwelcome, and I will preach but one more. We have been accustomed to say that the French are draughtsmen, and not colourists. That which we assert is true absolutely, while that which we deny is true but within certain limits. Accuracy of draughtsmanship in intricate things has been a greater aim, and a more constant achievement, with the French than with ourselves. Not for us the rapid truth even of a Boucher, who was a rose-water Rubens. Not for us certainly—at least until this present generation—the faultless draughtsmanship of Gérôme in "Cleopatra," or "Phryne," or in the white girl nude in the bath, before Moorish tiles and a copper-coloured eunuch. In regard to colour, on the other hand—unerring splendour in the use of it—it is true that no French landscapist has rivalled Turner, and no French figure painter has rivalled Etty. At all events, until the days of the Romanticists the French palette was charged less fully and less richly, and even with the Romanticists the success is yet more a success of tone than a success of pure colour. But, with different individualities, and at different periods of French painting, there have been varying schemes of colour, inspired by different ideals, and executed with unequal yet rarely quite unsatisfactory results. Ingres, of course, was not a colourist; but you cannot deny colour to Chardin, especially to those Chardins which incline to silver rather than to brown. You find in Watteau a colourist indeed, and a faultless one; and those who followed him best—Lancret and Pater—had something of his instinct as well as something of his talent. As a colourist Watteau is founded on the Venetians, much as our own Etty is. Something, too, of an adaptation of the Venetian is to be found in Henner's tawny browns and golds, his turquoise gleaming quietly amid his olive greens. Diaz was a colourist. Fantin-Latour is a colourist to-day. That may be taken for granted. But more gradually, perhaps, must the eye be educated to understand the colouring of Boucher—"rose-water Rubens," I have said before, but for all that, in his own way exquisite, and, in colour, original. Who combines as excellently as he does, and in proportions so just, sky-blue and pink?—a sky-blue pale and luminous, a pink prettily rosy. Nor do these combinations, or such as these, exhaust the resources of his palette. See, for instance, the novel and delicate harmony in his "Confidence" between the bared flesh of neck and throat and the dainty raiment that skirts the bust. To claim colour as his especial virtue would, of course, be absurd; but, at his hours, Boucher, too, was a colourist.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE METRE OF HAFIZ.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter in the last number of the ACADEMY in which Mr. James Platt, jun., while expressing a most kind and courteous opinion of my Versions from Hafiz, criticises my table of metres as "most inaccurate." He means that the division into feet is not that used by Arabic and Persian metrists. That is, of course, the case. The change was made deliberately, with the intention of giving English readers a better idea of the rhythm. In these lyrical measures the line is the unit; the manner in which it is divided into feet is purely arbitrary. I claim the same right of presenting the line as of presenting the sense, in the way which to the best of my judgment is most adapted to my purpose. To take one of Mr. Platt's instances, that of the metre which the Persians call a Hazaj, and divide — — | — — — — | — — — — | — — — —, or, in their own terminology, Maf'ûhu mafâ'îlu mafâ'îlu mafâ'îl. This to my ear is really a modification of the "Ionic a minore," and I have accordingly printed it as such, — — | — — — — | — — — — | — — — —. Rhythmically it seems to me to have the closest affinity with the Ramal — — — — | — — — — | — — — — | — — — —. Other metres I have not divided into feet at all, because, after various trials, I did not see that by so doing I could make them more intelligible to the English eye. In this I may have been wrong, and regret that I should be at variance with so kindly a critic as Mr. Platt; but against the charge of inaccuracy I must enter a mild protest. At least, I knew what I was doing.

If the Arabic schemes represented the musical rhythm, and the division were into bars instead of feet, it would, of course, be a different matter—a matter of fact, not of opinion. We should, I think, all be grateful if some scholar would put these metres into a musical notation. For such a task I am not competent. But it might be done, and would throw more light on the metre than all the spondees and Maf'ulus in the world. For instance, the metre of the famous Bokhara and Samarcand ode is evidently—which, as has been pointed out to me—I wish it had been before publication—is the rhythm of a famous song in “Carmen,” to the music of which the Persian of Hafiz and my version can equally be sung.—Yours faithfully, WALTER LEAF.

Regent's Park : June 7.

MR. GLADSTONE AS CRITIC.

SIR,—As in the ACADEMY, May 28, an invitation is addressed to your readers to produce missives similar to the brief opinions of Mr. Gladstone given in that number, I send a copy of a letter addressed to myself, acknowledging a sermon I preached before the University of Oxford on Palm Sunday, 1865.

It is, perhaps, not of sufficient importance or interest to be admitted into the columns of the ACADEMY, but it may serve to show that Mr. Gladstone was as courteous in acknowledging a sermon by a country clergyman as he was in giving his opinion on larger works.—Your obedient servant,

CHARLES WARNER,

Prebendary of Hereford Cathedral.

“ 11, Carlton House-terrace :
May 14, 1865.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,—I thank you sincerely for your sermon, which I have read with much interest.

The trials and dangers of the Church are many, and the cry for relief is every way natural. I think it will depend upon herself to obtain what is really required; and I have the pleasure of believing that there are already important indications which may make us reasonably hopeful for the future.

I remain,

Your very faithful servant,

W. E. GLADSTONE.

Rev. C. Warner, The Rectory,
Henley-on-Thames.”

SIR,—I send a copy of a letter which Mr. Gladstone wrote to me some years ago, in case you may think that it would be of interest to the public.

When I was a girl I wrote a little book, called La Famiglia Cairoli, which was published at Naples, where, a short time before, Benedetto Cairoli had saved the king from a would-be assassin. In the autumn of that year my mother and I were at Venice, and Mr. Gladstone was staying at the Grand Hotel at the same time. My mother had often met him in her youth when both were the guests of Mrs. Gaskell at Thornes

House, and it thus came about that she presented him with a copy of La Famiglia Cairoli. I shall always remember how, with the particular art of giving pleasure which he possessed in so eminent a degree, he seated himself afterwards in the middle of the Salle de Lecture where the young author could not help seeing him, and spent about an hour in reading the little work, apparently with extreme attention. It was a trait which exactly revealed the man.

When my Italian Characters came out, I naturally sent the book to my kind reader of earlier days, and the subjoined letter was written on that occasion. At a later period I sent him The Liberation of Italy, and there came in a week a post-card saying that, though very blind, he had been reading it “with much profit and pleasure.” Of course, I know that Mr. Gladstone was always rather too generous in his praise, but I am sure that these notes truly represent the intense interest which he felt to the last in the Italian Risorgimento.—I am, &c.

EVELYN MARTINENGO CESARESCO.

Palazzo Martinengo, Salò,

Lago di Garda : June 1.

“ 10, St. James's-square, S.W. :
April 18. 90.

DEAR MADAM,—I thank you very sincerely for presenting to me your interesting volume.

My public and personal engagements keep me sadly in literary arrear, but yesterday I was able to begin your work and I read with profound interest the memoir of Ricasoli and that of the Poerios.

Both are most interesting and the workmanship is like that of a practised biographer. The Ricasoli is singularly vivid.

I knew him at Florence in 1866, and I cannot forget how, on my entering his room for the first time, he grasped my hand and cried, ‘Siamo amici.’

I would that his services were still available for Italy.—Believe me, dear Countess, your very faithful

W. E. GLADSTONE.

Countess Martineño Cesaresco.”

POETRY *AS SHE IS WRIT.

SIR,—J. L. P.'s letter in your issue of June 4 refers to the obscurity in modern poetry. But our modern prose is not free from the same flaw.

What a boon it would be for “ordinary mortals of average education and intelligence” if writers would remember that their readers have, in many cases, only a small modicum of brain power, and that, also, their time is limited.

If a writer has a message, he ought (1) to define clearly and rigidly in his own mind what that message is. For if his ideas are hazy, his expression of them will be obscure. (2) When his ideas are clear to himself, he ought to give them lucid expression, so that he who runs may read.

Writers who realise at all adequately the greatness of their calling as diffusers of sweetness and light by their work, will surely not think the pains thrown away which is given to make their thoughts more definite, and the expression of those thoughts more clear.—Yours, &c.,
H. P. W.

June 6.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

“Byron.” Poetry edited by E. Hartley Coleridge; Letters, by Rowland E. Prothero. (John Murray.)

OF the first of the six volumes of poems, for the editing of which Mr. Hartley Coleridge is responsible, the Times, after quoting Mr. Coleridge to the effect that the printed text has been collated with all the MSS. that passed through Moore's hands, and some other details, comments with enthusiasm :

“This is genuine editing, and it is this, assuming the accuracy of the collation, which gives the work its value as an edition. . . . English Bards and Scotch Reviewers [continues the critic] is the only one of the above-named poems which is included in this first volume. The suppressed fifth edition is followed for the text. In Mr. Murray's copy of the fourth edition Byron wrote: ‘The binding of this volume is considerably too valuable for the contents. Nothing but the consideration of its being the property of another prevents me from consigning this miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony to the flames.’ . . . Mr. Coleridge's editorial footnotes are all that they should be. They are short and to the point, and they seem to leave no difficulty untouched.”

Of the promise of the whole edition, the Daily News says that it “has been prepared with a degree of editorial care and research, which must needs give it precedence over all previous editions, and stamp it as the highest authority for the text of the poet's works.”

And of the volume now published, which comprises “Hours of Idleness” and other juvenilia, “English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,” “Hints from Horace,” “The Curse of Minerva,” and, finally, the social satire entitled “The Waltz” :

“These early poems do not, of course, possess the interest of those which are to follow; but they belong to the story of the poet's life, and the introductions, notes, and the variorum readings which accompany them furnish much amusing matter bearing on literary feuds and controversies and the manners of the early years of the eventful century now rapidly drawing to its close.”

In the Daily Telegraph Mr. W. L. Courtney writes of the hitherto unpublished poems that “some, like the juvenile poems included under the general title of ‘Hours of Idleness,’ are of more than doubtful value. There are, for instance, eleven poems in this first volume, which only prove once more what, indeed, is abundantly clear in the ordinary experience of effusive and sentimental youths: that one writes a good deal of indiscriminate and feverish rhetoric ‘quand on a vingt ans.’ Byron was a tumultuous and moody strapping, very ready to attest with his fists at Harrow that no one could call him an Atheist with impunity, but equally prepared to illustrate the undoubted truth that unbridled poetic yearnings, when conjoined with much immaturity and an ebullient temperament, are not wholly an advantage either to their owner or to the public. Later volumes of this edition will have more to say for themselves. It will be interesting to read fifteen new stanzas of the unfinished 17th canto of ‘Don Juan,’ and the considerable fragment which is promised of the third part of ‘The Deformed Transformed’ will be valuable, if only to show how extremely wide of the mark Goethe's criticism was that the idea was borrowed from his Mephistopheles.”

The same critic says of Byron's work at large and of his Continental reputation :

"What evidently impressed Europe was the grandiose character of Byron's genius, the largeness of his conceptions, the tremendous energy of his temperament. He belonged to the same category of mankind as Prometheus, a great rebel against God. He had the same wild, ill-regulated energy as Christopher Marlowe; or, perhaps, he was an actual nineteenth-century Hamlet, at odds with fortune, and cursing the day of his birth. . . . In England, meanwhile, the judgment on him was necessarily different, and has become increasingly so throughout the last half of this century. It was as an artist that Byron's fame first suffered, because his countrymen could appreciate far more than the foreigner how great were his lapses from the true poetic technique."

Of the first volume of the Letters and Journals the St. James's Gazette points out that up to August, 1811, Mr. Prothero has nearly twice as many letters to print as had Mr. Henley, and that of these two-thirds were inaccessible to Moore in 1830 :

"As Mr. Prothero says, they are naturally not letters which would be printed for their intrinsic literary interest—though for all their precocious man-of-the-worldishness they have already the natural directness and vivacity that make Byron's best letters so delightful. Their value lies in their biographical interest, in their self-portraiture of the young Byron. As one reads them, one cannot but say, a difficult son, an impossible schoolboy, an uncomfortable undergraduate.

Mr. Prothero expresses in very generous terms his regret that this new material is not to have the advantage of Mr. Henley's commentary; but his own annotation is in its diametrically opposite style no less admirable. It is concise, apt, full of knowledge, always to the point, free from prejudice and passion. It is the style of annotation that becomes a classic."

In the columns of the Chronicle a critic who subscribes the familiar initials "C. K. S.," after generally acknowledging the importance of the enterprise, goes on :

"It is not easy to understand precisely at what Mr. Murray and his editor are aiming by the general scheme of this volume. . . . Is it intended that the present edition should cancel Moore's Life? That, I think, should have been the aim of the publishers. Having taken all the letters out of the Life, and having conveyed a certain number of Moore's facts in footnotes, there remains remarkably little in Moore that is worth preserving, or that it would be worth while the ordinary student to examine. . . . But one is bound to complain that this handful of facts has not been transferred to the new edition. . . . Equal space is devoted in the letters to the continual repetition of even greater trivialities, and while Mr. Prothero was about it he might as well have done his work thoroughly. At no point of the story, however—at Aberdeen, Harrow, Cambridge—does he attempt to create an atmosphere around his hero. He has not given us a biography, but rather a valuable collection of documents, shot out hurriedly for the consideration of the public. . . . The eighty hitherto unpublished letters do not indeed, as later letters assuredly do, place Byron on a pinnacle as one of the very best letter-writers in literature, and as the guide to style that Mr. Ruskin claims that he is, but they cannot nevertheless be neglected by any student of Byron's remarkable career."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, June 9.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY: THE CHRISTIAN PASTOR. By Washington Gladden, D.D. T. & T. Clark (Edinburgh). 10s. 6d.

CHRISTIAN DOGMATICS. By John Macpherson, M.A. T. & T. Clark (Edinburgh). 9s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

MEMORIALS OF AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY PAINTER (JAMES NORTHCOTE). By Stephen Gwynn. T. Fisher Unwin. 12s.

REMARKS AND COLLECTIONS OF THOMAS HERNE. Vol. IV. Edited by D. W. Raine, M.A. Printed for the Oxford Historical Society at the Clarendon Press.

THE GROWTH OF THE EMPIRE. By Arthur W. Jose. Angus & Robertson (Sydney).

ST. MARTIN, CANTERBURY: ITS HISTORY AND FABRIC. By C. F. Routledge. G. Bell & Sons. 1s. 6d.

PAPERS RELATING TO THE NAVY DURING THE SPANISH WAR. Edited by Julian S. Corbett, the Navy Records Secretary.

TALKS WITH GLADSTONE. By the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache. Edward Arnold.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

SONGS OF ACTION. By Conan Doyle. Smith, Elder & Co. 5s.

SOME LATER VERSES. By Bret Haite. Chatto & Windus. 5s.

AVE, VICTORIA! By F. R. Brown. Wright & Sons (Colchester).

UNCUT STONES. By H. Bell. G. Redway. 2s. 6d.

POEMS. By R. Loveman. J. B. Lippincott Co. (Philadelphia).

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY WILLIAM MORRIS TO BIRMINGHAM ART STUDENTS, 1894. Longmans & Co. 2s. 6d.

FINE ART.

HOLBEIN'S DANCE OF DEATH. With Introductory Note by Austin Dobson. G. Bell & Sons. 2s. 6d. nett.

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

LYRICAL BALLADS BY WORDSWORTH AND COLERIDGE, 1798. Edited by Thomas Hutchinson. Duckworth & Co. 3s. 6d.

TALES FROM THE TELLING HOUSE. By R. D. Blackmore. Sampson Low & Co.

THE SPECTATOR. Edited by G. A. Aitken. Vol. VII. J. C. Nimmo. 7s.

WHAT IS SCIENCE? By the Duke of Argyll. S.P.C.K. 1s.

TRAVEL.

PIONEERING IN FORMOSA. By W. H. Pickering, C.M.G. Hurst & Blackett. 16s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL. By Lillian Whiting. Third series. Sampson Low & Co.

PRACTICAL PLANT PHYSIOLOGY. Translated from the German of Dr. W. Detmer by S. A. Moor. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 12s.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MR. F. B. MONEY COUTTS'S new volume will be published shortly by Mr. John Lane.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & Co. will publish on June 13 The Study of Man: an Introduction to Ethnology, by Prof. A. C. Haddon. This work is the first volume of the "Progressive Science Series," edited by Prof. F. E. Beddard, and will embrace every branch of science. Among the books which are ready or in preparation are the following: Earth Sculpture, by Prof. Geikie; Volcanoes, by Prof. Bonney; The Groundwork of Science, by St. George Mivart; Vertebrate Palaeontology, by Prof. Cope; Science and Ethics, by M. Berthelot; The Animal Ovum, by Prof. F. E. Beddard; The Reproduction of Living Beings: a Comparative Study, by Marcus Hartog; Man and the Higher Apes, by Dr. Keith; Heredity, by J. Arthur Thomson; and Bacteriology, by Dr. George Newman, M.D.

THE Rev. J. E. C. Welldon's volume, The Hope of Immortality, will be issued by Messrs. Seeley & Co. on June 15.

MR. FISHER UNWIN has in the press a short biographical and critical account of the greatest of Russian authors. It is entitled Leo Tolstoy, the Grand Mujik, and is from the pen of Mr. G. W. Perris.

MESSRS. CHAMBERS are reprinting as a shilling brochure the article on "Homer" which Mr. Gladstone contributed to their Encyclopedia. To this reprint will be prefixed Mr. Justin McCarthy's biography of Mr. Gladstone, contributed to the same work, brought up to the date of his death.

A NEW edition of Barnett Smith's Life of Gladstone will shortly be issued by Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co., Limited.

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & Co. have arranged to issue a series of books upon the English Public Schools. The volumes will be illustrated from old prints, and with original drawings; they will be printed in small quarto, and will cost, as a rule, 5s. each.

Hiannibal's Daughter is the title of a new historical romance by Lieut.-Colonel Andrew Haggard, which will be published in a few days by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

MESSRS. DARLINGTON & Co. have in the press (for issue on July 1) an enlarged edition of their handbook to London and Environs (written by Mrs. Emily Constance Cook and her husband, Mr. E. T. Cook M.A., editor of the Daily News), which will include a full description of the new Gallery of British Art (the Tate Gallery), the Black wall Tunnel, the Passmore Edwards Settlement, and other new buildings, and an additional index of forty pages with 4,500 references to places of interest in London.

MR. D. C. BOULGER'S new and revised History of China is now almost ready. The author has brought the work quite up to date, including the recent concessions to England, Russia, France, and Germany, and the latest maps and portraits of celebrities are included in this edition.

JOHN LANE'S LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

UNADDRESSED LETTERS. By Sir Frank Swettenham, Author of "Malay Sketches." 6s.

THE REVELATION of ST. LOVE the DIVINE: a Poem. By F. B. MONEY COUTTS. Square 16mo, 3s. 6d. net.

MUTINEERS: a Novel. By A. E. J. Legge. 6s.

JOHN BURNET of BARNES: a Romance. By John BUCHAN, Author of "Scholar Gipsies," &c. 6s.

NOW READY, AT 6s.

The EDGE of HONESTY: a Novel. By Charles Gleig.

THE ROMANCE of ZION CHAPEL. By Richard Le GALLIENNE.

The HEART of MIRANDA. By H. B. Marriott Watson.

COMEDIES and ERRORS. By Henry Harland.

REGINA; or, the Sins of the Fathers. By Hermann SUDERMANN. Translated by BEATRICE MARSHALL.

DERELICTS. By W. J. Locke.

PATIENCE SPARHAWK and HER TIMES. By Gertrude ATHON.

At 3s. 6d.

SUN BEETLES: a Novel. By Thomas Pinkerton.

A GUARDIAN of the POOR. By T. Baron Russell.

SHADOWS of LIFE. By Mrs. Murray Hickson.

THE BISHOP'S DILEMMA: a Novel. By Ella D'Arcy.

ORDEAL by COMPASSION: a Novel. By Vincent Brown.

OF NECESSITY. By Henry Gilbert.

BEATRIX INFELIX: a Summer Tragedy in Rome. By DORA McCHESNEY.

CARPET COURTSHIP: a Novel. By Thomas Cobb.

A YEAR'S EXILE: a Novel. By George Bourne.

THE SPANISH WINE: a Romance. By Frank Mathew.

A MAN from the NORTH: a Novel. By E. A. Bennett.

PAGAN PAPERS. By Kenneth Grahame, Author of "The Golden Age." 3s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.]

THE LAW'S LUMBER ROOM. Second Series. By FRANCIS WATT. 4s. 6d. net.

THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

A PERFECT LEAD PENCIL.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL.

"A remarkably smart contrivance."
Black and White.
"Surely a boon to all busy people."
Westminster Budget.

"A design in lead pencils that deserves popularity."
Morning Leader.
"I hope he may make a fortune by it."
Truth.

The Blaisdell Self-Sharpener Pencil looks like an ordinary pencil, and is used like an ordinary pencil. It is the same size as an ordinary pencil. It costs no more than an ordinary pencil of the same quality.

Blaisdell Pencils, whether black or coloured, are made in but one quality—the best; but the black-lead pencil is made in all grades of hardness for writing or drawing.

USED BY

THE WAR OFFICE.
BANK OF ENGLAND.
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT OFFICE.
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE.
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.
UNITED STATES ARSENAL.
UNITED STATES NAVY.
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES.

ETON COLLEGE.
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE.
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES.

If not obtainable at your Stationer's, send for Specimens—Red, Blue, and Black, post free (in the United Kingdom), is.

BLAISDELL PENCIL CO., Limited

46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

THIS DAY is published, crown 8vo, 6s.

HELBECK OF BANNISDALE

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "The History of David Grieve," "Marcella," "Sir George Tressady," &c.

"This delightful volume."—Daily News.

JUST ISSUED, with Frontispiece.—Demy 8vo, 16s.

COLLECTIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

By "ONE WHO HAS KEPT A DIARY."

A perfect mine of good things... Certainly one of the most amusing 'Recollections' that have appeared for many years.—Daily Telegraph.

JUST ISSUED.—Small crown 8vo, 5s.

SONGS OF ACTION.

By CONAN DOYLE.

NEW VOLUME OF THE BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION

OF

W. M. THACKERAY'S COMPLETE WORKS.

On JUNE 15th.—Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

YELLOWPLUSH PAPERS, &c. With 24 Full-Page Reproductions of Steel Plates by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, 11 Woodcuts, and a Portrait of the Author by MACLISE.

*.* A Volume will be issued each subsequent month until the entire Edition is completed on April 15th, 1899.

*.* A Prospectus of the Edition, with Specimen Pages, will be sent post free on application

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have appeared, and the numbers containing them can still be obtained; or Complete Sets may be had separately.

|                        |               |                             |                |
|------------------------|---------------|-----------------------------|----------------|
|                        | 1896.         | WILKIE COLLINS              | ... March 20   |
| BEN JONSON             | ... Nov. 14   | JOHN MILTON                 | ... .. 27      |
| JOHN KEATS             | ... .. 21     | WILLIAM COWPER              | ... April 3    |
| SIR JOHN SUCKLING      | ... .. 28     | CHARLES DARWIN              | ... .. 10      |
| TOM HOOD               | ... .. Dec. 5 | ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON       | } .. 17        |
| THOMAS GRAY            | ... .. 12     | HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW  | } .. 24        |
| ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON | } .. 19       | ANDREW MARVELL              | ... May 1      |
| SIR WALTER SCOTT       | ... .. 26     | ROBERT BROWNING             | ... .. 8       |
|                        | 1897.         | THOMAS CARLYLE              | ... .. 15      |
| SAMUEL RICHARDSON.     | Jan. 2        | PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY        | .. 22          |
| THOMAS DE QUINCEY      | .. 9          | CHARLES DICKENS             | ... .. 29      |
| LEIGH HUNT             | ... .. 16     | JONATHAN SWIFT              | ... June 5     |
| LORD MACAULAY          | ... .. 23     | WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY | } .. 12        |
| ROBERT SOUTHNEY        | ... .. 30     | WILLIAM BLAKE               | ... .. 19      |
| S. T. COLERIDGE        | ... Feb. 6    | SIR RICHARD STEELE          | .. 26          |
| CHARLES LAMB           | ... .. 13     | ALEXANDER POPE              | ... July 3     |
| MICHAEL DRAYTON        | ... .. 20     | DOUGLAS JERROLD             | ... .. 10      |
| WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR   | } .. 27       | FRANCIS BACON               | ... .. 17      |
| SAMUEL PEPYS           | ... March 6   |                             | 1898.          |
| EDMUND WALLER          | ... .. 13     | HENRIK IBSEN                | .. .. March 26 |

HARPER & BROTHERSPUBLISH THIS DAY,BEHIND A MASK. By Theo Douglas. Author of "Iras: a Mystery." Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

This tale admits us to the reverse view of more than one mask. The chief one, however, is worn by a young Italian girl, who is received, under false pretences, into an English family and the society of a country village.

THE GOLFCIDE, and other Tales of the Fair Green. By W. G. VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN. Illustrated. 16mo, cloth extra, 2s.

These tales, written by an enthusiastic golfer, realise the fascination which the royal and ancient game has for its votaries.

*NEXT WEEK.SILENCE, and other Stories. By MARY E. WILKINS, Author of "A New England Nun," "Jerome," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.WILMAY, and other Stories of Women By BARRY PAIN, Author of "The Octave of Claudius" and "In a Canadian Canoe." Cloth extra, 3s. 6d.GHOSTS I HAVE MET. By John KENDRICK BANGS, Author of "The House-Boat on the Styx." Cloth, 2s.

NEW WORK BY DU MAURIER.

SOCIAL PICTORIAL SATIRE. Reminiscences and Appreciations of English Illustrators of the Past Generation. By GEORGE DU MAURIER, Author of "The Martian," "Trilby," "Peter Ibbetson," &c. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s.THE AWAKENING of a NATION: Mexico of To-day. By CHARLES F. LUMMIS With Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 10s. 6d.

"Everything connected with this splendidly fertile region is touched upon in turn; the immense strides Mexico has made in the adornment of her towns are recognised; the vast improvements in her systems of agriculture and commercial activity are acknowledged." Daily Telegraph.

PICTURESQUE SICILY. By William AGNEW PATON. Illustrated from Photographs. Pp. xxvi.-384. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, uncut edges and gilt top, 10s. 6d.

"We can only say that every page of the ample volume teems with interest. A liberal supply of excellent illustrations completes the attractiveness and usefulness of the volume."—Spectator.

CHEAP EDITION.

STUDIES in the WAGNERIAN DRAMA. By HENRY EDWARD KREHBIEL. Crown 8vo, flexible cloth, 2s. 6d.

Includes an analysis of "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," "Der Ring des Nibelungen," and "Parsifal."

SOWING the SAND. By Florence HENNIKER, Author of "In Scarlet and Grey," "Outlines," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Mrs. Heniker is a writer whose work invariably bears the hall-mark of distinction, and everyone who values the intellectual quality in fiction will welcome her new novel."—Speaker.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
London and New York.F. V. WHITE & CO'S LIST.*POPULAR NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

At all Libraries, Booksellers', and Bookstalls.

NOW READY.

THE THIRD EDITION OF JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE PEACEMAKERS. By the AUTHOR of "BOOTLE'S BABY," "THE TRUTH-TELLERS," &c.

THE THIRD EDITION OF

WILLIAM LE QUEUX'S NEW NOVEL.

SCRIBES and PHARISEES. By the AUTHOR of "THE EYE of ISTAR," "WHOSO FINDETH a WIFE," &c.THE SEASONS of a LIFE. By H. FALCONER ATLEE.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

LITTLE MISS PRIM. By the Author of "THE GIRLS at the GRANGE," "THE HOUSE on the MARSH," &c.

BY L. T. MEADE.

THE SIREN. By the Author of "The WAY of a WOMAN," "A SON of ISHMAEL," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY E. YOLLAND.

MISTRESS BRIDGET. By the Author of "IN DAYS of STRIFE."

GEORGE GRIFFITH'S NEW ROMANCE.

In 1 vol., 3s. 6d., with Frontispiece.

THE GOLD-FINDER. By the Author of "THE ROMANCE of GOLDEN STAR."

F. V. WHITE &amp; CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand.

AUTHORS and their PENS.

DAVID WILLIAMSON, Esq., Editor of the "Windsor Magazine": "I wrote both my books on Gladstone with my beloved 'Swan'; and not only these vols., but many columns lately which have had to be penned in railway carriages, where your pen is just as excellent as when used on terra firma."

HALL CAINE: "I wrote the 'Manxman' with the Swan Pen."

S. R. CROCKETT: "Your Gold Pen suits me most admirably."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES: "You may like to know I used this pen from the days of a book of mine called 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table' (1857)."

PHIL MAY: "It is the most successful pen I have ever used."

W. R. BRADLAUGH: "I write over 8,000 words a day, and your pens are a perfect boon."

"TOBY'S DIARY" daily written with it."

Send for Illustrated List, &amp;c., to

MABIE, TODD & BARD,

Manufacturers of Gold Nibs and the Swan Fountain Pen.

93, Cheapside; 95, Regent Street, London; and 3, Exchange Street, Manchester.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY MR. ANDREW LANG.

THE MAKING of RELIGION. By ANDREW LANG. 8vo, 12s.

"A most valuable, interesting, and we might add exciting contribution to one of the chief controversies of the time. The argument of this very original, very fascinating, and very learned and able book exhibits religion as probably beginning in a kind of Theism, which is superseded in some degree, or even corrupted, by Animism in all its varieties." Daily News.

W. G. WILLS: Dramatist and Painter. By FREEMAN WILLS. With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"Mr. Freeman Wills has told the story of his brother's life and ways with admirable tact—in fact, with the exact mixture of candour and discretion which was needed. The biographer, in short, has given us an attractive picture of an eccentric but interesting and, indeed, lovable personality."—Literature.

SOUTH AMERICAN SKETCHES. By

ROBERT CRAWFORD, M.A., Honorary Master in Engineering, Dublin University, Member of the Institution of Civil Engineers, Member of the Royal Irish Academy, &c., Author of "Across the Pampas and the Andes," "Reminiscences of Foreign Travel," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [On Monday next.]

PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER'S WORKS,
COLLECTED EDITION.

VOLUME FOR JUNE.

THEOSOPHY; or, Psychological Religion: the Gifford Lectures delivered before the University of Glasgow in 1892. Crown 8vo, 5s. [On Monday next.]LONGMANS' CIVIL ENGINEERING SERIES.—New Volume.

EDITED by the AUTHOR of "NOTES on BUILDING CONSTRUCTION."

CALCULATIONS in HYDRAULIC

ENGINEERING: a Practical Text-Book for the Use of Students, Draughtsmen, and Engineers. By T. CLAXTON FIDLER, M.Inst.C.E., Professor of Engineering, University College, Dundee. Part I. Fluid Pressure, and the Calculation of its Effects in Engineering Structures. With numerous Illustrations and Examples. 8vo, 6s. 6d. net. [On Monday next.]

NEW STORY BY MRS. WALFORD.

LEDDY MARGET. By L. B. Walford, Author of "Mr. Smith," "Iva Kildare," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., London, New York, and Bombay.Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s.;
half-calf, 10s. 6d., post free.HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."—Times.

"Readers will find here, in a clear and attractive form, much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It is a handsome volume, and constitutes a trustworthy history of the struggle for religious equality in England." Daily News.

ALEXANDER &amp; SHEPHEARD, Farnival St., London, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1363.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1898.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE.

No. 576, just published, includes a number of BOOKS in FINE BINDINGS, of Fourteen of which Illustrations are given; besides the usual Selection of GOOD BOOKS in LITERATURE and SCIENCE.

Post free from H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C., and 37, Piccadilly, W.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application. DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,

Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, BELL & RAJLTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 19, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing Illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 101. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply Academy Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilized world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to K., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, FURNIVAL STREET, LONDON E.C.

FRENCH Gentleman, Licencé-ès-Lettres (Paris University), seeks an ENGAGEMENT as TUTOR for the Summer months (from July). Highest references. Salary no object.—Address P. E., 29, Carlton Hill, N.W.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

(Incorporated by Royal Charter.)
Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—The Right Hon. Sir M. E. GRANT DUFE, G.C.S.I.
The ALEXANDER MEDAL for 1898 will be AWARDED for the best ESSAY in HISTORICAL RESEARCH on the subject of "THE INFLUENCE of the CROWN upon TRADE in the REIGN of JAMES I."
Applications for further particulars should be addressed to the SECRETARY, 115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

UNIVERSITY of ABERDEEN.

LECTURESHIP IN EDUCATION.
The University Court will, at a meeting in July, proceed to APPOINT, under Ordinance No. 17, a LECTURER in HISTORY for a period of Five Years, from 1st October ensuing. The Lecturer will be required to reside in Aberdeen during each Winter Session (October to March inclusive). The salary will be £200 yearly.
Particulars may be obtained from the SECRETARY, with whom applications along with fifteen copies of testimonials, should the Candidate think fit to submit any, are to be lodged on or before 15th proximo.

ROBERT WALKER, M.A., Secretary.
University of Aberdeen,
14th June, 1898.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT NORMAL MASTER and ASSISTANT LECTURER on EDUCATION.
Applications, accompanied by testimonials, must be sent on or before Wednesday, 8th July, 1898, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars can be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.
June, 1898.

THE WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT. CARDIFF SCHEME.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the post of HEAD MASTER for the CARDIFF INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL for BOYS.

Intending Applicants may obtain particulars of the Appointment from the Clerks to the Governors, who will also supply copies of the Scheme.

Applications, accompanied by not less than four recent Testimonials, and marked on cover "Head Master," must be in the hands of the undersigned not later than Saturday, the 9th July next.

By Order of the Governors,
DAVID SHEPHERD, Clerk.
1, Frederick Street, Cardiff,
June 7th, 1898.

MR. HUMPHRY WARD will give FOUR LECTURES on "ENGLISH ART in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY" at the PASSMORE EDWARDS SETTLEMENT, on FRIDAYS, June 17th, 24th, JULY 1st, 8th, at 3.30 p.m. Tickets, 10s. 6d. for the Course; Teachers, 5s.; 3s. for a Single Lecture, may be obtained from the WARDEN of the SETTLEMENT.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CHRISTIAN ROME: Historical View of its Memories and Monuments. 41. 1887. By E. DE LA GOURNERIE. Translated by the Hon. Lady MACDONALD. With a Preface by H.E. CARDINAL YACOHAN. 2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, 15s.
ROLAND'S FOREIGN LIBRARY, 20, Berners Street, London, W.

AT ALL THE LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

STEPHEN BRENT.

By PHILIP LAFARGUE,
Author of "Salt of the Earth."
Crown 8vo, 2 vols., 12s.

CONSTABLE & CO., Westminster.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows Interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.,

Open Free Daily from 10 to 8.

A VISIT of INSPECTION IS INVITED TO THE PERMANENT EXHIBITION of AUTOTYPE (CARBON) REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS of ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN BRITISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of WORKS by ARTISTS of the PRERAPHAELITE SCHOOL.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by OLD MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of SELECTED WORKS from the PARIS SALONS.

FRAMED AUTOTYPES form acceptable and Artistic Wedding and Birthday Gifts, and are eminently suitable for the adornment of the Hall, Library, Boudoir, Dining-Room, Shooting-Box, &c.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, New Edition of 160 pages.

With upwards of One Hundred Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and Twenty-three Tint Block Illustrations.

For convenience of reference, the Publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' names.

Post free, ONE SHILLING.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET LONDON, W.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.'S LIST.

MR. R. AUSTIN FREEMAN'S NEW BOOK OF TRAVEL IN WEST AFRICA.

TRAVELS and LIFE in ASHANTI and JAMAN.

With many Illustrations from Drawings by the Author, and from Photographs, and 2 Maps. Large demy 8vo, 21s.

"Has a special interest and value.... the author speaks with the experience of many years of residence and official employment. The book with its lively narrative, wealth of description, numerous photographs and sketches and excellent maps is more than a mere book of travel."
Daily Chronicle.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE LIFE of WILLIAM TERRISS.

By A. J. SMYTHE. With an Introduction by CLEMENT SCOTT. Profusely Illustrated, Photo-gravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

TWO NATIVE NARRATIVES

of the MUTINY in DELHI.

Translated from the Originals by the late CHARLES THEOPHILUS METCALFE, C.S.I., Bengal Civil Service. Demy 8vo, with large Map and 2 Portraits, 12s.

"It is often said that the history of the Indian Mutiny has yet to be written..... This more than anything else imparts an unusual interest and value to 'Two Native Narratives of the Mutiny in Delhi'.... a valuable and substantial contribution which no student of Indian history can afford to neglect."—Scotsman.

MISS H. M. POYNTER'S TRANSLATION OF
M. R. DE LA SIZERANNE'S VERY IMPORTANT BOOK,

ENGLISH CONTEMPORARY ART

With Illustrations after Pictures by Lord Leighton
Hubert Herkomer, Sir J. E. Millais, Burne-Jones, &
Demy 8vo, 12s.

JUST PUBLISHED, at all the Libraries and Booksellers',
PHILIP LAFARGUE'S NEW NOVEL, entitled

STEPHEN BRENT.

2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

A NEW VOLUME of VERSES.

By B. E. BAUGHAN. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

NOW READY.

IN CONSTABLE'S POPULAR EDITION OF THE WORKS OF GEORGE MEREDITH.

THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS.

Crown 8vo, 6s

DANTE'S TEN HEAVENS:

A Study in the Paradiso.

By EDMUND GARDNER. Demy 8vo, 12s.

"A valuable addition to any Dante library."—Scotsman.

"A fascinating and masterly book.... Whilst in perfect sympathy with the spirit of Dante and Aquinas, Bernard and Bonaventura, Francis and Dominic, betrays no par-tisanism, but shows the proper impartiality of culture.
This book is an elaborate and erudite exposition of the 'Paradiso.'"—Daily Chronicle.

UNFORESEEN TENDENCIES

of DEMOCRACY.

By EDWIN LAWRENCE GODKIN. Large crown
8vo, 6s. net.

"We have read the book with much interest and instruction, and commend the book not only to students of politics, but to those who wish to get a glimpse of the inner United States and the working of the State."—Glasgow Herald.

2, WHITEHALL GARDENS, WESTMINSTER.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

HELBECK OF BANNISDALE.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "Marcella," "Sir George Tressady," &c.

From the TIMES.—"A book which will take rank with Mrs. Humphry Ward's best work.... The story is the story of a great passion worthily told. Fine luminous passages, fraught with delicate significances, permit us to understand the atmosphere in which the two chief actors move."

From the SPECTATOR.—"Very few men and women will, we predict, be able to close Mrs. Ward's book without the sense that they have been profoundly interested and deeply touched. We follow the searchings of heart experienced both by Laura and the Squire with intense interest. We never lose our human interest, nor do the chief combatants ever cease to be real people, and so we shall venture to predict for Mrs. Ward's new book a success quite as great as that which fell to her last two novels."

From the MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"Notwithstanding the height of its theme, the most simply and effectively told story of any that have yet come to us from her hand."

NOTICE.—The FIRST EDITION of "COL-LECTIONS and RECOLLECTIONS, by
'One who has Kept a Diary,' is exhausted.
A SECOND EDITION will be ready in a few days. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 16s.

From the SPECTATOR.—"One of the most entertaining books that we have ever looked through. Mr. Russell not only tells us who is who, but who was who. We lay down the book with a proud feeling that we have enjoyed a short intimacy with every one, from Sydney Smith to Mr. Augustine Birrell, and from the First Gentleman in Europe to Mr. Labouchere. All the people who flit before us live, and some of them live in quite a new light."

From the DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A perfect mine of good things.... Certainly one of the most amusing 'Recollections' that have appeared for many years."

From the DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Mr. Russell's diary reaches the distinction of a national treasury. The reader will find many stories, many shrewd reflections upon life, and vivid character-sketches of distinguished contemporaries."

SONGS OF ACTION.

By CONAN DOYLE. Small crown 8vo, 5s.

From the GLOBE.—"Dr. Doyle's 'Songs' are full of movement. They have fluency, they have vigour, they have force. Everybody should hasten to make acquaintance with them."

From the DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Almost without exception 'rattling good verses.' They ought to be a godsend to the reciter."

From the YORKSHIRE POST.—"Dr. Conan Doyle writes a good song and a good ballad. He has the requisite amount of pathos, and his humour is spontaneous."

NEW VOLUME OF THE BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION OF W. M. THACKERAY'S COMPLETE WORKS.

NOW READY.—Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

YELLOWPLUSH PAPERS, &c. With 24 Full-Page Repro- ductions of Steel Plates by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, II Woodcuts, and a Portrait of the Author by MACLISE.

*.* A Volume will be issued each subsequent month until the entire Edition is completed on April 15th, 1899.

From the BOOKMAN.—"In her new biographical edition Mrs. Richmond Ritchie gives us precisely what we want.
The volumes are a pleasure to hold and to handle. They are just what we like our ordinary every-day Thackeray to be.
And prefixed to each of them we have all that we wish to know, or have any right to know, about the author himself; all the circumstances, letters, and drawings which bear upon the work."

*.* A Prospectus of the Edition, with Specimen Pages, will be sent post free on application.

COMPLETION OF THE NEW EDITION OF SYMONDS' "RENAISSANCE IN ITALY."

NOW READY. In 2 vols., with Portrait and Index to the 7 vols., large crown 8vo, 15s.

THE CATHOLIC REACTION.

By the late JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

NEW VOLUME OF "THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

On JUNE 25.—Royal 8vo, 15s. net, in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. net.

VOLUME LV. (STOW—TAYLOR) OF

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

*.* Vol. I. was published on January 1, 1885, and a further volume will be issued Quarterly until the completion of the Work, which will be effected within two years from the present time.

NOTE.—A full Prospectus of "The Dictionary of National Biography," with Specimen Pages, will be sent upon application.

NEW NOVEL.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE AMBITION OF JUDITH.

By OLIVE BIRRELL, Author of "Anthony Langsyde," "Behind the Magic Mirror," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

CONTENTS.

| REVIEWS :                                 | PAGE    |
|---|---------|
| The Making of Religion ... ..             | 651     |
| A Book for the Heart... ..                | 652     |
| Two Novelist Poets ... ..                 | 653     |
| Oom Paul ... ..                           | 655     |
| Anecdoteage ... ..                        | 656     |
| A Polyglot Colony ... ..                  | 657     |
| BRIEFER MENTION ... ..                    | 658     |
| THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT ... ..             | 659-662 |
| NOTES AND NEWS ... ..                     | 663     |
| PURE FABLES ... ..                        | 665     |
| A NEW DICTIONARY AND SOME OMISSIONS... .. | 665     |
| THE EDITOR OF THE LATE "LARK" ... ..      | 666     |
| STEVENSON AS HUMORIST ... ..              | 667     |
| DRAMA ... ..                              | 668     |
| THE BOOK MARKET ... ..                    | 669     |
| CORRESPONDENCE ... ..                     | 670     |
| BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..              | 670     |
| BOOKS RECEIVED ... ..                     | 670     |
| Announcements ... ..                      | 671     |

REVIEWS.

THE MAKING OF RELIGION.

The Making of Religion. By Andrew Lang, M.A., LL.D., St. Andrews. (Longmans & Co.)

MR. LANG, like the British Empire, has often a little skirmish on hand. At varying intervals he has, among other controversies, brought his dialectic skill into effective play against the solar theory of interpretation of myth and legend. The expounders of that theory, having satisfied themselves that the names of the chief characters in "Aryan" mythology were equations of names of the sun, the dawn, and so forth, contended that every god and hero was a personification of the sunshine or the weather. But, passing from shaky etymologies to stable ideas, Mr. Lang brought the "Aryan" myths into comparison with those of barbaric peoples, and demonstrated what common elements entered into their structure. The correspondences between them evidenced that man, at the levels of culture, explains the phenomena in much the same way, and warranted the inference that the mythologies of civilised races are survivals of a stage in their development when the forefathers of Greeks and Hindus were on the level of Australian black fellows and bushmen.

The solar mythologists being put hors de combat, Mr. Lang turns his light artillery on the animistic school of anthropologists, and attacks its theories of the origin of belief in God and the soul as based on methods not only defective in principle, but undermined by recent evidence collected from savage sources. The "result is to indicate that the belief in the Soul is supported by facts which Materialism cannot explain. The belief in God, again, far from being evolved out of the worship of ghosts, is proved to occur where ghosts are not yet worshipped."

As is well known, Prof. Tyler traces the origin of the belief in the soul and a future life to animistic conceptions, of which dreams, hallucinations, and allied phenomena supply the material, while the origin of belief in an ascending series of spiritual beings is referred to conceptions accrediting all phenomena with life and personality. Mr. Herbert Spencer rejects the evidence of attribution of life to inanimate things as inconclusive, and finds in the cult of deceased ancestors sufficing factors for the evolution of gods from the lowest to the highest rank. In the words of one of his most ardent adherents, Mr. Grant Allen (to whose Evolution of the Idea of God Mr. Lang makes the barest reference) "corpse-worship is the germ-plasm of religion." Enlarging on topics already dealt with in more fugitive form in Cock Lane and Common Sense, and kindred work, Mr. Lang adduces a considerable body of evidence as to the occurrence of visions and hallucinations among savages, and compares it with the evidence furnished by "living and educated civilised men." Savages can hypnotise one another; they are asserted to have coincidental hallucinations; and long before the Society for Psychological Research offered crystal balls for sale at three shillings upwards, the "poor Indian" saw "apparitions not attainable through the normal channels of sense" by gazing into smooth water or polished stones. Well, asks Mr. Lang, instead of dismissing with scorn this corroborative evidence as part and parcel of spiritualism, "a word of the worst associations, inextricably entangled with fraud, bad logic, and the blindest credulity," why do not the anthropologists accord it a hearing as bearing on "super-normal phenomena" which, possibly, may have validity, and therefore can impregnably witness to the existence of the soul? So far as any "general confession" can be gleaned from Mr. Lang's admissions, he appears satisfied as to the objective character of these phenomena. His old hesitation as to the validity of thought-transference has vanished, and he gives reasons for the faith that is in him in examples of telepathy among both Zulus and Englishmen, while a reference to "telepathic crystal-gazing" indicates that he puts the two on a common plane. We do not deny that the anthropologists might have suffered with more gladness the bearers of such testimony as is imported into a book on the "making of religion," but, finding in hallucinations—"the main trunk of our psychical existence," as Dr. Dessori calls them—a sufficing factor of barbaric psychology, we think that they are not to be reproached for not treating seriously a mass of evidence which, where it has been possible to sift it, has failed to secure a unanimous verdict. Man's intellectual history is the history of his tardy escape from the illusions of the senses, whether they report the revolution of the sun round the earth or the existence of spooks. And that freedom has been won only by the barest minority among even so-called civilised peoples, so that in place of seeing in the multitude of examples of concordant hallucinations cumulative evidence of the existence of "genuine by-products of human faculty," we see the persistence of ideas which prevail in the degree that empirical theories of human nature survive. With the unexpected periodically revealing itself—as, e.g., in Rontgen Rays and the constitution of matter—the lesson against assumption of limitations is ever being taught, but no less binding is the duty of satisfying ourselves that all possible causes of error are eliminated before we endorse theories of the validity of phenomena which defy all known modes of energy in the cosmos, and add only to the inane gossip of the day. Knowing what tricks the subconscious self plays, and in what subtle ways matters unconsciously acquired lodge themselves among the three thousand million cells of the brain, leaping, seemingly unbidden, into activity as information newly gained from mysterious sources, hesitancy in following him will command the sympathy of one who himself shrinks from making the passage from belief in telepathy to belief in communications from a spirit world. As the French proverb has it, "He who says A must say B," and Mr. Lang's attitude puzzles us; perchance it puzzles himself. He asks permission to cite, as testimony of the highest importance, the opinion of M. Charles Richet, Professor of Physiology in the Faculty of Medicine in Paris, that "there exists in certain persons, at certain moments, a faculty of acquiring knowledge which has no rapport with our normal faculties of that kind." We may also be permitted to refer to this same M. Richet as a member of the company of experts in psychical research whom the Neapolitan medium, Eusapia Palladino, befooled, while, as showing what unanimity exists among those who regard Mr. Lang as an "effective ally," we have Dr. Hodgson, who detected the trickery of Eusapia, confessing his full belief in the "trances" of Mrs. Piper, which Prof. MacAlister denounces as a sorry imposture. When Mr. Lang's friends have arrived at some common agreement as to what "supernormal phenomena" are frauds and what are genuine, there will be better warrant for his criticism of the anthropological method.

In the second part of his book, Mr. Lang comes to close quarters with Prof. Tylor and Mr. Herbert Spencer. As the leading representatives of the animistic school, he asks them:

"Having got your idea of spirit or soul out of the idea of ghosts, and having got your idea of ghosts out of dreams and visions, how do you get at the idea of God? Now by 'God'—the proverbial 'plain man' of controversy, means a primal eternal Being, author of all things, the Father and Friend of man, the invisible, omniscient guardian of morality.

Having got your idea of spirit into the savage's mind, how does he develop out of it what I call God? God cannot be a reflection from human kings where there are no kings; nor president elected out of a polytheistic society of gods where there is as yet no polytheism; nor an ideal first ancestor where men do not worship their ancestors; while, again, the spirit of a man who died, real or ideal, does not answer to the usual savage conception of the Creator. All this will become much more obvious as we study in detail the highest gods of the lowest races."

Here we have an element of freshness imported into the controversy, which is a welcome change from wraiths and mediums, while the facts which Mr. Lang submits should lead to searchings of heart and scrutiny of documents among the advocates of the ghost-theory of deity. From materials furnished by savage hymns and ancient and secret tribal mysteries there is producible a mass of evidence as to the conception of a group of relatively Supreme Beings: "eternal not-ourselves that make for righteousness." Caqn among the Bushmen, Mtanga among the Yao, Ndengei among the Fijians, Ti-ra-wá among the Red Indians, Derumulum and Pund-jel among the Australian aborigines — are representative of moral gods of savage tribes which, there is good reason for assuming, had long escaped the infiltration of Christian and Mohammedan ideas. These high gods are defined as "deathless beings" rather than "spirits," because belief in them is not derived from the theory of ghosts or souls at all. These "Ancient Ones" and "Fathers" dwell in the heavens which they have made; they rule the lives of men, and are prompt to punish breach, of their commands, among which unselfishness has chief place, although, descending more to detail, adultery and bad carving of meat are an offence to the Adamanese Puluga! Under cover of names conveying—if correctly translated—surprising philosophical conceptions of deity, there are, as in the Dinka god Dendid, which means "great rain," are indications warranting the assumption that these "makers" are nature-gods, with tribal ethics superadded. Man, says Goethe, never knows how anthropomorphic he is, and the quality of unselfishness as a leading moral attribute of savage high gods on which Mr. Lang lays stress is essentially of social origin, arising in emotions stimulated by human relations, and strengthened by conditions enforcing self-repression and self-regardlessness on each member of the community. As for conceptions of the gods themselves, given the attainment of a certain, and that no very advanced, intellectual stage, there follow peculiarities as to the whence of things, the wonder aroused by them in the degree that they are unknown, and that tendency to personify forces, which, together, are sufficing factors for those conceptions. On this view of the matter there is little of novelty in Mr. Lang's argument, but there is opportune re-statement in an effective way, and with cogent examples, of the case against ancestor worship as the sole origin of the god idea. These high gods, however, have a short-lived career so far as their connexion with mortals goes. The fact that they are not regarded as spirits relegates them to an order of being wholly detached from men's "businesses and bosoms." Hence, as religions reflect social stages, we find these dii majores superseded by departmental, tribal, and family gods, a process which—as shown in the "Essay on the Religion of a Hindu Province," in Sir Alfred Lyall's remarkable Asiatic Studies, is in operation in every Indian village to-day. Mr. Lang skilfully elaborates this fact, showing that the "first advance in culture necessarily introduces a religious degradation," which may be taken as the anthropological equivalent of the doctrine of the Fall, the Supreme God, needing neither temple nor priest to serve or sacrifice therein, takes a back seat, and becomes roi fainéant, or, like the Fijian Ndengei, "is mythically lodged in a serpent's body, and reduced to a jest." As Mr. Lang quaintly puts it, "there is no money in him" to support a sacerdotal caste whose fees and reputation depend on squaring the word of hungry ghost-god-beings, and on slaking with bloody offerings the thirst of the world's Molochs, "whose best excuse is that they do not exist." If, therefore, the great gods are fading abstractions, reigning but not resting, only the swarm of "deities who abhor a fly's death or who delight in human victims" being operative on the life of man, it would seem that Mr. Lang makes "much ado about nothing."

How keenly alive to the complexity of the problem of the origin of religion the author of a volume that is interesting from cover to cover shows himself is seen in the remark that "finding among the lowest savages all the elements of all religions already developed in different degrees, we cannot, historically, say that one is earlier than another." Mr. Lang, therefore, is careful to disclaim belief in "primitive monotheism," but in so far as the savage moral-god theory disturbs his equilibrium he inclines to suggest an explanation which creates more difficulties than it solves to the religion of Israel. Jehovah is for him, and here we are in full agreement, no ghost-begotten god, and the stages of Israel's degradation are but temporary eclipses of a moral glory which the Prophets restored, and which, "blended with the doctrine of our Lord, enlightened the world." This is but one of several implications of the special mission of Israel, and of the Divine origin of Christianity, scattered through the book which cannot be dealt with here. It suffices to say that the evidence as to the validity of hallucinations summarised in the first section of the volume does not seem to us to warrant Mr. Lang's strictures on anthropological treatment of that evidence, and that in the second portion he has exposed vulnerable points in the theory which finds its most biased advocates in Mr. Herbert Spencer and Mr. Grant Allen.

EDWARD CLODD.

A BOOK FOR THE HEART.

The Journal of John Woolman. (Melrose.)

THIS volume is to be numbered among those that claim a welcome because they are utterly opposed to the spirit of the time, and because they afford rest and relief from the pressure and clamour of ordinary life. It was highly prized in the early part of the century by Coleridge, Lamb, Edward Irving, and other leaders of thought. Later, although Elia's references kept it in the remembrance of curious book-lovers, it fell into complete oblivion as far as the general public was concerned. We cannot help wondering if, in the attractive form now bestowed on it, the Journal will attract the attention it assuredly merits.

To some extent, perhaps, its remote environment may prove an obstacle to readers, for it is safe to say that we are, in a sense, nearer to classic Greece and Rome than to the America that existed in Woolman's lifetime (1720-1773). He belonged to a district famed for its Quaker settlements. Helived, to borrow the words of Longfellow,

"In that delightful land which is washed by the Delaware water Guarding in sylvan shades the name of Penn the apostle."

The delightfulness of it is not emphasised in the slight biography that we can piece together. Woolman travailed under a deep sense of the world's sorrow, and his own circumstances were generally stern and narrow. As will be seen, this was his own choice: he was born into poverty, and deliberately chose to remain poor when the tide offered to lead on to fortune. The interest of his life does not lie in that, but in its inner struggles. It is necessary to remember that in the middle of the eighteenth century a poor Quaker lad knew nothing of the doubts that have sapped the vital religious beliefs of this generation. You cannot get his equation without understanding that his ideas of a just and omnipotent God and the immortality of his own soul were positive and unshakable; but, on the other hand, his character was so gentle and sweet, love was so absolutely his preponderating quality, that it was impossible for fervour to change into fanaticism. His weapons were those of kindness and persuasion; he was not of the tribe of John Knox, but of St. Francis of Assisi. He reminds one of the timid, shrinking early Christians, so easily guided, so adaptable in unessentials, but disclosing the temper of steel when called upon to suffer for their principles or forswear them; and it is this revelation of strength and goodness in the depths of human nature that gladdens and consoles even those who regard as nursery tales and mere legends much that the martyr has died for. The awakening of his conscience, his conception of holiness and how he tried to attain to it—these are what engage our attention in the Journal. It is written, let us add, in a meditative rather than a preaching vein.

Woolman's spiritual life began in earnest on a certain day in 1742. He was at the time shop-tender and book-keeper to a man owning a store at Mount Holly—a small village standing on one of the Delaware's tributaries. The young man was a servant hired by the year and very poor. Whittier describes the cottage he lived in as small and plain—"not painted, but white-washed." In front, however, was the garden with its "nursery of apple-trees" which he tended himself, ever loving "the sweet employment of husbandry." At that time the Quakers were just beginning to feel a preliminary uneasiness in regard to the practice of slave-keeping. The violent little hunchback Benjamin Day had probably even then (and in the hearing of Woolman) begun to lift up his angry voice. It happened, then, that Woolman's master asked him to make out a bill of sale of a negro woman for whom he had found a purchaser. He recollected that he owed a duty of obedience, and "it was an elderly man, a member of our Society, who bought her," and so

"through weakness I gave way and wrote it; but at the executing of it I was so afflicted in my mind, that I said before my master and the Friend that I believed slave-keeping to be a practice inconsistent with the Christian religion."

Whenever his scruples were aroused they quickly gained force. Henceforward he was to be a steady opponent of slavery. With an exquisite simplicity he intersperses his account of religious work with brief paragraphs about his worldly concerns. Was ever the romance of love condensed to a shape akin to this:

"About this time, believing it good for me to settle, and thinking seriously about a companion, my heart was turned to the Lord with desires that He would give me wisdom to proceed therein agreeably to His will, and He was pleased to give me a well-inclined damsel. Sarah Ellis, to whom I was married the 18th of eighth month, 1749."

Except that he preserved one letter to his wife, there is nothing more said about this "well-inclined damsel." In the same brief way he tells of the death of his father, which took place in the following year. "I reckon Sister Anne was free to leave this world," the old man said; and on receiving an affirmative answer, "I also am free to leave it," he added. One does not wonder that Charles Lamb commanded us "to love the early Quakers."

His unworldliness and freedom from the self-aggrandising ambition that besets most of us made him take a step that was indeed accordant with the maxims of Christ, but very much out of keeping with the ordinary practice of men. Let him tell what it was in his own words:

"The increase of business became my burden, for though my natural inclination was toward merchandise, yet I believed truth required me to live more free from outward cumbers; and there was now a strife in my mind between the two. In this exercise my prayers were put up to the Lord, who graciously heard me, and gave me a heart resigned to His holy will. Then I lessened my outward business, and, as I had opportunity, told my customers of my intentions, that they might consider what shop to turn to; and in a while I wholly laid down merchandise and followed my trade as a tailor by myself, having no apprentice."

It was eminently characteristic that he put aside the love of riches without railing against that Mammon worship which has come to be the greatest weakness of his fellow-citizens in the land of the Almighty Dollar. This, too, was before the phalanxerist, and Thoreau had made their protest against the same vice. His was not the spirit of the modern Socialist, who, as a rule, takes as much as he can himself and bitterly assails those who have more. It was an outcome of that same human characteristic which has given us ascetics and anchorites and bare-footed friars within the Christian pale, and yoga and dervish and tattered sage without it. Above all, it was the teaching of Him who commanded His disciples to "take nothing for your journey, neither staves nor scrip, neither bread, neither money"; an outcome of those moments of intense and passionate devotion when, again to quote his own language,

"in bowedness of spirit I have been drawn into retired places, and have besought the Lord with tears that he would take me wholly under His direction and show me the path in which I ought to walk."

One of his minor—we had almost written trivial—struggles illustrates at once his fastidiousness, cleanliness of person, and the rigour of the cleansing powers applied to his mind. It ended in his determination to wear no hat or garment that was not of a natural colour—firstly, because dye was hurtful in itself; and secondly, because the practice and that of "wearing more clothes in summer than are useful" have not "their foundation in pure wisdom." Withal there was nothing of the mendicant in his disposition. He feared that the effect of taking gifts, even of food and lodging, would be hurtful to his soul, and so, proud yet humble, poor yet independent, we can easily picture him in that semi-wild Pennsylvania of 1760 tramping on foot many a hundred of miles wherever a "motion of love" guided him, stopping on his way to preach the Gospel, or to plead the cause of the negro, often because he had a chance of being kind to some poor slave; meditating in his hours of loneliness on new openings for acts of goodness or inwardly debating some nice point of conduct, such as whether it were justifiable in a Quaker to pay the war-tax at that time being imposed. As rulers have found out before now, a well-developed conscience makes a difficult citizen. You cannot order about a community of Woolmans as if they were mere items in a Parliamentary majority. In these journeys he often met tribes of Indians, and was moved with compassion for them also. But we must hasten over his graphic account of the Wyoming nomads and his visit to the Indian town of Wehaloosing on the Susquehanna, noting only a pregnant remark by the chief Papunehany, "I love to feel where words come from."

The last scene of his life took place in England, where he came to visit some Friends in Yorkshire. On the way he grew interested in the common Jack Tars of his time, and he places them and their miseries before us as vividly as the negroes and Indians. At London the wretched, ill-dressed wanderer excited suspicion at the Quaker meeting to which he made his way. Some one (we are told in an editorial note) was unkind enough to suggest his return to America. He was profoundly affected, and his tears flowed freely, but replied with rare wisdom and independence: "He could not go back as had been suggested; but he was acquainted with a mechanical trade, and while the impediment to his services continued, he hoped the Friends would be kindly willing to employ him in such business as he was capable of that he might not be chargeable to any."

All who are interested in the condition of England in 1772 will do well to con the history of his tour; it sets before us with the power of truth the strong, vital, energetic country with its go-ahead merchants and nobles, its wretched peasants and labourers.

It was an era of dear and scarce food. "Great numbers of poor people live chiefly on bread and water in the southern parts of England as well as in the northern parts, and there are many poor children not even taught to read." But a scrap like that hardly suggests the wealth of detail from which it is taken. His conscience would not let him use a stage-coach because the system was cruel to post-boys and horses: probably he saw all the more from travelling on foot. He caught small-pox and died at York in the fifty-second year of his age.

Such, in brief outline, was the career of John Woolman, out of whose life-experience this little book is made. It emphatically deserves the eulogy of Charles Lamb, "Get the writings of John Woolman by heart," for, like Abou Ben Adhem, "he loved his fellow men." To saturate the mind with the best of your own time is good, the best poetry, the best fiction, the best thought of every kind; yet it is also wise and wholesome to withdraw at intervals from your contemporaries, and look for solace and consolation to the devout of other days: to go to Woolman as you go to Thomas à Kempis. The Journal is not for common use, but in certain moods it will yield the pleasure so well described by the poet:

"And her ear was pleased with the Thee and Thou of the Quakers,
For it recalled the past, the old Acadian country
Where all men were equal and all were brothers and sisters."

TWO NOVELIST-POETS.

Songs of Action. By A. Conan Doyle. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Some Later Verses. By Bret Harte. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. BRET HARTE—the author of "Thompson of Angels," and "John Burns of Gettysburg," and "Jim," and "In the Tunnel," and "The Society upon the Stanislaus," and much else that is memorable—is an old poetical hand; but this is Mr. Conan Doyle's first volume of verse. Let us then begin with Mr. Conan Doyle.

Readers of Micah Clarke who remember "The Song of the Bow," readers of The White Company who remember "The Franklin's Maid," and readers of Cornhill and certain other periodicals, are aware that Mr. Conan Doyle has rhyming skill and vigour. He has no magic, no subtle mastery of words; he is not a poet, nor does he even command that verbal cunning which passes for poetry; but he sings of brave things like a brave man. Hunting and fighting, golf and racing—these are Mr. Doyle's subjects; and at the back of all his verse—with one deplorable exception—is buoyant masculinity. Where he comes into direct competition with certain predecessors—Mr. Kipling, for example, and the late Egerton Warburton—we cannot consider Mr. Doyle's efforts first rate, although the "Song of the Ranks," albeit mechanical, is good reading; but here and there, on his own ground, he reaches a high level. "The Groom's Story" is an instance. Readers of the ACADEMY may remember this diverting ballad of a runaway motor-car, for we quoted freely from it a few weeks ago on the occasion of its appearance in Cornhill; well, in this piece Mr. Doyle stands alone and need fear no one. Similarly, in the ballad entitled "Ware Holes!" he does his own sterling work. A groom is again the narrator, and the story tells of a famous run in Sussex with the foxhounds, and of a strange "gent" from London way. No one knew who he was, but

"'e 'ad gone amazin' fine,
Two 'undred pounds between 'is knees;
Eight stone he was, an' rode at nine,
As light an' limber as you please."

The run was long and fierce, and the gent lod the field. At last

"They seed the 'ounds upon the scent
But found a fence across their track,
And 'ad to fly it; else it meant
A turnin' and a 'arkin' back.

'E was the foremost at the fence,
And as 'is mare just cleared the rail,
He turned to them that rode be'ind,
For three was at 'is very tail.

"Ware 'oles!" says 'e, an' with the word,
Still sittin' easy on his mare,
Down, down 'e went, an' down and down,
Into the quarry yawnin' there.

Some say it was two 'undred foot;
The bottom lay as blaek as ink.
I guess they 'ad some ugly dreams
Who reined their 'orses on the brink.

'E 'd only time for that one cry;
'Ware 'oles!' says 'e, an' saves all three.
There may be better deaths to die,
But that one's good enough for me.

For, mind you, 'twas a sportin' end,
Upon a right good sportin' day;
They think a deal of 'im down 'ere.

That gent what came from London way."

Those two last lines are exactly right, an inspiration.

On a much lower plane, pleasant and gay though they be, are the hunting songs, of which "The Old Gray Fox" is a favourable specimen:

"We started from the Valley Pride,
And Farnham way we went.
We waited at the cover-side,
But never found a scent.

Then we tried the withy beds
Which grow by Frensham town,
And there we found the old gray fox,
The same old fox,
The game old fox;

Yes, there we found the old gray fox,
Which lives on Hankley Down.

So here's to the master,
And here's to the man!
And here's to twenty couple
Of the white and black-and-tan!
Here's a find without a wait!
Here's a hedge without a gate!
Here's the man who follows straight
Where the old fox ran!"

That is good stuff for a hunting supper, but a thought too facile; and the same may be said of several others of Mr. Conan Doyle's songs. But the notable weakness of the book is "The Passing." This egregious poem tells how a "dear dead girl" came to the bedside of her lover, and spoke thus to him:

"' You said that you would come,
You promised not to stay;
And I have waited here,
To help you on the way.

I have waited on,
But still you bide below;
You said that you would come,
And, oh, I want you so!"

And so on. She then drew his attention to the "triple key" on his dressing-table, which can unlock the gate between them. The triple key is a pistol, a hunting knife, and a bottle of poison, which should be enough for any gentleman's suicide. The lover forthwith shot himself with the pistol, and joined the girl, "as in the days of old." The girl was charmed. She exclaimed:

"The key is very certain;
The door is sealed to none.
You did it, oh, my darling!
And you never knew it done;"

and then entered into an account of the new life and its conditions:

"There's not a trick of body,
There's not a trait of mind,
But you bring it over with you,
Ethereal, refined.

But still the same; for surely
If we alter as we die,
You would be you no longer,
And I would not be I.

I might be an angel,
But not the girl you knew;
You might be immaculate,
But that would not be you."

And, in the end,

"with hands together,
And fingers twining tight,
The two dead lovers drifted
In the golden morning light."

Such is "The Passing"—"the right butter-woman's rank to market"; and where Mr. Conan Doyle's sense of humour was when he wrote it we offer no opinion.

Let us turn again to his virile "Song of the Bow" for relief:

"What of the bow?
The bow was made in England:
Of true wood, of yew-wood,
The wood of English bows.
So men who are free
Love the old yew-tree,
And the land where the yew-tree grows.

* * * * *
What of the mark?
Ah, seek it not in England,
A bold mark, our old mark,
Is waiting over-sea.

When the strings harp in chorus,
And the lion flag is o'er us,
It is there that our mark will be."

This is Mr. Conan Doyle as we prefer to leave him and think of him.

One chief cause of gratitude for Mr. Bret Harte's new volume of verse is that it gives further glimpses of Truthful James and Brown of Calaveras, particularly Brown of Calaveras. We have always felt that more information concerning Mr. Brown was due:

"He was a most sarcastic man, this quiet Mr. Brown;
And on several occasions he had cleaned out the town."

That statement, it has seemed to us, needed expansion. When and how did Mr. Brown perform his municipal cleansing? We are entitled to know. Meanwhile, although these particular feats are not described, Mr. Brown becomes again a prominent figure. At Angel's, it appears, a spelling-bee was once held. It happened thus:

"There was Poker Dick from Whisky Flat, and Smith of Shooter's Bend, and Brown of Calaveras—which I want no better friend;
Three-fingered Jack—yes, pretty dears, three fingers—you have five.
Clapp cut off two—it's sing'lar, too, that Clapp ain't now alive.
'Twas very wrong indeed, my dears, and Clapp was much to blame;
Likewise was Jack, in after years, for shootin' of the same.

The nights was kinder lengthenin' out, the rains had just begun,
When all the camp came up to Pete's to have their usual fun;
But we all sot kinder sad-like around the bar-room stove
Till Smith got up, permiskiss-like, and this remark he hove:
'Thar's a new game down in 'Frisco, that ez far ez I can see Beats euchre, poker, and van-toon, they calls it "Spelling Bee."

Then Brown of Calaveras simply hitched his chair and spake,
'Poker is good enough for me'; and Lanky Jim sez 'Shake!
And Joe allowed he wasn't proud, but he must say right thar
That the man who tackled euchre hed his education squar.
This brought up Lenny Fairchild, the school-master, who said
He knew the game, and he would give instructions on that head."

The competition then began. The first word was "separate." Then came "parallel," which Pistol Joe alone could circumvent; but his triumph lasted only as far as "rhythm." "O little kids, my pretty kids [says Truthful James, who tells the story], 'twas touching to survey

These bearded men, with weppings on, like schoolboys at their play.
They'd laugh with glee, and shout to see each other lead the van,
And Bob sat up as monitor with a cue for a rattan,
Till the Chair gave out 'incinerate,' and Brown said he'd be durned
If any such blamed word as that in school was ever learned."

For "durned," it seems to us, Mr. Bret Harte might have substituted "burned" with humorous effect. This was the first sign of bad temper, which students of Mr. Bret Harte's work will recognise as the beginning of the end. Only carnage now can follow. It drew near steadily. "Phthisis" and "gneiss" numbered scowling victims, and

"Then with a tremblin' voice and hand, and with a wanderin' eye,
The Chair next offered 'eider-duck,' and Dick began with 'I,'
And Bilson smiled—then Bilson shrieked!
just how the fight begun
I never knowed, but Bilson dropped, and Dick, he moved up one."

A scene ensued—very similar to that which broke up the Society upon the Stanislaus; and Truthful James thus brings his story to a close:

“Oh, little kids, my pretty kids, down on your knees and pray!
You’ve got your eddication in a peaceful sort of way;
And bear in mind thar may be sharps ez ‘slings their spellin’ square,
But likewise slings their bowie-knives without a thought or care.
You wants to know the rest, my dears?
That’s all! In me you see
The only gent that lived to tell about the Spellin’ Bee!”

We have treated “The Spelling Bee at Angel’s” thus fully because it seems to us the best thing in the book. Among the other pieces is “His Last Letter,” of which an account was recently given in the ACADEMY, and some exercises in Mr. Bret Harte’s earlier manner. An inability now and then to scan the lines has, however, interfered with our enjoyment of them, and we have always returned with pleasure to the Truthful James section. This, in addition to the Spelling Bee, contains “A Question of Privilege,” beginning thus:

“It was Andrew Jackson Sutter who, despising Mr. Cutter for remarks he heard him utter in debates upon the floor.
Swung him up into the skylight, in the peaceful, pensive twilight, and then heedlessly proceeded, makin’ no account what we did—
To wipe up with his person casual dust upon the floor.
Now a square fight never frets me, nor unpleasantness upsets me, but the simple thing that gets me—now the job is done and gone,
And we’ve come home free and merry from the peaceful cemetery, leavin’ Cutter there with Sutter—that mebbe just a stutter
On the part of Mr. Cutter caused the loss we deeply mourn.”

The story proceeds to explain the stutter and the misconstruction put by Mr. Sutter upon its possessor’s words. Then there is “The Thought-reader of Angel’s” in the metre borrowed years ago by Mr. Bret Harte from Atalanta in Calydon; and “Free Silver at Angel’s,” with its further glimpses of Abner Dean, and Brown of Calaveras, and Ah Sin. Mr. Brown therein is thus touched off:

“He was a most convincin’ man—was Brown in all his ways,
And his skill with a revolver, folks had oft remarked with praise.”

And Abner Dean, of whom, in “The Society upon the Stanislaus,” we were told nothing more than the episode of the sandstone, now blossoms forth as a savant:

“Fer though a sinful sort of man—and light-some, too, I ween—
He was no slouch in Science—was Mister Abner Dean!”

As a whole, we cannot think the book worthy of its author’s poetical reputation. It has nothing to approach some of his earlier work—the pieces, for example, mentioned at the head of this article, and “San Francisco,” and “Fate,” and “The Stage Driver’s Story,” and “The Heathen Chinese.”

Let us leave it with this musical, wistful little poem of a serious cast:

“O bells that rang, O bells that sang
Above the martyr’s wilderness,
Till from that reddened coast-line sprang
The Gospel sad to cheer and bless,
What are your garnered sheaves to-day?
O Mission bells! Eleison bells!
O Mission bells of Monterey!

O bells that crash, O bells that clash
Above the chimney-crowded plain,
On wall and tower your voices dash,
But never with the old refrain
In mart and temple gone astray!
Ye dangle bells! Ye jangle bells!
Ye wrangle bells of Monterey!

O bells that die, so far, so nigh,
Come back once more across the sea,
Not with the zealot’s furious cry,
Not with a creed’s austerity,
Come with His love alone to stay;
O Mission bells! Eleison bells!
O Mission bells of Monterey!”

OOM PAUL.

Paul Kruger and His Times. By F. Reginald Statham. (London: Unwin.)

As this is a very controversial volume it is well to say at the outset that here we are not concerned with political opinions. From a literary point of view the book has to stand or fall exclusively by the picture it offers of a human personality. Of Paul Kruger sufficient is known to make us wish for more. His portrait is almost as familiar as Lord Salisbury’s, and the clever, smug, tobacco-stained face with all its cunning humour and shrewdness, the Dutch nose, the low but not unintellectual forehead, the crow’s-footed, self-concealing eyes, has been appropriately chosen for Mr. Statham’s frontispiece. But it is dismaying to find that the biographer has been so engrossed in polemics that he has not put on record a single new example of those caustic sayings which whet our curiosity in regard to the Great Boer—for instance, his comment on the Jameson expedition: “If you wish to kill a tortoise you wait till he puts out his head”; or on the famous telegram: “Queen Victoria only sneezed and the Germans drew back.” We have diligently, but in vain, searched Mr. Statham’s pages for material wherewith to widen these hints into a full-length portrait. The Historic Muse is much too lofty and dignified to Boswellise Mr. Statham, and inspire him with adequate appreciation of the graphic homely details that make a man live before us. Yet his opportunities have been abundant. He has lived in close intercourse with the President, and must have heard his daily conversation over and over again. But he never produces him except in full dress, never introduces us to the old man sitting at a cottage-door with a pipe between his teeth, shrewdly commenting on things in general. He has in the old bad way of biography conventionalised his subject, smoothed out the angularities and callosities, and made him but an item in politics. Yet he has a very high sense of Mr. Kruger’s position. He says:

“It must be admitted as a remarkable fact, that South Africa, a country so little heard of till within the last twenty years, should during these twenty years have produced two out of the five most noted personalities of the later decades of this century.”

Mr. Statham harps on the number five as assiduously as Sir Thomas Brown did on the quincunx; but if, as he says, Mr. Kruger and Mr. Rhodes are two, who are the other three “most noted personalities?” He does not condescend on an answer, and as to the second of these paragons, Mr. Statham is at so much pains to show his inferiority to the Boer President that we wonder at his inclusion.

In spite of himself, as it were, Mr. Statham occasionally forgets that he is a political pamphleteer, and offers a passing glimpse of the real Oom Paul. We learn, for instance, that Mr. Kruger was born in 1825, that he has been twice married, that his first wife bore him a single child, and the second sixteen, while his descendants now number no fewer than 120. Here is one of the too few specimens of his caustic remarks. A petition full of complaint had been submitted to the Executive from Johannesburg:

“‘Ah,’ remarked Mr. Kruger, ‘that’s just like my monkey. You know I keep a monkey in my back-yard, and the other day, when we were burning some rubbish, the monkey managed to get his tail burnt, whereupon he bit me. That’s just like these people in Johannesburg. They burn their tails in the fire of speculation, and then they come and bite me.’”

There is more true humour in this than in the following illustration of his “playfulness of disposition”:

“It is no uncommon thing for him, as he passes along the corridor of the public buildings to his office, to give a friendly dig in the ribs with his stick to any personal acquaintance—possibly some highly responsible official—whom he may encounter. There is, too, a well-authenticated story of how, coming out of his office with a piece of wood in his hand, he gave a pretty sharp rap on the head to one of the occupants of the ante-chamber he had to pass through, doubtless supposing it was one of his clerks [the italics are ours]. ‘Who’s that?’ said the person struck, who happened to be a missionary and a stranger in Pretoria. ‘Who’s that?’ was the answer; ‘why, it’s the President.’”

For the few touches of this kind we are grateful, and only regret that they are so rare. Instead of giving them Mr. Statham indulges in a vast deal of vague eulogy and not very convincing rhetoric, which is based on the assumption that if England were to take direct control of the Transvaal it would mean ruin and loss of liberty to the country. It were as logical to assert that Scotland was ruined when consent was given to the union.

It would, however, be unjust to condemn the book utterly for the mere reason that it fails to present a life-like portrait. The student of politics who is not as a rule turned away from a book because it lacks literary quality will do well to study it. He may regard Mr. Statham as a counsel engaged to make out the best case he can for President Kruger. From an advocate it were unfair to expect the impartiality and the judicial tone of a judge. Nay, it is quite according to the rules of the game for him to make what points he can against his antagonist. But while showering abuse on Mr. Cecil Rhodes, who, whatever his faults, has proved himself capable of evolving ideas as great and far-reaching as Mr. Kruger, on Mr. Chamberlain, on the Conservative leaders and on the Liberal leaders, Mr. Statham is doing his cause no good by directing innuendoes against the Heir-Apparent. Indeed, take it how you will, the message of the book is not one of peace and goodwill. On the contrary, if taken seriously, it must embitter the relations between Great Britain and the Transvaal.

ANECDOTAGE.

Collections and Recollections. By One who has Kept a Diary. (Smith & Elder.)

SOME people work their way through life; a happier sort goes laughing. Mr. G. W. E. Russell (whose intimate association with this Diarist is an open secret) belongs to the latter class. He appears to have kept steadily before him a single-hearted purpose to find life amusing, and to have instituted a diary to the express end that no gleeful word should fall to the ground. The contents of his journal, as they are here set out, justify his intelligent industry. He has had exceptional opportunities, has companied with the most interesting people, and many of his best things he gives us at first hand. But, very rightly, he has no nervousness about offering you what you may have heard before (it is so easy to skip); and he even does not scruple to transcribe a passage from Dickens or Thackeray if he believes himself to have discovered in it some new bearing.

His recollections date from the burning of Covent Garden Theatre, and one of his early friends linked him to the Court of Queen Charlotte: Lady Robert Seymour said "goold" for "gold,"

"and 'yaller' for 'yellow,' and 'laylock' for 'lilac.' She laid the stress on the second syllable of balcony. She called her maid her 'ooman'; instead of sleeping at a place she 'lay' there, and when she consulted the doctor she spoke of having 'used the 'potticary.'"

He is, indeed, not quite free from convictions (of which an anecdotist should have none); and they partly discolour his impressions of political persons, even of those who, like Mr. Balfour, are political only in the second dimension; but in the case of Lord Beaconsfield his sympathies do generally rise above the level of Government and Opposition, particularly when that courtier-statesman gives himself away:

"In the last year of his life he said to Mr. Matthew Arnold, in a strange burst of confidence . . . 'You have heard me accused of being a flatterer. It is true. . . Everyone likes flattery; and when you come to Royalty you should lay it on with a trowel.'"

And he acted upon this principle to the point of implicating Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands with Coningsby and Sybil in the phrase "we authors," and of gravely declaring—"Your Majesty is the head of the literary profession." But it was not only to royal personages that Lord Beaconsfield knew how to be adroitly civil. Begged by a friend of Mr. Mallock's to read the New Republic, he protested with a groan:

"Ask anything, dear lady, except this. I am an old man. Do not make me read your young friend's 'romances.' . . . 'Oh—well, then, give me a pen and a sheet of paper,' and sitting down in the lady's drawing-room, he wrote: 'Dear Mrs.—, —I am sorry that I cannot dine with you, but I am going down to Hughenden for a week. Would that my solicitude could be peopled by the bright creations of Mr. Mallock's fancy.'"

He was not always so fortunate himself; as when a new member from the North, complimenting him on his novels, candidly confessed, "I can't say I have read them myself. Novels are not in my line. But my daughters tell me they are uncommonly good." A more distinguished man, the Duke of Wellington, showed a like appreciation of Letters when Mrs. Norton asked leave to dedicate a song to his great name:

"I have made it a rule [he wrote] to have nothing dedicated to me, and have kept it in every instance, though I have been Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and in other situations much exposed to authors."

To return to Court. Here is a nice anecdote of a member of the illustrious family in an extinct generation:

"How do, admiral? Glad to see you again. It's a long time since you have been to a levée' [cordially cried the Duke of Gloucester, known among his intimates as 'Silly Billy,' to a deeply tanned sailor]. 'Yes, sir. Since last I saw your Royal Highness I have been nearly to the North Pole.' 'By G—d, you look more as if you had been to the South Pole.'"

Some of the most mordant pleasantries proceed out of ecclesiastical mouths.

"The dress is very effective,' replied the Archbishop [Benson, when Manning's portrait was singled out for admiration by the author], 'but I don't think there is much besides.' 'Oh, surely it is a fine head?' 'No, not a fine head, only no face.'"

And in the chapter on the Cardinal, for whom the writer shows a deep reverence, occurs a similar (but half-unconscious) depreciation of his great rival in public esteem:

"When Newman died there appeared in a monthly magazine a series of very unflattering sketches by one who had known him well. I ventured to ask Cardinal Manning whether he had seen these sketches. He replied that he had, and thought them very shocking; the author must have a very unenviable mind, &c.; and then, . . . after a moment's pause, he added: 'But if you ask me if they are like poor Newman, I am bound to say—a photograph.'"

Liddon wrote jostlingly to a correspondent:

"London is just now buried under a dense fog. This is commonly attributed to Dr. Westcott having opened his study window at Westminster."

And two happy words of the Cherubic Master's are to be found in these pages. Here is one:

"The scene was the Master's own dining-room, and the moment that the ladies left the room one of the guests began a most outrageous conversation. Every one sat flabbergasted. The Master winced with annoyance; and then, bending down the table towards the offender, said in his shrillest tone—'Shall we continue this conversation in the drawing-room?' and rose from his chair."

The other is less familiar:

"At dinner at Balliol the Master's guests were discussing the careers of two Balliol men, one of whom had just been made a judge and the other a bishop. 'Oh,' said Henry Smith, 'I think the bishop is the greater man. A judge, at most, can say "You be hanged," but a bishop can say "You be d—d." 'Yes,' characteristically twittered the Master, 'but if the judge says "You be hanged," you are hanged.'"

The chapter on Verbal Infelicities is full of good things. "Well, at eight o'clock to-morrow then," is the cordial last word of a temporary prison chaplain as he left the condemned cell. Municipal eloquence yields this post-prandial flower: "It had always been his anxious endeavour to administer justice without swerving to partiality on the one hand, or impartiality on the other." Invulnerable dulness triumphs in the following report upon Mr. Ruskin's condition given by a notorious button-holer and bore: "What is the matter with him?" asked one of the bore's victims.

"Well," replied the buttonholer, 'I was walking one day in the lane which separated Ruskin's house from mine, and I saw him coming down the lane towards me. The moment he caught sight of me he darted into a wood which was close by, and hid behind a tree till I had passed.'"

And the way in which a good story comes to grief is exemplified in the strange corruption of the legend that Dr. Vaughan of Harrow was accustomed to dismiss his pupil guests with the courteous hint, "Must you go? Can't you stay?"

"Well" [said the Dissenting minister who was proud of a son at Trinity], 'when Dr. Butler has undergraduates to breakfast, if they linger inconveniently long when he wants to be busy, he has such a happy knack of getting rid of them. . . . He goes up to one of them and says, "Can't you go? Must you stay?"'

Less naïf is Sir William Harcourt's misquotation of a Tennysonian line in comment upon the Laureate's eulogy of his after-breakfast smoke:

"The earliest pipe of half-awakened bards"

—if, indeed, it was "bards," and not "birds," that the knight said. With this compare the nicknames applied by a young Irish lady to Lord Erne, who abounds in anecdote, and his beautiful Lady.

"The storied Erne and animated bust."

It is base, rather, to make a sport of children's innocence; but this is funny (it occurs in the account of a children's charade):

"This scene displayed a Crusader knight returning from the wars to his ancestral castle.

At the castle-gate he was welcomed by his beautiful and rejoicing wife, to whom, after tender salutations, he recounted his triumphs on the tented field and the number of Paynim he had slain. 'And I, too, my lord,' replied his wife, pointing with conscious pride to a long row of dolls of various sizes—'and I, too, my lord, have not been idle.'

Three chapters are devoted to parodies in prose and verse. Most of them have seen the light before; many are familiar. But here, apropos of Dr. Murray's Dictionary of the English Language, is an excellent Johnson for which Boswell will be searched in vain:

"Boswell: 'Pray, sir, what would you say if you were told that the next dictionary of the English language would be written by a Scotchman and a Presbyterian domiciled in Oxford?'"

Dr. J.: 'Sir, in order to be facetious it is not necessary to be indecent.'

In 1869 Lewis Carroll published anonymously a book of rhymes called Phantasmagoria, afterwards incorporated in his Rhyme? and Reason? It had no success, but it contained the poem called "Hiawatha's Photographing," of which here are some precious fragments, which, though well known to older students of the poet, are probably strange to the new generation:

"From his shoulders Hiawatha
Took the camera of rosewood,
Made of folding, sliding rosewood.
In its case it lay compacted,
Folded into next to nothing.
But he pulled the joints and hinges.
Pulled and pushed the joints and hinges,
Till it looked all squares and oblongs,
Like a complicated figure
In the Second Book of Euclid.
This he perched upon a tripod,
And the family in order
Sate before it for their portraits.
Mystic, awful was the process . . .
First the Governor, the Father . . .
Next his better half took courage,
She would have her portrait taken. . . ."

But, principally because

"Every one as he was taken
Volunteered his own suggestions,
His invaluable suggestions," the single figures were disastrous failures. So the photographer "tumbled all the tribe together," and—

"Did at last obtain a picture,
Where the faces all succeeded,
Each came out a perfect likeness.
Then they joined and all abused it,
Unrestrainedly abused it,
As the worst and ugliest picture
They could possibly have dreamed of;
Giving one such strange expressions—
Sulkiness, conceit, and meanness.
Really anyone would take us
(Anyone who didn't know us)
For the most unpleasant people.
Hiawatha seemed to think so,
Seemed to think it not unlikely."

The stories from which we have selected a few are classified and strung together by Mr. Russell so as to bulk like essays. Regarded from this point of view—as a volume of essays—the book is of no great value, but its parts are delightful: it runs over with bright things.

A POLYGLOT COLONY.

Twenty-five Years in British Guiana. By Henry Kirke, M.A., B.C.L., Oxon. (Sampson Low.)

British Guiana. By the Rev. L. Crookall. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

Stark's Guide-book and History of British Guiana. (Sampson Low.)

Not so very many years ago an Under-Secretary of State in the House of Commons gravely asserted that Demerara was an island, and none of his hearers in that august assembly could venture off-hand to contradict him. Now, thanks to the boundary dispute with Venezuela and the controversy over the decline of the cane-sugar industry, British Guiana and her three provinces—Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo—are more familiar to the British public. To anyone who wants to know something of the life of the country and its odd mixture of races we can cordially recommend Mr. Kirke's volume, which is full of entertaining stories.

The climate is not so very bad, considering that the temperature rarely falls below 82°, and that Georgetown, the principal city, lies below the level of the sea, on a soil largely composed of ancient cess-pools. The rainfall varies from 90 to 140 inches, and as much as 16 inches has been known to fall in one night. Doctors are very numerous. In 1895 there were forty-six medical men in the Government service, with salaries averaging about £600 a year, to look after a population of 280,000. If people were careful not to expose themselves to chills, they would not find the climate unhealthy. But they are not careful, and so get fever. Besides, as an old sea-captain used to say, "Demerara, yes you have fever in Demerara, and, not content with that, you must import more of it in wooden cases containing twelve bottles each." The swizzle is the local drink, and a very seductive compound it appears to be. In Georgetown the sound of the swizzle-stick—the instrument with which Hollands, water, bitters, sugar and crushed ice are twirled into a foaming pink cream—is heard all day. The local dish is petter-pot, a compound into which enters any sort of meat which may be handy, even on one occasion a stray kitten. Nowhere in the world, perhaps, is religious toleration carried to a greater pitch. There is not only one State Church, but four:

"The Anglican, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, and Wesleyan churches were all well endowed by the State, and even the stubborn Congregationalist is not too proud to accept an occasional grant from the Government for his church and missions."

In this last statement Mr. Kirke conflicts with the Rev. Mr. Crookall, who says that the Congregationalists have steadfastly refused all State aid. The religious system, like other institutions of British Guiana, is probably due to the extraordinary mixture of races. There are native Indians; negroes, descendants of the old slaves; other pure negroes more recently imported; East Indian coolies, who are most industrious, and sometimes take back thousands of dollars to India; the ubiquitous Chinese; a few Algerian Arabs, Annamese, and Tonquinese who have escaped from the French penal settlement at Cayenne; and whites of various nations. Add to these the progeny of mixed marriages among the various races above enumerated, and you have the strangest hodge-podge of a population, whose successful administration adds yet another feather to the Briton's cap. The late Mr. James Crosby, who was the protector of immigrants in British Guiana for some thirty years, so identified himself with the welfare of the East Indian population that he became a sort of deity. The department became known as Crosby Office, and to this day every coolie in difficulty announces his intention of going "to see Crosby." The disputes among the various sections of the population, accentuated by the cheapness of intoxicating liquor and the low state of sexual morality, cause a high crime rate. Mr. Kirke as sheriff of Demerara has had to deal with two hundred murderers in his time. Illegitimacy is rife, for marriage is not highly regarded.

"I heard a story about a hard-working, well-meaning Wesleyan minister, who was urging an old man to marry the woman with whom he had lived for many years. But at last, when the subject was renewed, the old man replied, 'Well, minister, we have discoursed together—me son John and me datter Selina—and dem all say married is very danger. Dis time de ole woman 'tand quiet; but de children say if I marry she, de old woman will get out-lawded, and put on too much airs. Better 'tand easy!'"

Mr. Kirke writes like a thorough man of the world, in the best sense. Mr. Crookall writes like what he is, an apostle of the London Missionary Society, fond of mild moral reflections, and still more mild humour. His style, too, is hardly impeccable, as witness the following passage:

"One lady that I knew, whilst busy at her toilet, felt something crawling on her shoulder; she screamed, and called her husband, and he had just time to knock the centipede off before biting her in the neck."

Still, he has some interesting things to say, and he quotes some verses which sum up certain characteristics of the country tellingly enough:

"Demerara, land of trenches,
Giving out most awful stenches,
Land of every biting beast
Making human flesh its feast:
Land of swizzles, land of gin,
Land of every kind of sin!
Why have I been doomed to roam
Far, so far, away from home?"

In spite of this pessimistic view, we fancy a winter in British Guiana would pass pleasantly enough. Those who meditate a trip thither will find Stark's guide-book a useful work of reference.

BRIEFER MENTION.

Scots Poems. By Robert Fergusson. (Blackwood & Sons.)

SO much has of late been written about Fergusson that this little pocket volume of selections from what he himself wrote should be welcome. We have seen how Mr. Stevenson drew a parallel between Fergusson and himself; we have seen how Dr. Grosart manfully championed Fergusson as something approaching a model of the virtues; and now for a simple shilling, the more respectable of Fergusson's Scots poems may be acquired. To the Southron they will be difficult enough reading; but if the student cares anything for scorn, broad humour, hard-hitting, and virile rhyme, he should persevere. We quote a passage from the "Lines to the Principal and Professors of the University of St. Andrews on their Superb Treat to Dr. Samuel Johnson." Fergusson begins by recording the events. He then proceeds:

"But hear my lads! gin I'd been there,
How I'd hae trimm'd the bill o' fare!
For ne'er sic surly wight as he
Had met wi' sic respect frae me.
Mind ye what Sam, the lying loun!
Has in his dictionar 'laid down':
That aits in England are a feast
To cow and horse, an' sicken beast, While in Scots ground this growth was common
To gust the gab o' man and woman."

And then follows the characteristically national feast as Fergusson would have prepared it:

"Secundo, then, a good sheep's head,
Whase hide was singit, never flead,
And four black trotters, cled wi' girsle,
Bedoun his throat had learn'd to hirsle.
What think ye neish o' gude fat brose
To clag his ribs? a dainty dose!
And white and bloody puddins routh,
To gar the Docter skirl o' drouth!"

And so on. The publishers mercifully add a glossary.

A Visit to Walt Whitman. By John Johnson, M.D. (Manchester: The Labour Press.)

In 1890 Dr. Johnston visited the good Gray poet at Camden, N.J., and subsequently sent him the notes of his experiences. On receiving the little pamphlet (the presentation was made in public, on the occasion of Walt's seventy-second birthday) Walt remarked:

"Say, you fellows, who dabble in the bigger streams of literature, there is a splendid lesson that such notes as these of Dr. Johnston teach. It is the same lesson that there is in the play of the "Diplomatic Secret." At the end of that interesting play, which I have seen, a great fellow who is in pursuit of it comes in, crying, "At last I have found it—I have found the Great Secret! The Great Secret is that there is no secret at all!" That is the secret. The trick of literary style! I almost wonder if it is not chiefly having no style at all. And Dr. Johnston has struck it here in these Notes. A man might give his fame for such a secret."

We can't agree that Dr. Johnston's diary is as good as this, but he has interesting things to tell. He wasted no time while in America: when he was not with Walt Whitman, he was hunting up the poet's friends, and talking to them—Mr. Burroughs, Mr. H. H. Gilchrist, and persons of obscurity who had some tie with Whitman—and whatever they said or did is recorded here. The description of Walt himself is very full. Here is a specimen of his talk:

"Have you noticed what fine boys the American boys are?" Their distinguishing feature is their good-naturedness and good temper with each other. You never hear them quarrel, nor even get to high words. Given a chance, and they would develop the heroic and manly, but they will be spoiled by civilisation, religion, and the damnable conventions. Their parents will want them to grow up genteel—everybody wants to be genteel in America—and thus their heroic qualities will be simply crushed out of them."

There is no doubt that Walt knew his countrymen. Of Oliver Wendell Holmes he said: "Holmes is a clever fellow, but he is too smart, too cute, too epigrammatic, to be a true poet." At another time: "I think I was intended for an artist: I cannot help stopping to look at the 'how it's done' of any piece of work, be it a picture, speech, music, or what not." There are some very good photographs and illustrations to this little book.

The Genealogical Magazine. Vol. I. (Elliot Stock.)

WE have read this volume through at a sitting, and have read it with unflagging enjoyment. In point of scholarship and reliability the Genealogical Magazine fully holds its own with the best of its rivals, the Miscellanea Genealogica et Heraldica and The Genealogist, it far surpasses them in scope, variety, and sustained interest. Where the general level is so high and so equal, it is difficult to select particular portions for exceptional remark. If we must do so, we would note the following articles as more especially combining solidity for the student with attractiveness for the general reader. The paper on the Sobieski Stuarts, with its attendant correspondence; the inquiry into the Nelson pedigree, wherein the appearance of grocers, mercers, ironmongers, and butter factors seems to have aroused a pretty feminine indignation on the part of a descendant, which it is strange was not appeased by the allotment to the great admiral of a leash of royal descents, two from Edward III. and one from Alfred the Great; investigations into the history of the Shakespeare family that ought to dispel once for all the pleasing error that there exists any posterity whatever of the bard, either in the male or in the female line; the story of the Beresford Ghost; and the suggestive chapters on "The Evolution of the Mediæval Helmet." One contributor, we rejoice to see, takes up the cudgels for female descent, which it is the unscientific fashion of the day to depreciate, or even to ignore—an attitude to be stigmatized as pedantry of the narrowest and most senseless kind. With reference to the Shakespeare lineage, it may be pointed out that French's Shakespeareana Genealogica is a very slovenly and untrustworthy book. We have noticed in the magazine a few misprints: "Kingstone" for "Kingston" (p. 576); "county" for "country" (599); saevus for saevus (p. 623); and "p. 346" for "p. 546" (p. 689). The "Further Royal Descents of Lord Nelson" (p. 520) has escaped the compiler of the index; and the Latin inscription on p. 652 needs overhauling. The editor, so far as his personal identity is concerned, with scholarlike modesty remains an unknown quantity; but when he is en evidence in these pages, we think we can detect the trenchant pen of one of the shrewdest and most accomplished genealogists of the day. We wish his new magazine the long life and complete success it deserves.

Christian Profiles in a Pagan Mirror. By Joseph Parker, D.D. (Hurst & Blackett.)

DR. PARKER has the happy gift of expressing old truths in a fresh and lively way. He cannot be dull, and he is often witty. In this little book the master of the City Tabernacle enunciates the truths of Christianity by placing them in the mouth of a pagan lady, whom he supposes to have come to England to inquire into the Christian faith, and into the habits and customs of Christians. She reports her impressions in letters to a friend in India. The lady herself embraces Christianity, and describes not only her own experiences but those of other people into whose lives and hearts she looks. As might be expected from this scheme, and from Dr. Parker's ability, the book contains many pungent as well as many edifying pages. It is suffused with an earnest spirit, and Dr. Parker is entirely justified in pointing to the fact that this book appears just fifty years after his first ministry, as a boy preacher, in 1848. Dr. Parker is moved to declare that: "Having paid much attention to Agnosticism, Secularism, Altruism, Socialism, and other theories and philosophies of life, I here set it down as my deliberate conviction that Jesus Christ alone can save the world."

Colloquy and Song. By B. J. M. Donne. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

THE method of this little book is the method of The Complete Angler, and Friends in Council, and Dr. Holmes's "Breakfast Table" volumes: certain persons come together to talk, and here and there a song is dropped in. Isaac Walton is, in truth, the author's particular model. Neither prose nor verse is of a very high order, but they have geniality and high spirits, and as the subject of conversation is nearly always one sport or another, the book, if somewhat trivial, is quite a pleasant one. Here is a specimen of the author's verse, from a poem in praise of coffee:

"Then toast King Coffee's noble beryl,
His wine flows finer when he's toasted,
When Bacchus' soul would be in peril,
His body dead if he were roasted!
Phoenix like, one rises higher,
The other dies before the fire!"

Our author, however, is no teetotaler. One of his songs celebrates "The Beauty of Beer."

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

THE STORY OF A PLAY.

BY W. D. HOWELLS.

The title just suits the story, which describes in three hundred and twelve bright, neat pages the vicissitudes of a play, and the varying moods of the author and his wife under the ordeal. Their triumph in the end is unequivocal, but there are hard things by the way. Mr. Howells has done wonders with so slender a plot. As usual, his characters behave beautifully, and converse as if they were people in a book. We fear British actors do not talk quite like this: "It might be the very thing. The audience likes a recurrence to a distinctive feature. It's like going back to an effective strain in music." Neither is this the common speech of British journalists: "'What a singular spectacle,' said Maxwell. 'The casting off of the conventional in sea-bathing always seems to me like the effect of those dreams where we appear in society insufficiently dressed, and wonder whether we can make it go.'" (Harper & Brothers. 312 pp. 6s.)

SILENCE.

BY MARY E. WILKINS.

Another gentle, fragrant book by the author of A New England Nun. The stories are six in number: "Silence" (Silence was a girl), "The Buckley Lady," "Evelina's Garden," "A New England Prophet," "The Little Maid at the Door," and "Lydia Hersey, of East Bridgewater." (Harper & Brothers. 336 pp. 6s.)

UNADDRESSED LETTERS.

BY F. A. SWETTENHAM.

Disregarding the device by which the short papers comprised in this volume are made to appear the jottings of a dead hand, we suppose them to represent the occasional output of Sir Frank Swettenham himself. They are the work, at any rate, of a man of wide knowledge of the world—of both the social world and the countries of the globe. They treat with a kind of brief discursiveness of such diverse matters as tigers, ghosts, criticism, death, letter-writing, and the education of daughters. "Too much scenery, too much sentiment," was the verdict of a friendly critic. But there are descriptive passages of great beauty, and the sentiment is virile. (John Lane. 312 pp. 6s.)

WILMAY.

BY BARRY PAIN.

Five stories of women: "Wilmay," "The Love Story of a Plain Woman," "The History of Clare Tollison," "The Forgiveness of the Dead," and "A Complete Recovery." This is a work in its author's serious manner. (Harper & Brothers. 248 pp. 3s. 6d.)

MUTINEERS.

BY ARTHUR E. J. LEGG.

Given a man of education and refinement, and, generally, of parts which in favourable circumstances—with a sufficient patrimony, that is to say—would secure him a pleasant and useful life, what will happen to him thrown upon his own resources in the pushful London of to-day? The problem is open to a hundred possible solutions, and every single one of them is right. Mr. Legge has made a very agreeable book about it, and has not found it necessary to demolish the fabric of society to find a solution. Also he has a good command of the English language. (John Lane. 341 pp. 6s.)

IN THE EYE OF THE LAW.

BY W. D. LYALL.

On page 9 the passage occurs: "A, not being a domiciled Scotsman, married B, a domiciled Scotswoman, who subsequently deserted him, and has remained away for the statutory period of four years. A, since. . . The opinion of counsel is requested on the following points. . ." The book contains a villainous lawyer and his charming, dignified victims, comic constables, and a melodramatic trial. (Glasgow and Edinburgh: Hodges. 199 pp.)

LOST MAN'S LANE.

BY ANNA KATHARINE GREEN.

By the author of The Leavenworth Case. The sub-title, "A Second Episode in the Life of Amelia Butterworth," will recommend this book to Mrs. Rohlf's admirers. The tale is "wrop in mistry" from head to foot, and for an episode 400 pages form a generous space. It is, perhaps, to exemplify the highly complex character of the enigma that the last page of the Contents is printed upside down. (Putnam's Sons. 403 pp.)

MURDER BY WARRANT.

BY E. T. COLLIS.

This book—as may be guessed from its title—is a plea for a court of criminal appeal; and lest its purpose should be misunderstood or ignored, an Introduction cites the names of some score of authorities who have declared themselves in favour of a prompt measure of reform. That of the Lord Chief Justice heads the list. A first glance does not reveal any sign of genius in the construction and style, but the end is kept always steadily in view. Corelli and Makefame are names which appear frequently upon the pages. (Kelvin Glen & Co. 253 pp. 5s.)

MATERFAMILIAS.

BY ADA CAMBRIDGE.

Begins with an elopement, and issues in grandmaternity. The form is autobiographical, and includes flirtation, shipwreck, and a colonial farm; also a second marriage, to correct the precipitation of the first. Domestic details are touched in with the sure hand of experience. (Ward & Lock. 314 pp. 3s. 6d.)

THE LOVE OF A FORMER LIFE.

BY CHARLES J. H. HALCOMBE.

A story built upon vivid dreams and information gleaned during a visit to Italy. It tells how Liello and Lucina, two lovers of ancient Rome, were re-incarnated in modern times under the names of Ferondo and Althea. Persecutions cut short their Roman life with some abruptness, but in the second innings they had plenty of excitement, including a shipwreck and the conversation of negroes. (John Long. 318 pp. 6s.)

THE GOLFGICIDE.

BY W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN.

A collection of six humorous stories for golfomanacs. This is Mr. W. G. Van T. Sutphen's manner: "There was a heap of wet sand on the costly Bokhara rug at the far end of the hall, and even as she gazed, unable to believe her own eyes, Mr. Brown appeared from the butler's pantry, attired in full golfing costume, and attended by Robinson Brown, jun., with his bag of clubs. Mr. Brown carefully teed his ball, and with a loud shout of 'fore,' drove it the whole length of the hall and drawing-room, to the utter destruction of a unique Sèvres vase." (Harper Brothers. 190 pp. 2s.)

IT WAS MARLOWE.

BY WILBUR GLEASON ZEIGLER.

Marlowe was Kit Marlowe, author of Dr. Faustus. Shakespeare comes into it too, and Ben Jonson, and George Peele. This is Shakespeare's conversational manner: "Yes, I shall at once lease the Green Curtaine that is now closed, and produce thy play there, Marlowe. A fortune can soon be reaped from such a venture." The attempt of the author is to prove that Marlowe wrote "Hamlet." We thought it was Bacon. (Kegan Paul. 295 pp., or, with the notes, 310 pp. 7s. 6d.)

GHOSTS I HAVE MET.

BY JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

Mr. Bangs is an American humorist and the author of A House-Boat on the Styx. This is his method: "I am glad to be of service to you," the Awful Thing replied, smiling at me so yellowly that I almost wished the author of The Blue Button of Cowardice could have seen it." There are seven stories in this book, and each is as funny as the last. Mr. Peter Newell's illustrations really make us laugh. (Harper & Brothers. 194 pp. 2s.)

A SON OF THE GODS.

By MRS. LODGE.

"Miss Dustan often owned to herself that her youth had been wasted, like the perfume of many a flower on the desert air; but that was only in her desponding moods. At other times she believed herself beautiful, young, and irresistible." Another character is Lord R—, "a man who does not mind what people say, at any rate." Subsequently there are a bicyclist's adventures among Fire Worshippers. (Digby & Long. 284 pp.)

BEHIND A MASK.

By THEO DOUGLAS.

A lengthy, closely woven, domestic drama by the author of A Bride-Elect. Love and scandal, madness, and a fire at a ball—these are some of the elements. A carefully written novel, a curious blend of quietude and sensationalism. (Harper & Brothers. 268 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

Sun Beetles: a Comedy of Nickname Land. By Thomas Pinkerton. (John Lane.)

THIS is the merest episode. In the perfectly appointed riverside mansion of Mr. Harpwell, a wealthy, hide-bound widower, where everything needed has but to be "buttoned" for and straightway it is produced by obsequious servants, dwell his sister Mrs. Fernshaw, a rich widow, and her son "Tubbie," a young man of humour and luxurious tastes. Mr. Harpwell's enormous gifts as benefactor-in-chief of Polderswick, the neighbouring Thames-side town, disturb these relatives, who looked to inheriting the money which is being thus disbursed. And when Mr. Harpwell meditates an expensive bridge across the river, their patience is exhausted. They seek the services of Lord Coldwitte, a permanent guest and renowned cynic (of whose wit, however, we hear more than we are permitted by Mr. Pinkerton to taste: it is dangerous for a novelist, unless he be a Meredith, to expatiate on the wit of his puppets), to help them out, and the decision is that Mr. Harpwell shall stand for Polderswick in the Liberal interest in the coming election, and that there being already a popular Liberal candidate, the town shall reject him so effectually as to disgust him with it for ever. Then the fun begins. "Tubbie" at once takes the affairs in hand, and with the assistance of a lawyer named Philpott, the plot is matured. How it ends the reader must discover unaided.

The book is clever, but not, we think, clever enough. We lay it aside with the feeling that had Mr. Pinkerton striven more the result would have been far better. With the exception of two characters—the lawyer Philpott, a true type waiting to be set on paper, and Mrs. Basker, of Eclipse Villa, a perfectly radiant creation, touched in with admirable dexterity—the figures are shadowy. Here is a specimen piece of dialogue relating to the bridge. It should be premised that Lord Coldwitte's nickname for Mrs. Fernshaw was the Fatuist:

"It will be a costly affair," said Coldwitte.

'It will be costly,' cried Harpwell, with enthusiastic conviction. 'I am inclined myself, as to the balustrades and more ornamental parts, to red Aberdeen granite.'

'The tombstone of your hopes, my Tubbie,' whispered Coldwitte; while Harpwell sat down after the manner of a political person who has made a splendid impression and waits to be heckled, as to rather a pleasure than otherwise.

'What will the Fatuist say?' whispered Coldwitte.

'The fact is, dear boy,' said Tubbie serenely, 'poor Mumeys, thinking your name for her had reference to what is politely called embonpoint, has got down some steel-centered stays, with a new patent winch-action for drawing 'em tight. Her maid over-wound her, and the ratchet or something got blocked. I had to button for the engineer with his leathern bag of tools to cut her loose. She's lying down now, with a pain in her heart, poor dear!'

'Aberdeen granite,' said Coldwitte, as after self-communing; 'why not porphyry?'

'Why porphyry?'

'Oh, it sounds expensive; more in the purple, you know! Remember, if you adopt it, that I gave you porphyry.'

'I'd like to give him peperino,' muttered Tubbie.

'The pillars might be of porphyry. I must look up porphyry. The local poet would be pleased with the name, if that be any recommendation.'

In this particular stratum of society—professional guests at country houses, and the newly rich who form a fringe to aristocracy—Mr. Pinkerton has a fruitful field for study. He is, we think, as well qualified as any one to study it, and yet we regret a little the loss of the fine humour that went to the making of his John Newbold's Ordeal.

* * * * *
The Keepers of the People. By Edgar Jepson. (C. Arthur Pearson.)

MR. JEPSON seems to have resolved to show that the world cannot do without an aristocracy, and that all little shibboleths of civilisation and convention sink out of sight in the presence of the single great man. The same people who figured in his former book, A Passion for Romance, appear here. The sensualist is still to the fore, but it is no longer the humorous sensualist, like Lord Lisdor, but the calm, god-like, invincible sensualist. He, Mr. Edgar Jepson assures us, is the true man of action. At the Lisdors' house suddenly appears a stranger, who is some remote connexion of the family returned to England to seek a wife. He marries a strong-minded young woman, and takes her out to rule with him in a strange land, called Varandaleel, somewhere north of the Himalayas. Then comes a Russian invasion, and many remarkable things happen which we will not reveal. But "the moral of it all," as the Duchess said, is the humiliation of the unfortunate lady who believed in conventional ethics. When she is removed, the inhabitants of Varandaleel settle down to enjoy themselves, and it certainly is a convenient land for everybody but stray missionaries and strong-minded women.

Mr. Jepson has an unfortunate trick of always appearing to moralise. We do not believe that he would subscribe to all the rather crude theories of morals and government in the book, but unfortunately he writes so as to appear as their advocate. Now, the reader of such a story as this has nothing to do with the moral so long as the interest is there, but he has a right to complain if he suspects the author of preaching. For the rest it is a clever and well-written romance, ingenious and full of action. Lord Lisdor is excellently done, and for the first hundred pages Althea could not be bettered. But when the company shifts to Varandaleel and the fantastic enters, the interest flags, not from lack of movement in the tale, but from the overdone brutality. Things are put a little too bluntly, and there is the fatal suspicion that the author would have us take it seriously. Now, sensualism taken seriously—except from the purely external point of view of the pathologist—is an absurdity and a weariness; it is only the humorous sensualist who, when drawn con amore, is tolerable. Indeed, a little wholesome humour is sadly needed in this dish of carnal bakemeats to make the mess palatable.

* * * * *
Sons of Adversity. By L. Cope Cornford. (Methuen & Co.)

THERE is little to complain of in this "romance of Queen Elizabeth's time," except that it belongs to the modern school of historical fiction, which is surely the most stereotyped and elaborately conventional school of fiction that ever got itself into print. Mr. Cornford writes with skill, and there is a freshness in his phrasing which greets one pleasantly after the pseudo-archaics of countless Covenanting novels:

"There was a breathing silence. I saw Mr. Nettlestone turn a dusky white colour, and instantly there swam into the glass of memory another image, the picture of a knave of diamonds glistening on wet stones, and having ciphers written on the back; and before Mr. Nettlestone opened his lips, I knew what he would say—and his answer fell pat like an echo: 'Thirteen hundred and fifty crowns.'

The words were scarce out of his mouth when I was flung aside, thrown down, and trampled on, as Chidoek Marston burst through the ring of men to the door. There was a glitter of steel—a confused momentary swaying to and fro and shouting, the scream of a man hurt—and I was upon my feet again, the wet wind from the open door blowing upon my face. Cleisby's poniard stuck quivering in the panel; he and his men were out of the room; and there came from without a sound of galloping hoofs and cries of pursuit. Sir Ralph's halberdiers, again closing about us, had stood fast at his word of command."

The scene is prettily rendered, and there are many such scenes in Sons of Adversity.

Nevertheless, the book is merely concocted according to a recipe: a siege, a ship, a girl, some money, and a mystery, culminating in the inevitable love-match. And we still await the novelist who will look back at history through his own unaided virginal eyes, and not through the glasses used by a thousand and one predecessors. Surely there is yet new material in history—material which will employ the larger scope and fuller power that the art of fiction has acquired since the days of Scott and Dumas. These were great men, but they did not utter the last word of historical fiction.

It is difficult to define exactly what is the matter with the historical novels of to-day. To say that they lack originality is not enough. But even on present lines they might be easily improved. For instance, by not invariably writing them in the first person singular; and by infusing into them a little of what Dumas (who knew its value as well as most people) calls in his Memoirs, "cette merveilleuse qualité de la gaieté."

To return for a moment to Sons of Adversity, let us say that it is good of its kind. If Mr. Cornford had been as fresh in the invention of his incident as he is in the presentation of it, he would have sharply distinguished himself from the ruck. Unfortunately, his incidents are altogether too trite. For an example, chosen at random: "When I came to myself, I was lying propped against his knee, in the bottom of the wherry, which was moving swiftly to the creak and splash of oars." That venerable wherry (sometimes it is a lugger), with its apparatus of swooned hero and vocal rowlocks, ought to be made taboo by ordinance of the Society of Authors.

* * * *

Concerning Isabel Carnaby. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"AND there, I have gone and forgotten your tea again! How careless I am! I am afraid this tea is not very fresh, Mr. Sebright; in fact, it has stood for over an hour; but Simmons (that is the butler) is so dreadfully offended if I send out for fresh tea to be made during the afternoon, that I really dare not do it. You won't mind much, will you, if it is rather strong and cold?"

Paul smiled and forsook the paths of rectitude so far as to assure her ladyship that tea on the lees was the beverage he fancied above all others.

"Oh, how dear of you to say that! And you can have as much hot water as you like, though the hot water is cold too. But it will take off the bitter taste which makes the special nastiness of old tea. Is it very bad, now you come to drink it?" asked Lady Esdaile, with sympathetic interest.

Paul lied bravely. "It is delicious."

"I am so glad. It really is tiresome having a butler who takes offence if you ask him to do anything."

"It must make life very difficult, Lady Esdaile."

"It does; very difficult indeed. I often don't get enough to eat because I daren't ask for more when Simmons is carving; but I make up with vegetables, because the footmen hand them. I'm not afraid of a footman."

We have begun with this passage because it illustrates perfectly Lady Esdaile's conversational methods, and Lady Esdaile is the most valuable figure in the book. Indeed, as a novel, we rank Miss Fowler's work low, but as a collection of frivolous talk it is extremely amusing. Isabel Carnaby herself is not to be believed in, Paul Seaton (Lady Esdaile's Mr. "Sebright") is only half drawn, the society in which they move has little reality; but for good-humoured "piffing" chatter such as this Miss Fowler is to be thanked:

"Isabel smiled. 'My dear Lord Bobby, how absurd you are! Now perhaps you will respond to my confidence, and tell us when you feel shy.'

Bobby thought for a moment. 'When my boots creak,' he answered.

Everybody laughed. 'It is no laughing matter, I can assure you,' he continued. 'I've got a pair now that make me feel as timid as an unfledged schoolgirl every time I put them on. I wore them to go to church only last Sunday; and they sang such a processional hymn to themselves all the way up the aisle that by the time I reached our pew I was half dead with shame, and "the beauty born of murmuring sound" had "passed into my face"; but it wasn't the type of beauty that was becoming to me—it was too anxious and careworn for my retroussé style.'

'Weren't your people awfully ashamed of you?' asked Isabel.

'There were none of them there except my mother; and she sat at the far end of the pew, and tried to look as if I were only a collateral.'

Briefly, the story is nothing, but the talk pleasantly titillates; and we shall always with some eagerness reach out a hand to a new novel from the same pen.

* * * *

Her Ladyship's Elephant. By David Dwight Wells.
(Heinemann.)

THIS is a bright, farcical little story. Two couples are married upon the same day. The man in one case, the bride in the other, is an American; and the American of each couple, being the predominant partner, has assumed the sole secret arrangement of the tour. The two pairs start by the same train. At a junction the train divides while the two men have met and for a few moments have exchanged places. The narrative of the subsequent complications and difficulties is sufficiently comic. As to the elephant, so touchingly depicted on the cover by Mr. William Nicholson, he is in reality rather incidental. Irritated by the reception accorded him by his friend's aunt, Lady Dian, to whom he had taken his friend's wife for protection, Allingford (the American bridegroom) sent on to her ladyship a newly imported elephant, which the chance necessity of a fellow countryman had assigned to him in pledge. Here is a part of what then began to happen:

"He judged now that he was in the park of the 'Damconsul'; and the fact that there were clumps of familiar plants scattered over the grass increased his belief that this was the case. He tried a few coleus and ate a croton or two. . . . He lay down on a few of the beds; but the foliage was pitifully thin, and afforded him no comfortable resting place; moreover, there were curious rows of slanting things which glistened in the sunlight, and which he much wished to investigate. On examination he found them quite brittle, and easily smashed a number of them with his trunk. Nor was this all, for in the wreckage he discovered a large quantity of most excellent fruit—grapes and nectarines and some passable plums. Evidently the 'Damconsul' was an enlightened person. . . . At this moment a shameless female slave appeared at a window . . . and abused him. He could not, it is true, understand her barbarous language, but the tone implied abuse. Such an insult from the scum of the earth could not be allowed to pass unnoticed. He filled his trunk with water . . . and squirted it at her with all his force, and the scum of the earth departed quickly. 'It would be well,' thought the elephant, 'to find the "Damconsul" before further untoward incidents occur'; and with this end in view, he turned himself about. . . . He forgot, however, that marble may be slippery; his hind legs suddenly slid from under him, and he sat hurriedly down on the breakfast-table. It was at this singularly inopportune moment that Lady Dian appeared upon the scene."

The whole story is good fooling of its kind.

FOR HASTY WRITERS.

An American critic, Mr. A. G. Compton, concludes his volume, Some Common Errors of Speech (Putnam's Sons) with this Index Expurgatorius:

- Above, for more than.
- Antagonise, for oppose.
- Any, for at all: "She does not walk any if she can avoid it." "I don't work any at night."
- Apt, for liable or likely.
- Balance, for rest or remainder.
- Be done with, for have done with.
- Bogus, for worthless, fraudulent.
- But, for only: "Others but nodded."
- Cablegram, for cable despatch or message.
- Calculated to, for likely to or fit to.
- Carnival, as metaphor.
- Claim, for assert or maintain.
- Cyclone, for tornado or hurricane.
- Deputise, for depute.
- Develops, for turns out: "It develops that Senator Hoar introduced the proposed amendment."
- Due to, for owing to.

Electrocute, for kill by electricity.
 Endorse, for approve.
 En route, for on the way.
 Enthuse over, for feel enthusiastic over, or admire.
 Every now and then, for now and then.
 Every once in a while, for once in a while.
 Expect, for think or suppose, relating to present time.

Fix, for adjust, repair, and a hundred other words.
 Folks, for folk or people: "The good folks at the inn," for "the good people at the inn."
 Fraud, for impostor.

Goes without saying, for is understood.
 Gratuitous, for unnecessary.

Have got, for have.
 Hire, let, lease. (See dictionaries.)

Inaugurate, for begin or open.
 In evidence, for conspicuous.
 In our midst, for in the midst of us, or among us.
 Inside of, for within or in less than: "Inside of two weeks."

Jeopardise, for endanger.

Know as, for know that: "I do not know as I can say much on that subject."

Learn, for teach.
 Leave, for let.
 Lengthy, for long.
 Loan, for lend.
 Locate, for settle or place.
 Lurid, for bright or brilliant.

Majority, for most: "The majority of the stock is worthless."
 Materialise, for appear.
 Murderous, for deadly: "Murderous weapons."
 Mutual, for common.

Observe, for say (it means to heed or attend to).
 Official, for officer.

Patron, for customer.
 Posted, for informed.
 Proven, for proved.

Quite, for very.

Reliable, for trustworthy.
 Remains, for corpse.
 Rendition, for performance.
 Repudiate, for reject or disown.
 Restive, for restless or frisky.
 Resurrect, for bring back to life.
 Retire, for go to bed.
 Retire, for withdraw (active verb).
 Rôle, for part.
 Ruination, for ruin or destruction.

Since, for ago: "It happened more than a year since."
 Some, for somewhat or a little: "It thawed some."
 State, for say: "He stated that he had no property of his own."
 Stop at, for stay at.

Those kind, for that kind.
 Transference, for transfer.
 Transpire, for occur or take place.

Ventilate, for expose or explain.

Will be able, for shall be able, in the first person.
 Would like, for should like, in the first person.

DAUDET DESCRIBED BY HIS SON.

WE have already referred to the articles upon Alphonse Daudet, by his son Leon Daudet, which have appeared in the Revue de Paris. The narrative (says the Literary Digest) reveals more fully than ever his heroic fortitude in the deadly embrace of an incurable malady, and makes manifest that through dire suffering the invalid's character was continually elevated and his talent exalted.

The son's recollections go back to the time of his infancy—back to the time when his father was still young and strong, and crowned with his budding laurels.

Many of these early reminiscences cast a vivid light upon the earlier years of Daudet:

"We were in the country, in Provence, visiting a family of our dear friends. The morning was admirable, vibrant with bees and perfumes; my companion took his Virgil, his cloak, and his short pipe, and we wandered forth, and ensconced ourselves on the border of a rivulet. The dark cyprus-trees near us enhanced the clear blue of the horizon, delicately intersected with roseate and golden lines. My father explained to me Les Georgiques. Then it was that poetry was revealed to me. The beauty of the verses, the rhythmical intonations of the musical voice reciting them, and the harmony of the landscape penetrated my soul with a single impression. An immense beatitude took possession of me. I felt suffocated, and burst into tears. My father knew what was going on within me, and, pressing me to his heart, shared my enthusiasm. I was drunken with beauty."

Another scene at a later date:

"It is evening—I return from the Lyceum after attending several lectures. Our master, Burdeau, had just analysed Schopenhauer for us with incomparable clearness and insight. I was disturbed by his sombre theories. In fact, then for the first time I had tasted the fruit of death, and of distress. How came it that the words of the gloomy pessimist made such an impression upon my sensitive brain? That I will not attempt to elucidate, but my father understood me. I had said scarcely anything, but he saw from my looks that the lesson had been too severe for my youth and inexperience. Then he drew me tenderly to his side, and he, upon whom the black shadow had already fallen, for my sake celebrated life in terms that I shall never forget. He told me of work that ennobles everything; of radiant goodness; of pity, in which refuge may be found; and finally of love, a consolation even for death that I knew now only by name, but which in time would be revealed to me, and dazzle me with inconceivable raptures. How strong and convincing were his words! He presented me with a radiant picture of the life into which I was about to adventure. The arguments of the philosopher fell one by one before his eloquence; this, my first and most violent attack of metaphysics, he repelled victoriously. Do not smile, you who read these pages. I now comprehend the importance of this little domestic drama. Since that evening I have been gorged with metaphysics, and I know that by means of it a subtle poison infected my veins, and those of my contemporaries. It is not because of its pessimism that this philosophy is so much to be dreaded, but because it distorts and masks what is best in life. I regret bitterly that I did not fix in my memory my father's discourses—it would have been a comfort to many."

Montaigne, Pascal, and Rousseau were among Daudet's favourite authors. Montaigne he had always by his side. Descartes and Spinoza he admired chiefly among the philosophers; and, although opposed to his doctrines, Schopenhauer was read by him with keen relish. The book that he studied more than any other, however, was the book of life. According to him it is only through practical experience that we can learn to know the truth; and again, he constantly maintained that emotion is the real source of all that is great in art. One of his own most striking characteristics was certainly his extreme sensibility, a most rare capacity for deep feeling, that was never diminished either by suffering or the flight of time. In maturity his emotions were as keen and as quickly aroused as in his ardent youth; but they had been ennobled and purified by his profound and sad experience.

Alphonse Daudet always had a great penchant for books of travel and adventure. Napoleon was one of his heroes, and he was familiar with all the details of his campaigns. In speaking of this tumultuous and restless nineteenth century, he maintained that it was dominated by two types: that of Buonaparte and that of Hamlet; the latter, prince not only of Denmark, but of the interior life; the former, source of high deeds and daring enterprises.

Among his contemporaries there were two whom he regarded as representatives of their opposite ideals—H. M. Stanley and George Meredith. He delighted in Stanley's books, and read them incessantly. Moreover, when the daring traveller was attacked, he defended him with conviction, maintaining that, so far from being cruel, he was the most just and merciful, as well as the most tenacious of conquerors.

The younger Daudet describes their visit to George Meredith's charming cottage at Box Hill, concluding with an eloquent eulogy of the English author.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1898.

No. 1363, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. | HALF-YEARLY. | QUARTERLY. |
|---|---------|--------------|------------|
|   | £ s. d. | £ s. d.      | £ s. d.    |
| If obtained of a News-vendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .              | 0 13 0  | 0 6 6        | 0 3 3      |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom. . . . .                | 0 15 3  | 6 7 8        | 0 3 10     |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0 18 0  | 0 9 0        | 0 4 6      |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

ON Wednesday, at Cambridge, the honorary degree of Doctor in Law was conferred upon General Ferrero, the Italian Ambassador; Sir Nathaniel Lindley, the Master of the Rolls; Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P.; Prof. Dicey; Mr. Bryce, M.P.; Sir Henry Irving (who is this year's Rede Lecturer); Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A.; Dr. Caird, the Master of Balliol; and Mr. F. C. Penrose, late President of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and first Director of the British School of Archaeology in Athens. Upon Mr. Charles Booth, the social economist, was conferred the degree of Doctor in Science.

In her introduction to the new volume of the Biographical Thackeray, which contains The Yellowplush Papers, Major Gahagan, The Great Hoggarty Diamond, and others of the shorter works, Mrs. Ritchie quotes a number of extracts from a diary kept by her father in London in 1832, when he was reading law and seeing much of Maginn and the Tennysons, FitzGerald, and the Bullers. Later we are offered glimpses of Thackeray in Paris, when studying painting and leading a strikingly Trilbyesque life; and then in 1836 comes his marriage, in 1837 the appearance of Yellowplush in Fraser's Magazine, and in 1838 of Major Gahagan, in Colburn's New Monthly Magazine. Mrs. Ritchie suggests that Thackeray had had to pay dearly for some of the knowledge which went to the making of the Yellowplush Papers. Thus:

"As a boy he had lost money at cards to some card-sharpers who scraped acquaintance with him. He has told us that they came and took lodgings opposite to his, on purpose to get hold of him. He never blinked at the truth, or spared himself; but neither did he blind himself as to the real characters of the people in question, when once he had discovered them. His villains became curious studies in human nature; he turned them over in his mind, and he caused Deuceace, Barry Lyndon, and Ikey Solomons, Esq., to pay back some of their ill-gotten spoils, in an involuntary but very legitimate fashion, when he put them into print and made them the heroes of those grim early histories."

Mrs. RITCHIE writes thus of the pseudonym Michael Angelo Titmarsh, which Thackeray was then using:

"We know that Haroun al Raschid used to like to wander about the streets of Bagdad in various disguises, and in the same way did the author of Vanity Fair—although he was not a Calif—enjoy putting on his various dominos and characters. None of these are more familiar than that figure we all know so well, called Michael Angelo Titmarsh. No doubt my father first made this artist's acquaintance at one of the studios in Paris. Very soon Mr. Titmarsh's criticisms began to appear in various papers and magazines. He visited the salons as well as the exhibitions over here, he drew most of the Christmas books, and wrote them too. He had a varied career. One could almost write his life. For a time, as we know, he was an assistant master at Dr. Birch's Academy. . . . He was first cousin to Samuel Titmarsh of the great 'Hoggarty Diamond'; also he painted in water-colours. . . . To the kingdom of heaven he assuredly belongs! kindly, humorous, delightful little friend; droll shadow behind which my father loved to shelter himself. In Mr. Barrie's life of his mother he tells us how she wonders that he should always write as if he were some one not himself. Sensitive people are glad of a disguise, and of a familiar who will speak their thoughts for them. . . ."

AND here is a letter from Thackeray to his wife in 1838, which strikes a deeper note, and is of touching beauty:

" . . . Here have we been two years married and not a single unhappy day. Oh, I do bless God for all this happiness which He has given me! It is so great that I almost tremble for the future, except that I humbly hope (for what man is certain about his own weakness and wickedness) our love is strong enough to withstand any pressure from without, and as it is a gift greater than any fortune, is likewise one superior to poverty or sickness, or any other worldly evil with which Providence may visit us. Let us pray, as I trust there is no harm, that none of these may come upon us; as the best and wisest Man in the world prayed that He might not be led into temptation. . . . I think happiness is as good as prayers, and I feel in my heart a kind of overflowing thanksgiving which is quite too great to describe in writing. This kind of happiness is like a fine picture, you only see a little bit of it when you are close to the canvas; go a little distance and then you see how beautiful it is. I don't know that I shall have done much by coming away, except being so awfully glad to come back again."

An interesting personal relic of Milton has just been described at some length by a writer in the Daily News, to whom it was entrusted for that purpose by its present owner. This is a little tortoise-shell case, some four inches long, 1½ broad, and half an inch deep or thick, containing tablets, three ivory leaves, and a pair of dividers; other contents—a pencil and a pen and three other things—having been (like Paradise) lost. At the bottom, which is of steel, there is a nearly circular raised part, which was used by the poet for sealing his letters. The relics are accompanied by the following document:

"I Richard Lovekin, of Namptwich [now Nantwich], in the county of Chester, do affirm and will make oath, if need be, that a tortoise-shell-case containing a pen, pencil, three leaves of ivory, and a pair of dividers, and a fish-skin case in which is contained ivory leaves [this fish-skin case does not appear to be extant], late in my possession and now the property of Josh Massie, were given me by my aunt Mrs. Milton, widow of Poet Milton, sometime before her death, who informed me that both of the cases above-mentioned belonged to her deceased husband Mr. Milton, and that he used the raised oval at the bottom of the tortoise-shell case as a seal; also that he did intend to have had his own coat of arms engraved on it. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this first day of October [originally "September," but the September is crossed out], A.D. 1742.

RICHD. LOVEKIN."

Milton's widow was his third wife, Elizabeth—"Betty"—Minshall, who died in 1727, surviving her husband some fifty years. As Nantwich was her home, there is every reason to believe in the authenticity of the document and case. In whose possession they are we know not, but considering the fate of Thackeray's inkstand, which was stolen from Mr. Leslie Stephen's house a few weeks ago, it might be well if the British Museum acted as custodian.

THE Outlook, which specialises in R. L. S., supports the theory that Stevenson was the author of the sea-song which we quoted a week or so ago—"The Fine Pacific Islands"—attributed by him to a singer in a public-house at Rotherhithe. "Written in a private house at a Fine Pacific Island" would, says our contemporary, probably more nearly explain their origin. This private house is, alas! in a poor way. According to a recent visitor to Samoa, whose experiences are cited by the New York Critic, the home of Tusitala is rapidly falling to ruin. It is empty, and likely to remain so.

THE following is the list of the principal contents of the new Cornish Magazine, due on July 1, which Mr. Quiller-Couch is editing: A frontispiece, "Pilchards," from the picture by C. Napier Hemy, A.R.A.; "Truro Cathedral" (with five illustrations)—1, Its History, by Canon Donaldson; 2, Its Future, by the Bishop of Truro; "The Mystery of Joseph Laquedem," a story, by "Q"; "Madam Fanny Moody at Home," a chat with the Cornish nightingale (six portraits); a sonnet, "Cornubiensibus Adoptivus," by A. C. Benson; "A Strong Man," a story, by Charles Lee; "The Duchy's Harvest," by F. G. Aflalo; "The Merry Ballad of the Cornish Pasty" (three illustrations), by R. Morton Nance; and "Two Noble Dames" (two portraits)—Margaret Godolphin and Grace Lady Grenville—by A. H. Norway.

In commenting upon the Anglo-American banquet, "C. K. S." in the Illustrated London News remarks: "From one point of view, it is true, the dinner was not particularly well managed. The organisers evidently knew nothing of half their guests, and showed not the slightest tact in sorting them. It was rather quaint, for example, to see one of the most learned men in England—a brilliant classical scholar—sitting side by side with a representative of the newest of new journalism, whose genius runs rather in the direction of catering for the million than in adapting himself to the one-hundred-and-odd people who care about Greek verse." But we decline to sympathise with "one of the most learned men in England." The newest of new journalists is probably the very man with whom it was well he should come into contact.

MR. DENT has not long remained in possession of The Idler. He bought it some few months ago, and has only just succeeded in making the change of control perceptible. But now he sells it again to a young gentleman from the University of Oxford.

THE two first volumes—constituting Sense and Sensibility—of Mr. Grant Richards's Winchester Edition of Jane Austen lie before us. They are satisfying both to eye and touch. The cover is of a smooth and sober green, the paper is stout and white, and the type which Messrs. Constable, of Edinburgh, have employed is noble. It was time that Miss Austen had this generous treatment. A portrait of the novelist, from a painting by her sister Cassandra, forms the demure frontispiece.

LORD ROSEBERY has not yet definitely decided what to do with "Lady Stair's House." Two schemes are under consideration. On the one hand, his Lordship feels half inclined, it seems, to fit up the house as an occasional residence; but there are obvious objections. The Lawnmarket certainly ranks among the least desirable residential parts of Edinburgh. The alternative proposal is to turn the house into a Sir Walter Scott Museum. Its associations with the tradition upon which Scott's story, My Aunt Margaret's Mirror, is founded makes its devotion to such a purpose the more appropriate.

No one appears to be inclined to do for Allan Ramsay's house—another of the historical and literary landmarks of the Scottish capital—what Lord Rosebery has done for Lady Stair's house. The quaint old building at the head of Halkerston Wynd, in the High-street of Edinburgh, is the only remaining memorial of the author of the once famous "Gentle Shepherd"—and it is doomed to destruction. It was here, "at the sign of the Mercurie," that honest Allan for the most part lived, and laboured in manifold capacities. In 1725 he removed to the Luckenbooths, and later he built his celebrated "goosepie" on the slope of the Castle Hill; but nearly all his publications were issued "at the sign of the Mercurio." Moreover, the shop in the Luckenbooths—afterwards occupied for many years by Creech—has been swept away; and the "goosepie" has been incorporated by Prof. Geddes in his University Hall scheme, and has lost its separate identity. Perhaps this last would have appeared to Allan the most severe blow. For he was extremely proud of the little lodge which he erected for himself, and was surprised that its fantastic octagon shape excited the mirth rather than the admiration of his fellow-citizens. It was the wags of the town who first dubbed it a "goosepie," and the story is told that on Allan complaining of this to Lord Elibank, the latter replied: "Indeed, Allan, when I see you in it I think they are not far wrong."

MR. MARION CRAWFORD in his forthcoming novel will be found to have forsaken modern life for the nonce. It is a romance of the second Crusade. He is also at work on a volume of Italian history.

MR. GEORGE MOORE, whose new novel, Evelyn Innes, has been boycotted by Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son, takes his adversity (or advertisement) without either anger or resentment. In an interview published by the Chronicle his attitude is set forth. Mr. Moore's Esther Waters was boycotted in the same way, but it has been proved, he holds, that it was a morality. Therefore Messrs. Smith & Son boycotted a morality. Mr. Moore does not, he says, mind that:

"What I am sorry for is, that after having discovered their mistake, they have not yet tried to set themselves straight with their conscience. They have libelled me, and have not withdrawn the libel. This is a serious matter for them, not for me. I cannot fancy any position more painful than to discover that one has libelled a fellow-creature, and sooner or later Messrs. Smith will seek to make reparation. Conscience has a way of finding us out. After years men have refunded sums of money which they owed to the revenue on account of false declarations regarding their income."

The spectacle of the conscience-stricken Messrs. Smith & Son advancing to Mr. Moore to make reparation is one that we should wish to witness.

SUBSEQUENTLY, in the same conversation, Mr. Moore returned to this point, and thus answered a Pall Mall reviewer's question: What is the central idea of Evelyn Innes? "I have expressed my conviction," said Mr. Moore, "that sooner or later conscience will force Messrs. Smith to make reparation to me. None can persist in wrong-doing. It is too uncomfortable. And that, by a curious irony of fate, is the very theme of the book which Messrs. Smith have boycotted." Meanwhile Messrs. Mudie are circulating five hundred copies.

WHAT promises to be a very interesting series of books has been projected by Messrs. Duckworth, and is now in preparation. This is a library of typical modern plays of all civilised nations, translated into English. The general editors are R. Brimley Johnson and N. Erichsen, and the following volumes are now in progress:

Henrik Isben's Love's Comedy (Kjærlighedens Komædie), translated by C. F. Keary; Maurice Maeterlinck's Intérieur, translated by William Archer, and La Mort de Tintagiles and Alladine et Palomides, translated by Alfred Sutro; Villiers de l'Isle Adam's La Révolte and L'Evasion, translated by Theresa Barclay; Sergius Stepniak's The Concert, translated by Constance Garnett; Emile Verhaeren's Les Aubes, translated by Arthur Symons; August Strindberg's The Father (Faderen), translated by N. Erichsen; Ostrovsky's The Storm, translated by Constance Garnett; Brieux's Les Bienfaiteurs, translated by Lucas Malet; and Henryk Sienkiewicz's On a Single Card, translated by E. L. Voynich.

To Messrs. Boussood Valadon's superb series of historical monographs, which already includes Bishop Creighton's Queen Elizabeth, Sir John Skelton's Queen Mary, and Mr. Holmes's Queen Victoria, Mr. Andrew Lang will contribute The Young Pretender and Mr. S. R. Gardiner Cromwell.

In these days nothing escapes the novelist, as Mr. Lang pointed out at the Booksellers' Dinner. The earth is theirs and the sea, the air is theirs and the stars that swim in space. They do the work of historian and evolutionist, biographer and sociologist. So much preamble to the statement that the worst is upon us: an American—a translator of Tolstoi, and therefore one who ought to know better—has written a novel around Omar Khayyam. Omar the Tent-Maker is his title, and the scene is laid in Khorasan, and Hassan el Sabah is a prominent character. The prospect is terrible.

MR. CONAN DOYLE's latest novel, The Tragedy of the "Korosko," has met with a criticism which the author is likely to have some difficulty in rebutting. "The 'Tremont Presbyterian Church,'" says a correspondent of the Book Buyer, "may go down with foreigners, but not with New Englanders. They know there is no Presbyterian church in Boston."

In major poetry England easily leads, but American minor poetry is perhaps a few degrees better than our own. There is a crisper manner across the Atlantic, a clearer sense of what is to be said, a gayer movement. In a recent Nation we find some dozen native singers dealt with, and nearly all repay notice. Among them is Mr. Edwin Arlington Robinson with a slim volume, entitled The Children of the Night, from which we take this worthy little sonnet:

"THE CLERKS.

I did not think that I should find them there
When I came back again; but there they stood,
As in the days they dreamed of when young blood
Was in their cheeks and women called them fair.
Be sure, they met me with an ancient air—
And yes, there was a shopworn brotherhood
About them; but the men were just as good,
And just as human as they ever were.

And you that ache so much to be sublime,
And you that feed yourselves with your descent,
What comes of all your visions and your fears?
Poets and kings are but the clerks of Time,
Tying the same dull webs of discontent,
Clipping the same sad alnage of the years."

And another volume, entitled, with fearsome hideousness, What can I do for Brady?
by Mr. Charles F. Johnson, yields this excellent piece of rhymed criticism:

"THE SHAKESPEARIAN PHRASE.

He took ten words from our English speech:
Two were such as mothers teach
Their children when they croon them rhymes
Or teach them legends of old times,
One he learned from his father's men,
One he picked up from 'rare old Ben,'
Two he heard Marlowe use one day
At the Mitre Tavern after the play,
One he recalled from a ballad rude
That his comrades sang in Lucy's Wood,
Two he had heard on London street—
A verb and a noun now obsolete,
But full of pith in Elizabeth's reign—
And one he found in old Montaigne.

He set the Saxon words beside
The high-born Latin words of pride,
And lo! the ten words joined together
To make a phrase which lives for ever—
An immortal phrase of beauty and wit,
A luminous thought the soul of it,
But with no baffling wordy fence
Between the reader and the sense.
Genius finds in our every-day words
The music of the woodland birds,
Discloses hidden beauty furled
In the commonplace stuff of the every-day
world,
And for her highest vision looks
To the world of men, not the world of books."

APROPOS American poetry, the following notice has claims upon the connoisseur of unconscious irony:—"Mr. Blank's stirring battle-song, 'Remember the Maine,' will be issued with fitting music by Mr. Dash, the well-known composer, whose compositions, notably the universally known hymn 'What a friend we have in Jesus,' are so widely known."

THE interest shown by Americans in their first foreign war has led to a reissue of Dr.
Edward Everett Hale's famous story, The Man Without a Country, with a new and timely preface. Here is a sentence showing how the story has been topicalised: "The man who, by his sneers, or by looking backward, or by revealing his country's secrets to her enemy, delays for one hour peace between Spain and this Nation is, to all intents and purposes, 'A man without a Country.' He has not damned the United States in a spoken oath. All the same, he is a dastard child."

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS's first two War articles for Scribner's Magazine will appear in the July number. They are "The First Shot of the War" and "The First Bombardment" (Matanzas), with snap shots of life on the flagship New York and a portrait of Ensign Boone, who fired the first shot to kill. Mr. Davis will write of the war for no other magazine.

An article in the Conservator yields the following characteristic story of Walt Whitman: "Once," said the dean of a great university to the writer, "I called on Walt Whitman with a number of my fellow professors. The old man received us with that gentle courtesy which was characteristic, and among other things he asked me kindly: 'And what do you do?' I said that I held the chair of metaphysics and logic at my university. The old poet gave a reassuring smile as one who encourages a child, and answered: 'Logic and metaphysics; ah, yes, I suppose we have to have people to look after these things even if they don't exist.'"

WE take the following from the Daily Mail:

"A crowd of Manx farmers and others who attended a sale by auction of a large farming estate known as Ballamheve, near Ramsey, were surprised to find Mr. Hall Caine among the bidders. It is said that the farm possesses a fascination for Mr. Caine, owing to its being the reputed home of a certain 'fairy doctor.' The man of letters was the first to set the ball rolling with a bid of £6,250. He was opposed by a Mr. R.
Camley, who is a member of the Manx Legislature, but Mr. Caine kept his end up until he offered £7,200. Mr. Camley declined to go further, but as the reserve was £7,600 the property was not sold. The 'fairy doctor,' therefore, remains in undisputed possession."

MR. M. SOUTHWELL writes: "Might I ask you kindly to note that I will issue, in a few days, a poetical satire, entitled Cockney Critics and their Little Games, by Junius Secundus." Certainly.

THE present week has yielded two volumes of peculiar interest to writers. One, which comes from across the Atlantic—Some Common Errors of Speech—is alluded to in our Fiction Supplement; the other is of native manufacture, The Mistakes We Make, by Mr.
C. E. Clark (C. Arthur Pearson). Mr.
Clark is more general than the American censor, but both writers have common ground. Among "Some Literary Stumbling-Blocks" Mr. Clark includes many stock misquotations, such as "Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink," for "Water, water, everywhere, nor any drop to drink"; and "Fresh fields and pastures new," for "Fresh woods and pastures new"; and "The even tenor of their way" for "The noiseless tenor of their way";
and "When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war," for "When Greek joins Greek then was the tug of war." Mr. Clark also corrects a number of traditional misapprehensions. Dr. Johnson, for instance, never used the phrase "We will take a walk down Fleet-street"; the words were invented for him by Mr. Sala as a motto for Temple Bar. The Duke of Wellington never said "Up, Guards, and at them." Napoleon never called the English "A nation of shopkeepers": it was Adam Smith.
And what Sir Robert Walpole said was not "Every man has his price," but "All these men have their price."

PURE FABLES.

FORM.

CIRCUMSTANCE got a poet by the throat, and well-nigh squeezed the life out of him.
And the poet begged, chokingly, for mercy.
"Will you write fiction, then?" quoth Circumstance.

"Yes," gasped the poet, "I suppose I must!"

So that he went and fashioned a plot, and set it round with his best; eschewing only rhyme and measure.

And forthwith Circumstance began to be very kind to him.

And the poet laughed in his sleeve.

MEETINGS.

The sun and the moon had heard a great deal of each other.

And one afternoon they chanced to be in the firmament together.

"Washed out!" said the sun.

"Jaundiced!" said the moon.

ADVICE.

"You should endeavour to cultivate epigrammatic brevity."

"No doubt! . . . But isn't there a lot more money in elegant diffuseness?"

MOBBED.

A popular writer complained that it was impossible for him to go abroad without being followed and stared upon by gaping vulgarity.

"You shouldn't have had so many photographs taken," said his friend.

T. W. H. C.

A NEW DICTIONARY AND SOME OMISSIONS.

THE publication of a new dictionary sets one to discover how far the editor has condescended to admit new words, and what others he considers obsolete. Is it accurate to say, for example, as Chambers's English Dictionary says, that "temerarious" is obsolete? It was a word dear to Sir Thomas Browne, and, no doubt, the revival of interest in Browne shown by the publication, first, of Dr. Greenhill's excellent edition of the Religio Medici, and, a month or two ago, of an edition by another physician, accounts for the revival of the word "temerarious." Mr. Stevenson uses it, even of a thing, in the first page of his well-known story The Suicide Club.
Certainly, to say that there is a revival of this adjective cannot be called temerarious.
It has been often used during the last few years in the literary weeklies, and more recently has crept into the daily papers. And what for no? as Mr.
Lang would say. It might be urged with just as much, or as little, truth that "arride," a verb used by Charles Lamb in the sense of to please, is obsolete. It is coming into fairly frequent use again, it is true, but the word is not met very often.
The new dictionary records its use by Lamb.

Is this not a case where a later author's name might have been also given? By the way, if one may judge by Ben Jonson's definition of it in Every Man Out of His Humour, the word was then not much known.

The definition of the decadents as a "school in modern French literature not distinguished for vigour or originality" shows Scotch combativeness, as well as a lack of fulness. Max Nordau and Tolstoi are much more comprehensive. What about the English decadents? Has none of them been original? The abundance of Scotch words tends to show, perhaps, that Chambers's has more sympathy with the Kailyard. It reminds me of the curt dismissal of Nietzsche, by a certain biographical dictionary, as a madman, a useful word—or one like it—for a British jury of twelve. "Documentation" is given under "document," but not its specific sense derived from the hackneyed phrase, the "human document," of the Goncourts.

Similarly, "motivation" is found, a word that Mr. Archer has borrowed from the German—ho talks of the "motivation" of a play. The adjective "concinuous," harmonious, is not stated to be rare, though the Century Dictionary says it is. Mr. Grant Allen recently spoke of Horace's "nice concinnity," and the latest dictionary has the word. It also has a pet word of Stevenson's—"aleatory," i.e., depending on a contingent event.

Current slang is represented in Chambers's. There is no attempt at the etymology of "oof." The editor might have added to the gaiety of the dictionary by citing the fanciful derivation from the Latin ovum, an egg, the reference being to the goose that laid the golden eggs. Under "salvation" we might have had "Salvation Sally," for a Salvation Army girl. "Bouncer" is found, but not the more expressive Americanism, "bounder." The bounder, by the way, was not known to the New English Dictionary a dozen years ago. But Mr. Walkley, in Cosmopolis, says that "we in England are apt to call Molière's young men 'bounders,' and his young maidens 'dolls.'" One looks in vain for Mr. Lang's "boomster." However, we get both "boom" and "slump." We find to prig, meaning to steal. But though the dictionary has "snaffling-lay," the trade of highwayman, it does not give Mr. Kipling's "snaffle," which means to steal. Besides the "crib" of the lazy schoolboy, we have, with the same meaning, "trot," "horse," and "pony." As early as 1818, Greville, in his famous Memoirs, writes: "He is equally well amused whether the play is high or low, but the stake he prefers is fives and ponies"—slang, of course, for £25. By a pony is also sometimes meant a small glass of beer. But "crib," as slang for a situation, is not mentioned. It is curious that "mouse" should mean both a term of familiar endearment and a black-eye. The word is used in the former sense in "Hamlet": "Let the bloot king . . . call you his mouse." There are many zoological terms of endearment—chick, duck, dove, lamb. The New English Dictionary notes that Browning uses "dove" as a transitive verb—"loved you and doved you." "Dump," as a colloquial term for a small coin (so used by Mr. Birrell), and "dumps," money in general, are curious modern usages.

We do not get the American "boodle" or "Boodler," both of which are coming into use in London, even without the safeguard of inverted commas, in the sense of "gain from public cheating of any kind," and a man who lives by such plunder. The New English Dictionary says that boodle = sinews of war; "soap" may be a different word from "buddle." From the Century we get the useful suggestion that the seventeenth-century "buddle" may have been taken, with other slang, from the Dutch, in Elizabeth's time.

In the United States they also have the expressive "caboodle." We have "thick" defined as a colloquial word meaning in fast friendship. We might have had the vulgarism, "thick," or "too thick." An unfortunate story teller is quoted by the ACADEMY as saying that one of his stories was considered by a publisher too "thick."

It will arride journalists to find "newsy," a word sanctioned by Mr. Frederick Locker-Lampson. But they will not find "leaderette," which Mr. Lang abhors. The dictionary does give "novelette," a neologism employed by Dr. Garnett to describe Peacock's short novel, Maid Marian. Mr. Fisher Unwin, it will be remembered, called one of his series of short stories Little Novels. Chambers's might have found room for Mr. Stevenson's "mingle-mangle," meaning a jumble. For the first half of the word, used as a noun, we can cite a passage in "Antony and Cleopatra." By the way, a Parliamentary descriptive writer aptly described the proceedings in the House of Commons until Easter as a "mingle-mangle." Since "danky," used by Dickens in its slang sense of a policeman's lantern, is given, why not "duffer," which Hood used, and to which Mr. Henry James has given a literary cachet? "Johnny," defined as "a simpleton or a fellow generally," is here; so is "dude." The latter bit of slang, which, the Century said, was made in London, reminds us of the Boston preacher's announcement that he would preach on "the dude Absalom." We do, however, get an occasional gleam of humour, as when the "Land o' the Leal" is defined as "the home of the blessed after death—Paradise, not Scotland." I looked with interest for the useful "labourist," which was coined by the late Prof. Minto in an article in the Nineteenth Century during the General Election of 1892. I did not find it, however. Nevertheless, Chambers's is much fuller and more scholarly than any of the cheaper English dictionaries.

M.

THE EDITOR OF THE LATE LARK.

A YEAR or two ago many literary Londoners were startled and amused and pleased by a weird esoteric periodical called the Lark, which had reached these shores from San Francisco. Certain poems and illustrations created a distinct impression—especially the celebrated "Purple Cow." The editor of the Lark was Mr. Gelett Burgess, and Mr. Gelett Burgess has just arrived in London, with the aim of getting an inside view of Fleet-street and things journalistic in England.

"Tell me about the Lark," I said to Mr. Burgess.

"To begin with, you mustn't say anything about the Purple Cow; I'm sick of it. Do you think if you tried you could keep that notorious animal out of the interview?"

"I could if I tried," I said.

"Well, do what you can. The Lark was written and illustrated by quite a small San Franciscan group, which called itself Les Jeunes. When this group scattered, having been bidden to wider spheres, the thing expired. But it ran for two years—twenty-four numbers. Bruce Porter was one of the best men on it. You will hear of him some day. By the way, he did the first statue to Stevenson that was put up in America. I used to produce most of the writing, and some of the pictures too."

"Of course, the Lark was purely whimsical?"

"Nothing of the kind. It contained a lot of serious work. All its poetry was serious. We went through, for instance, every one of the old French forms. Many people were considerably struck by the poetry; and W. D. Howells urged me to republish it in book form."

"Where did you learn to draw?"

"! ! !"

I repeated the question.

"I can't draw, but if you give me a pencil I can make something funny."

I gave him a pencil and he drew some pictures of "The Goops." Now the Goops are a race of people that the readers of St. Nicholas will know all about next year. Mr. Burgess has written and illustrated a serial entitled "Goopbabies: a Manual of Manners for Polite Infants." Some time or other he is going to write the history of Goopland.

"And after the Lark?"

"The Lark was the first of a series of magazines that I created and killed. There was Le Petit Journal des Refusées, a wild burlesque of the fad magazines which had sprung up in America. It was printed on wall paper, in a trapezoid shape, and every number was different."

"How long did that run?"

"It ran for one number."

"And then?"

"Then came Phyllida; or, the Milk Maid, a bi-weekly serious review meant to revive the manners and customs of the Tatler and the Spectator. The typography was something splendid. But it didn't go. For two reasons: First, if it had been literary, San Francisco wouldn't have bought it; and, secondly, it wasn't literary. See?"

"Perfectly."

"It ran for two numbers. Then, in partnership with Oliver Herford, the artist, I projected L'Enfant Terrible—this was in New York. We worked at it frightfully hard for two months, after which the scheme subsided. In the end I produced the first number alone, and surprised Herford by publishing it. This was a weird Bab-ballad sort of thing. Its existence was brief. That was the last of my magazines."

"And afterwards?"

"Last winter I spent in New York writing for Harper's, the Century, St. Nicholas, and some other magazines. And I published a book called Vivette—fiction—that I hope will soon be published on this side also. Finally, I came to London, partly to see the Stevensons, whom I knew very well in the Latin quarter of San Francisco, and partly to pick up experience."

"How long shall you stay here?"

"Don't know. I'm going to write."

"Write what?"

"Well, my speciality is the whimsical, imaginative, subtle, rather precious sort of essay and story—essentially whimsical. A sort of throw-the-reins-on-the-horse's-back-and-let-go style. We accomplished some tours de force with the English language in the Lark, you know—quite legitimate effects, too."

"What is your opinion of English journalism?"

Mr. Burgess retired behind his glinting spectacles and considered.

"It's too rigid—ought to be more plastic. It wants originality. In a town that starts two or three new papers every week there should be scope for the absolutely spontaneous. But I don't seem to see it yet. However, I have heard of one or two forthcoming publications that sound attractive. I'm very interested in the new Butterfly—though I never saw the old one. My idea is that some paper ought to offer an annual prize for the most original—original, mind you!—thing published during the year. People don't dare to express themselves here. Of course it must be literary, but it must also be spontaneous. Yes, I know about the ACADEMY'S annual prize. That's a splendid thing, but it doesn't cover the ground that I want to see covered. Spontaneity, that's the keynote."

E. A. B.

STEVENSON AS HUMORIST.

TEXT to not being appreciated at all, to be appreciated unintelligently must be the bitterest fate that can befall an author, and this seems to me to have been, to some extent at least, the fate of Robert Louis Stevenson. He has been acclaimed as the author of Kidnapped, he has been acclaimed as the poet of A Child's Garden of Verses. Enthusiastic people have compared him to Walter Scott, and his prose style—a very charming, though highly artificial style—has received extravagant praise from all and sundry. The only part of his writings which critics seem determined to pass over in silence or contempt is his humorous work, The Wrong Box, The New Arabian Nights, and The Dynamiter. And yet it cannot be denied that in these Stevenson showed himself possessed of a really individual vein of humour which was copied from no one, which was fresh and spontaneous and original, and, in fact, everything which his mannered artificial romances were not. I am not concerned here with depreciating any portion of Stevenson's work, or denying it the merits which it unquestionably possesses. Indeed, it would be absurd to ignore the merit of such a book as Treasure Island on the one hand, or of stories like "Will o' the Mill," "Markheim," or "The Pavilion on the Links" on the other: I am only concerned in pointing out the curious fact that, in the chorus of praise which has been lavished upon Stevenson, that portion of his work which is most original, which is most individual, has met with least recognition. Stevenson's essays are charming as the expression of a sane, courageous, good-humoured attitude towards life, but it would never astonish me to find that somebody else had written, or was writing, just such essays. The New Arabian Nights and The Dynamiter, on the contrary, are unique in literature. Prince Florizel and the young man with the cream tarts, Zero and the Fair Cuban, are Stevenson's creations. They belong to a world of their own. No one else before him ever thought of drawing such people, and no one can do so in the future, except as a mere imitator. Again, it is the fashion to decry or ignore The Wrong Box. Yet no one else before ever wrote a book quite in that genre or imagined the convention which made such a book possible. We have had plenty of farces on the stage, and the farcical convention, in the theatre at least, is well understood. But no one save Stevenson ever conceived the idea of writing a novel which should be pure farce from beginning to end, and only a humorist of the highest order could have carried out that idea successfully. A single touch of seriousness in the book would have marred the whole. Its absurdity is its sole justification, and Stevenson, with astonishing skill, kept up its farcical extravagance and its exquisite unreality to the last.

The book is so little read that it may be worth while to sketch the outline of its plot, if only that my readers may recognise what Stevenson called its "judicious levity." Joseph and Masterman Finsbury are the sole survivors of a "tontine" of thirty-seven lives. Whichever of them outlives the other will come in for thirty-seven thousand pounds, plus compound interest for some sixty years. The expectant legatees of each are naturally eager that their candidate should live longest. There is a railway accident, and Morris Finsbury believes that his Uncle Joseph, whose leather business he manages and practically owns, has perished in it. More than that, he identifies what he believes to be his corpse by its clothes. He determines, however, to pretend that Uncle Joseph is still alive, hoping that when Masterman dies in due course he may be able to claim the Tontine. So, with the help of his brother John, he packs the corpse in a water-butt, and sends it by train to his London house. But by the same train travels a packing-case containing a gigantic statue of Hercules, consigned to W. D. Pitman, artist, which has been smuggled over from Italy. A mischievous person changes the labels in the guard's van, and Morris, on returning to town, finds his hall blocked with a giant packing-case, containing a hideous but valuable antique, while the water-butt, he learns at the station, has gone to W. D. Pitman. Morris hacks the incriminating statue to pieces with the coal axe and buries it in the garden. Pitman, with the fear of the police before his eyes, endeavours to dispose of the corpse. With this in view, he consults a friendly solicitor, Michael Finsbury, who chances to be none other than the only son of Masterman, the other survivor of the Tontine. Michael concocts the absurd plan of transferring the corpse to the inside of a Broadwood grand piano, and leaving it, with that instrument, in some chambers in the Temple of which he chances to possess a key. Matters are further complicated by the fact that Morris Finsbury has persuaded himself that Masterman is really dead, and that Michael, who declines to produce him for inspection, is only pretending that he is still alive in order to secure the Tontine, while, to add to his troubles, Morris can get no money from the bank, since the account is in Uncle Joseph's name, and he can get none from the moribund leather business, because that also nominally belongs to Uncle Joseph.

More of the plot need not be disclosed, but it may be said that the book keeps up its level of fantastic absurdity to the end. Nor is its humour merely the humour of incident. The characterisation is admirable, and the style is not merely charming (as all Stevenson's writing is), but is informed with a good humour and high spirits which are irresistible. This is how, in the parallel columns familiar to lovers of Robinson Crusoe, the unhappy Morris sums up his position when he finds that his water-butt containing the body of his uncle has been sent to Pitman:

"BAD. GOOD.

1. I have lost my uncle's body. 1. But then I no longer require to bury it.

2. I have lost the Tontine. 2. But I may still save that if Pitman disposes of the body, and I can find a physician who will stick at nothing.

3. I have lost the leather business and the rest of my uncle's succession. 3. But not if Pitman gives the body up to the police.

'Oh! but in that case I go to jail; I had forgot that,' interpolates Morris, and begins again:

BAD. GOOD.

3. I have lost the leather business and the rest of my uncle's succession. 3. But not if I can find a physician who will stick at nothing.

'This venal doctor seems quite a desideratum, he reflects. 'I want him first to give me a certificate that my uncle is dead, so that I may get the leather business; and then that he's alive—but here we are again at incompatible interests!' and he returned to his tabulation:

BAD. GOOD.

4. I have almost no money. 4. But there is plenty in the bank.

BAD.

5. Yes; but I can't get the money in the bank.

6. I have left the bill for £800 in Uncle Joseph's pocket.

7. Yes; but if Pitman is dishonest and finds the bill, he will know who Joseph is, and he may blackmail me.

8. But I can't blackmail Michael (which is, besides, a very dangerous thing to do) until I find out.

9. The leather business will soon want money for current expenses, and I have none to give.

10. Yes; but it's all the ship I have.

11. John will soon want money, and I have none to give.

12. And the venal doctor will want money down.

13. And if Pitman is dishonest, and don't send me to jail, he will want a fortune.

'Oh, this seems to be a very one-sided business,' cries Morris in conclusion."

The Wrong Box (on the title-page of which, I should have said before, Mr. Lloyd Osborne also figures) is so full of delicious nonsense that it is a temptation to quote more of it, but nothing save reading it will enable anyone to understand how delicious it is. The Dynamiter (associated with Mrs. Stevenson) is, perhaps, a little better known, but even among Stevenson lovers there are many who have never read it. And yet the scene in which Somerset visits his dynamiter lodger, and finds himself sitting with him in a room full of explosive machines which have all been set going by their desponding owner is one of the most genuinely humorous things in modern literature. Moreover, the whole idea of meeting the "ugly devil of crime" not with fiery denunciations but with the cold water of merciless ridicule, is too ingenious and, in its author's hands, too successful not to deserve due recognition. As for the exquisite absurdities of Sir John Vandeleur and his wife in "The Rajah's Diamond," readers of The New Arabian Nights will know how to appreciate them at their full worth. They are the good wine which, emphatically, needs no bush.

ST. JOHN HANKIN.

GOOD.

5. But—well, that seems unhappily to be the case.

6. But, if Pitman is only a dishonest man, the presence of this bill may lead him to keep the whole thing dark, and throw the body into the New Cut.

7. Yes; but if I am right about Uncle Masterman, I can blackmail Michael.

8. Worse luck!

9. But the leather business is a sinking ship.

10. A fact.

11.

12.

13.

DRAMA.

THE new piece at the Court is suitable to the season. It is light, airy, gossamer, and makes no strain upon the intellectual resources of the audience. "His Excellency the Governor" is in the nature of a summer entertainment, and will probably prove more acceptable at the present moment to Mr. Arthur Chudleigh's patrons than a play of heavier calibre would. Criticism, under the circumstances, may well be expected to deal gently with its defects. For defects Mr. R. Marshall's "farceical romance" undoubtedly possesses. Constructively, it lacks cohesion; the author's hold upon his subject is at times manifestly uncertain, while his desire to be brilliant at all costs occasionally leads him into tortuous by-paths, from which no issue is to be found, save at the sacrifice of good taste. The most glaring fault in the piece is, however, the author's lack of sincerity. With such scant ceremony does he treat his characters that the listener may easily be pardoned if he, too, fail to believe in them or their actions. Now, even in farce it is essential that the earnestness of those on the stage should be beyond all dispute. This is a truth perfectly understood and invariably acted upon by Mr. W. S. Gilbert, whose pupil Mr. Marshall obviously is. One conspicuous difference between the two is, however, that while Mr. Gilbert, starting from an extravagant premiss, always progresses towards a logical conclusion by consistent means, Mr. Marshall, on the contrary, too frequently allows himself to be diverted from the direct course by his love for the purely farceical. "His Excellency the Governor" starts with the promising idea that once in every hundred years an aloe, indigenous to the Amandaland Islands, bursts into blossom, producing and disseminating a yellow dust which possesses all the properties of a powerful love-philtre. This is a capital notion to begin with; it may be remembered that Mr. Gilbert himself used one not altogether dissimilar in "The Mountebanks." But in his treatment of it Mr. Marshall somehow seems to go astray, the result being a certain impression of confusion and inconsequence produced on the minds of the audience.

THE piece, notwithstanding, is just the sort of thing to provoke a couple of hours' unreflecting laughter, for it has movement, brightness, and humour. It is impossible not to grow merry over the discomfiture of the prim and precise Cabinet Minister, the Right Hon. Henry Carlton, who, under the influence of the irresistible pollen, falls a victim to the wiles of the bewitching variety artist Stella de Gex. No less droll are the adventures of the three forsworn bachelors, Sir Montagu Martin, the Governor; and Captain Carew and Mr. John Baverstock, respectively his A.D.C. and private secretary, who find themselves rivals for the hand and heart of pretty Ethel Carlton. A further complication is provided by the introduction of a fancied native rising, which in the end turns out to be dictated simply by the inhabitants' wish to do honour to the newly arrived Cabinet Minister. In all this there is ample material for merriment, although the author's skill has not always proved quite equal to its manipulation in the most profitable manner. This circumstance, coupled with an unfortunate want of preparedness on the part of some of the artists, served in no small measure to jeopardise the success of the piece. Mr. Allan Aynesworth has still to acquire greater rapidity of speech and quickness of action before his sketch of Sir Montagu can be considered satisfactory. Mr. Paul Arthur, if a little slow here and there, gave an excellent account of the part of Captain Carew, and Mr. Dion Boucicault was agreeably eccentric as Baverstock, the most effectively drawn character in the farce. Miss Irene Vanbrugh's portrait of Stella, vivacious, bright, and refreshingly impudent, was as good as could be desired, and Miss Nellie Thorne, while somewhat overburdened by the part, played very sweetly and charmingly as Ethel.

OF the various afternoon performances given during the past few days one only deserves notice. Indeed, if anything could bring the experimental matinée into further disrepute it would be the experience of the last week. "Sue," however, for many reasons stands wholly removed from the category referred to. The production of Messrs. Bret Harte and T. Edgar Pemberton's play was due less to any idea of exploiting a new drama than to a desire to show Miss Annie Russell, the American actress, in a part worthy of her powers. "Sue," an adaptation of Bret Harte's story, "The Judgment of Bolinas Plain," is an unequal piece of work, at some points impinging upon the crudest melodrama, and at others hardly to be distinguished from burlesque. But in its rough-and-ready fashion it is not without merit. In sentiment, tone, and humour the piece is eminently characteristic of many of Bret Harte's tales. The heroine is a fresh young girl, whose innocence and purity have emerged un tarnished from the roughest and coarsest associations. Driven to the step by her father, she marries a man for whom she has no real affection, only to awaken three years later to what she believes to be the great passion of her life. A strolling acrobat, as unprincipled as he is fascinating, catches her fancy, and with the impetuosity of ignorance she throws herself into his arms. But the illusion is speedily dispelled, luckily before any mischief has been done, and humiliated and repentant Sue returns to beg her husband's forgiveness. In the background of the picture may be discerned a number of familiar figures such as Bret Harte is wont to set upon his canvas: the drunken, ne'er-do-weel father, whose conversation is a mixture of acrid humour and mawkish sentiment; the good-hearted parson; the Sheriff, a coarse bully with a strange belief in his powers over the feminine heart; and Judge Lynch in company with the members of the Vigilance Committee, whose code of ethics includes murder and robbery among minor offences, but regards the slightest discourtesy to a woman as a crime punishable by death.

In many ways Miss Annie Russell is unquestionably a remarkable actress. So far as can be judged, her equipment is almost complete, save in respect of the ability to express the highest forms of emotion. Occasional glimpses there are in her performance of genuine passion, but they are neither sufficiently enduring nor sufficiently forcible to justify the belief that her powers in this direction are absolute. In scenes of simple pathos she is, however, matchless; the quality of her voice is so beautiful and so sympathetic that its appeal is irresistible. Particularly fragile, and by no means striking in appearance, it is by sheer force of her art that she eventually conquers. At the moment I can recall no English artist to whom she can be compared. Her performance, moreover, gives the impression that throughout she is acting under a certain sense of restraint; that possibly in a part yielding greater opportunities she would still further astonish us by her capabilities. For that, however, we must be content to wait. Meanwhile, she has succeeded in thoroughly establishing her position in this country, and it will be a pity if she is allowed to return to America without affording us additional proof of her talent. To the support given her in "Sue" unreserved praise is due. Seldom has so good an all-round representation been witnessed on the London stage. It is conceivable, of course, that part of the effect created is the result of novelty; the novelty inherent in a cast, entirely American, whose ways and manners differ essentially from those of English artists, with whose tricks and methods we are all only too familiar. Yet, even allowing for this, it would be unjust not to speak in high terms of the freshness and the originality of the performance.

M. W.

THE BOOK MARKET.

SHOULD STATIONERS' HALL TO BE ABOLISHED?

NOW that a Special Committee of the House of Lords is engaged in hearing evidence bearing upon the general subject of copyright, and particularly upon Lord Herschell's new Copyright Bill, we would suggest that they direct special attention to the question of registration and to the position of Stationers' Hall.

As it now stands Lord Herschell's Bill makes little or no alteration in the existing arrangements for registration. The clauses run:

"Registration.

(1) There shall be kept in the hall of the Stationers Company, by an officer (hereinafter called the Registrar) to be appointed by the Stationers Company, a book of registry wherein may be registered the proprietorship of the copyright or performing right in any literary work, or of the copyright in any artistic work or of any assignments thereof, and any assignment so entered shall be effectual in law without being subject to any stamp or duty, and shall be of the same force and effect as if such assignment had been made by deed.

(2) The fee payable to the registrar for each entry in the register shall be fixed by the Stationers Company, but shall not exceed in respect of a literary work the sum of two shillings and sixpence, and in respect of an artistic work the sum of one shilling.

(3) The book of registry shall be open at all reasonable times to public inspection on payment of the sum of one shilling.

(4) The registrar shall, whenever reasonably required, give a copy of any entry, certified under his hand and impressed with the stamp of the Stationers Company provided by them for that purpose to any person requiring the same, on payment to him of the sum of five shillings, and this certificate shall be prima facie proof of the matters therein expressed.

(5) If any person shall deem himself aggrieved by any entry made under colour of this Act in the said book of registry, it shall be lawful for such person to apply by summons to a judge in chambers in any division of the High Court of Justice for an order that such entry may be expunged or varied, and upon any such application the judge shall make such order for expunging, varying, or confirming such entry, either with or without costs as to such judge shall seem just, and the registrar shall, on the production to him of any such order, forthwith comply with the same.

(6) It shall be the duty of the registrar to notify Her Majesty's Customs forthwith, on request of the person registering, the publication of any work, and such notification shall be accepted by Her Majesty's Customs in lieu of the notice heretofore required under the Customs Consolidation Act, 39 & 40 Vict., c. 36, s. 152, without further fee.

(7) Application for registration and the entries in the register shall be in the forms set out in Schedule B hereto, with such modifications therein respectively as the Stationers Company may from time to time prescribe."

Was there ever a more useless and vexatious system? Registration is not compulsory, generally not necessary. The omission to register does not affect copyright, but it does affect the right to bring an action for infringement of that copyright. The registration of a title at Stationers' Hall gives no right over that title, though there seems to be a very general opinion that such is the case. Registration prior to publication offers absolutely no protection, but registration can take place at any time subsequent to publication—indeed, whenever it is desired to bring an action for infringement. In a word, registration, which might easily be a help to author, publisher, and bookseller, is a useless annoyance.

Compulsory registration would, we think, be a boon to all concerned. At present it is impossible to fix accurately the date of publication of any book, and this date is of the utmost importance when arranging for simultaneous publication in order to secure copyright in the United States. And a register of titles is sorely needed. It is impossible to discover whether a title has been used before, and the law is perfectly incomprehensible when it attempts to deal with the right—if any—conferred upon the user of a title. A system of what may well be called blackmail has flourished of late years, and authors and publishers have incurred heavy losses by cancelling whole editions of books under the threat of an action for infringement of title—an action which would have failed in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. The present arrangement of registration at Stationers' Hall lends itself to this confusion. It is not necessary to show a complete copy of a book or periodical in order to register its title, and we have little doubt that many of the publications entered at Stationers' Hall have never been offered to the public.

The remedy for this chaos is, we think, apparent. Why should not the British Museum take over the work of Stationers' Hall? If we remember rightly, such a step was strongly recommended by the Royal Commissioners, but Lord Herschell has ignored the suggestion. Yet it would not be difficult to bring it into operation. The British Museum authorities have everything necessary ready to hand. They've got the men, they've got the books, and they've got the money too. The compulsory delivery to the British Museum, not to mention the other libraries, of a copy of every book and new edition issued has long been one of the standing grievances of the publisher; but if the British Museum did the work, and more than the work, of Stationers' Hall, he would be compensated for his trouble. Why should not the official receipt of this copy be taken as a certificate of registration of copyright? We have compulsory delivery, and compulsory registration follows without any difficulty. At present, literary copyright is an "indefinite property," as one writer on the subject puts it. Compulsory registration at the British Museum would do much to make it more "definite." But Stationers' Hall is an antiquated absurdity.

THE SALE OF SURPLUS LIBRARY NOVELS.

THERE is evidently considerable difference of opinion as to the general effect of circulating libraries on the sale of books, but we fancy authors, publishers, and booksellers will be unanimous in condemning the new system of selling surplus library novels, which, we understand, is to come into operation at Mudie's Library. It is stated that "when the first pressure of demand for any popular novel has begun to slacken, the cleaner copies are to be called in, re-bound, and sold at half price." This practically means that, in future, what is to all intents and purposes a new six-shilling novel will be obtainable for three shillings a short time after publication. Messrs. Mudie are compelled to dispose of their surplus stock, but books have hitherto figured in their catalogues only some considerable time after publication, and they have been sold in the original covers, which are, generally, in a decidedly second-hand condition. If by waiting a week or two—and the "first pressure of demand" only lasts longer than this in very exceptional cases—one is able to save one and sixpence on a six-shilling book—i.e., pay three shillings for what would cost four and sixpence at the booksellers', this arrangement is likely to meet with considerable success. But the publishers, and especially the Publishers' Association, ought to offer a strong and immediate protest. These large libraries seldom do much to create special demand among their readers; they supply as their subscribers order. If they are determined to hinder the sale of new books, it behoves the publisher to make such arrangements with them as will preclude them from offering books at terms with which no bookseller can hope to compete.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ORIENTAL PROSODY.

SIR,—With reference to the metres employed by the poets of Persia and Araby in their compositions, the following, to my knowledge, are the best known metrical forms in use :

Besit  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{\vee} \overset{\vee}{\vee}$
 Kamil  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Wâfir  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Tawil  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Munsarih  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Mutekârib  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Chaffif  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-}$
 Madid  $\overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} \overset{\vee}{-} | \overset{\vee}{\vee} \overset{\vee}{\vee}$

Strictly speaking, these are Arabian measures, the Tawil being a favourite one with the rhymsters of that country. Perhaps I may be permitted to add, in passing, that that what distinguishes Arabic from Persian poetry is a healthful sobriety of tone and its purity. With less imagination than the Persian, the Arab is the better artist of the two. He is no spouter, to begin with; no sententious wine-bibber, tolling you in slipshod rhymes: "Sit thee down on the lawn with a pretty girl and a gallon (min) of wine by thy side, and thou art a Sufi." The poets of Arabia are more reserved in their expressions. Their legitimate wives are as often as not the heroines of their songs. "As I was riding along in the night," sings Abu Bekr, "the sight of the moon made me think of thee, and I was so overcome by my feelings that I told the driver to turn back with the animals, and here I am myself." These lines are addressed by the poet to his wife Salihâ, of whom he was passionately fond. Another poet, Amru Ben Hakim, says of his sweetheart Charka: "If she would only stay with us here from end of the year to the other, what would I care about the spring? She would be spring to me." This is as good as a madrigal. Their heroic songs are full of spirit, especially when love is the question. Says Djemil Ben Abdallah to his intended: "The men of thy tribe, O Botheina! had vowed to kill me. What a pity it is that they did not try it. As soon as they saw me appearing on the top of the hill, they asked one another, Who is that man? pretending not to know me. Welcome! said they to me. God be with you." Some of their dirges are full of sentiment. Here is what a daughter says in remembering her dead father: "When I happen to hear the name Ali called out, I tremble and shiver like the she-camel that has lost her little one when the voice of the driver bids her go to him."

I refrain from further quotation, for fear of trespassing unduly upon your valuable space. It is quite a relief to turn from Hafiz and Omar Khâyyam to the lyrics of the warrior poets of Araby.

THOMAS DELTA.

June 13, 1898.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The Destroyer" By Benjamin Swift. (Fisher Unwin.) THE Saturday Review devotes a column and a half to explaining how The Destroyer is "really not at all a good novel." Having acknowledged the merit of the author's style and his skill in phrasing-making, the critic proceeds:

"But it would be unphilosophical to speak as if Mr. Swift might have written a vivid story if he had not been hampered by the possession of a style. It is nearer the truth to say that his style is the natural concomitant of the reason not of vision, it is the language of commentary rather than of presentation. Let us, as a little example, take the sentence, 'Soon enough they would be thinking that each was sitting in the dust of beauty's and each other's disdain.' It is just what they would not be thinking. Only a time would come when the woman would wear a look, or, in sitting down, entering the room, leaving it, make certain motions which it is the novelist's duty to discover; when the man would say something, meaningless perhaps, and get an answer, also perhaps meaningless, and both would think something very actual and not at all abstract or explanatory, all of which things the novelist should delight in discovering; and then the whole scene, or set of scenes, should move the reader who is of an analytical turn of mind to make some such comment as 'they are sitting in the dust of beauty's and each other's disdain.'"

As to the theme ("Love the Destroyer")—Mr. Swift, in fact, does not know what to do with his bogey idea, it only lies about and makes him solemn. There is, also, a certain significance in the fact that the only portion of the book which is at all moving comes early, before the bogey has yet exerted its blighting influence.

In a parenthesis occurs this remarkable utterance:

"Mr. Swift's book is of the kind that is so unreal that every time the reader comes across anything so harmless and necessary as a Christian name he receives a fresh shock."

"As cleverly written as any story that has been published for many a long day," writes the St. James's. But:

"Is it really necessary for our cleverest young writers to go astray after sheer epilepsy in their struggles for new motives in modern fiction? . . . The shade of Dr. Bede, the mad doctor, is over this volume. It is a long study in epilepsy. Lombroso and Maeterlinck (to the latter of whom the book is dedicated) are its inspiration. Horrible! But when all is said, and this moan duly made, the conception—repulsive as it is—is finely carried out, and with a master hand. The characters of Edgar, Sir Saul, Lady Rimmon, Violet, Miriam, and her mother are all true sketches. The moral struggles in each case are truly gauged and described. Such cleverness, with such material, is appalling."

The Chronicle, comparing the work with its predecessors, Nancy Noon and The Tormentor, pronounces it "thinner in theme, more obvious in intention, and less distinguished in style than they."

"If we appear to have been hard upon Mr. Swift it is because we have judged him by high standards. Judged by ordinary standards, he would come off quite triumphant. He is not an ordinary novelist by any means; there is not a page of ordinary writing in the volume. There is always a pleasant flavour of originality about him, even when he is least original. If all his characters are not interesting, they are all real enough. There are no dolls in the story. The drama is vibrant with life all through.

"In fine [writes the critic], there is better work here than in The Tormentor, better work and fewer blemishes. But it is not so good a book. There is a place in the front rank waiting for Mr. Swift, but he will have to work his way to it. In spite of this disappointment our faith that he will work his way to it remains unshaken."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, June 16.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE ABIDING STRENGTH OF THE CHURCH. Four Sermons by the Rev. R. S. Mynne. Elliot Stock. 3s. 6d.

THE DIVINITY OF JESUS CHRIST, FROM PASCAL. A Commentary by W. B. Morris. Burns & Oates. 3s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

"FAMOUS SCOTS" SERIES: WILLIAM DUNBAR. By Oliphant Smeaton. Oliphant, Anderson & Co. 1s. 6d.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM TERRISS. By Arthur J. Smythe. With an Introduction by Clement Scott. A. Constable & Co. 12s. 6d.

CHRISTIAN ROME. By Eugène de la Gournerie. Translated by the Hon. Lady Macdonald. London: P. Rolandi.

THE HISTORY OF THE TEMPLE. By G. Pitt Lewes. John Long. 1s. 6d.

POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES.

THE REVELATION OF ST. LOVE THE DIVINE. By F. B. Money Coutts. John Lane. 3s. 6d.

PERSEPHONE, AND OTHER POEMS. By C. C. Tarelli. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.

MATHEW ARNOLD. Papers of the English Club at Sewanee. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BALLADS AND POEMS. By Members of the Glasgow Ballad Club. Second series. W. Blackwood & Sons. 7s. 6d.

ART.

- ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1898. Cassell & Co. 7s. 6d.
- ENGLISH CONTEMPORARY ART. By Robert de la Sizeranne. Translated by H. M. Poynter. A. Constable & Co. 12s.
- THE BIBLE OF ST. MARK. ST. MARK'S CHURCH, THE ALTAR AND THRONE OF VENICE. By Alexander Robertson. George Allen. 10s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- TRAVELS AND LIFE IN ASHANTI AND JAMAN. By R. A. Freeman. A. Constable & Co. 21s.
- SOUTH AMERICAN SKETCHES. By R. Crawford. Longmans & Co. 6s.
- GUIDE TO SUSSEX. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncreiff. A. & C. Black

EDUCATIONAL.

- LECTURES ON THE GEOMETRY OF POSITION. By Theodor Reye. Translated and edited by T. F. Holgate. Part I. New York: The Macmillan Co. 10s.
- HISTORICAL ENGLISH AND DERIVATION. By J. C. Nesfield. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
- THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND EXAMINATION PAPERS. Dublin University Press.
- ENGLISH PROSE. Part I. By J. Logie Robertson. W. Blackwood & Sons. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- FOOTSTEPS IN HUMAN PROGRESS: A SHORT SERIES OF LETTERS TO A FRIEND. By James Samuelson. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 2s. 6d.
- HYMNS AND HYMN MAKERS. By Rev. Duncan Campbell. A. & C. Black.
- ELECTRICITY IN TOWN AND COUNTRY HOMES. By Percy E. Scutton.
- THE WONDERFUL CENTURY. By Alfred Russell Wallace. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 7s. 6d.
- THE MUSIC DRAMAS OF WAGNER. By Albert Lavignac. Translated by Esther Singleton. Service & Paton. 10s. 6d.
- THE MISTAKES WE MAKE. Compiled by C. E. Clark. C. A. Pearson. 1s. 6d.
- THE SHAKESPEARE REFERENCE BOOK. Selected and arranged by J. Stevenson Webb. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d.
- PRICES OF BOOKS. By Henry B. Wheatley. The Library Series. George Allen. 6s.
- NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.
- THE SPECTATOR. Edited by G. Gregory Smith. Vol. VII. J. M. Dent & Co. 3s.
- MADÉLON LEMOINE. By Mrs. Leith Adams. Jarrold & Sons. 3s. 6d.
- FOREIGN CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS: VOLTAIRE. By Gen. Sir Edward Hamley. DANTE. By Mrs. Oliphant. W. Blackwood & Sons. 1s.
- THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS. By George Meredith. A. Constable & Co. 6s.
- OUR FATHERS TOLD US. By John Ruskin. George Allen. 5s.
- RENAISSANCE IN ITALY. The Catholic Reaction. In two parts. By John Addington Symonds. Smith, Elder & Co. 15s.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

FROM the Clarendon Press next week will be issued The Parallel Psalter, being the Prayer Book version of the Psalms and a new version arranged in parallel columns, with a critical introduction and glossaries by Canon Driver. The Regius Professor explains that he has endeavoured in his translation (which is intended, in the first instance, for the use of readers not conversant with Hebrew) "to avoid a needless and unidiomatic literalism; at the same time, precision, rather than literary excellence, has been his primary aim."

MR. JOHN LANE announces for publication at an early date Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge's volume of poems, mainly lyrical. Mr. Coleridge's name will be remembered in connexion with the collected edition of his grandfather's letters, which Mr. William Heinemann issued in 1895, also with the volume of selections from Coleridge's notebooks, entitled Anima Poetæ. Mr. Murray's new edition of Lord Byron's Poetical Works, the first volume of which appeared in April last, at present claims Mr. Coleridge's attention.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will publish on Monday a translation by Mr. D. N. Smith of M. Brunetière's Essays in French Literature; also a new novel by Mr. W. S. Maugham, author of Liza of Lambeth, called The Making of a Saint.

THE article on "Mr. Gladstone as Seen from Near at Hand," by the Dean of Lincoln—in the July number of Good Words—will be followed by a Communion hymn by Mr. Gladstone, of which only two verses have appeared in print. The hymn has been placed at the Editor's disposal by the kindness of Mrs. Gladstone, who specially desires that "its first appearance in entire and original form should be in the magazine which first published his 'Impregnable Rock.'"

The Place Names of the Liverpool District, by Mr. Henry Harrison, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will give the history and meaning of the local river names of South-West Lancashire and of the peninsula of Wirral.

THE July number of the Pall Mall Magazine will contain the first of a series of articles by Mr. Clark Russell on "The Ship: Her Story," tracing the evolution of the modern man-of-war and ocean liner from their beginnings in the "dug-out" of the pre-historic savage. Mr. Seppings Wright will supply the illustrations.

Good Will, edited on Christian Socialist lines by the Rev. the Hon. James Adderley, will in future be published by Messrs. Wells, Gardner & Co.

MESSRS. W. THACKER & Co. have in preparation an édition de luxe of Mr. Kipling's Departmental Ditties.

THE July number of The Humanitarian will contain an article on "The Human Character" by Prof. Paul Mantegazza, the well-known Italian Sociologist. The magazine will in future be published by Messrs. Duckworth.

ELLIOT STOCK'S
NEW BOOKS.

In crown 8vo, handsomely printed and bound, with 4 Full-Page Illustrations, price 3s. 6d.

THE ABIDING STRENGTH of the CHURCH. Four Sermons preached in the Cathedral Church of Bangor, at the request of the Very Rev. the Dean, by the Rev. R. S. MYLNE, M.A., B.C.L., F.S.A. With a Preface by the Rev. H. A. JAMES, D.D., Head Master of Rugby.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

THE SHAKESPEARE REFERENCE BOOK. Being some Quotations from Shakespeare's Plays. Selected and Arranged by J. STENSON WEBB.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 6s.

DANTE at RAVENNA: a Study.

By CATHERINE MARY PHILLIMORE, Author of "Studies in Italian Literature," "The Warrior Medici," "Fra Angelico," "Selections from the Sermons of Padre Agostina Da Montefeltro," &c.

"The outcome of enthusiasm and scholarship..... will be heartily welcomed by the lovers of Dante."—Globe.

"All lovers of Dante will welcome this unpretending but careful and interesting work, which reveals to us practically all that is known about those lean years of exile when Florence had closed her gates on her most illustrious citizen."—Daily Chronicle.

"An interesting account of Ravenna in the fourteenth century and Dante's life there.... sympathetically written."—Glasgow Herald.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

The GROWTH and INFLUENCE of MUSIC in RELATION to CIVILISATION. By HENRY TIPPER.

"The author's sketches of what we may call the musical history of the world, and his monographs of the great composers, are skilful pieces of literary work."—Baptist.

"A very welcome volume. It gives a very clear and succinct narrative of the development of the musical art."—Aberdeen Free Press.

WITH A PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAIT TAKEN BY MILLET'S SON-IN-LAW.

In demy 8vo, cloth, 6s.

J. F. MILLET and RUSTIC ART.

By HENRY NAEGELY (HENRY GAELYN), Author of "The Mummer, and other Poems."

"The author is a thinker who can interest, and has introduced new matter in connection with the life of Millet."—Magazine of Art.

"With a pleasant discursiveness the author sets before us the surroundings in which the artist pursued his toilsome career, with comments upon his pictures, and here and there the filling up of gaps. Such a saying as this, which we think has not been recorded in previous memoirs, we are glad to have preserved, because it is characteristic of the man."—Literary World.

"We sincerely congratulate the author upon the result of his labours. He gives us a most vivid picture of a great personality, and tells, in a manner which fascinates the reader, the tragic story of his life, with its terrible struggles and disappointments."—St. George.

CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 1s. 6d.

ANGLING DAYS, and ANGLER'S

BOOKS. By JONATHAN DALE (J. E. PAGE), Author of "The Keynote of Life," "The Surrender of Religion," &c.

"A book that soothes, and pleases, and puts one in a better temper with the world."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"A very attractive volume."—Nature Notes.

In cloth boards, price 2s. 6d.

TWO CONVERSATIONS' on the FIELD and BY-PATHS, &c., of the ANCIENT VILLAGE of BYTON-on-DUNSMORE in the COUNTY of WARWICK. With Map and Illustrations. Edited by ALFRED STARKEY, Author of "Sardanapalus Smith," "Religio Clerici," &c.

In crown 8vo, price 2s.

SCIENTIFIC METHOD in BIOLOGY. By Dr. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Mr. UNWIN is pleased to announce that the First Impression of 10,000 Copies of Mr. GEORGE MOORE'S New Novel, EVELYN INNES, is now ready, and can be obtained at all Booksellers', price 6s.—Also, a Romance of Pitcairn Island, by LOUIS BECKE and WALTER JEFFERY, entitled THE MUTINEER, has just been issued in "Unwin's Green Cloth Library," price 6s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

TALKS WITH MR. GLADSTONE.

By the Hon. L. A. TOLLEMACHE,

Author of "Benjamin Jowett," "Safe Studies," &c.

With a Portrait of Mr. Gladstone. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Reams have been written about Mr. Gladstone within the last few weeks, but no sketch of him can approach in vividness and veracity such records as Mr. Tollemache preserves to us of his casual conversations upon everything under the sun."

GLOBE.—"In these pages everybody, whatever his political opinions, will find much to interest him, for the 'talks' over an enormous amount of ground, from the human conception of time and place to the merits and demerits of 'Dizzy.'"

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 37, Bedford Street.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.
6s. net, claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."
"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
"Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

|  |                      |
|--|----------------------|
| BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.                              | THE CHANNEl ISLANDS. |
| THE NORTH WALES COAST.                                   | THE ISLE of WIGHT.   |
| BRECON and its BEACONS.                                  | THE WYE VALLEY.      |
| ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.                             | THE SEVERN VALLEY.   |
| BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.             |                      |
| BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.        |                      |
| LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETTWSYCOED and SNOWDON.        |                      |
| ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH and ABERDOVEY.        |                      |
| BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH and PwLLHELI.     |                      |
| MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM. |                      |
| LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.             |                      |

NOTICE.

On JULY 1st will be Issued an ENLARGED EDITION, 5s.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

(By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.)

With Descriptions of the Tate Gallery, Passmore Edwards Settlement, Blackwall Tunnel, &c., and an additional Index of 4,500 References to Places of Interest.]

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

PARIS SALON, 1898.

IMPORTANT WORK FOR SALE.

PORTRAIT OF VICTOR BAILLOT.

AGED 105 YEARS,

LAST SURVIVOR OF WATERLOO.

Painted by the French Military Painter,
PAUL GROLLERON.

Mention Honorable, 1882.

Médaille 3e Classe, 1886.

Médaille Bronze Exposition Universelle, 1889.

Médaille 2e Classe, 1894, Hors Concours.

VICTOR BAILLOT fought under Marshal Davout at the Siege of Hamburg; was made Prisoner at Waterloo by the English; died at Corisey, 3rd February, 1898, aged 105 years.

Portrait was painted last year (life size), canvas 8 ft. x 6½. The intellect of the old warrior was preserved, and his hair grey, not white. He wears a dark jacket and trousers, with blue gaiters: seated on an old yellow cushion, with the yellow bed-curtain as back ground—a plaster bust of Napoleon I. on the old chest of drawers and he wears his Legion of Honour decorations and Medal of St. Helena.

The Painting has been most favourably noticed by the Art Critics in Paris and London.

Address, J. M. R., care of the Publishers of "THE ACADEMY,"
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

EPPS'S COCOAINE

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa are being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES EPPS & CO., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

"8000 words
a day with ease."

W. R. Bradlaugh.

Once a gold pen has been selected, the writer finds he is spared the recurring annoyance and regret of losing its services when he has become thoroughly used to it. "I have written with it half a dozen or more volumes, a large number of essays, etc., and a thousand of letters."

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Send for descriptive
Catalogue, or call:

Mable, Todd & Bard,

Manufacturers of Gold

Nibs and the Swan

Fountain Pen,

93, Cheapside;

95, Regent Street, London;

and

3, Exchange Street,

Manchester.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1364.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1898.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

SECOND-HAND BOOKS.—CATALOGUE, No. 9, Interesting Miscellanies, being recent Purchases.—Post free from Geo. A. POYNOKA, The Bookshop, Reading.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 34, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, BELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.—Address, Miss E. M., 18, Mertimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses E. & J. PUTZ, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY OFFICE, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Falling, Bolting or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIVE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE CO., LD., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO PER CENT. ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAYENSCROFT Manager.

UNIVERSITY of ABERDEEN.

LECTURESHIP IN HISTORY.

The University Court will, at a meeting in July, proceed to APPOINT, under Ordinance No. 17, a LECTURER in HISTORY for a period of Five Years, from 1st October ensuing. The Lecturer will be required to reside in Aberdeen during each Winter Session (October to March inclusive). The salary will be £200 yearly.

Particulars may be obtained from the SECRETARY, with whom applications, along with fifteen copies of testimonials, should the Candidate think fit to submit any, are to be lodged on or before 15th proximo.

ROBERT WALKER, M.A., Secretary.

University of Aberdeen,
14th June, 1898.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT NORMAL MASTER and ASSISTANT LECTURER on EDUCATION.

Applications, accompanied by testimonials, must be sent on or before Wednesday, 8th July, 1898, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars can be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

June, 1898.

THE WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT.

CARDIFF SCHEME.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the post of HEAD MASTER for the CARDIFF INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL for BOYS.

Intending Applicants may obtain particulars of the Appointment from the CLERK to the Governors, who will also supply copies of the Scheme.

Applications, accompanied by not less than four recent Testimonials, and marked on cover "Head Master," must be in the hands of the undersigned not later than Saturday, the 9th July next.

By Order of the Governors,

DAVID SHEPHERD, Clerk.

1, Frederick Street, Cardiff,
June 7th, 1898.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, FRIDAY, and SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 6, 7, and 8, 1898.

FIRST SEAT SINGLE TICKET (Ground Floor only)
Morning £1 1 0

FIRST SEAT SINGLE TICKET (Ground Floor only)
Evening 0 15 0

Plaza open in the Festival Office, on Monday next, June 27, and following days, at 10 a.m.

SERIAL TICKETS have all been SOLD.

Second Seats cannot be purchased before September, and will not then be guaranteed, except for Saturday Night.

All applications for First Seat Single Tickets, as above, must be accompanied by a remittance for the full value of the Tickets required.

Cheques and Orders payable to

FRED. R. SPARK, J.P.,
Hon. Sec.

Festival Office,
42, Great George Street, Leeds.

PASTELS by T. HERBERT MCNAIR.—EXHIBITION NOW OPEN at Mr. R. GUTEKUNST'S GALLERY, 18, King Street, St. James's S.W. Admission, including Catalogue, One Shilling.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeking Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. O. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street, London E.C.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS OF ART and BELLES

LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent. The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs. Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.O.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Rev. the LORD RISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo., price 21s.; to Members, 18s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
RUSSIAN, AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

PARIS SALON, 1898.

IMPORTANT WORK FOR SALE.

PORTRAIT OF VICTOR BAILLOT.

AGED 105 YEARS,

LAST SURVIVOR OF WATERLOO.

Painted by the French Military Painter,
PAUL GROLLERON.

Mention Honorable, 1882.

Médaille 3e Classe, 1886.

Médaille Bronze Exposition Universelle, 1889.

Médaille 2e Classe, 1894, Hors Concours.

VICTOR BAILLOT fought under Marshal Davout at the siege of Hamburg; was made Prisoner at Waterloo by the English; died at Corsey, 3rd February, 1893, aged 105 years.

Portrait was painted last year (life size), canvas 5 ft. x 6½. The intellect of the old warrior was preserved, and his hair grey, no white. He wears a dark jacket and trousers, with blue gaiter seated on an old yellow cushion, with the yellow bed-curtain as background—a plaster bust of Napoleon I. on the old chest of drawers and he wears his Legion of Honour decorations and Medal of St. Helena.

The Painting has been most favourably noticed by the Art Critics in Paris and London.

Address, J. M. R., care of the Publishers of "THE ACADEMY"
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

should have left it to the French Public. The British Public could have done very well without it. But no: Mr. Levin Carnac said to himself, "We will just modify the tale a bit. We will just bowdlerise and improve it a little." So, if you please, he turns Florence Marquès into the sister-in-law, instead of the step-daughter, of Valfon; and the trick is done. And "ma fille" becomes "my sister"; "ma mère" becomes "my sister"; "ma sœur" becomes "my aunt"; "mon frère" becomes "my nephew." Isn't it monstrous? And isn't it silly? And how would Alphonse Daudet have liked it, if he had lived to know?

It seems to us that the copyright law might profitably be enlarged, to contain a clause making this sort of literary outrage felonious.

THE ABERRATIONS OF DEMOCRACY.

Unforeseen Tendencies of Democracy. By Edwin Lawrence Godkin. (Westminster: Archibald Constable & Co.)

MODERN democracy has a curious aptitude for falsifying the predictions of its earlier patrons and critics. To read the confident opinions of the writers in the Federalist or even of Tocqueville, as to what was going to happen in the United States, and then to consider what has actually happened, is a chastening corrective to undue intellectual pride. Mr. Godkin, who is one of the ablest and most acute of living American publicists, is doing for the political system of the United States what Walter Bagehot did for that of England. He penetrates below the surface and shows how vast is the distance which separates the theory from the practice of government. Customs and institutions which have never been formally recognised by the Constitution are, in fact, of more vital importance than others which occupy the largest space in the statute books and the text books. In England, for instance, the Cabinet is a body still quite unknown to the law, and till recently almost ignored by constitutional writers. Yet it is not too much to say that, in the actual working of our system of legislation and administration, the Cabinet counts for more than Parliament, and more than the Crown; it is, in reality, the mainspring of our whole apparatus of law-making and governing. Similarly, in the United States, the Constitution has nothing to do with the "primary" or local meeting of electors who select candidates for public office. Yet, as Mr. Godkin demonstrates, it is on the primary that everything else depends; and it is this voluntary meeting of private citizens which controls the destiny of the country and the choice of its rulers, far more than those electoral colleges, on which the framers of the American Constitution expended so much thought and laborious ingenuity. But the primaries themselves are only intended to lead up to the "nominating convention," or meeting of party delegates, which is supposed to select the candidate for the presidency. The establishment and growth of the convention, says Mr. Godkin, constitute the capital fact of modern democracy in America; but he points out that "there is no mention or allusion, either in Tocqueville or in any of our early writers, to its probable or possible effect. One finds no allusion to it in any of the commentators on the Constitution, early or late." It is, indeed, only in comparatively recent years that the overwhelming importance of the "machine" in American politics has become apparent, not merely to foreigners, but to the citizens of the United States themselves.

Like most Americans of culture and educated intelligence, Mr. Godkin is against the "machine." But, unlike many of his countrymen, he is not disposed to regard its existence as the result either of the incurable vices of democracy or of the natural imperfections of the Constitution. Some changes in the law may be required to abolish the "boss"; but, after all, what gives the boss his power? Mainly the indisposition of the better sort of electors to mingle in the rough work of politics and take part in the primary meetings in their respective localities; and the reason for this is—so Mr. Godkin thinks, and we thoroughly agree with him—not that the respectable American politician is too good for politics, but that he is too busy. As he puts it:

"Private affairs have assumed in these latter days an importance, as compared with public affairs, which our forefathers never could have anticipated. This state of things is causing everywhere a demand for government without trouble, or with very little trouble. The demand for good and enlightened government is as great as ever; but the desire for simple government, which can be carried on without drawing largely on the time and attention of the private citizen is greater than ever. Government was never so much considered as a means to an end, and not as an end in itself, as it is to-day—a mode of looking at it which goes far to explain the success of 'the man on horseback,' or dictator in troubled communities."

No one who is at all acquainted with the United States will think that Mr. Godkin has underestimated the importance of this consideration. The average respectable American of the middle-class is an exceedingly active man of business, plunged up to the eyes in the details of his own commercial or industrial occupations, which provide for him, as a rule, a far more absorbing and all-pervading interest than is the case with persons of corresponding status in this country. Americans are constantly surprised at the amount of time which Englishmen, engaged in commerce and industry, seem able to devote to public and municipal affairs, or to sport, amusement, society, to such hobbies as gardening, and to various other pursuits in no way connected with their professional avocations. In America, outside New York and Philadelphia and one or two other large cities, where there is a comparatively leisured class of wealthy business men, there is much less of this diversity of interests. The American elector, who goes to his office early and comes away late, and works while there with an almost savage energy, can just spare the time to read and talk about politics, but not to take an active part in them. The present writer was once informed by the manager of a great commercial concern in New York that he had not recorded his vote in any election for more than a quarter of a century; the reason given being that he was too busy to attend to such matters. As a subsidiary excuse for his want of civism he explained that he objected to go to meetings or even to the ballots, because he might there come in contact with persons with whom he would not care to associate. This latter highly democratic sentiment is pretty widely diffused in the United States, and it is at once the cause and effect of the power of the boss and the caucus, and the reluctance of men of good social position to come forward as candidates for the Legislature; "for it is true," as Mr. Godkin remarks, "of every sort of public service, from the army up to the Cabinet, that men are influenced as to entering it by the kind of company they will have to keep."

Mr. Godkin belongs to the class of hostile, but hopeful, critics of American democracy. His hostility towards some of the recent developments in the State and Municipal government is uncompromising. Of the New York Legislature at Albany he says that it is not too strong to call it "a school of vice and a fountain of political debauchery," and that few of the younger men come back from it without having learned to mock at political purity and public spirit. But he does not despair of the Republic in spite of the corrupt local côteries and the dominance of the machine-men. He looks for amendment, partly to certain constitutional changes, but mainly to the enlarged political activity of the respectable electors, and to a better tone of public opinion. The misfortune is that opinion is chiefly educated by political meetings and the press; and while political meetings are now scarcely held except during a Presidential campaign, the newspapers, notwithstanding their unbounded energy and their success as commercial enterprises, have lost the greater part of their political influence. On this last point Mr. Godkin is particularly well worth reading. We cannot recall another recent writer who has explained the present position and tendencies of the modern daily press, in its relations to politics and public opinion, with so much competence and judgment.

A CRITIC ON CRITICISM.

Literary Statesmen, and Others. By Norman Hapgood. (Duckworth & Co.)

THIS is a little book of genuine criticism. Mr. Hapgood has scholarship, acumen, a nice sense of style and great sanity; and more, his work has the unity arising from a single point of view consistently maintained. He is a critic of critics. The men who interest him are the exponents of the nice, the subtle, and the deft in literature, the people who have been self-conscious and wide-eyed, and not the impulsive, irrational genius.

The essay on "Lord Rosebery" does full justice to the charm of his style, but finds it without the high gravity and moral earnestness which is the test of the greatest literature. "It is never caustic, but friendly and pervasive, often even merry, altogether inspired by temperament." But with Mr. Hapgood the style is the man in a peculiarly literal sense, and from a survey of Lord Rosebery's style, he proceeds to build up Lord Rosebery's character: "There is honesty, frankness, generosity; there are convictions; but there is no single unifying conviction or conception, no faith, or passion, or need of accomplishment." We do not wish to quarrel with the verdict, but we certainly quarrel with the method. Such an abrupt step from literature to life, from style to character, is scarcely justifiable. Further, the judgment passed shows a fault to which Mr. Hapgood is peculiarly liable, and which appears more distinctly in his appreciation of Mr. Balfour. He himself has a critic's insight, subtlety and lucidness, and a clever man's bogey in criticism is often his own cleverness. He is always hampered with a nervous desire to show his fairness by discounting whatever seems akin to his own special talent. So we find him erecting a fetish of moral earnestness and irrational faith—excellent things in their way, but here worshipped blindly and out of due bounds.

Mr. John Morley, according to Mr. Hapgood, is less an individual than a type, a familiar type, and may be criticised as such. He has "an ethical seriousness as extreme as his artistic failure, and he is consistently loyal to certain large facts and principles":

"His misfortune is that these principles are not timely, that they do not form a message needed and welcomed by the time, like that of Matthew Arnold, for instance, or that of Ruskin, and, of course, also because they are not set in a style of distinction, but rather in one soured by moralism and desiccated by science."

Many of the comments are shrewd and neatly phrased. Mr. Hapgood notes that Mr. Morley's limitation as a historian is that history presents itself to him as in no degree a picture but merely a problem. The criticism of the eighteenth century of France, that "no period has had more greatness with less individuality" has truth, and the supreme faults of his author's style, its lack of discrimination, its use of a weak scientific terminology, and the consequent absence of all emotional effect, are accurately set down. Almost the last sentence in the essay—

"Although lack of art or genius has followed Mr. Morley from letters into politics, although his love of absolute principle is in opposition to the spirit of a time that has no creed, the persistence which has helped him to escape failure and the straightness of his course make a picture that has some of the stimulus of the heroic"— has that touch of sympathy which is indispensable in genuine criticism.

But with the clever study, "Mr. Balfour Seen from a Distance," Mr. Hapgood again approaches the fantastic. He sees that his subject has a certain element of the subtle and the recondite, and he resolves that the critic shall not be wanting in the same qualities. We are quite with him when he calls Mr. Balfour's faith a "strong sceptical sincerity," when he describes his personality as "lacking in brilliant colours," and sums up his intellectual qualities as "a mind without exuberant powers, though with rare keenness, interested always, never excited, a mind of logic primarily, with little passion or sense of form." But such a criticism as this carries less conviction:

"Mr. Balfour has seen the difficulties of facts, and he has read a good deal, but of the kind of emotion that makes strong literature he has known nothing. Like Berkeley's early work, his books are original, lucid, subtle, and rather thin."

It is well expressed, but is it perfectly fair? Mr. Balfour's work is avowedly a popular critical exposition of certain systems of philosophy, the statement not of a creed but of a point of view. The "emotion that makes strong literature" would be quite out of place, and it is just the thin lucidity which forms his chief merit. Had the author written an ambitious epic in the same manner, Mr. Hapgood's verdict might be justified. The critic has argued that his author's personality is genuine, attractive, but slight, because these are the qualities of books where other qualities would have been out of place. Again, we do not quarrel with Mr. Hapgood's verdict, but with his method of proof.

The three studies on purely literary subjects—"Stendhal," "Mérimée as Critic," and "Henry James"—have the same merits as the first three, but the defects are fewer. The critic is more at home with his subjects, and in a better position to judge them. It is a far cry from the austerity of English statesmen to the utter unmorality and gay scepticism of Stendhal's work. He was a many-sided gentleman, with a great talent for enjoying life. In one aspect he is the modern Heraclitus, the philosopher of opportunism, who "sees in relativity, arbitrariness, caprice, the final law of nature; and, feeling a sympathy with this law, not unnaturally finds in the absolute, personal, perverse nature of women his most congenial companionship." Again, he is the "typical suggestive critic—formless, uncreative, general and specific, precise and abstract; chaotic to the artist, satisfactory to the psychologist." And on these two sides of the speculative and the personal Mr. Hapgood builds up a speaking portrait of the man. It is all very careful, choice, and subtle work—a mosaic of vivid phrases and apt instances. Indeed, the style throughout this little book is kept consistently at a high level of art, and hence we are all the more surprised to find so precise a writer admitting on p. 69 so inept a construction as this:

"His cool prophecy that a few leading spirits would read him by 1880 was justified, and the solution of his doubt whether he would not by 1930 have sunk again into oblivion seems now, at least, as likely as it was then to be an affirmative."

The study of Mérimée's criticism shows us a Mérimée that those who do not know his essays have not suspected. "Indeed," says Mr. Hapgood, "the powers which charm the lover of deftness in literature sometimes appear even more distinctly when he is speaking his critical opinion than they do when he is telling a story." And more, the Mérimée of the letters and stories is a man "always on the defensive"; but the writer of the essays has a broader comprehension and sympathy. The criticism is eminently just, and Mr. Hapgood's remark on the technique of the essays is suggestive: "It is almost impossible to see the logic of the arrangement, and quite impossible not to feel that there is logic. His bold unity is beyond analysis."

The essay on "American Cosmopolitanism" is a protest against a certain tendency to decivilisation which the author thinks he observes in American life. The young gentlemen who "say of England that she has no art, of Germany that she has only dull learning, of America that she is Philistine"; who hanker eternally for Italy or Paris; who are denationalised and without the instincts and prejudices of race, are acutely analysed and exposed. It is a timely plea on behalf of a wholesome national culture against a cheap cosmopolitanism.

"To be a great artist," says Mr. Hapgood, "a man must know his world so intimately that he does not express it on purpose. He talks about the simple, universal subjects, and his environment is given inevitably, without conscious effort, in every line he writes. The style is not the man only; it is the country, the race. To this height, to the largest poetry, cosmopolitanism has never reached."

Of the study of Mr. Henry James it is difficult to say anything, except that it is subtle without being fantastic. His two chief merits he finds to be that he represents the artistic as opposed to every other attitude, and that with a unique opportunity and singular power he has painted the contrast between culture and primitiveness. It is a striking piece of work, and brings fittingly to a close a little book of genuine power. Mr. Hapgood has his faults like other people. He hates art jargon, but every now and then he verges perilously near a jargon, part artistic and part psychological. At one time he distrusts his own cleverness too much, at another time he presses it too far. But the fact remains that this little collection is that rarity in modern letters—criticism done with dignity and competence, and expressed in pure and graceful prose.

AN EDUCATIONAL THEORIST.

Day-Dreams of a Schoolmaster. By D'Arcy W. Thompson. (Isbister.)

To touch on a quarter of the debatable subjects so light-heartedly treated by Mr. Thompson in his Day-Dreams would require very much more space than we could spare for the purpose. Nor, indeed, does his book require such detailed consideration. Written and first published, as we learn from the Preface, some thirty or forty years ago, it bears all the marks of heedless youth written large upon its pages; and it would be absurd to devote valuable space to refuting views most of which, we may charitably suppose, their author has long ceased to hold. His Preface is commendably apologetic and deprecatory—in strong contrast to the youthful self-confidence of the text—and thus the vehemence of criticism is disarmed. These Day-Dreams deal with a multitude of educational themes: the teaching of boys, the teaching of girls, the teaching of Latin, the pronunciation of the same, the pronunciation of Greek with some observations on Homer, &c., &c. In addition to these serious subjects, the book deals with several of a less strictly academic—perhaps Mr. Thompson would call it “practical”—kind, and the later essays are, in some ways, the best in the book. The last of all—Schola in nubibus—is a particularly pleasant piece of writing.

Mr. Thompson's essays, probably by reason of their brevity, seldom do more than skim the surface of their subject; and he has a young man's fondness for ironical persiflage where a rigid logical analysis would be more to the purpose. For example, he is full of flouts and jeers at our English method of teaching the “dead” languages. He would have them taught as if they were not “dead” at all, but very much alive—conversationally, in fact. And he urges the old view that in this way they would be learnt at once more rapidly and more easily. But from the other side it may be pointed out that our public schools do not aim primarily at teaching their boys to converse in Latin, but at putting them through a valuable intellectual discipline. The public school method of teaching the classical languages is believed to provide this discipline, and, so long as it does so, it does not matter two straws whether its pupils can talk Latin in after life or not. Mr. Thompson is particularly sarcastic on that vexed question, the indiscriminate teaching of Latin verse. He takes the familiar view that only those boys who have a taste for verse-writing and will one day excel in it should be asked to apply themselves to it. But it is probably superfluous to urge that boys are not taught Latin verse as an end in itself, but as a valuable mental exercise. Whether they will ever want to write or care to read Ovidian Elegiacs in after life is of no importance. Mr. Thompson, when this book was written, does not appear to have seriously considered this point of view. Doubtless he has done so since.

The conversational method of teaching the classical languages, of course, lands our author in the vexed question of “correct” pronunciation. We say “vexed” question, though it seems to have presented no difficulty whatever to Mr. Thompson. He tells how a veteran scholar read an ode of Horace “after the pronunciation he had recently heard in Tuscany,” and he assures us that never till then had he realised that “the Roman lyre could be struck to such reverberant sound.” Mr. Thompson does not trouble to give us his scholar's reasons for preferring the pronunciation of Tuscany over that of all the cities of Italy, and, indeed, we imagine that he would have his work cut out to prove that a modern Tuscan pronunciation was any more Ciceronian than a French or a Spanish. The fact is the difficulty of arriving at any certain conclusion as to the true pronunciation of a “dead” language—it really is “dead,” in spite of Mr. Thompson's conversational methods—is so great that we in England, very wisely, decide not to bother our heads and those of our pupils with what is, after all, a comparatively minor matter beside “the conveying of strict ideas of grammar and philology” (p. 101). And if Mr. Thompson still believes that no beauty can possibly be found in an ode of Horace or a passage of Virgil read by a competent person in English fashion, which seems to have been his view forty years ago, we can only note the fact with regret.

Mr. Thompson attacks our English pronunciation of Greek with an even greater disregard for the difficulties involved in any change. We do not gather precisely what he desires to put in its place, but apparently the pronunciation of Tuscany would be again requisitioned. For, speaking of Homer, he says (p. 125): “I need hardly say that I did not read these poems according to the ordinary principles of scansion.” It is a pity that he does not specify what extra-ordinary principles of scansion he found it advisable to put in their place. However, he continues:

“I contrived, to my own satisfaction, to combine the rules of metre with those of accent; and in my pronunciation of the words where the vowel-sounds of modern Greek seemed thin, I adopted without hesitation the richer vowel-music of Italy.”

Tuscany, again, no doubt. Now, for the sake of argument, we may credit Mr. Thompson in his youthful days with a fastidious taste in pronunciation, but in the conversational teaching of Greek we foresee a difficulty in carrying out his methods. For it is at least conceivable that half-a-dozen other ardent young men who were entrusted with the teaching of Homer to our sons might have different views as to the most desirable variations on the “thin vowel-sounds” of modern Greek, and instead of unanimously borrowing the “richer vowel-music” of Tuscany, one of them might glean fresh harmonies from Slavonic or Lithuanian, while another might borrow from Constantinople, or Mesopotamia. The shores of the Black Sea again, once sown with Greek colonies, would seem an obvious place from which to borrow vowel-sounds to improve upon the strong-winged music of Homer. Nor do our difficulties stop with pronunciation in the case of ancient Greek. For there arises the still greater problem of accent raised by the mistaken labours of a late Byzantine grammarian. Mr. Thompson boldly urges that we should pronounce according to the written accent, though he does not explain how this is to be done. Nor does he give his readers even a hint of the fact that there is considerable doubt in the learned world as to what Aristophanes of Byzantium meant by his accents, and how they are to be interpreted in spoken speech. Indeed, his position with regard to Greek accents is curiously frank in its caprice. “I did not hold myself bound to any code of laws, metrical or accentual,” he says of his reading in Homer. In other words, when the traditional accent of a Greek word struck him as inconvenient, he altered it! It seems hardly worth while to change our present method of Greek pronunciation in order to leave the language at the mercy of any adventurous youth who cares to invent a system of accentuation of his own and teach our sons to decline ἄθροπος in accordance with it. Our present method of ignoring accents altogether in pronunciation is at least more defensible than this.

But with all his heresies there is a buoyant self-confidence about this Mr. Thompson of forty years ago which is not unattractive, and even the fiercest of his sarcasms cannot conceal the amiability of his disposition.

THE “GREAT GRENADIERS.”

The Romance of a Regiment. By J. R. Hutchinson. (Sampson Low.)

At the beginning of the eighteenth century, when Russia was groaning under the tyrannous excesses of her crazy Tsar Peter, Prussia was enduring the folly and brutality of another madman, King Frederick William the First. The Russian Peter's mania took the form of cutting off his subjects' beards and beating their persons; the Prussian King's was more extravagant and more hopelessly foolish. His passion was to be surrounded by tall soldiers, and it grew upon him so much during the twenty-seven years of his reign that it became the scourge of his own kingdom and the scandal of Europe. The offspring of this madness of his was the giant regiment of “Great Grenadiers,” to the recruiting of which all the King's energies and a vast deal of treasure were devoted, and it is of this regiment that Mr. Hutchinson tells the history. Let us own at once that he does it, on the whole, exceedingly well. There is a vivacity about his narrative that at once removes it from all possibility of dullness; and he has collected a wealth of interesting material to illustrate his somewhat repulsive theme. The book would have benefited by a more chastened style, but that no doubt is a matter of taste.

The stories of the eccentric manner in which Frederick William recruited his big soldiers do not raise our opinion either of the Prussia or the Europe of his day. “Better be a eunuch in a Turkish harem than a Prussian subject,” said his own people; but they took no effective steps to rid themselves of the monster who wearied them, while the Europe of that day was either too timid or too much occupied in other directions to put a stop to the Prussian King's outrages. England herself pocketed more than one insult at his hands, no doubt because that process cost less than avenging it, and meanwhile Frederick William's recruiting agents swarmed over Europe, enticing or carrying off every man of six feet and over, whom force or cajolery could enlist in the service of the "Crowned Ogre." The King not merely claimed the right to impress any Prussian of the requisite inches, but, regardless of the comity of nations and all other specious phrases of that kind, forcibly enlisted such of his neighbours' subjects as happened to cross his borders, if they were tall enough. "If they don't want to be exposed to accidents, let them keep out of my country," he observed to Seckendorf on one occasion. Nor did he hesitate to kidnap foreign subjects in their own country, and to pay his agents handsomely for doing so. He spent in "foreign recruiting" between 1713 and 1735 some twelve million dollars, or £1,750,000. The taller the recruit the more the Prussian King was ready to pay for him, especially if he chanced to be handsome as well. James Kirkland, an Irishman of vast dimensions, whom the notorious Prussian Envoy Borcke secured for him, cost £1,260. Seckendorf gave more than £1,100 for a tall Austrian. A recruit, appropriately named Grosse, cost £719. In fact, Frederick William, though a niggard in all other respects, would pay almost any sum for his "children in blue." No man in the regiment measured less than six feet without his boots, while some of them were said to have measured eight! There are endless stories of the King's unscrupulous recruiting methods, some of which may be quoted here, though the amusement they might cause is apt to be strongly tinged with disgust at the crazy tyrant who sacrificed the happiness of his subjects and his own dignity to this idiotic whim. On one occasion some of his officers, in ignorance of his identity, tried to make a great Grenadier of the Emperor's ambassador, Baron von Benteinrieder, who chanced, like Rosalind, to be more than common tall. His coach had broken down near Halberstadt, and his Excellency, wishing to stretch his long legs, left the carriage to be brought on by his servants, and proceeded on foot. We will give the story in Mr. Hutchinson's own words:

"At the town gate he was challenged by a sentry.

'Halt! Who goes there?'

'The Emperor's Botschafter,' replied the tall stranger.

The officer of the Guard happened to be a Pomeranian, and in his mother tongue the big word meant merely a courier, not an ambassador. 'Courier, eh?' thought he. 'Not too great a dandy to make a Prussian soldier, anyhow.' So he turned out the guard and arrested him.

Entering into the humour of the thing, the Baron allowed himself to be led away to the house of the commandant, who, at sight of so promising a recruit, went into ecstasies.

'A perfect Godsend! How high does he stand? Ha! so much? Not higher, though, than I shall stand with the King!'

In the midst of these self-gratulations, up came one of Benteinrieder's servants.

'Your Excellency,' he began—'

Whereupon, of course, the commandant collapsed into apologies. The famous story of the gigantic Julich carpenter had a more tragic ending. The carpenter was observed by a certain recruiter, Hompesch by name, who at once made up his mind to kidnap him. He therefore ordered the man to make him a chest of the same length as the builder, say eight feet. When it was finished Hompesch began to quibble about its length, and the carpenter, poor fellow, to set all doubts at rest, unsuspectingly stepped into the box and stretched himself out on the bottom. Whereupon Hompesch shut down the lid, fastened it, and had the chest removed by his myrmidons. Unhappily, by the time the party had reached a place where it could safely be opened the carpenter was dead!

The service of soldiers thus brutally recruited could, of course, be retained only by methods equally brutal. There were frequent mutinies on a small scale. Constant efforts were made by the representatives of the various countries from which men had been entrapped to secure their freedom, but Frederick William would never consent to disgorge them. "Once a Grenadier always a Grenadier," was his reply. Constant efforts, too, were made by the unfortunate men themselves to escape, but very rarely with success. Their conspicuous height made them easy to recapture, and when brought back they were punished with merciless brutality. The bastinado or running the gauntlet were the usual penalties, or they might be broken on the wheel or languish in prison, deprived of ears and nose, at Spandau. Occasionally they were tortured with red-hot pincers by way of variety. On the other hand, as far as pay and rations went, they were handsomely treated, for in his mad fashion the King was genuinely fond of his Great Grenadiers. Witness the following story:

"One day, when Glasenapp, one of the tallest of the tall men lay ill, the King's lackeys rushed into his presence and announced the occurrence of some grave calamity. The King sank into a chair, pale and trembling.

'What is it?' he gasped.

'The tower of St. Peter's has fallen, your majesty.'

'Oh! is that all?' said he, vastly relieved; 'I was afraid my grenadier might be dead!'

It is astounding to reflect that this insane barbarian should have retained the throne of Prussia for seven and twenty years. At last retribution for his excesses fell upon him, and he died painfully of dropsy, amid the scarcely concealed rejoicings of his soldiers, his subjects, and his relatives. Within a month of his death, Frederick the Great disbanded the Great Grenadiers.

UNKNOWN TIBET.

Through Unknown Tibet. By M. S. Wellby, Captain 18th Hussars. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin.)

SINCE the Abbé Huc, fifty years ago, accomplished his famous pilgrimage through China and Tibet, we doubt whether anything has been done comparable to this immense journey through unknown Tibet which Captain Wellby made in company with Lieutenant Malcolm, of the 93rd, the Argyll and Sutherland, Highlanders. And in these latter days it is in some regards comparable only to the achievement of Nansen in the Northern Seas. At the same time it is distinguished among great and perilous journeys in that these two young soldiers absolutely accomplished all the task they set out to perform. Their resolve was to traverse, from west to east, the northern stretch of the vast plateau of Central Asia, to discover the mysteries which lay beneath the word UNEXPLORED with which that region is dismissed even in our latest maps, to strike the source of the Che Ma river, which is reported to be the remotest beginning of the great Yangtse Kiang, to cross the Tsaidam, and to descend by the Hoang Ho and across the Great Wall upon the capital of the Celestial Empire. All these things they did with success, in spite of great extremes of cold and heat, of privation and peril, and with a gaiety and an élan which distinguish the British soldier among travellers. Passing through Kashmir, they started off on their hazardous journey from Leh in Ladakh on May 4, 1896, and ended it at Peking in the beginning of December, thus in seven months traversing and exploring over 5,000 miles of very difficult country. Although the first month or two nominally constituted summer the extremes of temperature were very trying. Twenty-four degrees of frost in the night, and then by eight or nine in the morning a suu strong enough to grill flesh—that was a frequent experience, while snow and ice abounded on all sides. Here is a typical experience in the early part of the journey:

"The way was steep and rocky, and the sun so powerful that we slung our coats across our arms and loitered on the top for the breeze and the caravan. Snow lay in heaps—a welcome quencher to our thirst. This was a stiff climb for our caravan, the height of the pass being nearly 17,000 feet. Having waited till they were nearly at the top, we began to descend the other side. Quite suddenly we seemed to be transplanted into a new zone, for a cutting snowstorm blew straight in our faces. We were almost frozen, and any portion of the head we exposed suffered severely. We looked for some overhanging rock that would serve for a shelter, but there the cold became so intense that we preferred to fight the elements and keep in motion. . . . Having found a fairly suitable spot, and waited for a considerable length of time, we were perplexed to hear no sign of our caravan. Darkness and cold came upon us, and we kept up an intermittent fusilade till 8 o'clock, when a distant shout revealed to us that they were at length coming. But alas! Although some of the mules walked in fit and strong, others came in wretchedly weak; and, worst of all, six animals and three complete loads had been abandoned altogether."

In an Appendix Captain Wellby gives "some condensed meteorological observations" in that remarkable region, which is in the latitude of the Mediterranean. In June there were twenty-six fine days; snow fell on four days of the first week; the coldest night had 25° of frost, and the warmest had a temperature of 33° F.; and on the 21st the thermometer marked 110° in the sun. In August there were eleven fine days and eighteen with rain or snow; the coldest night had 14° of frost, and the warmest registered 40° F. There is surely no wonder that with such a climate the land is barren and bare of people. Indeed, the only folk the travellers met until they were past the Koko Nor and on the confines of China were a great caravan of Tibetans and scattered detachments of a tribe of Mongolian nomads.

"The head of the caravan was a very fine-looking Tibetan from Lhasa. He must have stood well over six feet, and was exceedingly well-built—decidedly the biggest Tibetan I have ever seen. In the camp he was always known as the 'Kushok,' and all attempts to find out his real name resulted in failure. . . . The title 'Kushok' was originally applied only to living Buddhas, but latterly it has become merely a term of respect or affection, and no longer has any religious significance."

With the "Kushok" and his imposing caravan of 1,500 yak laden with merchandise the travellers journeyed for a good many days. It is significant that on first hearing of their presence the "Kushok" declared they must either be English or Russian, "for, he said, men of no other nations could accomplish such a journey." The introduction to the tent of the "Kushok" is worth recording:

"They signed for us to be seated, and then handed us a basin each, which the servant filled with hot tea. Into this he dropped a large lump of butter, and then held before us a large red leather bag, filled with tsampa or finely ground barley meal. From this we took several large spoonfuls and mixed with the tea, adding whatever salt we fancied. The merchant's servant then handed us some chopsticks, and we were soon at work shovelling the hot mixture into our mouths rather greedily; and if I were to relate the number of basins we emptied that night it would never be credited."

But all their relations with the "Kushok" were not quite so pleasant as that; and they had to assume a very threatening aspect before he would allow them to go their own way in peace. It was soon after parting from the "Kushok" that they encountered the Mongolian nomads, who are very attractively presented. After a period of bitter privation,

"we could hardly credit the picture we caught a glimpse of through the thick bush. There was a fine flock of fat sheep being driven homewards (for it was now evening) by some young boys and girls riding bare-backed their well-fed ponies. They were singing all the while from mere lightness of heart, ignorant of all trouble and of the outside world. . . . I watched in secret this scene of perfect worldly peace and happiness before disturbing the partakers of it by a loud incongruous exclamation, 'Hallo!' They turned round at once to meet this unheard-of sound, and, though they received us with fear, their astonishment might well be pardoned."

These Mongols were found to be simple, honest, handsome, and hospitable, and—spite of the voracious appetites their guests displayed—smiling and polite.

"I was terribly hungry, and could scarcely keep my eyes from the cooking-pots, which just fitted the holes made in the ground. . . . I was made to sit down by the fire against the sacks, when my host, who had guided me here, and appeared to be chief of the party, opened one of the pots, and forthwith pulled out a well-boiled shoulder of mutton, which I took from his hands, and was soon gnawing at; on its completion, my host presented me with a leg, and afterwards with a neck. Then I began to reflect within myself what a reputation for an Englishman's greed I was bringing among these people, and I stoutly refused his pressing invitations to accept more."

With these estimable folk the travellers bargained to be conducted to the borders of China; and so they passed the Koko Nor—"a salt lake about 230 miles round"—and came to Tankar, the remarkable little Chinese border-town first described by Mr. Rockhill. Space fails us to tell of the Dutch medical missionary and his wife, who seemed all-powerful there, who befriended the travellers, and took them to visit a famous Buddhist monastery in the neighbourhood, where they were introduced to a living incarnation of Buddha, the head of the monastery. For these things, and varied ensuing adventures, the reader should turn for himself to Captain Wellby's admirable narrative. Enough has been set down to show how picturesque, romantic, lively, and sincere are the whole contents; and at the end of the volume is found a pocket filled with maps, which show that Captain Wellby's work is not merely an entertaining narrative, but has produced valuable scientific and geographical results as well.

BRIEFER MENTION.

University and Other Sermons. By C. J. Vaughan, D.D. (Macmillan & Co.)

IT cannot be said of these sermons of the late Dean Vaughan that they "read well." His was an attractive personality, but in the printed page we find little that recalls the magic of his voice. The expression is clear and vigorous, full of earnestness and sympathy for humanity, but if we must judge these sermons in a critical and dispassionate spirit—and such a volume of necessity invites such judgment—we are compelled to admit that it is only in a few isolated passages that they rise above the ordinary level. It was, probably, in the almost commonplace simplicity of his diction that lay the secret of Dean Vaughan's power as a preacher. He never attempted flights of rhetoric, he never spoke above the heads of his hearers; he preached with plain, outspoken directness as a man to his fellow men.

In addition to the series of University Sermons given in this volume there are five sermons preached on special occasions. Of these the most interesting are the sermons on the "Indian Mutiny" preached at Harrow on the Day of the National Humiliation, October 7, 1857, and on the death of the Prince Consort. We think it a pity that the editor has so rigidly divided all the discourses into "firstly," "secondly," "thirdly," &c. The figures give an unattractive air of stiffness and formality to the pages, and they are quite unnecessary. Although this book cannot be said to show the late Dean at his best, we feel sure that many will prize it as the last memorial to a great and good man.

Cycle and Camp. By T. H. Holding. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

THIS is a most annoying book; to us the more annoying as it has compelled us to read it through for the valuable information it contains. The author is an expert in touring by canoe and cycle, and he has devised and thoroughly tested—as you may read in his book—an outfit for board and lodging for four men which can be packed on bicycles and involve an outlay of only £2 a week for the lot. We were much interested in finding out how the cycle camp worked in the wilds of Western Ireland. But the writer insists on regarding himself as an author, and not as a remarkably clever expert in commissariat. He moralises with painful frequency, and he is humorous over and over again. His moralising is simply trite and unnecessary, and may be skipped. But his humour is all pervasive and invariably offensive. Thus he comments on the Roman Catholic chapel at Foxford:

"We went to the Roman Catholic chapel, a nice building enough outside, but within—though a new building—the essence of dreary poverty, stricken, too, with utter want of interest. 'The Spirit and the Bride might say come,' but it would be hard on the Bride to keep her there, and almost too bare for the Spirit to dwell in."

One must be brave indeed to face such humour as this for two hundred pages. We would protest, too, against the carelessness with which the book has been dumped upon our table, crammed from end to end with grammatical slips and typographical errors. Such punctuation as this could be corrected by a publisher's office boy: "Of all things, this bountiful earth has given to man, cheap Gorgonzola, is the nastiest in regard to its smell, at any rate." But possibly the publisher's office boy did not think such a sentence worth correcting. Nor do we think that a proof-reader ought to permit even an expert cyclist to talk of his morning bath as his "ebullitions."

Still, if you are a cyclist or contemplate touring you should read the book. You are forewarned. And you will get some useful information towards the end, where the humour and the moralising ceases and the information and the diagrams begin.

Our Living Generals. By Arthur Temple. (Andrew Melrose.)

OUR living generals, according to Mr. Temple, are twelve in number—namely, Viscount Wolseley, Lord Roberts, Sir Donald Stewart, Sir Redvers Buller, Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir George White, Sir Baker Creed Russell, Sir Henry Brackenbury, Sir Francis Grenfell, Sir William Butler, Sir Frederick Carrington, and Sir Herbert Kitchener. Dr. Jameson is therefore not included. The biographies are short and concise, resembling more than anything obituary notices in a provincial paper. Mr. Temple, who quotes Mr. Kipling now and then, ought to know that "Fuzzie-Wuzzies" is not the plural of "Fuzzy-Wuzzy." Mr. Temple thinks the Sirdar of the Egyptian forces the most prominent man in the British Army. Each biography has an accompanying portrait.

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1898.

THE NEWEST FICTION.

A GUIDE FOR NOVEL READERS.

LIFE IS LIFE.

BY ZACK.

A collection of short stories and episodes, mostly in dialect, by a new writer. An article on "Zack" will be found on page 689. (W. Blackwood & Sons. 323 pp. 6s.)

THE MAKING OF A SAINT.

BY W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM.

The author of Lisa of Lambeth has adventured upon a new field. "These are the memoirs of Beato Giuliano, brother of the Order of St. Francis of Assisi, known in his worldly life as Filippo Brandolini," of whom the editor describes himself as the last descendant. The author, in defence of his previous work and of his present volume, delivers himself of such mordant pleasantries as this: "I have a friend who lately wrote a story of the London poor, and his critics were properly disgusted because his characters dropped their aitches and often used bad language. . . ." As to the persons of this drama, "If they sinned, they sinned elegantly, and much may be forgiven to people whose pedigree is above suspicion." (Fisher Unwin. 303 pp. 6s.)

HANNIBAL'S DAUGHTER.

BY LIEUT.-COL. HAGOARD.

Under this title it has been the author's "humble effort to present to the world in romantic guise such a story as may impress itself upon the minds of many who would never seek it for themselves in the classic tomes of history." "Should there appear to be aught of art in the manner in which I have attempted to weave a combination of history and romance," he writes in his epistle dedicatory to the Princess Louise, "may I venture to hope that a true artist like Your Royal Highness, of whose work the nation is justly proud, may not deem the results of my efforts unworthy." The pages which follow are all also polite. (Hutchinson. 412 pp. 6s.)

THE AMBITION OF JUDITH.

BY OLIVE BIRRELL.

Judith was a red-haired girl with whom most men fell in love, and for whom some were ready to commit crimes. "I know you are a beautiful devil," one of them raved, "with eyes that can draw the soul out of a man's mouth, and leave him by the roadside, a dead body, useless for evermore. . . . But I cannot exist without you. Fiend or woman, it is the same." There is a rich aunt in the story, and a hocussed will, and a pale artist, and a lady Social Democrat. And the Social Democrat wins. Judith settles in Paris. "Her home is the street; her family, those who are in sickness or distress." (Smith & Elder. 307 pp. 6s.)

BAM WILDFIRE.

BY HELEN MATHERS.

Treats of the fringe of society in a tone to which the bookstall censor can hardly take exception; and as to style, here is the second sentence in the book: "Dennis was going out that night, and in a woman's illogical way, she [Bam] took a keen pride in his good looks, though he himself had offended her, and presently decorated him with a sense of satisfaction for which he was not responsible, but something sui generis to herself, was." (Thomas Burleigh. 460 pp.)

WINDYGAAP.

BY THEO. DOUGLAS.

Such evangelical trust in the call of Providence as survives among Welsh Dissenters drove Phœbe overseas to become the yoke-fellow of an ancient labourer in the vineyard, and his assistant in the work of the Lord. But when she got there, things turned out more humanly: the ancient labourer had gone to his reward, and his place was occupied by an agreeable bachelor. So Phœbe had her reward in this life. She was quite a pleasant young woman, and her story is told well. (Arrowsmith. 214 (tiny) pp. 1s.)

TRINCOLOX.

BY DOUGLAS SLADEN.

A story of half-pay captains, golden-haired widows, a New England girl, the mysterious Trincolox, and others, gathered together in a Heidelberg pension. Miss River began the romance by asking of her silent companion at the table d'hôte: "Say, are you under doctor's orders not to talk during meals?" and consummated it thus: ". . . I've been making violent love to you ever since Wednesday night, and you won't ask me. Oh, Mr. Trincolox, I am serious; I do love you so passionately, and I do so want to have the nursing of my hand, the one you sacrificed to me. Do marry me." The volume contains, also, three short stories, of which the scenes are laid in Japan and China. (C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 226 pp. 2s. 6d.)

A CELIBATE'S WIFE.

BY HERBERT FLOWERDEW.

A clerical marriage problem novel. How a girl may fare 'twixt the love of an unctuous ascetic Canon who persuades her to become his wife in the eyes of men, but to preserve the unmarried state in the secrecy of their home, and a healthy minded infidel who, when he means marriage—means it: that is the theme. A strong story in which the comedy of church work and village piety relieves the development of the heroine's fate. (John Lane. 413 pp. 6s.)

THE ADVENTURES OF A MARTYR'S BIBLE. BY GEORGE FIRTH.

The title is rather misleading. The Bible handed down in the Heathcote family from the hands of a martyr at the stake is a kind of charm; the handling of it causes tingling and wisdom. But the story proper is concerned with the sudden introduction into a quiet family of a live girl, the kind of woman "that no man can see without boiling madness in the blood." Harold's blood boils on the instant, and he kisses Juliet; his brother John meditates, takes down the Bible, and kisses her too. A decidedly original story with curious developments. (John Lane. 382 pp. 6s.)

WARNED OFF.

BY LORD GRANVILLE GORDON.

A racing novel, as the title suggests. In the "Prologue" the author takes a pessimistic view of modern sport. "In the days of Ross and Osbaldeston and poor Jack Mytton, who set fire to his nightgown to cure the hiccoughs; men 'knew' a horse when they saw one, and could ride a horse when they mounted one. Are the owners of racehorses to-day like these men? . . . Cricket is played by the hour. Oh! that lamentable cry of an effete civilisation, 'Surrey played out time!'" (F. V. White & Co. 292 pp. 6s.)

REVIEWS.

Helbeck of Bannisdale. By Mrs. Humphry Ward.
(Smith, Elder & Co.)

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD's new novel is an analysis of the alternating love-rapture and agony endured by a man and a girl at the opposite poles of belief and unbelief. Helbeck of Bannisdale is a rigid Papist, a member of the Third Order of St. Francis, faithful to the memory of twenty generations of ancestors—"a type sprung from the best English blood, disciplined by heroic memories, by the persecution and hardships of the Penal Laws." Laura Fountain, one of the most attractive personalities in Mrs. Ward's gallery of girls, is devoted to the memory and teaching of an Agnostic father. These two are thrown together in the old home of Bannisdale, in the "wild clean country of Westmoreland," where Helbeck has lived solitary for many years, selling his possessions one by one for the benefit of his church. Antipathy changes to love—passionate, uncontrollable—over which the spectre of their religious antagonism broods, gathering substance as the story progresses. The ordeal is too much for these strenuous spirits. It saps and spoils their lives. They are shipwrecked in sight of land. He becomes a Jesuit; she drowns herself. And the reader closes the book—moved and unhappy—on these words:

“What a fate!—that brought them across each other, that has left him nothing but these memories, and led her, step by step, to this last bitter resource—this awful spending of her young life—this blind witness to august things.”

The story passes mainly in Westmoreland. Sincerity and a conscientious and loving care of workmanship are stamped upon the pages through which blows the wind and shines the sun of the spacious lake country. Priests glide in and out of the story; peasants in sympathetic, uncouth presentment come and go; now and again an echo of the larger life of Cambridge is heard; and in the early chapters there are passages of gaiety; but, for the most part, the narrative proceeds, through chapters of ever-gathering greyness, to the final tragedy. Minor characters abound, but they are all deftly accessory to Helbeck and Laura—types of those who are constitutionally unable to enjoy life for its own sake; who have an abnormal hearing for the voices of conscience, and who can only obey by suffering.

We could have wished Laura a happier fate—“even in her play she was a personality,” says Mrs. Ward, and a personality, charming and inspiring, she remains to the end. Here is an early picture of her:

“All her childhood through she had the most surpassing gift for happiness. From morning till night she lived in a flutter of delicious nothings. Unless he watched her closely, Stephen Fountain [her father] could not tell for the life of him what she was about all day. But he saw that she was endlessly about something; her little hands and legs never rested; she dug, bathed, dabbled, raced, kissed, ate, slept, in one happy bustle, which never slackened except for the hours when she lay rosy and still in her bed. And even then the pretty mouth was still eagerly open, as though sleep had just breathed upon its chatter for a few charmed moments, and, the joy within, was already breaking from the spell.”

Laura always took things hardly. When her father was alive she taught herself German that she might read Heine and Goethe with him;

“and one evening, when she was little more than sixteen, he rushed her through the first part of ‘Faust,’ so that she lay awake the whole night afterwards in such a passion of emotion that it seemed, for the moment, to change her whole existence.”

The warfare in Laura’s mind between her growing love for Helbeck the man, and her unrelenting disapproval, her hatred, of Helbeck the Catholic is described with the sympathetic analysis that Mrs. Ward always brings to such subtle combats. The story is a third way through. Dislike is a thing of the past. They already feel the force of mutual attraction, but there has been no confession of love. Still, they have reached the point when he can speak to her freely of his personal affairs. His fortune is spent, his house is dismantled, his personal wants have been reduced to the bare necessities of life, but claims—large claims—still remain. The Romney must go. It is his last possession of any value. The sum which the dealer has offered will help to finish his Catholic orphanage buildings:

“She died a hundred years ago, pretty creature! She has had her turn; so have we—in the pleasure of looking at her.

‘But she belongs to you,’ said the girl, insistently, ‘She is your own kith and kin.’

He hesitated, then said, with a new emphasis that answered her own:

‘Perhaps there are two sorts of kindred —.’

The girl’s cheek flushed.

‘And the one you mean may always push out the other? I know, because one of your children told me a story to-day—such a frightful story!—of a saint who would not go to see his dying brother, for obedience’s sake. She asked me if I liked it. How could I say I liked it! I told her it was horrible. I wondered how people could tell her such tales.’

Her bearing was again all hostility—a young defiance. She was delighted to confess herself. Her crime, untold, had been pressing upon her conscience, hurting her natural frankness.

Helbeck’s face changed. He looked at her attentively, the fine dark eye, under the commanding brow, straight and sparkling.

‘You said that to the child?’

‘Yes.’

Her breast fluttered. She trembled, he saw, with an excitement she could hardly express.

He, too, felt a novel excitement—the excitement of a strong will provoked. It was clear to him that she meant to provoke him—that her young personality threw itself wantonly across his own. He spoke with a harsh directness:

‘You did wrong, I think—quite wrong. Excuse the word, but you have brought me to close quarters. You sowed the seeds of doubt, of revolt, in a child’s mind.’

‘Perhaps,’ said Laura, quickly. ‘What then?’

She wore her half-wild, half-mocking look. Everything soft and touching had disappeared. The eyes shone under the golden mass of hair; the small mouth was close and scornful. Helbeck looked at her in amazement, his own pulse hurrying.

‘What then?’ he echoed, with a sternness that astonished himself. ‘Ask your own feeling. What has a child—a little child under orders—to do with doubt or revolt? For her—for us all—doubt is misery.’

Laura rose. She forced down her agitation—made herself speak plainly.

‘Papa taught me—it was life—and I believe him.’”

Here is a later extract—after the barriers between them are quite broken down:

“A light noise on the gravel caught his ear.

His heart leapt.

‘Laura!’

She stopped—a white wraith in the light mist that filled the garden. He went up to her, overwhelmed with the joy of her coming—accusing himself of a hundred faults.

She was too miserable to resist him. The storm of feeling through which she had passed had exhausted her wholly; and the pining for his step and voice had become an anguish driving her to him.

‘I told you to make me afraid!’ she said mournfully, as she found herself once more upon his breast—‘but you can’t! There is something in me that fears nothing—not even the breaking of both our hearts.’”

In this, as in former books, Mrs. Ward brings to the consideration of spiritual problems a fine gift of characterisation and the mellowed powers of a cultivated mind. Her interest in the psychological development of men and women to whom such problems are the half of life is as perennial as her sympathy with the troubled eyes, the generous impulses, the short joys, and the shorter sorrows of youth. She is interested in things felt and rejected rather than in things seen and done; and although she is not a conscious maker of phrases, there are many passages that permit themselves to be remembered as the reader makes his way through these meditative, leisurely pages:

“He had the passionate scorn for popularity which grows up naturally in those who have no power with the crowd.”

“The once solitary master of Bannisdale was becoming better acquainted with that mere pleasantness of a woman’s company which is not passion, but its best friend.”

“She had been bred in that strong sense of personal dignity which is the modern substitute for the abasements and humiliations of faith.”

“In both natures passion was proud and fastidious from its birth; it could live without much caressing.”

“The great Catholic tradition beat through her meagre life as the whole Atlantic may run pulsing through a drifting weed.”

“So long as pain and death remain, humanity will always be at heart a mystic!”

“To what awful or tender things would it [the spell of Catholic order and discipline] admit her! That ebb and flow of mystical emotion she dimly saw in Helbeck, a life within a life—all that is most intimate and touching in the struggle of the soul, all that strains and pierces the heart; the world to which these belong rose before her, secret, mysterious, ‘a city not made with hands,’ now drawing, now repelling. Voices came from it to her that penetrated all the passion and immaturity of her nature.”

As to religious views, Mrs. Ward holds the scales even. She makes the reader feel for Laura and Helbeck in turn. Her attitude is that of the observer who sees good in all creeds, infallibility in none. If, in the speech of Laura, Helbeck, and the subsidiary characters, there is much that a Jesuit will approve and an Agnostic dislike, there is much also that a Jesuit will dislike and an Agnostic approve. Helbeck of Bannisdale is an analysis of an extremely difficult and interesting problem by one who has a genius for such inquiries, and who is able to clothe her intellectual abstractions with the bodies of living men and women.

Evelyn Innes. By George Moore.
(Fisher Unwin.)

WE have an immense respect for Mr. George Moore as a novelist. His patience, his laboriousness, his remarkable fidelity to the artistic light that is in him, are rare and invaluable qualities in an age of facile production and ready compromise. Starting, we should say, with almost no initial equipment of genius for fiction, he has worked his way by sheer dogged perseverance to a manner of expression and a point of view which, though they may excite discussion, cannot at least fail to rivet attention and enchain interest. Neither the expression nor the point of view, indeed, is, or is likely to be, in any ultimate sense, personal. To shake off critical pre-occupations and to see absolutely for himself seems to be an impossible thing for Mr. Moore. But if you compare Esther Waters or Evelyn Innes, whether for style or insight, with some of the author's earlier work, what an advance! The student of human nature has acquired a real knowledge in some at least of the secret things of the heart. The eye of the realist has been trained to discriminate and select, to a perception of the significant, instead of the obvious, in the external shell of life. And the pains devoted to Mr. Moore's style have not been without fruit. Verbal melody he generally misses, grammatical correctness sometimes. "There is no place in Paris," he will tell you, "where you get a better petite marmite than the Ambassadeurs." His sentences are frequently stiff and frequently jerky; too short or too overloaded with co-ordination. But—and it is a big but—he has learnt to paint, to visualise, to call up an image not of the outlines merely, but of the atmosphere, of a room, of a garden, of an environment. Here is one of fifty examples:

"The broad walk was full of the colour of spring and its perfume, the thick grass was like a carpet beneath their feet; they had lingered by a pond; and she had watched the little yachts, carrying each a portent of her own success or failure. The Albert Hall curved over the tops of the trees, and sheep strayed through the deep May grass in Arcadian peacefulness; but the most vivid impression was when they had come upon a lawn stretching gently to the water's edge. Owen had feared the day was too cold for sitting out, but at that moment the sun contradicted him with a broad, warm gleam. He had fetched two chairs from a pile stacked under a tree, and sitting on that lawn, swept by the shadow of softly moving trees, they had talked an hour or more. The scene came back to her as she sat looking into the fire. She saw the spring, easily victorious amid the low bushes, capturing the rough branches of the elms one by one, and the distant slopes of the park, grey like a piece of faded tapestry. And as in a tapestry the ducks came through the mist in long, pulsing flight; and, when the day cleared, the pea fowl were seen across the water sunning themselves on the high branches."

Evelyn Innes is an elaborate and minutely analytic study of the musical temperament. The heroine is a singer of opera—Wagnerian opera. She is one of those who, as Plato has it, pipe away their souls in sweet and plaintive melodies. Her spiritual life is confined almost entirely to vague emotions, and to such ideas as find their natural expression in music—ideas very slightly intellectualised, hardly raised above the level of sensations and emotions. She drifts along through life—with Mr. Moore watching and studying her, trying to disentangle and isolate the currents—in and out of a couple of liaisons, and, finally, into the bosom of the Holy Catholic Church. Precisely the same kind of mental processes determine her conversion as those which lead her out of the arms of one lover and into those of another. This is the spirit of it:

"Then, to rid herself of the remembrance, she thought of the joy she had experienced that morning at hearing in the Creed that God's Kingdom shall never pass away. Her soul had kindled like a flame, and she had praised God, crying to herself: 'Thy Kingdom shall last for ever and ever.' It had seemed to her that her soul had acquired kinship over all her faculties, over all her senses; for the time being it had ruled her utterly; and so delicious was its subjection, that she had not dared to move lest she should lose this sweet peace. Her lips had murmured an 'Our Father,' but so slowly that the sanctus bell had rung before she had finished it. Nothing troubled her, and the torrent of delight which had flowed into and gently overflowed her soul had intoxicated and absorbed her until it had seemed to her that there was nothing further for her to desire."

The interest of Mr. Moore's analysis is undeniable, although we own to finding it a trifle too subjective and monotonous. The young lady's fluctuations carry one rather often over the same ground, and we fancy that a broader touch would have enabled Mr. Moore to produce a really more vivid effect. The background of the book is filled up with musical discussion, skilfully designed to bring into contrast the two sides of music which attach it to the sensual life and the life of devotion respectively. We do not presume to sound the depths of Mr. Moore's musical lore, but we are not surprised that in Dulwich "none remembered that Dowlands was the name of Henry the Eighth's favourite lute-player." Surely his name was Dowland, and himself a contemporary not of Henry, but of Elizabeth!

PREFACE TO THE "MASTER OF BALLANTRAE."

IN our "Notes and News" columns we give some account of the bonus volume of the Edinburgh edition of the works of R. L. Stevenson, which include the hitherto unpublished preface to the Master of Ballantrae. This, says Mr. Colvin, in his biographical note, was written in the Pacific in 1889, with reminiscences of the office in Edinburgh of his old friend Mr. Charles Baxter, W.S. When he published the book in that year, he decided to suppress his preface, as being too much in the vein of Jedediah Cleishbotham and Mr. Peter Pattieson; but afterwards he expressed a wish that it should be given with the Edinburgh edition. At that time, however, the MS. had gone astray, and the text has now been recovered from his original draft.

The preface introduces "an old, consistent exile, the editor of the following pages" [The Master of Ballantrae], "who has just alighted at the door of his friend, Mr. Johnstone Thomson, W.S.," with whom he was to stay. Later, the two friends, "having pledged the past in a preliminary bumper," drop into a confidential chat.

"I have something quite in your way," said Mr. Thomson. "I wished to do honour to your arrival; because, my dear fellow, it is my own youth that comes back along with you; in a very tattered and withered state, to be sure, but—well!—all that's left of it."

"A great deal better than nothing," said the editor. "But what is this which is quite in my way?"

"I was coming to that," said Mr. Thomson: "Fate has put it in my power to honour your arrival with something really original by way of dessert. A mystery."

"A mystery?" I repeated.

"Yes," said his friend, "a mystery. It may prove to be nothing, and it may prove to be a great deal. But in the meanwhile it is truly mysterious, no eye having looked on it for near a hundred years; it is highly genteel, for it treats of a titled family; and it ought to be melodramatic, for (according to the superscription) it is concerned with death."

"I think I rarely heard a more obscure or a more promising announcement," the other remarked. "But what is it?"

"You remember my predecessor's, old Peter M'Brair's, business?"

"I remember him acutely; he could not look at me without a pang of reprobation, and he could not feel the pang without betraying it. He was to me a man of a great historical interest, but the interest was not returned."

"Ah well, we go beyond him," said Mr. Thomson. "I daresay old Peter knew as little about this as I do. You see, I succeeded to a prodigious accumulation of old law-papers and old tin boxes, some of them of Peter's hoarding, some of his father's, John, first of the dynasty, a great man in his day. Among other collections, were all the papers of the Durrisdeers!"

"The Durrisdeers!" cried I. "My dear fellow, these may be of the greatest interest. One of them was out in the '45; one had some strange passages with the Devil—you will find a note of it in Law's Memorials, I think; and there was an unexplained tragedy, I know not what, much later, about a hundred years ago —"

"More than a hundred years ago," said Mr. Thomson. "In 1783."

"How do you know that? I mean some death."

"Yes, the lamentable deaths of my lord Durrisdeer and his brother, the Master of Ballantrae (attained in the troubles)," said Mr. Thomson with something the tone of a man quoting. "Is that it?"

"To say truth," said I, "I have only seen some dim reference to the things in memoirs; and heard some traditions dimmer still, through my uncle (whom I think you knew). My uncle lived when he was a boy in the neighbourhood of St. Bride's; he has often told me of the avenue closed up and grown over with grass, the great gates never opened, the last lord and his old maid sister who lived in the back parts of the house, a quiet, plain, poor, hum-drum couple it would seem—but pathetic too, as the last of that stirring and brave house—and, to the country folk, faintly terrible from some deformed traditions.”

“Yes,” said Mr. Thomson. “Henry Graeme Durie, the last lord, died in 1820; his sister, the Honourable Miss Catherine Durie, in '27; so much I know: and by what I have been going over the last few days, they were what you say, decent, quiet people and not rich. To say truth, it was a letter of my lord's that put me on the search for the packet we are going to open this evening. Some papers could not be found; and he wrote to Jack M'Brair suggesting they might be among those sealed up by a Mr. Mackellar. M'Brair answered, that the papers in question were all in Mackellar's own hand, all (as the writer understood) of a purely narrative character; and besides, said he, 'I am bound not to open them before the year 1889.' You may fancy if these words struck me: I instituted a hunt through all the M'Brair repositories; and at last hit upon that packet which (if you have had enough wine) I propose to show you at once.”

In the smoking-room, to which my host now led me, was a packet, fastened with many seals and enclosed in a single sheet of strong paper thus endorsed:

“Papers relating to the lives and lamentable deaths of the late Lord Durisdeer, and his elder brother James, commonly called Master of Ballantrae, attainted in the troubles: entrusted into the hands of John M'Brair in the Lawnmarket of Edinburgh, W.S.; this 20th day of September Anno Domini 1789; by him to be kept secret until the revolution of one hundred years complete, or until the 20th day of September 1889: the same compiled and written by me,

EPHRAIM MACKELLAR,

For near forty years Land Steward on the estates of His Lordship.”

As Mr. Thomson is a married man, I will not say what hour had struck when we laid down the last of the following pages; but I will give a few words of what ensued.

“Here,” said Mr. Thomson, “is a novel ready to your hand: all you have to do is to work up the scenery, develop the characters, and improve the style.”

“My dear fellow,” said I, “they are just the three things that I would rather die than set my hand to. It shall be published as it stands.”

“But it's so bald,” objected Mr. Thomson.

“I believe there is nothing so noble as baldness,” replied I, “and I am sure there is nothing so interesting. I would have all literature bald, and all authors (if you like) but one.”

“Well, well,” said Mr. Thomson, “we shall see.”

SONNETS ON THE SONNET.

THE Rev. Matthew Russell, S.J., is an enthusiastic student of the sonnet, and the centre, one gathers, of quite a group of amateur sonneteers. He has compiled a volume of sonnets dealing with the structure and nature of the fourteen-lined crux of versification.

The following is Mr. Russell's rendering of “the earliest known Sonnet on the Sonnet,” by Diego Hurtado de Mendoza (1503-1575):

“You ask a sonnet, lady, and behold!

The first line and the second are complete.

If equal luck I in the third should meet,

With one verse more the first quatrain is told.

St. James for Spain! the fifth verse is outrolled—

Now for the sixth. 'Twill be a gallant feat

If after all I manage to retreat

Safe with my life from this encounter bold.

Already, rounded well, each quatrain stands.

What say you, lady? Do I bravely speed?

Yet ah! heaven knows the tercets me affright;

And, if this sonnet were but off my hands,

Another I should ne'er attempt indeed.

But now, thank God, my sonnet's finished quite.”

An early sonnet on the structure of the sonnet is the following, by Thomas Edwards (1699-1757):

“Capricious Wray a sonnet needs must have;

I ne'er was so put to 't before: a sonnet!

Why, fourteen verses must be spent upon it:

'Tis good, however, to have conquered the first stave.

Yet I shall ne'er find rhymes enough by half,
Said I, and found myself 't the midst o' the second.
If twice four verses were but fairly reckon'd,
I should turn back on the hardest part, and laugh.

Thus far, with good success, I think I've scribbled
And of the twice seven lines have got o'er ten.

Courage! another 'll finish the first triplet;

Thanks to thee, Muse, my work begins to shorten:

There's thirteen lines got through, driblet by driblet;

'Tis done. Count how you will, I warrant there's fourteen.”

The maiden sonnet, what has it not cost its author? The directions for making it are thus set out by the Rev. J. J. Judkin:

“Of fourteen lines your sonnet must consist,

The first and fourth and fifth and eighth of which

Will have their final syllables to hitch

In the same rhyme; yet not with tortuous twist

Of words, but flowing kindly, e'en as kissed

Melt into kisses baby-lips; then rich

In your authorities from Walker, pitch

The intervening lines, like harmonist

Most true, to one key-note. The closing six

In couplets or in triplets freely mix,

Taking chief care, lest critics rate you on it,

The thought in its staid unity to fix.

And then hurra! fling high your tartan bonnet,

For lo! the thing is done—your maiden sonnet.”

This is technical enough, but in the following sonnet we reach the depth of this kind of writing:

“Fourteen ten-syllabled iambic lines

Rhymed in two quatrains: a, b, b, a.

Such is the classical Petrarchan way,

But usage in our harsher tongue inclines

To wider tolerance, and oft assigns

A third rhyme for the middle couplet here,

Where to its close the octave draweth near

And for a breathing-space the poet pines.

The sestet follows with its two new rhymes,

Alternate thus: c d, c d, c d;

More oft these tercets run in triple chimes,

Of which the symbol is twice c d e.

Unless the closing tercet should betimes

Reverse this order into e d c.”

In the second division of his book Mr. Russell places sonnets on the nature of the sonnet, and very properly leads off with Wordsworth's on the “sonnet's scanty plot of ground.” Rossetti's “A Moment's Monument” will bear quoting again:

“A sonnet is a moment's monument,

Memorial from the soul's eternity

To one dead deathless hour. Look that it be,

Whether for lustral rite or dire portent,

Of its own arduous fulness reverent:

Carve it in ivory or in ebony,

As day or night may rule, and let Time see

Its flowering crest imperal and orient.

A sonnet is a coin: its face reveals

The soul—its converse to what power 'tis due:

Whether for tribute to the august appeals

Of Life, or dower in Love's high retinue,

It serve, or 'mid the dark wharf's cavernous breath

In Charon's palm it pays the toll to death.”

And here is the second of three sonnets on the sonnet by the late Mr. John Addington Symonds:

“There is no mood, no heart-throb fugitive,

No spark from man's imperishable mind,

No movement of man's will, that may not find

Form in the sonnet and thenceforward live

A potent elf, by art's imperative

Magic to crystal spheres of song confined—

As in the moonstone's orb pent spirits wind

'Mid dungeon-depths day-beams they take and give.

Spare thou no pains; carve thought's pure diamond

With fourteen facets scattering fire and light.

Uncut, what jewel burns but darkly bright?

And Prospero vainly waves his runic wand

If, spurning art's inexorable law,

In Ariel's prison-sphere he leaves one flaw.”

In all Mr. Russell quotes 157 sonnets, of which 124 are English, and the remainder translations from the French, German, Italian, and Spanish. About thirty of the sonnets, classed under the title of “The Sonnet's Latest Votaries,” have been expressly written by the editor and his friends for this pleasant volume.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1898.

No. 1364, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

|   | YEARLY. |    |    | HALF-YEARLY. |    |    | QUARTERLY. |    |    |
|---|---------|----|----|--------------|----|----|------------|----|----|
|   | £       | s. | d. | £            | s. | d. | £          | s. | d. |
| If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .               | 0       | 13 | 0  | 0            | 6  | 6  | 0          | 3  | 3  |
| Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom. . . . .                | 0       | 15 | 3  | 6            | 7  | 8  | 0          | 3  | 10 |
| Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . . | 0       | 18 | 0  | 0            | 9  | 0  | 0          | 4  | 6  |

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE bonus volume to be presented to subscribers to the "Edinburgh Stevenson" — Miscellanea, Moral Emblems, &c. — is a strange medley. It is not one book so much as a nest of books, approximating to a Japanese nest of boxes. At the beginning are "The Charity Bazaar," two poems on lighthouses, a memoir on a new method of light for lighthouses, a memoir on the thermal influence of forests, reflections and remarks on human life, a broken essay on the ideal house, and a suppressed — or rather lost — preface to The Master of Ballantrae (portions of which will be found in our "Fiction Supplement," and which subsequently will probably be prefixed to the new edition of the romance that Messrs. Cassell & Co. are contemplating). Lastly come facsimiles of the quaint little pamphlets which were issued from the Davos private press. Altogether a very remarkable collection.

IN Mr. Pennell's article in the Studio on these tiny high-spirited publications, which was the first information concerning them which most persons received, too little attention was paid to "the volume of enchanting poetry" by R. L. S., entitled Not I, and Other Poems; and to Mr. Samuel Lloyd Osbourne's tale, Black Canyon; or, Wild Adventures in the Far West. Mr. Osbourne begins with a fine abruptness. This is Chapter I. in full:

"In this forest we see, in a misty morning, a camp fire! Sitting lazily around it are three men. The oldest is evidently a sailor. The sailor turns to the fellow next to him and says, 'Blast my eyes if I know where we is.' 'It's rather think we're in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains,' remarked the young man.

Suddenly the bushes parted. 'WHAT!' they all exclaim, 'not Black Eagle?' Who is Black Eagle? We shall see."

AND this is the poem which gives its title to Not I:

"Some like drink
In a pint pot,
Some like to think;
Some not.

Strong Dutch Cheese,
Old Kentucky Rye;
Some like these;
Not I.

Some like Poe,
And others like Scott.
Some like Mrs. Stowe;
Some not.

Some like to laugh,
Some like to cry,
Some like chaff;
Not I."

AT the end of the fragment, "The Ideal House," is the recommendation to have in the little room for winter evenings "three shelves full of eternal books that never weary." These are the books: "Shakespeare, Molière, Montaigne, Lamb, Sterne, De Musset's comedies (the one volume open at Carmosine and the other at Fantasio); the Arabian Nights, and kindred stories, in Weber's solemn volumes; Borrow's Bible in Spain, the Pilgrim's Progress, Guy Mannerling and Rob Roy, Monte Cristo and the Vicomte de Bragelonne, immortal Boswell (sole among biographers), Chaucer, Herrick, and the State Trials." The essayist adds: "The bedrooms [of the Ideal House] are large, airy, with almost no furniture, floors of varnished wood, and at the bed-head, in case of insomnia, one shelf of books of a particular and dippable order, such as Pepys, the Paston Letters, Burt's Letters from the Highlands, or the Newgate Calendar . . ." And here the MS. breaks off.

THE delay that has occurred in the publication of the final volumes of the Edinburgh Stevenson — St. Ives, and the bonus volume which we have just described — is due to the elaborate arrangement necessary for the safe inclusion of the little Davos books within covers so much larger than themselves. St. Ives is ready and waiting: the others are being prepared as rapidly as possible.

THE statement, which has recently been circulated, that Mr. Grant Richards has converted his publishing business into a limited liability company is inaccurate. Mr. Richards has certainly formed a company, but it has nothing to do with the publishing business associated with his name.

IN our issue of May 28 we published an interview with Mr. Menken, the bookseller, of Bury-street, on the subject of Mr. Gladstone's dealings with him. Mr. Menken then showed our representative a series of nine of his own catalogues on which Mr. Gladstone had written orders for books. These catalogues are valuable documents, showing as they do in a convincing way what Mr. Gladstone's book-buying propensities were. To Mr. Menken they are, or rather were, cherished mementoes of his transactions with the late statesman. We are pleased to be able to state that these catalogues, together with the wrappers in which they were returned to Mr. Menken by Mr. Gladstone, are now the property of the nation, having been presented to the British Museum by Mr. Menken.

THE circumstances under which the gift was made were these: A paragraph appeared in the Daily Chronicle describing the catalogues which Mr. Menken was then exhibiting in his shop-window, and stating that Mr. Menken was refusing offers for their purchase. Mr. Menken soon received a letter from Dr. Garnett expressing the hope that his objection to part with the catalogues might not extend to a public library, and inviting him to offer them for the consideration of the Trustees of the British Museum. Mr. Menken then did a generous thing — he offered Mr. Gladstone's catalogues unconditionally as a gift to the Museum, and the Trustees have since formally accepted them and accorded Mr. Menken their warm thanks.

DR. GARNETT has also been the medium through which another interesting relic has found a resting-place in a great library. The guitar which Shelley presented to Jane Williams, wife of Captain Edward Ellerker Williams, who was afterwards drowned at sea with the poet, is now added to the treasures of the Bodleian Library. The guitar is the instrument referred to in Shelley's beautiful lines inscribed, "To a Lady with a Guitar." The suggestion that the instrument should be placed in the Bodleian came from Dr. Garnett, whose selection of this library in preference to the British Museum will not surprise those who remember Shelley's connexion with Oxford, and the fact that already the Bodleian possesses an invaluable collection of Shelley MSS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Westminster Gazette who, over the initial "F.," gives some interesting personal reminiscences of the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones, remarks: "Those who are not 'offended' by the paradoxes of Charles Lamb would have delighted in Burne-Jones's play of humour and imagination. Let me justify my reference to Charles Lamb. Not very long ago I returned to Burne-Jones some books which he had lent me thirty years before, writing to him to the effect that if it was base to keep borrowed books so long, it was heroic to return them after such long possession as might well breed the sense of ownership. In reply he said:

"The return of those books has simply staggered me. It has also pained me, for it seems to raise the standard of morality in these matters, and perhaps to sting the susceptible consciences of book-borrowers. I have many borrowed books on my shelves. I would rather the owners should die than that I should have to think about these things and return them. I have two costly volumes that were lent to me before that little incident of ours, which, you may remember, was in Red Lion-square. I hope the owner is no more, for I simply will not give them up. And you have made me uneasy, and have helped to turn an amiable rascal into a confirmed villain.—Your affectionate NED.”

THE Press Bazaar, to be held at the Hotel Cecil on the 28th and 29th inst., in aid of the funds of the London Hospital, is, of course, to have its own newspaper. This will be called The Press Bazaar News. We have received six typewritten sheets about this newspaperette, from which we gather the following facts:

The Press Bazaar News will be the smallest evening paper ever issued, and the most expensive.

It will run from the 28th to the 29th of this month.

It will have on its staff the editor of almost every important paper in England.

But—“it would be premature to give a list of the staff at present, as we are still awaiting replies from many important men.”

In fact—“it is hoped that a very exalted personage may be prevailed upon to accept the Chief Editorship.”

Already—“we have got the largest, the most brilliant, and the most representative staff in the world.”

The P.B.N. will have two “tickers” and a linotype machine.

It will employ “the most brilliant and fashionable reporters in London” and will not pay them a sixpence.

From twenty-five to thirty editions will be issued daily.

There will be newsboys to sell the papers “or, if we are lucky, newsgirls.”

Most of the papers that have “historic things” are exhibiting.

The Linotype Company is “standing the expense,” and every penny received from the sale of copies will go to the charity.

M. MAURICE MAETERLINCK has been staying in London. Students of the incongruous will like to know that the author of Le Trésor des Humbles dated his letters from the National Liberal Club.

M. JEAN RICHEPIN, author of Le Chemineau, from which Mr. Louis Parker adapted “Ragged Robin,” lives in a remote quarter of Paris, in a vast and rambling old house, half hidden by towering walls, and surrounded by a romantic waste of garden, thick with trees, and over-run by a tangle of bush and undergrowth. Upon this secluded site, says the Daily Mail, in former times an abbey stood, and its isolation and quietude, though now it lies within the city walls, still make it an ideal place of retreat. Though one residence, no fewer than three distinct and separate houses stand in the huge enclosure. In one of them the poet lives; a second is given up to his library, a superb collection of many thousands of volumes of literature of all ages and in every tongue; while the third is reserved for his work. The numberless rooms are quaint in shape and, for the most part, low-pitched and small, for the buildings are of considerable antiquity; and there is scarcely one but challenges immediate attention with some rare specimen of the cabinetmaker’s art, which usually betrays M. Richepin’s Southern descent and predilections. Rich Romanesque decorations and Moorish hangings and a thousand relics of mediæval times stamp the romanticism of the author. Something with a story or a legend confronts you at every turn. But nothing in this old-world abode exceeds in interest the dais and the chair of honour in the study, where the guest is sometimes throned; and, with never a disturbing whisper from the madding crowd beyond the garden walls, the brilliant dramatist holds his little court of friends and admirers.

WE take from the Sketch, which in its turn took from the Orlovuski Vestrick, the following Russian appreciation of our national bard:

“THIS NIGHT
WILL BE PRODUCED
AT KREMENCHUG THEATRE
A REAL ENGLISH TRAGEDY, ENTITLED

HAMLET:

OR, THE PRINCE OF DENMARK;

WRITTEN BY W. SHAKESPEARE,
THE FAVOURITE OF THE LOCAL PUBLIC.

This piece has had an enormous success at Kharkov.”

THE “Advertisement” which Mr. Henley has written for M. De Thierry’s little work on Imperialism is a fine and vigorous stimulus to patriotism and shoulder-to-shoulderism, as it might be called. Mr. Henley shows how only of late years has the consciousness of the glory of being Britons really got into the mind of the people. To Mr. Kipling, “the great living Laureate of Imperialism,” is this result largely due. Here is a passage from the “Advertisement”:

“We have renewed our old pride in the Flag, our old delight in the thought of a good thing done by a good man of his hands, our old faith in the ambitions and traditions of the race. I doubt, for instance, if, outside politics (and, perhaps, the Stock Exchange), there be a single Englishman who does not rejoice in the triumph of Mr. Rhodes: even as I believe that there is none, inside or out of politics, who does not feel the prouder for his kinship with Sir Herbert Kitchener. And the reason is on the surface. To the national conscience, drugged so long and so long bewildered and bemused, such men as Rhodes and Kitchener are heroic Englishmen. The one has added some hundreds of thousands of square miles to the Empire, and is neck-deep in the work of consolidating that he has got, and of taking more. The other is wiping out the great dishonour that overtook us at Khartoum, at the same time that he is ‘reaching down from the north’ to Bulawayo, and preparing the way of them that will change a place of skulls into a province of peace. Both are great; and that is much. But both are, after all, but types; and that is more. We know now, Mr. Kipling aiding, that all the world over are thousands of the like temper, the like capacity for government, the like impatience of anarchy; and that all the world over, these—each one according to his vision and his strength—are doing Imperial work at Imperial wages: the chance of a nameless death, the possibility of distinction, the certainty that the effect is worth achieving, and will surely be achieved.”

It is part of life’s irony that at the time these stirring words appear Mr. Henley is prostrate after another trying operation.

He has, however, turned the corner, and we trust that his recovery may be swift and sure.

AN evidence of Mr. H. G. Wells’s versatility lies before us in the shape of a Text-Book of Zoology, by H. G. Wells, B.Sc. Lond., F.Z.S., F.C.P., and A. M. Davies, B.Sc. Lond. This work which, we conceive, after a careful examination of its three hundred and odd pages, will not endanger the popularity of The War of the Worlds, has been based by Mr. Davies on Mr. Wells’s Text-Book of Biology.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: “Do you consider it worth while to make a note of the fact that the Wagnerian ‘cuts’ which have recently offended extreme Wagnerites are foreshadowed in Evelyn Innes? However, in the novel the protest was made by the prima donna herself:

“‘You have cut some of the music, I see,’ she said, addressing the conductor.

‘Only the usual cut,’ Miss Innes.

‘About twenty pages, I should think?’

The conductor counted them.

‘Eighteen.’

‘Miss Innes, that cut has been accepted everywhere—Munich, Berlin, Wiesbaden—everywhere except Bayreuth.’

‘But . . . my agreement with you is that the operas I sing in are to be performed in their entirety. . . . If people don’t care sufficiently for art to dine half-an-hour earlier, they had better stay away.’”

Ulick Dean, the musical critic, says of the manager that “the idea of Wagner without cuts always brings on a violent attack of toothache.”

THERE is an amusing, and very feminine account of the Women Writers’ Dinner in the Daily News. The note was struck in the sixth line with this passage: “Mrs. Crawshay’s opals and Mrs. Alec Gardiner’s diamonds were admired by all.” Then this merry woman writer proceeded:

“Of course everybody wants to know who was there! Mrs. Craigie took the chair, to her right sat Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, to her left Mrs. Andrew Lang. The presence of Mrs. Lang explained the article on woman’s usurpation of public dinners, which had interested readers in the evening’s Westminster Gazette. Others present were Mrs. Dollie Radford, looking as childish as her name; Mrs. M. L. Woods, straight up from Oxford, and a strong contingent from Cambridge, including Miss Clough and Miss E. E. C. Jones. “Rowland Grey,” “Iota,” and the Girl from the Carpathians were all there; also dear old Mrs. Parr, who pleaded for a veteran’s table next year, as the younger generation were so noisy and would smoke cigarettes. The speeches were brief and pointed, and all aimed at the reviewer—evidently the reviewer is believed to be ever of the male sex. Mrs. Simpson gave a few ‘memories,’ and expressed a pious horror of knickerbockers. Mrs. Steel gave examples of the length, breadth, and height of criticism, and of one form of critique which was an utterly unknown quantity. This last was the review which found fault with her grammar, and especially with the finality of her prepositions, and concluded: ‘This is a rule one ought to be ashamed of oneself for not being acquainted with.’ That we are our own best critics was a sentiment with which all agreed. Then 'Annie Swan' had the courage to quote the opinion that she was 'the apostle of the eternal commonplace,' and naively pointed out that, with a good husband, she was bound to picture life as it appeared to her. Miss Bateson, in a really witty speech, marred by a nervous delivery, gave some experiences of the journalist as general adviser. The public would consult her in all their private concerns, and ask whether strawberries should be served before cherries, and whether soup should be eaten with a knife. Of course, a journalist knew everything—knew equally how to conduct a war or arrange a bridal. There were even journalistic giants, who felt themselves equal to a redistribution of the supply of lovers and babies, though Miss Bateson confessed that she herself did not deal in perishable human goods. Then Mary Kingsley, in manly voice, acknowledged her crimes on the English language, and promptly proceeded to perpetrate more—especially in eliding the final g. But her stories were delightful, and to those who were shocked at them she explained that, compared to the language of other 'coasters,' she was only fit for a Sunday-school. And so with laughter and chat the evening drew to a close. Beatrice Harraden went off on her wanderings, spinsters took a final farewell of Annie Holdsworth (who is going to be married), and Miss Friedriches, Miss Billington, and other journalists gathered up their note-books and made for the newspaper offices."

Among distinguished Americans to visit England this summer is Mr. Hopkinson Smith, the author of Col. Carter, of Cartersville. Mr. Smith, who is both writer and painter, is contemplating a book on the Thames.

An English version of that sumptuous Paris guide to the fashions, La Mode Artistique, is announced. The first monthly number will appear in July. The beauty of the large coloured fashion-plates, finer than anything now published in this country, should ensure the success of the venture.

THE method of advertising his new magazine which Mr. Alfred Harmsworth is adopting is in keeping with the times. Huge financial speculations are rife, and the talk is of losses and risks. Hence Mr. Harmsworth begins with the remark: "It is being freely said that the loss on each copy of the forthcoming Harmsworth Magazine will be 3d." But that, the announcement continues, after an imposing array of figures, may or may not be the truth. Anyway:

"We know that in most expert quarters the magazine will invite the remark, 'How can they do it?' We are aware that all kinds of financial disaster is predicted as to the result. That again, as we have said, is our end of the matter. You pay the 3d., and any bankruptcy proceedings that may ensue are ours, not yours."

This is ingenious and ingenuous.

WE have already noticed The Eagle and the Serpent, a journal of egoistic philosophy and sociology, which appears each month with this pronouncement upon the cover:

"The earth is mortgaged to seven speculative scoundrels.

The rest of mankind are necessarily the slaves thereof.

A Race of Altruists is necessarily a Race of Slaves.

A Race of Freemen is necessarily a Race of Egoists."

The June issue contains some press opinions on The Eagle and the Serpent. This, from Teddy Ashton's Journal, is the one we like best. "We recommend E. & S. to the notice of all whose lives pulsate with a passion for a better order of things. Its eogographs stir the blood like a trumpet."

Two more Civil List pensions have been awarded, and well awarded, by Mr. Balfour. One, of £100, has gone to the Rev. J. C. Atkinson, who wrote that fascinating book, Fifty Years in a Moorland Parish, and other excellent works beside. A similar amount has gone to Canon Silvan Evans, who has spent the leisure of many years on a Welsh Dictionary.

WE invite the attention of literary agents to the remarks of Mr. W. H. Rideing, who instructs Americans on Literary Life in London by means of an article in the North American Review. There the literary agent of a familiar type is treated to some hard hitting. Here is a passage:

"His methods, like his manners, are bad, and rather than submit to his extortions and impudence more than one strong house has ceased to consider the work of the authors who are only accessible through him. To a certain extent he might be useful, at least so far as relieving hypersensitive creatures from the irritation almost unavoidable in business transactions, but he is not content with so simple an office. The more MSS. he sells and the higher the price he obtains the larger are his own commissions. The young author in his hands who has made a success at the start is not allowed to choose his own time for further work and to prepare for it, but is urged and tempted to add book to book until he becomes a diffuse and tedious hack, undesired by anybody, undesired even by the literary agent himself. An instance occurs to me. The young author was 'boomed' so persistently, that in order to fulfil his orders he had to rise at four in the morning, and then, sitting down with a typewriter before him and a phonograph at his elbow, he would carry along two stories at once. His first book was an instant success when it appeared a few years ago, but his last MS., delivered 'as per invoice,' in the words of the agent, has been rejected by thirteen different periodicals, and is still in the market. 'As per invoice' expresses the agent's view of literature precisely."

Mr. Rideing specially notes that there are agents and agents, and that the better ones are "entirely unobjectionable." But he seems to have a worse one very clearly in his eye. There are not so very many to select from.

MR. N. H. DOLE's romance of Omarism, to which we referred last week, is not that gentleman's only contribution to the literature that is gathering around the Persian poet's name. He has prepared a privately printed edition of FitzGerald's translation, accompanied on alternate pages by a Latin translation of FitzGerald's version made by Mr. Greene of Oxford, a tour de force which was privately issued in 1893.

EDWARD BURNE-JONES.

At the age of sixty-five has passed away Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Baronet, resigned A.R.A., wearer of the Order of the Legion of Honour, and honorary D.C.L. of Oxford University. These and other distinctions, which came to him, who never made a move towards them, were won without strife and were borne without ostentation. Once, indeed, he had been a competitor. That was when, as a Birmingham boy, born of the middle class, and sent to King Edward's Grammar School in the city commonly associated with Bright and Chamberlain, but also with Newman, he worked for a scholarship at Exeter College, Oxford, and had the wonderful luck and pluck, despite his artistic temperament, to secure it. William Morris (whose biography has been written by Mr. J. W. Mackail, Sir Edward Burne-Jones's son-in-law) entered the college on the same day; and the two youths, both destined by their families' dreams of respectability and their own innate love of the ideal to be clergymen, talked together about art, and saw an early picture of Rossetti's, just imported into Oxford by Mr. Coombe, of the Clarendon Press. The effect of that picture was enormous. What the chance words "Take and Read" did for St. Augustine, and what the meeting with another phrase did for Newman, the Rossetti canvas did for Burne-Jones in a quite opposite direction. He, too, decided to be a painter. But first he must make acquaintance with Rossetti, a far less formidable affair to manage in those days than it afterwards became. In fact, Rossetti, out of the goodness of his heart, was then giving some of his evenings to teaching at a college for working men in Great Titchfield-street. Thither went Burne-Jones; and, in the case of two such temperaments, a meeting was all that was requisite to make a friendship. Such men have, as part of a birthright which brings many counteracting disabilities, "the gift of intimacy," as George Meredith names it. Rossetti had, besides, something of the gift of divination. The most generous of praisers, he was also one of the most discerning. He had not known his new friend and William Morris many months before he wrote to Bell Scott: "Two young men have recently come to town from Oxford, and are now very intimate friends of mine. Their names are Morris and Jones. They have turned artists, and both are men of real genius. Jones's designs are marvels of finish and imaginative detail, unequalled by anything except, perhaps, Albert Dürer's finest works."

Literature, perhaps, detained both men a moment on their artistic way—the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, of which they were projectors, is the witness. But that was only for a moment, and Burne-Jones did not stop at Oxford long enough to take his degree. He settled in Sloane-terrace, until William Morris followed him from the University; and then the two friends dwelt in rooms together at No. 17, Red Lion-square. Rossetti was the foster-father of Burne-Jones's art—he gave the young man of his own brushes and paints, and lent him studies to copy—studies which the master rapidly withdrew on the ground that his disciple had already outdone him. An introduction by Rossetti to the Messrs. Powell resulted in Burne-Jones's doing a good deal of designing for stained glass. Pen-and-ink drawings, too, occupied his attention, and one of the finest of these early works was "The Waxen Image," practically an illustration for Rossetti's "Sister Helen." The later fifties passed pleasantly away with these and other tasks—including some Chaucer drawings treated decoratively on a cabinet for Morris (whose thoughts already ran to furniture), a triptych for a church at Brighton (St. Paul's), and some decorative work for the walls of the debating chamber of the Oxford Union. There was a holiday besides—a first visit to Italy. Wonderful to say, Rossetti did not go with him; never was the land which possessed his spirit, and informed his art and his thought, visited by Rossetti, except in imagination.

The year 1860 saw his marriage with Miss Georgina Macdonald, a marriage which gave him as sisters-in-law Lady Poynter and Mrs. Lockwood Kipling. Burne-Jones, needless to say, lived to be very proud of his nephew, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, who has lately spent much time near his uncle's house at Rottingdean, and has been his companion in many a walk and talk. It was about the time of his marriage that Burne-Jones secured another piece of fortune—the friendship of Mr. Ruskin, that fairy godfather of young artists of talent. Two years later Burne-Jones accompanied Ruskin to Italy; and when, a little later, the young painter produced a series of illustrations of Morris's "Earthly Paradise," Mr. Ruskin bought them and presented them to the Oxford Museum—one little item in the expending of that £157,000 which Mr. Ruskin received from his parents and regarded as if he were a steward rather than an owner. Thirteen years later, Burne-Jones, the most retreating of men, came before the footlights as the defender of Ruskin, when his angry dismissal of the Grosvenor Gallery pictures of Mr. Whistler brought down upon him a libel action for damages—estimated by the jury at one farthing. The evidence given by Burne-Jones on that occasion has been perversely misquoted within the last few weeks; so we think it worth while to repeat it in full as best reported in the daily press of the morning after—a version the present writer, an ear-witness of the proceedings, can verify:

"Mr. Edward Burne-Jones, examined by Mr. Bowen, deposed—I am a painter, and have devoted twenty years of my life to that study. I have painted various works within the last few years which are known to the public. I was the author of the 'Days of Creation' and 'Venus's Mirror,' both of which were exhibited at the Grosvenor Gallery in 1877. I also exhibited 'Deferentia,' 'Fides,' 'St. George,' and 'Sybil.'

In your opinion, what part do finish and completeness bear to the merit of a painting?—I think complete finish ought to be the object of all artists.

Had you an opportunity of seeing the pictures of Mr. Whistler in this court?—I saw them yesterday.

[Shown the 'Nocturne in blue and silver,' belonging to Mrs. Leyland, and representing a scene on the river.]

What is your judgment of that picture as a work of art?—I think it is a work of art—an admirable beginning; but very incomplete. It is a sketch, in short.

It does not show the finish of a complete work of art?—Not in any sense whatever. It is a beautiful sketch; but that is not alone sufficient to make it a good work of art. Form—quite as important as colour—is deficient in the picture.

Are composition and detail also of great importance in a picture?—Yes.

What is your opinion as to the composition of this picture?—I think it has no composition whatever, but it has distinct and high merit, so far as colour goes.

[Shown the 'Nocturne in blue and silver,' representing a night scene at Battersea-bridge.]

What do you say to this picture?—It is similar to the last, only I think the colour is still better. It is, however, bewildering in its form.

And as to composition and detail?—It has none whatever. A day or a day and a half seems a reasonable time within which to paint it.

Does this picture show any finish as a work of art?—No; I should call it a sketch. I do not think Mr. Whistler ever intended it to be a finished work.

Take, lastly, the 'Nocturne in black and gold,' representing fireworks at Cremorne. What is your judgment upon it?—I don't think it has the merit of the other two at all.

Is it in your opinion a finished work of art?—It would be impossible for me to say so. I have never seen any picture of night which has been successful; and this is only one of the thousand failures which artists have made in their efforts at painting night.

Is that picture, in your judgment, worth 200 guineas?—No; I cannot say it is, seeing how much careful work men do for so much less.

Mr. Bowen proposed to ask the witness to look at a picture by Titian, in order to show what finish was.

Mr. Serjeant Parry objected.

Mr. Baron Huddleston.—You will have to prove that it is a Titian.

Mr. Bowen.—I shall be able to do that.

Baron Huddleston.—That can only be by repute. I do not want to raise a laugh, but there is a well-known case of an undoubted Titian being purchased with a view to enabling students and others to find out how to produce his beautiful colours. With that object the picture was rubbed down, and they found a red surface, beneath which they thought was the secret, but on continuing the rubbing down they discovered a full-length portrait of George III. in uniform. (Laughter.)

The picture, a portrait of 'Andre Gatti,' was produced, and the witness, having examined the picture, gave it as his opinion that it was a highly finished picture, exhibiting great artistic skill.

Examination continued.—Mr. Whistler gave great promise at first, but I do not think he has followed it. The difficulties in painting increase daily as the work progresses, and that is the reason why so many of us fail. We are none of us perfect. The danger is this, that if unfinished pictures become common, we shall arrive at a stage of mere manufacture, and the art of the country will be degraded.

A Juror asked—What is the value of the picture produced?

Witness.—It is a mere accident of the sale room.

Mr. Serjeant Parry.—Is it worth £1,000?

Witness.—It would be worth many thousands to me, but it might be sold for £40.

Do you mean to say that it could be bought now for £40?—Yes, it might. I know of a very fine Titian being bought by Lord Elcho for 20 guineas. The picture produced, I believe, belongs to Mr. Buskin.

You have said Mr. Whistler has an unrivalled sense of atmosphere?—Yes, I certainly think so.

How long have you known him?—For 13 or 14 years.

You have exhibited unfinished pictures yourself?—Yes, I have.

Is it a wicked thing to exhibit unfinished pictures?—I do not think it is very desirable. Mr. Whistler's colour is beautiful, in his moonlight pieces especially.

Mr. Serjeant Parry.—You would not call a man a wilful impostor for exhibiting those pictures?

Mr. Bowen objected to the question, which Mr. Serjeant Parry did not press."

There was nothing of malice about Burne-Jones, then or ever. Even Mr. Whistler, who has taken many revenges, and has boasted about them in a book, could hardly complain. The vengeance he took henceforth on the witness for Ruskin was to call him baldly "Jones." The bearer of that surname needs, doubtless, a further distinction—he is one of a multitude. That was why, by degrees, a hyphen grew up between the Burne and the Jones, in the case of this artist; indeed, the name grew to be Edward Coley Burne Burne-Jones. The Burne was a godsend to an exhibitor who wished to be marked in memory among other Joneses; and when the baronetcy was offered to him, one reason he gave for accepting it was the further distinction of Jones from Jones afforded by the title. One remembers there was another Jones, who had not the same ideas; for he, when the Stuarts were kings, was offered the title of Sir, but he did not take it, preferring to pay a fine rather. But then he had the prefix Inigo; and his monuments are of imperishable stone.

The baronetcy dates from 1894. Years earlier Sir Edward had been elected a member of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours; and though he had never exhibited in the Academy, the good-will of Lord Leighton procured him an associateship in 1885—an honour which made him happy only in the resigning of it a year or two later. The Grosvenor Gallery, first, was his true home; and then the New Gallery. There it was that he made the large public fame which has been his since the seventies. Punch might exclaim, "Burn Jones!" and Philistines might smile at the suggested auto-da-fé of his works. All the same, the admirers of the artist grew in numbers and in enthusiasm, and such pictures as "The Mirror of Venus," "King Cophetua," "The Days of Creation," "The Golden Stairs," and "The Briar Rose" were the chief attractions of the galleries that held them. For years there was no moderation where his reputation was in question. The extremes of praise and blame were meted out to him; and it is only of late that people agreed to differ about him without mutual scorn, or were allowed to be indifferent. That he was an illuminator in some of his qualities rather than a painter might well be conceded to his critics, and his deficiencies as a draughtsman may be allowed by those to whom his great decorative qualities, and his fine treatment of drapery, remain as high memories of the art of his time. Fortune, as well as fame, came to him in his later years; for his prices are indicated by the great sums of 1,350 guineas paid for his "Wine of Circe," and of 3,780 guineas for his "Beguiling of Merlin."

"ZACK."

MISS KEATS began to write under her pseudonym of "Zack"—by which we shall henceforward speak of her—for Blackwood's Magazine in November, 1896. Her contribution was a story in Cornish dialect, called "Widder Vlint." So were "Rab Vinch's Wife" and "Travelling Joe," published in the early part of 1897. "The Busted Blue Doll," which appeared just a year ago, told an episode of Australian goldfields; so did "The Failure of Flipperty" a few months later. "At the Stroke of the Hour," which was in the April number of "Maga," and "The Storm," published about the same time in the Outlook, took her back to Cornish scenes. Messrs. Blackwood have just brought out a volume by "Zack," called Life is Life, which contains one story a good deal longer than any yet included in the short list which we have gone through. But, if longer, it could not well be stronger. Force and concentration of feeling are the essential characteristics of this lady's work. What she sees or says, she says and sees with implacable distinctness. Her narration is bare even to baldness; it does not extend so much comment as is contained in a compassionate epithet. Comment there is, no doubt, on the situation here and there, but it is put dramatically, and forms part of the narrative. Yet her vision of life, though grim and unsparing, is not pitiless. It has the insight that irradiates rather than lays bare for dissection; and it irradiates strange places; hidden tendernesses in gnarled and twisted lives, set hard by time or native obduracy. Nothing need be said of her two Australian stories, remarkable as they are, and interesting because they testify indubitably an experience gathered overseas. But take the five Cornish ones. "Widder Vlint" is the tale of an old woman who had borne three drunkards and found herself "disrespectit in the village," yet overflowed with thankfulness and love for her gift of children; "Travelling Joe" is a crippled boy with the soul of a world wanderer inherited from a vagrant father; "At the Stroke of the Hour" tells how an old sexton, dispossessed of his hereditary office, dug his own grave, and on the very brink of it knelt before the altar, evoking the images of all his past life till the youth of the old despairing pensioner lives and breathes before you. "The Storm" is a tale of love passion, and describes the wives of fisher-folk waiting in their cottage on the cliff, while through every sentence you seem to hear the blast straining and shaking at the door. "Zack," you see, has a varied range of sympathy. But the finest thing she has done is "Rab Vinch's Wife," telling how the wife, not twenty months married, urges her husband to go and give himself up for the killing of a man, since an innocent person—a mere idiot indeed—has been condemned, and the weak should not suffer for the strong.

"'Twid be zame ez if yer wez to let a chile dic for 'ee," she said, in a slow dreamy voice, speaking as one who had seen a vision.

He thrust her from him and rose to his feet. "Then I wull gi' meself up ta-marrer," he said, "but ez for 'ee," he added with concentrated bitterness, "yer ba no wife o' mine from this hour," and he turned from her and climbed the rickety stairs that led to their bed-room."

In the morning he stole from her side, tended his ferrets, oiled his guns tenderly, tied up his big lurcher, and going out shut the cottage door behind him.

"A rough sob rose in his throat. 'I didn't reckon her wid zlaple like thic,' he said, 'but there, women folk be alwiz contrary.'

Up through the great woods he went, for his road to the town lay that way. And in a certain hedge facing west a hare had made its seat. Rab had often tried to catch it, but the hare had been too wary for him, and now, as he passed the accustomed spot, he stopped instinctively and noticed that the snare had been brushed away, but that the animal had escaped. He knelt down and re-set the wire, and as he did so he heard footsteps, and looking up he saw his wife. The blood rushed into his face, but he assumed an air of indifference.

'I reckon I've alwiz zet thickey snare a deal too low,' he said, bending down over his work; 'a hare howlds hiz 'ead wonderful 'igh when ha ba movetting along unconscious. Eh,' he continued, drawing a deep breath, 'but hares ba vautysheny (handsome) baistesses; skaurs o' times I've nuckeed (stooped down low) behind a bit o' vuz wi' tha moon a-glinting a-tap o' me an cock-leert (dawn) jest on tha creep and iverything that quiet 'ee cud moast a-yhear tha dew a-valling; eh, an' I've 'ad tha gun a-zide o' me, an' cudn't vire cuz they baistesses wez thic vautysheny.'

But she only saw that an animal caught in such a snare would be hung.

'Come away, Rab,' she cried, 'come away.' He looked down at the snare meditatively.

'Zome o'em,' he said, half to himself, 'makes a to-do, but moast die meral quiet.'

'O Rab, come away,' she repeated in a voice of agony, 'come away.'

'Ba 'ee afraid I shall ba late for tha hanging,' he cried and sprang to his feet; then, without waiting for her answer, he rushed past her and was hidden from view behind the thick trees.

'Rab!' she called, running after him, 'Rab! Rab! Rab!'

But there came no reply. Later in the day she learned that he had surrendered himself to the police, but permission to see him was refused. So when evening came she crept homewards alone through the great woods, and when she had reached the spot where he had set the snare she heard a strange cry; the hare had been caught in the wire. Covering her ears with her hands she fled away, yet ever and ever the cry followed her."

This mixture of realism based on close observation with the symbol-making imagination is very like the quality that we call genius.

WHAT THE PEOPLE READ.

XIV.—A CONSTABLE.

It was my dog who effected the introduction. I had come home an hour or so after midnight, and my dog protested that he had been horribly bored, and thought the least I could do was to give him a run. I consented at once. On our return, five minutes later, I, the dog, and a constable met at my gate. The dog walked suspiciously round the constable, and the constable, eyeing the dog, remarked that it was a very lucky dog to be without a muzzle. I bade him good-night; but he was inclined for conversation, being, of course, a lonely man. Muzzles, he said, were stupid things, but they had very strict orders about them, and it was a warm night, a close night, in fact, a dry night, and if there was a drop—Well, there was a drop. In a few seconds he was standing by the revolving bookcase in my study with a whisky and soda in one hand and a cigar in the other. He looked genially around him, but with the professional eye for details, and surmised, if it was no offence, that I was a writing gentleman. Ah, yes; there was a lot of writing gentlemen living about here; there was Mr. John Morley just over there, and Mr. Barrie—he often saw Mr. Barrie walking down Gloucester-road, and you wouldn't think, to look at him—well, perhaps, he was a friend of mine; anyhow they did say that Mr. Barrie was all right for several thousand pounds. No. He hadn't read any of Mr. Barrie's books. It had to be one thing or the other. You've either got to do your work proper, and then you hadn't much time for reading in books, or else you read in books and weren't fit to do your work. That's where it was. The missus, now, she did read, having been a pupil teacher at a Board school; she had read one of Mr. Barrie's books, about a clergyman. I suggested The Little Minister. Yes, that was it; and ever since then she had wanted to see Mr. Barrie, but had never succeeded. Wonderful lot of books there was written; he looked around at my bookshelves; and newspapers, too; somebody must write them; if he might make so bold, did I write newspapers?

"That," I said, "is the sort of nonsense I write"; and I handed him a slip of paper from my desk. He glanced at it dubiously.

"It isn't published yet," I explained. "It's only a proof."

"Ah," he said, looking at it more carefully. "It's first-rate print, first-rate."

He had finished his whisky, and consented to take a drop more.

"Well, there is a lot of reading here," he said, as he contemplated my shelves, looking at them with the air of a man trying to identify an acquaintance among a gang of strangers. Presently his attention was arrested, and I saw that his eyes were upon the Adventures of Sherlock Holmes.

"You've read that?" I asked.

"Ah," he said. "My missus got that from the Free Library and made me read it. All about a 'tec," she said.

"And did you like it?"

He pursed his lips, looking at the remnant of liquor in his glass.

"I can't deny but what it was a good book—nice easy print and all that; but the gentleman what wrote it wasn't ever a constable."

"I don't think he was," I said.

"Well, then, they ain't true cases what he tells about. Because if you're going to be a detective, you've got to be a constable first. It wouldn't surprise me if I was taken into the—but that's boasting, and I don't like to boast. What I mean is, it's easy enough to catch a man if you make up the crime yourself, first to last. But it's quite different when you only have the crime to work on, and then have to find the criminal. I don't suppose Mr.—Mr.—let me see."

"Dr. Conan Doyle."

"—Conan Doyle ever thought of that."

"Then I expect you don't get very much time for reading."

"Oh, I like a bit of reading, especially Sunday mornings, if I get a few hours off duty. The People gives you a lot of reading. And then there's the Hue and Cry; we have to keep an eye on that. But not what you'd call reading—Shakespeare—and—and—Huxley—and them. Well, sir, I'm keeping you up. If you wouldn't mind just giving a look round the gate. Of course, I'm not supposed—in a general way—not to—"

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. HUGUES LE ROUX has written the inevitable complement of his "Sons of France" in the volume just published by Calmann Lévy, Nos Filles. Only more astonishing than the persistence with which men write treatises upon women's characters, weaknesses, and fashions is the patience with which women for centuries and centuries always receive these exhortations. Yet what a howl of ridicule and vexation would arise from masculine ranks if any woman were to dare comment in an entire volume devoted to the subject on the weaknesses and absurdities of men. Suppose some middle-aged lady were to write excellent articles telling young men what the girls they aspire to marry expect from them, what they should do and think and learn in order to please their future wives, bitterly condemning their iniquitous taste for clubs and absinthe, their bicycling, betting, and racing, and foretelling that the day would come when these now tolerated habits should prove disastrous to domestic life. This is exactly what M. Le Roux has done. Only the women, with the sublime and inexhaustible patience of their sex, will receive this fresh impertinence as they have received the rest. Poor creatures! They are so used to being badgered and criticised. The fun of the thing is, that they go on sinning in the perversest fashion, and the males have nothing to do but follow them, swearing and gnashing their teeth. Hence refuge in the only resource left these scolding and surprised superior beings—the sermon and public print. Heaven knows if they abuse it.

Since time immemorial the unmarried woman has been a stumbling-block in French civilisation. Even to-day she is a kind of déclassée. There is no place for her anywhere, and the only polite thing to do is to ignore her existence. In the days of Mme. de Maintenon she was denounced from the pulpit as "an object of scandal, an obstacle to public morals." To-day the situation is not greatly improved. The unmarried woman, if not "an object of scandal" in France, is one of general contempt. This is only natural in a land where the courtesan is publicly adulated. In France a woman only exists by the nature of her relations to men. She must be a wife or a mistress, it does not matter which, better if both, to obtain any measure of personal consideration.

So much must be understood to appreciate M. Le Roux's fervent tirade upon marriage. From a Frenchman's point of view he is justified in looking upon old maidenhood, even with independence, as the last form of misery. It is not the loneliness of the state that he deplures, but the lack of consideration from men and the complete social extinction it involves. Would it not be better to begin by seeking to clear the atmosphere of these idiotic prejudices, and boldly asserting that the unmarried woman should be weighed like the unmarried male—by the measure of personal value? Why should an old maid be a greater object of ridicule and contempt than an old bachelor, or either more pitiable than the overtaxed husband and overworked wife? If happiness comes through marriage (alas, how rarely!), marriage is then the best state in life for both sexes. But, if not?

M. Le Roux quotes the Ladies' Realm as one of the most important English magazines. And surely it is no less an eccentricity to assert that a dowry of £20,000 (500,000 frs.) is regarded by young Frenchmen as so inadequate as to condemn the owner to old maidenhood. Many of us might make shift to spend a very pleasant old maidenhood with £20,000, and be sure of the conspicuous devotion of our nephews and nieces.

Last autumn Mr. Benjamin Swift did me the honour to break a lance with me in behalf of a lady he supposed me to have injured by regarding Guy de Maupassant as her collaborator. My assertion was never denied, though it could not well have been more public in its utterance. I receive the lady's second book with very warm thanks for that same article, and not a word about my error. L'Amour est mon Péché, by the author of Amitié Amoureuse, is a curiously inferior book to that fascinating correspondence. This fact alone helps to support the rumour, which a year ago was what we here call un secret de Polichinelle. It will interest readers as a long and careful study of English aristocratic life. The heroine, the daughter of a ruined French Count, goes to England as the companion of the daughter of the Duke of Surrey. The author knows English well, and is at great pains to reproduce in French English idioms and manner of phrasing, with an inharmonious result in the too faithful transposition of the much abused English adverb. One must read in the precise and remorseless French tongue our "awfully" and "certainly" and "positively" reiterated ad nauseam to realise how inelegant our every-day English speech is, even of the best society. The author draws a delightful English old lady and a charming English girl, but for the rest she is hard on English women. She considers them in the main unintelligent, ungracious, and ungraceful, their conversation a string of adverbs, and jealousy and ill-nature their characteristics. When her French heroine embroiders a sachet for the Duchess's daughter, and trims it with real lace, she describes it as a "vengeance of woman" to give these mean Englishwomen a lesson, who cannot in the matter of gifts rise above a sixpenny Christmas card. The men are better, though they sometimes fall under the dinner-table. The English daily life and the hunting and balls are all well done. The heroine marries the Duke's younger son, which she certainly would not have done in France, and the distraction of married life is extremely unpleasant and indelicate. A clever book, but not fair.

George Pellissier's Études de Littérature Contemporaine (to which I shall refer again) contains some very sprightly and biting portraits, as well as literary studies. He is ingeniously and quite justifiably hard on Bourget, who, he tells us, "see-saws without fatigue between the 'criminal attraction of negation' and the 'splendour of deep faith.'" His favourite reading is The Imitation and Liaisons Dangereuses. The one inspires him without disgusting him with the other, and his originality lies in the confusion of both. His mysticism is admirably coupled with his sensuality. He condemns adultery with a sympathetic tear. He curses his female sinners through duty, and caresses them in reward. The Catholics, who yearn for his full conversion, are constantly taken in. The end of each book promises conversion; but, alas! the beginning of the next is as far away from sanctity as ever. M. Pellissier admits that he is dangerous by reason of the contagion of the moral diseases he delights to paint; but is still less dangerous than he is pleased to regard himself. He clericalises every virtue, and puts every ideal into a sentence. His latest enthusiasm is Leo XIII., before whose sorrows he sheds copious tears. He calls him a prisoner and a martyr, yet shows him each day outside his prison gates (the Vatican, where most of us would find imprisonment a dear delight) taking his daily exercise, and, as part of his martyrdom, smelling enchantedly the fragrance of a yellow rose. Bourget is regarded in Paris as the prince of snobs: now he is defined as the prince of humbugs.

H. L.

DRAMA.

PELLÉAS AND MÉLISANDE.

THE production of Maeterlinck's "Pelléas et Mélisande" at the Prince of Wales's for a series of nine matinées is an event in which the drama has, properly speaking, only a vague interest. For the piece is in no sense a play, contravening as it does at every turn all the recognised conditions of stage work. Maeterlinck may be a poet, a dreamer, a visionary, a what you will, but one thing he undoubtedly is not, namely, a dramatist. His ideas are loose and ill-defined; they float hither and thither indeterminately, and apparently without power to direct their own course. But that he possesses the true imaginative faculty is incontestable, although it still exists in an inchoate and undisciplined state. Some of the scenes in "Pelléas et Mélisande" are of a rare and delicate beauty, just as others seem positively ludicrous, through the author's inability to appreciate the grotesqueness of their character. Maeterlinck, in short, has been denied the great gift of humour, and is thus unable at times to distinguish between what is really sublime and what is obviously ridiculous. His passionate love for the mystical is apt, also, to prove misleading on the stage where clear and direct expression is a desideratum not lightly to be esteemed. Stripped of all its garnishing, there is, however, a very distinct story in "Pelléas et Mélisande," although the writer appears to take infinite pains to obscure its meaning by the introduction of much irrelevant and unintelligible matter. Possibly it is this very element of vagueness and incomprehensibility which, in the eyes of his admirers, is his truest recommendation.

MR. FORBES-ROBERTSON'S enterprise in presenting the piece cannot, however, be too highly applauded, for although it is essentially in the nature of an exotic which could not hope to survive exposure to the bracing atmosphere of an evening bill, it contains much that is both exquisite and interesting. It is, on the other hand, difficult to understand how a writer capable of conceiving and setting forth so touching and powerful a scene as that of the last act could at other moments descend to such profound depths of puerility. The revolting nature of certain episodes, revolting in their savage ferocity as in their sickly sentimentality, is, moreover, not to be denied. In the love passages Maeterlinck is sensuous rather than passionate, voluptuous rather than poetic. But here and there he contrives to touch a true note. In adapting the piece Mr. J. W. Mackail has shown considerable skill, although in one notable instance he has contrived fatally to misconstrue the author's meaning. In point of scenic beauty the production is irreproachable; the strange, bizarre significance of the text is preserved, and not infrequently heightened, by the lovely stage pictures and the charmingly expressive music which M. Gabriel Fauré has specially composed for the occasion. Nor could the performance be improved.

Mr. Forbes-Robertson's Golaud is a superbly virile impersonation, inevitably indicating him as the coming Othello; Mrs. Patrick Campbell is splendidly pathetic as Mélisande, and Mr. Martin Harvey is interesting as the love-sick Pelléas.

So far as any important novelty is concerned, Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's brief season in London is, this year, almost entirely barren. In her repertory figure such familiar plays as "La Dame aux Camélias," "Frou-Frou," and "Adrienne Lecouvreur," but of anything really fresh there is a lamentable lack. Of the circumstance the public apparently is sympathetically tolerant; content, seemingly, to see its old favourite again and again in characters which, one might have thought, were by this time worn completely threadbare. This attitude on the part of her admirers is, notwithstanding, perfectly comprehensible if, as would appear, Mme. Bernhardt finds it impossible to present anything more novel or stimulating than "Lysiane," her latest new play, performed at the Lyric Theatre on Monday evening. The piece failed to attract in Paris, and there certainly is no reason why it should enjoy more favour in London. The author, M. Romain Coolus, is a well-known French professor, and his work throughout smacks of the library. In style and quality it is purely academic; the writer possesses none of those attributes which distinguish the man of letters from l'homme du théâtre. M. Coolus, in short, has neither the inventive faculty nor the dramatic instinct necessary for the production of a really effective play. His characters talk in irreproachable French, but they are obviously merely puppets in the hands of a painstaking manipulator, not living beings governed by the impulses and the emotions common to humanity. The result is that the spectator remains unmoved alike by their sufferings and their joys.

THE story of "Lysiane" is practically a variant upon that of "L'Aventurière," and half a dozen other plays that might be mentioned. The author's manner of developing his theme is, moreover, curiously prolix and long-winded. One scene, and one alone, affords Mme. Bernhardt anything resembling fitting scope for the display of her acknowledged talents. If intrinsically of no extraordinary value, it possesses at least the merit of showing that time has not had any deteriorating influence upon the powers of the great French actress. No fresh aspect of her genius is revealed, however. Whether she be called on to coo with the softness of the dove or to turn with tigerish ferocity upon her pursuer, Mme. Bernhardt remains the same as of old. This, perhaps, is inevitable in a part closely modelled upon a pattern which has become far too familiar to most of us. When a piece is written solely with the view of exhibiting certain facets of an artist's talent, it would obviously be, however, unfair to complain that the terms of the understanding are strictly observed on both sides. Mme. Bernhardt's own appreciation of "Lysiane" may, notwithstanding, be judged by the fact that the piece is to be played twice only during her present engagement. The company she brings with her, with M. Lucien Guitry at its head, is fairly competent, if no more.

UPON the new musical farce, "A Stranger in New York," produced at the Duke of York's, there is no temptation to enlarge. It is purely and undisguisedly a variety show, organised on American principles, and neither calls for nor deserves criticism. The author modestly avows, by a note in the programme, that his object is "merely to attempt to supply material for an evening's entertainment," and it is for the public to decide whether he has accomplished his aim or not. Some of the performers engaged in the representation are, however, decidedly clever in their way, but their way is the way of music-hall artists rather than of genuine actors and actresses.

M. W.

THE "ANTIGONE" AT BRADFIELD.

NOTHING could be more favourable than the conditions which prevailed at Bradfield on Monday afternoon, when the first performance of the "Antigone" was given. This was fortunate, for in the open-air theatre the audience was entirely at the mercy of the elements, while their comfort would have been almost as much interfered with by great heat as by rain. Fortunately, neither of these disadvantages had to be faced. The day was warm, but not too hot, and though there were moments when the sun shone somewhat fiercely, a cool breeze always tempered its vehemence. The theatre, which has been recently enlarged, looked its best shut in by green trees which contrasted admirably with the dazzling white of the chalk out of which the seats are cut. The stage itself, with the handsome front of the Palace of Thebes, was very effective, while the orchestra, with its pavement of black-and-white surrounding the altar of Dionysius, in which the chorus trod its stately measures, made an admirable foreground to the raised stage. With such a theatre and such a day it was hoped that the representation would prove an artistic triumph.

This hope was not altogether realised. It may be taken for granted that in a performance of this kind fidelity to tradition is of the first importance. The circular theatre, white and gleaming in the summer sunshine, shut off by its trees from a world of railways and modern theatres, demanded a representation of Sophocles that should follow in all essentials that which was given long ago at Athens. It may be that the day of the tragic mask and the tragic buskin is too far removed from us to be recalled even for an afternoon's entertainment before a presumably learned audience, though we ourselves should not be sorry to see the attempt made if the structural and archaeological difficulties with regard to the reproduction of ancient masks could be overcome. But in all other respects tradition should have been respected. Under these circumstances, it was something of a shock to see the parts of Antigone, Ismene, and Eurydice essayed by ladies. This might have been forgiven in a modern play-house in the glare of footlights, with a limelight in the wings, but in a Greek theatre and almost Greek sunshine, the anachronism was glaring. One could not help expecting the wrath of Sophocles to arise and rebuke what would have seemed to him a shocking deviation from established dramatic usage. One can appreciate the difficulty of finding among the boys at Bradfield College an actor competent to undertake the difficult part of Antigone, but it was surely a mistake not to persevere in the attempt. Much could have been forgiven to the schoolboy who failed to give its full significance to the rôle, while success in it would have been a veritable artistic achievement. As it was, there was a modernity, a lack of restraint, and an excess of gesture about the heroine which robbed the play of much of its dignity. The Greek actor, hampered in his movements by the cothurnus, and unable, by reason of his mask, to employ facial expression, approached his art from a standpoint which had little in common with the Moderns. He must have relied in the main upon dignity of pose and gesture and perfect declamation of his speeches to produce his effects. There would have been few half-shades in his performance. In order to be impressive he had to be statuesque, whether he stood alone upon the stage or formed as it were one of a group of bas-relief. The stage picture was an illustrated accompaniment to the recitation of the poetry. It can hardly have been acting in our sense. An Antigone, played on these lines, could surely have been found among the Bradfield boys. The limitations in the field of gesture—a feature which might still have been retained though mask and buskin had disappeared—would have made the part easier to a schoolboy, and if he had been possessed of a cultivated voice and some perception of the art of speaking verse a most interesting impersonation might have been secured. Such a conception of the rôle might have been frigid, but it could hardly have been fidgety, and to fidget is the one unpardonable sin in a Greek tragedy. Nothing should be allowed to interfere with the statuesque and ideal character of the representation. This note unhappily was lacking in Mrs. Gray's performance on Monday.

It will perhaps be imagined that in saying this we are condemning the whole performance. The play of "Antigone" with the part of Antigone left out as it were sounds somewhat ominously. The play, however, was saved by the rare excellence of Mr. J. H. Vince's Creon. Nothing could have been better than the way in which he declaimed the magnificent speeches that fall to him. He has a voice of great range and quality and understands to perfection the art of speaking Greek verso. With extreme wisdom the Warden of Bradfield had decided not to tamper with our English pronunciation of Greek at the performance, and as spoken by Mr. Vince no language could sound more musical. His use of gesture was most judicious in its restraint and his posing—a most important factor in Greek tragedy—was excellent throughout. Of the Bradfield boys who took part in the performance, T. B. Layton as Second Messenger was the most successful. C. G. Ling was a somewhat unconvincing Haemon, and A. M. C. Nicholl played the Sentinel as if he were Launce in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona"—why, we are unable to say. Teiresias (G. A. W. Booth) lacked dignity, perhaps because old age had bent him double. He would have been more effective if he had been allowed to stand upright. He would have looked equally old and more venerable if he had done so.

In the costuming of the play there was much to praise, and the stage grouping was really excellent. The performance was greatly appreciated by the audience, if we may judge by the applause with which it was greeted, and, alas! interrupted. Nothing, apparently, will keep an English audience silent and in its seats to the end of a play, and the final choric song was drowned in the clapping of hands and the shuffling of departing footsteps. But it was an interesting occasion, and we are glad to see that the practice of presenting a Greek tragedy at the school every third year is likely to continue.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE RIGHTS OF THE REVIEWER.

(By a Publisher.)

THE old question of the rights of the reviewer has just been discussed before the House of Lords' Committee on Copyright. Mr. Dodley, the secretary of the Copyright Association, was examined upon the clauses of the Bill which deal with the right of adaptation or abridgment, wherein it is provided that "the making of fair and moderate extracts from a book which is the subject of copyright, and the publication thereof for the purpose of a review, shall not be an infringement." The following is the report of the proceedings:

"Lord Knutsford: 'You want to prevent all the plums being put in the newspapers, which in many cases would stop the sale of the book?'—'Precisely. I have known in copyrights in which I have been interested the whole of a tale taken bodily as a review.'

Lord Thring: 'Do you not think on the whole the fact of an author being noticed by a number of reviews is as much to his advantage as it is to his disadvantage that a review should sometimes take too much of his book?'—'That depends a great deal on circumstances. A favourable review may be an advantage. An unfavourable review may annihilate him almost.'

Lord Knutsford: 'But you do not wish to stop unfavourable reviews?'—'Not at all.'

'What you object to is taking either the best or the worst things in your book and putting them all in the newspaper, whether the review is favourable or unfavourable?'—'Just so.'

Lord Welby: 'But it is very difficult to draw words that would cover that, is it not? The reviewer must be left at liberty to illustrate his review, and it would be difficult to limit the right.'—'It is difficult.'

Lord Knutsford: 'It might be left to the Court.'

Lord Thring: 'Do you not think it more injurious to the public to frighten reviewers by putting in a clause of this sort than to leave the law as it stands?'—'I think not.'

Now, to the publisher this right of the reviewer raises important issues. Let me illustrate what I mean by referring to an instance of unfair reviewing, from a publisher's point of view, which came before my notice a short time ago. The Review of Reviews has done much to popularise good literature; Mr. Stead has often very considerably helped the sale of a book by one of his controversial articles. But his method of reviewing is now and then unjustifiable. Take the case of his article on Zola's Paris. I read that article, and I felt that I had read Paris. The story is given in the minutest detail; practically all the most striking passages are quoted at great length. I cannot imagine a single person buying the book after he had read the review, for the review was, to all intents and purposes, an abridged edition of the book. Mr. Stead may contend that the extracts were fair and moderate. I do not so much complain of the extracts. What I do protest against is this manner of reviewing a book, especially a novel, by giving a detailed summary of the whole story.

Another instance of very much the same class of reviewing occurs to me. Have the reviewers only made "fair and moderate" extracts from Mr. Russell's Reminiscences? I think not. They have, as Lord Knutsford expresses it, taken all the plums. I have read several reviews of the book, and I feel I have read all Mr. Russell's best stories. Why should I wade through a bulky volume when I can find all the most interesting parts of it in my newspaper? The new edition of Thackeray has suffered to some extent in the same way. Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie's most charming introductions have been quoted immoderately. I have my edition of Thackeray, and I have read most of the new matter contained in this new edition in the reviews. Why should I buy it?

There are, of course, certain books where long quotations are essential to an adequate review. But these are not usually works of fiction. The arguments of a philosophical or theological treatise must be summed up before they can be criticised. But a reviewer has no right to damage the value of a copyright of a book by too minute a summary of all it contains. Many books—especially religious and philosophical books—have been killed by over-reviewing.

I do not see, however, how any clause in the Copyright Law can limit the rights of reviewers. It is rather a question of common courtesy. Publishers owe a great deal to the critics, and authors owe perhaps even more, though a single review, even in the most influential papers, cannot now make or mar a book as it did in the old days. But if the style of reviewing to which we have referred were to become general, the sale of books would be materially hindered.

WHY NOT A SUMMER PUBLISHING SEASON?

FROM the First of July to the First of October the book publishing business is practically non-existent: at least it "lies low and says nuffin'." From the Twenty-fourth of December to the First of July the book publishing business is quiet, quieter indeed every year. The Spring publishing season is becoming more and more insignificant. Books that sell, and that ought to sell—there is a great difference—are nearly all issued within the three last months of the year.

This arrangement is fraught with the gravest consequences to the publishing and bookselling trade. The output in November and the early part of December is enormous, and it is becoming increasingly impossible for the bookseller, the reader, and the reviewer to keep pace with the quantity of new books. Many good books published during "the season" have not a chance of success. They are swamped in the deluge. The cry of the bookseller throughout the country is: "We dare not stock any more. Our shelves are overcrowded, and we have no room to display anything else." The printers, binders, and publishers get through the enormous accumulation of work with the greatest difficulty. The amounts paid for overtime during the winter season are astonishing. And for nine months in the year business in all these trades is slack. At the present time most of the business in many large publishing houses could be finished by midday. A large staff is kept throughout the year because a large staff is indispensable during the winter.

Is this system of publishing necessary? We think not. "People do not read books in the summer," you say. They do, as anyone at Mudie's Library will tell you. "A book published in the summer has no sale," says the publisher. But the experiment is so seldom tried. We believe that a popular novel would sell as well now as in October. Mr. Heinemann's experience with The Christian surely proves that people will read and buy certain books at any season of the year. Mr. Hall Caine's novel was issued in the midst of the holiday season. Its sale was enormous. It was the only new book of any interest, and early publication did not in any way interfere with the circulation at Christmas. And is not Helbeck of Bannisdale selling now by thousands?

Surely, considering the bad effects on all concerned of the congestion of new books in the winter, more publishers might make the experiment of issuing popular books during the summer. The "Trade" seems to have accepted the existing state of things—no travellers are sent out between the spring and the winter. Even if a few books are published, they are of very second-rate character, and no effort is made to push the sale. We suppose that the chief reason for the literary activity of the winter months is the fact that books are given largely as presents, not that people read more. But there is nothing to prevent a book issued in August selling at Christmas. For our part, we believe that a summer publishing season would prove remarkably successful.

And we can promise that the newspapers and literary periodicals will do their utmost to help the publisher who is daring enough to attempt this new system. A good book published in July and August is certain to be reviewed with care, whereas in the winter it is impossible to find room for even the briefest mention of many interesting publications.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING."

SIR,—It is exceedingly difficult to introduce a new idea into the heads of mankind. Mr. Clodd, in his generous review of my book, The Making of Religion, illustrates this familiar fact. He says: "If the great gods [of certain lower barbaric peoples] are fading abstractions . . . it would seem that Mr. Lang makes 'much ado about nothing.'" Now my point was that, as "fading abstractions," these great gods cannot be (as in one current anthropological theory they must be) the very latest results of religious evolution. Being the latest, they ought to be the most potent, and most vividly conceived, and most assiduously worshipped. The very reverse is the fact; they are "fading abstractions," while the religious conceptions which, on the current theory, are oldest—namely, ghosts and 'ghost-gods—are the most powerful and flourishing. Thus facts precisely contradict the current theory, "the ghost theory," and to say so is not, I hope, to make "much ado about nothing." I trust that this argument is not beyond the powers of the human intelligence to understand. If it is, I am lost; for it is a corner-stone of my simple edifice.—I am, &c.,
A. LANG.

"PAUL KRUGER AND HIS TIMES."

SIR,—I am sorry to be obliged to dispel an illusion, but, nevertheless, perhaps you will allow me to say that, so far from having lived "in close intercourse" with President Kruger and "heard his daily conversation," my personal acquaintance with the President is limited to a single interview of, perhaps, five-and-twenty minutes' duration, in March or April, 1890.—I am, &c.,
F. REGINALD STATHAM.

National Liberal Club:
June 21.

"HAMLET" AND PLATO'S "REPUBLIC."

SIR,—The suggestion that Plato's "Republic" had any influence on "Hamlet" is likely to appear at first sight altogether improbable. Ben Jonson's "small Latin and less Greek" is at once recalled. There is, however, no necessity for maintaining that Shakespeare was sufficiently conversant with Greek to be able to read Plato in the original; and, with respect to versions of the "Republic" in Latin and Italian which had been published before the year 1600, it is scarcely necessary to speak. In the year just named appeared Le Roy's French translation, edited by F. Morel, and, on the evidence especially of certain scenes in "King Henry V.," it has been reasonably maintained (Brandes) that Shakespeare was able to read, if not to speak, French. This being so, there is no difficulty in supposing that his attention was directed to Le Roy's version, and that he thence gained an acquaintance with the "Republic." This hypothesis may enable us to solve the disputed question concerning Hamlet's age, as well as to explain some other difficult places in the play.

The seventh book of the "Republic" opens with a very remarkable allegory. The world is represented as a subterranean cavern, in which its human inhabitants are prisoners. Their necks and legs are so bound and fettered that they can look only to the rear of the cave. Behind them is the entrance, such light as may come from which does not suffice to dispel the obscurity and gloom. At some distance, also, behind the prisoners, and above them, a fire sheds its light. Between the prisoners and the fire there is a wall; above this pass in succession various objects, whose shadows are cast on the back of the cave, towards which, as was just mentioned, the prisoners' faces are directed. They see the shadows, but not the objects. If, however, one of the prisoners were released suddenly from his fetters, and brought up out of the subterranean prison into the light of the sun, he would be, of necessity, dazzled by the glare, and greatly distressed.

The traces of this allegory in "Hamlet" seem to me unmistakable, even though it be true that Shakespeare did not servilely copy Plato.

In the first scene of the second act, Ophelia describes Hamlet as coming to her, when she was sewing in her chamber,

"his doublet all unbrac'd,
No hat upon his head, his stockings foul'd,
Ungarter'd, and down-gyved to his ancle,
Pale as his shirt; his knees knocking each other,
And with a look so piteous in purport,
As if he had' loosed out of hell,
To speak of horrors."

That Shakespeare intended in this description to depict the condition of a person who has just come forth from a prison or dungeon is made pretty clear when it is said that Hamlet looked "as if he had been loosed out of hell." His stockings are "ungarter'd," and hang about the ancle, the fetters having prevented them from being drawn fully up the leg. This I take to be the probable meaning of "down-gyved to his ancle," an expression which at once reminds us of the fetters on the prisoners' legs in Plato's world-cavern. And when, in the sequel, we read of Hamlet's hand being held "o'er his brow," as if to protect his eyes from too dazzling light, we easily recall the prisoner suddenly released from Plato's cave. It is, moreover, very noteworthy that in the next scene (Act ii., sc. 2) the world is described as a goodly prison, "in which there are many confines, wards, and dungeons."

In full agreement with the supposition that Shakespeare had Plato's allegory in view when he described the world as a prison is a closely contiguous passage which has greatly puzzled the commentators: "Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows." Shakespeare apparently conceives of the beggars as objects passing above the partition in the rear of Plato's prisoners, and of the beggars' shadows, cast on the internal wall of the cavern, as the only monarchs and heroes seen by the prisoners. Plato had described (Rep. vii. 521) evil consequences which would ensue if the Government of the State were seized by the competitive ambition of beggars or persons destitute of appropriate qualifications. Le Roy's version gives pauvres et destituez de biens propres. Shakespeare, it would seem, satirically represents the world's monarchs and heroes as the shadows of such beggars. The otherwise difficult expression, "outstretched heroes," entirely suits the idea of lengthened shadows.

We may now come to the difficulty which has been felt about Hamlet's being already thirty years of age (according to the gravedigger's statement in Act v., sc. 1) when intending to resume his studies at Wittenberg. A probable explanation of the difficulty is to be found in the fact that Plato (Rep. vii. 539) fixes the age of thirty as the age at which the serious study of dialectic or philosophy is to be commenced; and after five years of study, the students, still spoken of as young, are to enter on important offices of state. And it is worthy of note that, a little before the mention of the "thirty years," we have "young Hamlet," though no doubt this might be otherwise explained.

According to the edition of 1603, which, it can scarcely be doubted, represents—however imperfectly—Shakespeare's earlier conception of his great tragedy, Hamlet, as is well known, would be much younger than thirty. Yorick's skull has lain in the earth "this dozen years" instead of the twenty-three years of the later texts. Hamlet's age (eleven years being deducted) would become nineteen. This discrepancy would be accounted for by the supposition that Shakespeare became acquainted with Le Roy's version of the "Republic" after he had first written "Hamlet." A similar explanation might be applied with respect (1) to the description of Hamlet as a released prisoner, (2) of the world as a prison, and (3) of monarchs and heroes being beggars' shadows. The latter particulars, (2) and (3), appear for the first time in the Folio (1623); (1) is found in the Quarto of 1604. But, whatever may have been the date of Shakespeare's first acquaintance with the "Republic," the influence of that work is, I think, manifest.—I am, &c.,

THOMAS TYLER.

London: June 13.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

The Open Boat, and Other Stories. By Stephen Crane. The Westminster Gazette's critic begins his review with the remark:

"Mr. Stephen Crane has not yet given us the complete novel which some day or other we all expect of him."

While Literature remarks:

"When a writer works in this manner, generally, it must be admitted, with less success than Mr. Crane, his friends, as a rule, urge him to sustained efforts of which he is not capable, and lament that he does not write 'a regular novel.' For ourselves, we see no evidence in these sketches that Mr. Crane is equal to any such undertaking."

After this pretty divergence of opinion we may take an agreement. The critics of the Outlook and Literature are at one in their view of the relation between Mr. Crane's matter and his manner. Says the first critic:

"The author is always more interested in the manner in which a given event comes to pass than in the event itself. He is ever intensely preoccupied with the psychology of circumstance. And it is this preoccupation which both secures to him the mastery of the conte, the short story proper, and denies him success in the relation of a story whose interest lies in its appropriate culmination."

And in Literature we read:

"They [Mr. Crane's stories] are incidents rather than stories, and are selected not for their dramatic interest, which the author apparently wishes to exclude, but as a vehicle for the telling touches in which he paints aspects of nature, or analyses human emotions. Some of them are so extremely slight that one is tempted to think that almost any other ordinary incident would have served Mr. Crane's purpose equally well. We can assure him that the value of his work, and the reader's pleasure, would be much increased if he chose his subjects as carefully as the words in which he describes them. In 'The Red Badge of Courage' he had an excellent subject, certain aspects of which are repeated in one of these sketches; the rest, however, appeal too exclusively to our appreciation of his power of vivid presentment, and that, in our opinion, is their chief defect."

The Athenæum says that the stories in this volume show evident signs

"of that extraordinary ability, amounting to genius, which distinguishes all the prose of Mr. Crane; but we doubt whether they will hit the taste of the public in this country, as they are too sombre and too generally concerned with persons of a somewhat uniform type of white savagery."

"The Life of Judge Jeffreys." By H. B. Irving. (Heinemann.) "ACCEPTING the writer's conclusions, and finding little fault with the details of his work," the Spectator pays Mr. Irving the compliment of an independent testimony, of three columns' length, to the general soundness of his presentation of this extraordinary man. It is pointed out that the sources of information are all hostile.

"They may be ranged under three headings

—the frantic diatribes of the friends, relatives, and partisans of those on whom he had passed sentence in the Western Rebellion; the accounts given of him by those who, as Whigs and Non-conformists, were naturally and necessarily, considering the part he had to play, his strong enemies; and lastly, the more temperate, but not less prejudiced, notices of him by men who had various reasons for presenting him in an unfavourable light."

The cases of what have been called the "judicial murders" of Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney having been weighed, and the conflicting accounts of the "Bloody Assize"—including the trial of Lady Alice Lisle, who was condemned and executed for harbouring rebels—the reviewer sums up as follows:

"It would be absurd to contend that Jeffreys was either a high-minded or a virtuous man. He was an ambitious adventurer, pursuing fortune in what was little better than a social and political cesspool. He must be judged relatively. He must be compared with those who jostled him at the Bar or sat beside him on the Bench, with such sots as Treby, Shaw, and Saunders, with such libertines as Pemberton and Scroggs, with such 'butcher-birds' as Wright, Pollexfen, Howel, and Jenner, with politicians like Sunderland and Shaftsbury, with ecclesiastics like Sprat, Cartwright, and Parker. And he will not lose by the comparison. His career had the merit of consistency. . . . He was not corrupt. . . . He was neither a hypocrite nor untruthful, neither a charlatan nor a sycophant. The stories told about his hardness and brutality rest wholly on the authority of his enemies, and are very difficult to reconcile with what is certainly known."

The St. James's Gazette, if less convinced, is no less complimentary.

"Now, when we all thought judgment had long since been given, and sentence finally passed, by mankind, there comes a junior counsel, in the person of Mr. H. B. Irving, holding a brief for the notorious Chief Justice, and 'showing cause' in spirited fashion against all the learned big-wigs from Burnet to Macaulay! And the best of it is that he argues his case remarkably well, and cites undeniable authorities to support it."

Allusion is made to the appeal to Kneller's portrait of Jeffrey's handsome and refined features, and the condition of the law of evidence is compared to that which was exemplified in M. Zola's trial. In fine:

"Mr. Irving is perhaps driven, in defence of his client, to over emphasise what may be said in his favour; but he appears, on the whole, to have applied the critical method not unfairly to Jeffrey's career. It was no doubt unfortunate for the Judge that the most furious of his Tory actions were so quickly followed by Tory collapse, that his reputation immediately became a prey to the fury of Whig writers; but no pleading can make him appear an amiable character, even in the age of Shaftesbury, Sunderland, and Oates, and his name will remain for ever in the catalogue of fireside bogies. But Mr. Irving's vivacious and readable narrative may be safely commended as a painstaking re-examination of the original sources of history, and a spirited attempt, not wholly unsuccessful, to question the conclusions of great, but by no means infallible, writers."

THE SPECTATOR treats Mr. Capes' book with extreme respect. A passage descriptive of the Thames "recalls one of the finest of Mr. Henley's Voluntaries." "He is not less successful in the framing of his plot, the invention of incident, and the discreet application of the great law of suspense." The book, as a whole,

"might not be unfairly described as a blend of Le Fanu and Stevenson. It has the 'creepiness' of the former, and the grace of style, the literary finesse, of the latter."

The Athenæum does not treat Mr. Capes' book with extreme respect. It "has qualities of a solid order, in more senses than one. It is by no means easy reading, not only on account of its material weight and substance, but also because it is written in that difficult and complicated language which the admirers of Mr. Meredith have adopted in order to show their reverence for the Master. . . . But the process is one which readers of even the genuine Meredithian work sometimes feel irksome. Whether it is wise for a lesser writer to expect people to take this trouble in deciphering an imitation is, to say the least, doubtful."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Week ending Thursday, June 23.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE EVE OF THE WORLD'S TRAGEDY: OR, THE THOUGHTS OF A WORM. By Louis H. Victory. Louis H. Victory. 6s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

FATHER AND SON: MEMOIRS OF THOMAS THOMAS AND LLEWELYN THOMAS. Edited by Harriet Thomas. Henry Frowde. 6s.

W. E. GLADSTONE: A SOUVENIR. Reprinted from Chambers's Encyclopædia. W. & R. Chambers, Ltd.

POETRY, CRITICISM, BELLES LETTRES.

POET'S WALK: AN INTRODUCTION TO ENGLISH POETRY. Chosen and arranged by Mowbray Morris. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.

THE "POCKET FALSTAFF" SHAKESPEARE: KING LEAR AND THE WINTER'S TALE.

BRUNETIÈRE'S ESSAYS IN FRENCH LITERATURE. A selection translated by D. Nichol Smith. T. Fisher Unwin.

THE WORLD AT AUCTION: A PLAY. By Michael Field. Hacon & Ricketts. 15s.

VERSES. By B. E. Baughan. A. Constable & Co. 5s.

ESSAYS AT EVENTIDE. By Thomas Newbigging. Gay & Bird. 3s. 6d.

WILLOW AND LEATHER. By E. V. Lucas. J. W. Arrowsmith. 1s.

BERTH-DECK BALLADS: "OLD GLORY" AND OTHER POEMS. By William S. Bate. New York.

AN ANALYSIS OF MENDELSSOHN'S ORGAN WORKS: A STUDY OF THEIR STRUCTURAL FEATURES. By Joseph W. G. Hathaway. William Reeves.

SCIENCE.

THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES: THE STUDY OF MAN. By A. C. Haddon. Bliss, Sands & Co. 6s.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

EPPING FOREST. By Edward North Buxton, Verderer. Fifth edition, revised. Edward Stanford. 1s.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO LONDON AND ITS ENVIRONS. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. Tenth edition. A. & C. Black. 1s.

BLACK'S SHILLING GUIDE TO SCOTLAND. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. A. & C. Black. 1s.

COLONEL ALEXANDER GARDNER. Edited by Major Hugh Pearse. With Introduction by Sir Richard Temple. W. Blackwood & Sons. 15s.

A SUMMER ON THE ROCKIES. By Major Sir Rose Lambert Price. Sampson Low & Co.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY COLLEGE HISTORIES: ST. JOHN'S. By W. H. Hutton. F. E. Robinson (London). 5s.

COMPENDIUM OF GEOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL: NORTH AMERICA. Vol. II: THE UNITED STATES. By Henry Ganmeth. Edward Stanford. 15s.

OVER THE ALPS ON A BICYCLE. By Mrs. Pennell. T. Fisher Unwin. 1s.

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

W. E. GLADSTONE. By G. Barnett Smith. Ward, Lock & Co. 5s.

WAVERLEY NOVELS, TEMPLE EDITION: THE MONASTERY. By Sir Walter Scott. Vols. XVIII. and XIX. J. M. Dent & Co. 3s.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. A Revised Translation, Notes, and Introduction. By C. Bigg, D.D. Methuen & Co. 2s.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE UNIVERSITY TUTORIAL SERIES: DEMOSTHENES: MEIDIAS. A Translation. By W. J. Woodhouse, M.A. TEXT-BOOK OF ZOOLOGY. By H. G. Wells, B.Sc., and A. M. Davies, B.Sc. W. B. Clive.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TABLE-BOOK OF ARITHMETIC, MONEY, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES, &c. Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd. 1d.

AN INDEX TO THE EARLY PRINTED BOOKS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM: FROM THE INVENTION OF PRINTING TO THE YEAR MD., WITH NOTES OF THOSE IN THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY. By Robert Proctor. Second Section: ITALY. Kegan Paul.

LAO-TZE'S TAO-TEH-KING: CHINESE ENGLISH. With Introduction, Transliteration, and Notes. By Dr. Paul Carus. The Open Court Publishing Co. (Chicago.)

ROWING. By R. P. P. Rowe and C. M. Pitman. With Contributions by C. P. Serocold, F. C. Begg, and S. Le B. Smith. Longmans, Green & Co. 10s. 6d.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE. By Carveth Read, M.A. Grant Richards. 6s.

CYCLING FOR EVERYBODY. By G. Lacy Hillier. Chapman & Hall.

THE LONDON YEAR BOOK. The Grosvenor Press. 1s.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Oxford University Press has nearly finished printing the first part of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, which is being edited by Messrs. B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt for the Egypt Exploration Fund. The volume, which will appear at the end of the present month, contains 158 texts, thirty-one being literary, and including the early fragments of St. Matthew's Gospel, Sappho, Aristoxenus, Sophocles, and of other lost and extant classics. The remainder is a selection of official and private documents dating from the first to the seventh century of our era, many of them of exceptional interest. The texts are accompanied by introductions, notes, and in most cases by translations. There are eight collotype plates illustrating the papyri of principal literary and palæographical importance.

The controversy which has agitated Paris over Rodin's "Balzac" statue will add additional interest to the July number of the Art Journal, which is to contain an appreciative article on the great French sculptor, by Mr. Charles Quentin, with reproductions of some of his most noted works, including the "Balzac."

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has issued a series of "Climbers' Guides," about the size of a Punch Pocket-book, but in a cover that no weather can destroy. Briefly and clearly Sir W. M. Conway, Mr. W. A. B. Coolidge, and others, explain the routes to be taken by adventurers in the Pennine ranges, the Lepontine Alps, the mountains of Coque and the Tödi.

The July number of Science Progress will contain, among other articles, papers on "Prehistoric Man in the Eastern Mediterranean," by J. L. Myres, Senior Student of Christ Church, Oxford, and "The Fall of the Meteorites in Ancient and Modern Times," by Prof. H. A. Miers, F.R.S.

"THE LIFE AND WORK OF SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES," which formed one of the extra numbers of the Art Journal, contained illustrations of all his leading pictures, including "The Briar Rose," "The Golden Stairs," "The Mirror of Venus," "The Star of Bethlehem," "Chant d'Amour," "The Wheel of Fortune," and "King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid."

The July number of the Lady's Realm, to be published next week, will be a double summer number, with over 190 illustrations, and nearly 200 pages. Among its principal contents will be an illustrated article on Ellis Roberts, the portrait painter, with many reproductions from his paintings published for the first time.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

GUY BOOTHBY'S VERY POPULAR NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, special design, 5s. each.

Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

LUST OF HATE.

"Most strangely and absorbingly interesting, and from the first to the last page compels and enthralled the attention of the reader."—St. James's Budget.
 "A story full of action, with never-failing vigour and vivacity, abundance of exploits, and variety of adventurous interest."—Globe.

[Just ready.

BUSHIGRAMS.

"Intensely interesting. Forces from us, by its powerful artistic realism, those choky sensations which it should be the aim of the humane writer to elicit, whether in comedy or tragedy. The book will enhance Mr. Boothby's reputation and bring him into the very front rank of emotional writers, as well as confirm our opinion of him as a most powerful imaginative author. His humorous vein is fascinating and attractive. His pathos is true and often most touching."—Manchester Guardian.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

"A brilliant tale, dramatically and vigorously told."—Daily News.
 "A most picturesque romance, noteworthy for its spirited style, chivalrous tone, powerful human interest, and freedom from commonplace in plot and characterisation."—Globe.
 "Highly ingenious and exciting. . . . A stirring romance."—World.

DOCTOR NIKOLA.

"Carrying it out Mr. Boothby exhibits a power of imagination altogether exceptional."—Bookman.
 "One hair-breadth escape succeeds another with rapidity that scarce leaves the reader breathing space. . . . The interest of their experiences is sufficient to stay criticism, and carry him through a story ingeniously invented and skilfully told."—Scotsman.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL.

"An original idea worked out in original fashion. A book for all who like stories told in a bright, healthful style."—Globe.

521-4

A BID FOR FORTUNE.

"It is impossible to give any idea of the verve and brightness with which the story is told. Mr. Boothby may be congratulated on having produced about the most original novel of the year."—Manchester Courier.

IN STRANGE COMPANY.

"A capital novel of its kind—the sensational adventures. It has the quality of life and stir, and will carry the reader with curiosity unabated to the end."—World.

THE MARRIAGE OF ESTHER.

"A story full of action, life, and dramatic interest. . . . There is a vigour and a power of illusion about it that raises it quite above the level of the ordinary novel of adventure."—Manchester Guardian.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

"A brilliant book."—Sketch. "Particularly good."—Academy.
 6s. net, claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Letter from H.M. the QUEEN.

"Sir Henry Ponsonby is commanded by the Queen to thank Mr. Darlington for a copy of his Handbook which he has sent to Her Majesty."

"Nothing better could be wished for."—British Weekly.
 "Far superior to ordinary Guides."—London Daily Chronicle.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

16cap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

|  |                      |
|--|----------------------|
| BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.                              | THE CHANNEL ISLANDS. |
| THE NORTH WALES COAST.                                   | THE ISLE of WIGHT.   |
| BRECON and its BEACONS.                                  | THE WYE VALLEY.      |
| ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.                             | THE SEVERN VALLEY.   |
| BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.             |                      |
| BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.        |                      |
| LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, BETWYSYCOED and SNOWDON.        |                      |
| ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH and ABERDOVEY.         |                      |
| BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH and PWLLHIEL.     |                      |
| MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER and CHELTENHAM. |                      |
| LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.             |                      |

NOTICE.

On JULY 1st will be Issued an ENLARGED EDITION, 5s.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

(By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.)

With Descriptions of the Tate Gallery, Passmore Edwards Settlement, Blackwall Tunnel, &c., and an additional Index of 4,500 References to Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.
 The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

Writer's Cramp.

"G. J., aged 33, wrote 7-8 hrs. daily. . . . after about 7 yrs. of this employment the initial symptoms of writer's cramp first declared themselves. . . . I learn the cramp now affects the whole arm and he intends to abandon his present occupation for another of a totally different description."

B'ham Medical Review.

"I may add in my practice as a surgeon, I have found the gold-nib a preventative as well as a corrective of writer's cramp—no slight recommendation, I think."

Herbert Vine, M.B., C.M.

Send for Illustrated Price List or call—

MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
 Manufacturers of Gold Nibs and the
Swan Fountain Pen,
 93, Chapside; 95, Regent Street,
 London;
 and
 3, Exchange Street, Manchester.

University of Toronto Library

---

DO NOT REMOVE
THE CARD FROM THIS POCKET

Acme Library Card Pocket
LOWE-MARTIN CO. LIMITED.

